Four years more of labor and anxiety have passed away, and the great council of the church is about to convene to review the results of these years of toil, and to arrange for greater labors and conquests in the future. Much good has been done, many souls brought to Christ, and the church in all respects strengthened and built up. The reports from every field will show a healthy growth in all things good. Our domestic work has prospered; our foreign missions have increased in numbers and efficiency; and our sunday-schools have gone up from 7,917 in 1878 to 9,129 in 1881, or an increase of 1,182; pupils from 353,163 in 1878 to 440,614 in 1881, or an increase of 77,451. Our periodicals have greatly increased in circulation during the last four years; in 1878 it was 250,000 copies monthly, in 1882 it is over 400,000 copies. Our Publishing House has been relieved from embarrassment, and placed on a safe foundation. All these interests will be fully reported to the General Conference. There is much cause for thankfulness to God.

Rev. J. L. P. Sheppard writes as follows from Pineville, La., April 6. "The interest here is deepening, five more accessions last Sunday, and the services all good; a solemn awe pervading in every congregation; but little of that lightness and frivolousness which so often steel the people against the power of the gospel. Of course there are some exceptions.

Rev. A. M. Brown, writing from Minden, La., April 7, says: "We are doing well here considering the times." In my pastoral visits and in my congregations, I present the claims of the ADVOCATE, but oh! the scarcity of money! A goodly number of my members, however, are subscribers already.

Rev. Dr. Mood, Chancellor of the Southwestern University, Georgetown, Texas, writes to the Nashville Christian Advocate:

God has again visited us in great mercy. The revival has been far-reaching and deep. Fifty-one have professed faith in Christ—some forty of them students of the University, who for the first time have been brought under the religious influences of our institution during the present session. As every year, since our foundation here under the union charter, has been marked by an increase of students, so each year has been accompanied by increased moral and religious power, for which we give devout thanks to the great Head of the Church.

The Virginia Conference sets a good example of earnest interest in the mission work in Mexico. Mass meetings were held in both Richmond and Petersburg on the occasion of Dr. Patterson's recent visit there. He received six hundred dollars for the mission an Virginia children sustain in Mexico.

Dr. A. W. Wilson has just had printed a History of Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Dr. Summers pronounces it a concise manual, and says it should be placed in every family and Sunday-school in the connection.

Valedictory.

In retiring from the ADVOCATE I desire to express my gratitude to its patrons for the forbearance exhibited over any errors of omission or commission that may have occurred during the past three years or more that I have been its publisher. Also to thank its agents for their earnest efforts and kindly aid extended, and express the hope that they will still further exert themselves to increase its circulation and widen its influence, that it may be always self-sustaining, and maintained on a solid basis. My other business interests compel me to sever my connection with the paper, but I shall always feel an abiding interest in the ADVOCATE, its editor, publishing committees, agents and subscribers.

G. T. LATHROP.

Note from Publishing Committee.

Mr. Lathrop, in retiring from the business management of the ADVOCATE, carries, with him the best wishes of the Publishing Committee, and, we may safely say, of the agents and subscribers also. During his connection with the paper the accounts have been kept with accuracy, and the paper has been issued promptly and in good style. The Publishing Committee, from the time of Mr. Lathrop's retirement, April 25, assume the business control and all financial responsibility. The Publishing Committee have employed Mr. T. J. Carver as their business manager. All communications on business should be addressed to no individual name, but "To the New Orleans Christian Advocate, 112 Camp street, New Orleans."

FELIX R. PITT,
LINUS PARKER,
CHRISTIAN KEENER,
Sub-Committee.

Business Manager's Notice.

As will be seen in the above, the undersigned has taken the business management of the ADVOCATE. This will in no wise interfere with my commission business conducted at 60 Carondelet street, this city. I shall have ample time to give all needed assistance to the Publishing Committee. The late publisher, Mr. Lathrop, has so systematized the business department of the paper that no changes will be needed. Everything will go on as if no change in the management had been made. As stated above, all communications must be addressed to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

T. J. CARVER.

—The floods in southern Louisiana are slowly declining, but not sufficiently, as yet, to afford much relief. In the sugar regions several weeks must elapse before the fields will be dry, and, in any case, there can be no planting of cane before next fall or winter. The value of sufficient cane to plant one acre is about forty dollars, even if it can be purchased; but it is not likely that planting for a full crop will be practicable, in many cases, for two or three years to come.

The people in the cotton belt are generally much encouraged. Their lands are drying off, and in most instances some part of a crop will be made.

The effects of the great flood of 1882 will be felt for years; and the results to the business and finances of Louisiana, and to our State securities, will be specially unfortunate and protracted. To the business interests of New Orleans this flood is more disastrous than was the yellow fever epidemic of 1878.

—Capt. J. F. Lhuscott, under the auspices of the National Christian Woman's Temperance Union, is lecturing in New Orleans. He lectures every night of this week at the Unitarian Church, on St. Charles street. The captain is an earnest and most entertaining speaker, and a noble advocate of the cause of temperance. We sincerely hope that his visit here will arouse an increased interest in temperance, and that much good may be done through his efforts. He comes to us highly and fully endorsed by Miss Frances E. Willard and other well-known temperance workers.

—Rev. Dr. Ahrens lectures at the Soniparu Street, German Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in this city, Friday night, at eight o'clock, April 21, on "what I have seen during my travels in Europe." The lecture will be well worth hearing.

—The General Conference Daily—specimen copy—is excellent in form and general make-up. It is of the right size for convenient reading and also for binding. The price is $1 for the session. J. B. McFerrin, D. D., publisher; O. P. Fitzgerald, D. D., editor.

—Dr. C. B. White, a prominent physician of New Orleans, died, on Monday, April 17. Dr. White was specially noted for his untiring efforts to improve the sanitary condition of this city. In his death we have lost a good and most useful citizen.

—The NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, besides editorial correspondence, will contain the proceedings of the General Conference nearly in full. All that our readers will care to see will be given.

—The session of the New Orleans District Conference, at Baton Rouge, April 13-15, was a very pleasant occasion. The secretary, Dr. Carter, will give some account of the proceedings in next week's ADVOCATE.

WANTED.—Our well known and highly esteemed contributor, "Invalid," is thinking of publishing a volume of poems bearing the title of "Wood Notes." She desires those wishing to subscribe for the work to inform her by postal-card, address: Miss Maggie R. Beale, Canton, Miss. Miss Beale is a writer of decided merit, and we have no doubt that "Wood Notes" will be an attractive and valuable work. We commend the gifted author and her work to the considerate and generous attention of our readers.

Rev. W. M. Patterson, D. D., superintendent of our Central Mexican Mission, says the Western Methodist, of April 15, returned Tuesday to Memphis where he found his family in good health. Dr. Patterson, during his tour visited the brethren in Richmond, Petersburg, Fredricksburg, Baltimore, St. Louis, Louisville, Nashville, and various other places. He is much pleased with his observations and the results of his tour in relation to the work in Mexico. He found wherever he went that the brethren felt deeply interested and he is assured that they will take interest even greater in the evangelization of our neighbors. Dr. Patterson goes next to Columbus, Miss. where he is due April 16, and thence to Moldle, Macon, Savannah, Atlanta and Nashville, where he expects to spend the last Sunday in April. A few days at the General Conference he hopes to enjoy, and thence to the City of Mexico.

The good work of God prospers in Memphis among Methodists, and others too—Presbyterians and Baptists, sharing in the gracious influences. Of the results at Hernando Street Church, mention will be made hereafter. A large number of persons—we have not the figures—have been received to membership at the First Church. The revival at Sartaran-street Church increase in power—thirty-seven conversions up to Monday evening last. Brother Evans, who has been helping others, begins now a series at Central Church—may the work prosper.—Western Methodist.

Personal and Other.

—The growth of circulation of American illustrated magazines in England is somewhat remarkable. In November 20,500 copies of the Century were sold against an average of 16,230 for the twelve months preceding. The recent growth of St. Nicholas has been even greater in proportion; for while 3,000 copies were sufficient there a year ago, 8,000 and 10,000 copies are now needed every month.

—Nearly all the aged members of the peerage of the United Kingdom are Irish: The Earl of Mountcashel, aged 89, who is the oldest peer in existence, is an Irishman; and the oldest marquis, the Marquis of Donegal, aged 84; the oldest judge, Baron Fitzgerald, close on 75, and the oldest bishop, the Bishop of Kelmore, aged 81, are of the same nationality.

—The oldest son of the Russian Emperor is in his fourteenth year, of an active and lively disposition, and, for his years far advanced in his studies. Russian is always the language employed by the imperial family when they are together, but when the boys are with their teachers they speak French and English, on alternate days, six hours a day.

—Plans are on foot for the establishment in St. Paul, Minn., of a Young Ladies' Seminary of the highest order, unsectarian, under general Christian care and influence. Efforts are making to raise by subscription $50,000, for land and buildings, with furniture and school equipment. Such an institution is much needed in that region.

—The Russians intend to build in the Shipka Pass, midway between the village of Shipka and St. Nicholas, the summit of the pass, a chapel, a monastery and a seminary. The walls are to be five feet thick and to enclose the well—built by the Turks—which furnishes the sole water supply.

—The death is announced at Hastings, in his 84th year, of Rev. Samuel Dunn, formerly a Wesleyan minister, whose expulsion from the Conference in 1849, together with that of Messers. Everett and Griffith, caused a great agitation in the Wesleyan body.

—King Kalakua, of the Sandwich Islands, is fitting up the new royal palace at Honolulu, which has cost about a quarter of a million, and has sent his chamberlain to this country after the furniture, which he expects to buy in this city, Philadelphia, and Boston.

—Francis Scott Key, the namesake and grandson of the writer of the "Star Spangled Banner," is an applicant for the first vacancy in the rank of second lieutenant in the Marine Corps. His application is signed by the most prominent men of all parties in Maryland.

—The ex-Empress Eugenie is at present living in a small house within the grounds of Osborne, in the Isle of Wight, and is visited daily by Queen Victoria, who has proved a devoted friend to the afflicted lady.

—The will of the late Rev. William Morley Punshon has been proved, the personal estate being sworn under $70,000. The only legacy to a religious society is $250 to the Wesleyan Missionary Society.

—Pinot says, in one of his writings: "I cannot deny that time, and perhaps time alone, has somewhat cooled my enthusiasm, and if certain things continue I shall end by admitting nothing but Providence."

—Of the delegates from the United States to the Ecumenical Conference to be held in London next fall, fourteen are bishops, sixty-seven are doctors of divinity, and thirty-four are colored.

—The colored people of Richmond, Va., are loudly demanding that teachers of their own race should be placed in the public schools.

—Chung Tsao Ju, the new Chinese minister, is a clever diplomat and scholar, about fifty-four years old. He is a man of great wealth.

—The Grand Duke Constantine, uncle to the Czar, has taken house in Paris, and it is probable that he will reside there in future, as he is not permitted to return to Russia.

—The present Congress now sitting in Washington numbers among its members eight Irishmen, five Englishmen, four Scotchmen, and three Germans.

—John R. Buchtle, of Akron, Ohio, gave $75,000 more to the Buchtle College, Akron, making his gift nearly $200,000.

Books and Periodicals.

AUNT PEGGY, and other poems. By Rev. T. A. S. Adams, 12mo., 240 pages. Price 75 cents for single copy; three copies to one address $2; six copies $3,75; one dozen $7; twenty or more 51 cents each. Address Rev. T. A. S. Adams, Kosciusko, Miss.

The author of Enscotidion, in this work, chooses a humbler theme, and his verse will command more popular appreciation. Aunt Peggy reminds us of the simple and sparkling beauty of Goldsmith, and sometimes of the style and thought of Cowper. The measure and rhyme are musical, and the story with its incidents, scenes, humor, pathos, and religious and moral reflections, flows on smooth and clear as a brook. In Aunt Peggy the author relates several incidents, as received by tradition, illustrative of Southern Frontier life, fifty years ago. "The only deviation, from tradition," says the author, "is in bringing the heroine nearer the present date than reality." Domestic and rural life is depicted graphically, and nature, in almost every aspect and mood, is painted with wonderful power and accuracy. The author has an eye for the beautiful, and catches and describes the minutest shades and colors in a landscape, and depicts domestic scenes with striking vividness and truthfulness.

Aunt Peggy is a character well drawn—a portrait biographical, set in the frame of every day life, and exhibiting the best traits of female excellence. About this character and history are gathered abundant riches of incident, description, and wise and pertinent reflections, and the manners and customs of fifty years ago, are reproduced with masterly skill.

The style abounds in startling contrasts, the grave the gay, the humorous, the sedate, the homely and the ornate, the backwoods vernacular and the classic. There is movement, variety, liveliness, and a well sustained interest from the beginning to the end.

Aunt Peggy occupies a little more than half of the volume. The "Other Poems are of varied merit. Among the best of them, if we may judge, are: "Growing Gray," "The Island in the Future's Sea," "Old Papers," "Swift as the Shadows Fly," "The Orphan's Tear."

Doubtless there may be some faults of style in the structure of the verse, and inadequacy in the conception and treatment. If we were capable of pointing them out in detail we should not care to do so. The excellencies are many; the blemishes comparatively few. These poems are pleasing, they are also wholesome and inspiring, and calculated to make us purer and better. It may be that the author has been unfortunate in the title of his works. "Enscotidion" was certainly obscure as a fiddle to most people, and "Aunt Peggy" may sound too common place. However this may be, there is genuine poetry in the book if there be none in the name. We have a poet among us, and we commend his works to all who would enjoy and encourage merit and worth.

THE COMPLETE HOME: an encyclopedia of domestic life and affairs. The household in its foundation, order, economy, beauty, healthfulness, emergencies, methods, children, literature, amusement, religion, friendships, manners, hospitality, servants, industry, money, and history. A volume of practical experience popularly illustrated. By Mrs. Julia McNair Wright. Bradly, Garretson & Co., Columbus, Ohio; Chicago, Ill.; Nashville, Tenn.; St. Louis, Mo.; San Francisco, Cal.

The above gives the outlines of the work, and the headings of the several chapters. It is in the form of a diary, and scenes, characters and incidents are introduced in a manner to awaken interest and to illustrate the matter in hand. The book is full of wise and good things, and impresses us as a most entertaining and instructive work. It will prove specially suggestive and helpful to young parents and to house keepers. The volume is supplied with a copious index making it convenient for reference. It is an octavo of 584 pages, handsomely bound and in large clear print.

This is a story running through 362, 8x6 inches, pages. The publishers claim that it is a work of great merit. Yensie Walton is the heroine. She is depicted as a teacher, as a dutiful member of her uncle's family. Then she is courted, married, and becomes a very exemplary wife, mother, and mistress of a model home. It is a good book of its kind, religious, and may be to some minds entertaining and profitable. A woman of good taste, at our elbow, says it is a capital work.

A FRUITFUL LIFE: A narrative of the experiences and missionary labors of Stephen Payson. By his daughter, H. Payson Drury, with an introduction by Rev. C. L. Goodell, D. D. Philadelphia: American Sunday-School Union.

Mr. Payson labored for many years as a missionary under the direction of the American Sunday-School Union. His field of labor was in the west and on the frontier. He was a remarkable character, and the narrative abounds in scenes and incidents of great interest. The volume is a 12mo. cloth binding, 224 pages, illustrated. Price $1 25.

—The Arkansas Methodist is the title of a new venture in Southern Methodist Journalism. It is published at Morrilton, Ark. Revs. John W. Boswell, Julien C. Brown and S. G. Colburn are the editors. A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is overstocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. W. Klein, at 135 Canal, in person. A representation of pianos at this establishment is called upon impolitely. Send their 1882 for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

"Thou little rogue, what brings thee to my house?"
Said a starved miser to a straggling mouse.
"Friend," quoth the mouse, "thou hast no cause to fear;
I only lodge with thee—I live elsewhere."

Lucilius.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sherar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. W. A. Noyes, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

A man went into a drug-store and asked for something to cure a headache. The druggist held a bottle of hartshorn to his nose, and he was nearly overpowered by its pungency. As soon as he recovered, he began to rail at the druggist and threatened to punch his head. "But didn't it help your headache?" asked the apothecary. "Help my headache?" gasped the man. "I haven't any headache. It's my wife that's got the headache."

Bountiful nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Laplace's Indian Turnip Pectoral Balm is made of an herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

Lawrie's mother was teaching him to add, and held up two fingers. He counted. "Now," said she, "here are three more. How many does that make?" The little fellow did not quite understand. "Why, Lawrie," said she, "if you had two apples, and I should give you three more, what would you have?" Looking up with his great speaking eyes, he said: "Why, mamma, I would have the stomach-ache."

They only can appreciate health who have suffered from long-continued illness. Brown's Iron Bitters gives health and strength, and thus has made very many happy.

"I tell you," said a canvassor, "you have no idea of the hard work there is in this business. It is either talking or walking from morning till night." "Beg pardon," replied the victim; "I have a pretty distinct idea of the talking part of your programme. Now please favor me with an exhibition of the walking part." The canvasser exhibited.

BY BAYARD TAYLOR.

Well, well! this is comfort now—the air is mild as May,
And yet 'tis March the twentieth, or twenty-first, to-day.
But now I see the furrows turned, I guess it's dry enough.

I'm glad I built this southern porch: my chair seems easier here;
I haven't seen as fine a spring this five and-twenty year.
And how the time goes round so quick; a week I would have sworn,
Since they were huskin' on the flat, and now they plough for corn!

Across the level Brown's new place begins to make a show;
I thought he'd have to wait for trees, but blessing, how they grow!
They say it's fine—two acres filled with evergreens and things;
But so much land! it worries me, for not a cent it brings.

He has the right, I don't deny, to please himself that way.
But 'tis a bad example set, and leads young folks astray.
Book-learning gets the upper hand, and work is slow and slack;
And they that come long after us will find things gone to wrack.

Well—I suppose I'm old, and yet it is not long ago
When Reuben spread the swath to dry, and Jessie learned to mow,
And William raked, and Israel hoed, and Joseph pitched with me;
But such a man as I was then, my boys will never be!

I don't mind William's hankerin' for lectures and for books,
He never had a farmin' knack—you'd see it in his looks:
But handsome is that handsome does, and he is well-to-do;
'Twould ease my mind if I could say the same of Jesse, too.

'Tis like my time is nearly out; of that I'm not afraid:
I never cheated any man, and all my debts are paid.
They call it rest that we shall have, but work would do no harm;
There can't be rivers there, and fields, without some sort o' farm.

DISEASE AMONG TURKEYS.—Under this heading there appeared a complaint from I. D. The trouble in every instance was very clearly one of roup. No doubt the birds starved to death from inability of seeing to eat. The cold season was too early, and the turkeys hatched too late, but they ought to have grown up if taken care of and fed, providing the fowls were not closely bred. Turkeys will not bear close breeding, as disease is sure to follow, and I suspect this is the difficulty with the birds before mentioned. When the cool weather came on, they were weak and immature, and contracted the roup.

The eyelids become glued together as tightly as though cemented. The head is crusted over, and a discharges oozes out from the nostrils, and dries hard and yellow, causing great difficulty in breathing. The throat is also inflamed and swollen; a cheesy matter forms, which, if not cleaned away, causes a corroding canker that destroys the victim. If the eyes are soaked open each day with warm water, and kept open, the bird will eat, and if the sores are washed in a solution of sugar of lead, the inflammation, and consequently much of the swelling, will go down. The birds should be kept on soft feed entirely, with condiments or medicine added. Give first a good dose of salts in the feed before the fowls are unable to eat. This disorder must be checked as soon as possible. It works a long time in secret before manifesting any apparent symptoms. It is a terrible scourge, and generally fatal among turkeys. They do not appear to have the ability to withstand disease as well as common fowls.

Prevention is better than any cure, or any attempt at it. Roup is not contagious, although hereditary, but where a whole flock is exposed they are more or less affected, according to the stamina of the constitution. Roup is the effect of cold on the system long after the miasms have been absorbed into the blood. It comes to the surface about the head and eyes because they are exposed. Give plenty of condition powders, and keep the blood in order. Every turkey should be out of the shell by the first of June at the latest. Broods later than this are of small value. The turkey requires a long, warm summer, and a mild autumn to round out the bodies and complete the fattening by the holidays. Late turkeys are of small value, and fit subjects for disease, no matter how bred. It is the same with all poultry. The full growth must be completed during the warm months. In all probability the cause of the trouble with the fowls of I. D., originated from a cold, damp roost, or a current of damp cold air. Sudden changes and severe weather are damaging to poultry. Highly fed birds suffer most: they are filled with fat and liable to disease, there being so much more effete matter for the poison to feed on (disease is a poison,) and their condition invite the scourge at the smallest provocation.

Some ten or fifteen years back, disease was almost unknown among turkeys, as it is now in localities where small numbers of fowls are reared. The covering of the soil so completely year after year with the tread of poultry engenders disease. Much trouble is also brought about by close breeding. Fowls that are late in moulting are especially subject to this disease, which assumes many forms, and is more or less deceptive to all but the initiated. The appetite is generally good, and the fowls are active, but there is often a difficulty in breathing and a certain explosive sound that can not be mistaken in the common fowl. The turkey takes it in the hardest manner, and enters no complaint, but suffers in silence.—C. B., in Country Gentleman.

POTATO CULTURE.—The potato will grow on a great variety of soils, but will give the best results as regards quantity and quality if planted in a rich, warm, sandy soil. The ground should be naturally rich, and if a large crop is wanted old stable manure should be used at the rate of ten or fifteen tons to the acre. The method we practiced some twelve or fifteen years ago in planting and cultivating the potato has always been successful and is quite simple. We selected a sandy soil, strongly inclining to clay, naturally rich. Old manure was hauled to the lot in winter, at the rate of twenty loads to the acre, and spread evenly over the surface. As soon as the soil could be worked we started the plough, turning the soil to a depth of eight inches and pulverizing it as much as possible. The furrows were set up on edge and not turned top side down. The surface was made fine with an old-fashioned harrow, and the potatoes planted in shallow drills some three feet apart and the tubers eight inches apart in the rows. The seed was covered two to three inches deep with fine soil. After planting we spread a half inch coat of ashes over the rows raking the surface thoroughly with a fine steel rake, and mixing the ashes with the surface soil. As soon as the plants began to show here and there we spread a coating of old rotten straw over the rows to the depth of an inch and covering the entire row with a strip of straw about eighteen inches wide. We then put a single shovel plough to work, running once only between the rows and throwing the soil as far over the straw as possible. With a long shovel, some eight inches wide, and sunk to a good depth, the soil would be thrown over the entire surface, covering and holding the straw in place. The coat of straw will keep down the weeds, and nothing more need be done until the plants are well up. We then run through the rows again with the single shovel sunk as deep as possible, and continued to cultivate near the plants with a small three shovel plough. Care was taken not to disturb the straw and rake it out from the potato plants. Late in the season only the surface soil was stirred, and in a careful manner, so as not to break the roots. From long experience we find that the potato requires a good deal of sunshine and also a good deal of moisture. A cold, wet season will not suit them, and for the best results we always prefer a warm and dry summer. To get the proper amount of moisture we use the straw mulch. It is quite important to get a strong, healthy growth early in the season.—Farm, Herd and Home.

THE SWEETS WE BUY.—I write this article and urge our farmers to thus grow their own sweets, because I am fully convinced that the common syrup—of which such large amounts are made now—are unwholesome and unfit for the human stomach. I believe that those who are manufacturing them should be prosecuted. I bought, a few days since, a gallon of the most beautiful "golden syrup;" no strained honey was ever clearer or more sparkling, but four members of my family were attacked with pains in the stomach and bowels, and with more or less of diarrhœa, the first night after using it. A few days later a friend at my table said to put a little of it into clear tea was a test; that if the syrup contained no acids the tea would remain clear, while if otherwise it would at once be discolored. On applying the test the tea at once turned an inky black. I would advise all who are using the golden syrups to apply this test, and if it proves the presence of acids, to refuse to buy them and to notify their grocer of the result of their experiment. I would not use another pint of the villanous stuff any more than I would "forty-rod" whiskey. We can better afford to use even a poor quality of home-made sorgo syrup than to risk health by the use of the dangerous chemical syrups made from corn. Doubtless many articles we buy are adulterated, which we have no means of detecting, and some of them may be harmless, such as using bran or ground peas to mix with pepper, or chickory or parched corn with coffee, but this corn syrup I believe to be worse than adulteration, worse than a fraud, for it contains poisonous acids and is detrimental to health, and the sale of it becomes a crime, I think that our readers will all be ready to apply the simple test given above, and if it turns the tea to the color that the sample I tried did, it will take away their appetite for cane syrup.

The best way for a family to provide themselves with a nice syrup is to make it themselves out of the best refined sugars; say granulated or crushed.—Correspondent Ohio Farmer.

SHEEP SHEARING.—A correspondent of the New Hampshire Patriot says: In two cases we have known of loss by early shearing, but in both cases the sheep were not in prime condition and the shearing was followed by a cold snow storm and very chilly air. Sheep will usually draw the feet a little nearer together if cold weather immediately follows shearing, but who has not seen them lie and pant in a hot May sun when unshorn, suffering with heat? One of the benefits of early shearing is that it is the best way to destroy ticks. Fowls will clean them all off if allowed to go where the sheep are—both sheep and fowls enjoy it. Another: The necessity for washing is obviated. Sheep having heavy fleeces sometimes do not dry off well after washing. Sometimes the farmer may suffer in selling unwashed wool; but not washing at all is better for the conscience than washing slightly and shearing after the grease has started again. On the other hand, don't shear early unless the weather is fine or superior protection can be given, and do not shear weakly sheep unless very ticky; when thus they may improve under such treatment. Shear before the lambs are dropped if possible, having none but men experienced in the business to handle them. A sheep a few days well over shearing is all right, if not allowed to stay out over night or through stormy weather. It is important that shearers should learn to leave from one-third to one-half inch of wool on the sheep for protection, which they may easily learn to do with coarse wooled and medium sheep, without seriously affecting the appearance of the animal, after a little time. It is not a good practice to shear too close in June, as the hot sun may cause the shedding of wool to the skin.

SOWING CELERY SEED.—Celery is often such an uncertain crop from the seed, that the majority of persons prefer to buy the plants they need, to taking the trouble to raise them. It was formerly considered necessary to start the seed in a hot-bed, but now it is always sown in the open ground. A piece of well-manured soil is carefully prepared, and marked off in drills nine inches apart; the seed is sown thinly, and covered by rolling or patting the soil down with the back of the spade. As soon as the seeds break ground, a push-hoe should be run between the rows, and the plants kept clean from the start. There are several dwarf sorts, all of which are preferable to the tall kinds. Celeriac, or "Turnip-rooted" or "Knob celery," the root of which is used in soups, and after boiling as a salad, is started in the same manner.—American Agriculturist.

HIGH MANGERS.—A veterinary writer condemns high mangers for horses, claiming that they irritate the throat and create a tendency to heaves. He says the manger should be on a level with the feet, as that is in accordance with nature.

Blood and refuse meat rubbed on the trunks of trees will keep away troublesome mice and rabbits.

HOW TO TRIM A LAMP.—A writer in an exchange says: "There is such a vast difference in both the quantity and quality of light promised by a common coal oil or kerosine lamp when properly trimmed and that produced by the same lamp when improperly trimmed, that it is surprising how any one of ordinary intelligence and observation can be satisfied to use, even for a single hour, an imperfectly trimmed lamp. Yet, strange to say, a large portion of the millions of kerosine lamps that are in nightly use are not trimmed as they should be. Careless housekeepers and stupid servants think 'It will do just as well,' in trimming a lamp, to break the charred wick with the fingers, to saw it with a rough knife, or to haggle it with a pair of dull shears, as it will to clip it smoothly and evenly with a sharp trimmer. But people who are fastidious enough to care for a light they can read, write, sew or do any kind of work by with satisfaction and comfort, know that such is not the fact. Since kerosine came into use as a light-producing agent various instruments for trimming lamps have been patented and placed upon the market; but after a pretty thorough examination of the most of them I incline to the belief that nothing has yet been invented for the purpose quite so convenient, cheap, and effective as a pair of ordinary, medium sized scissors. To do the work properly, however, the scissors must be sharp, for it is impossible to trim a lamp perfectly without a sharp trimmer. The belief is quite general that to prevent a lamp-wick from flaring at the corners and breaking the chimney it must be cut rounding to correspond with the cap or cover of the burner. My experience, however, coupled with close and careful observation, leads me to the conclusion that the way to trim a lamp so as to secure the very best result—to get the most and pleasantest light with the least breakage of chimneys—is to cut the wick parallel with the top of the burner. When ready to trim a lamp remove the chimney. Raise the cap of the burner. Turn up the wick, and with a pair of sharp scissors clip it even with the top of the tube. Be careful not to cut or squeeze the tube with the scissors. See that no lint or thread remains on the wick, and that it has not been pushed out of its perpendicular position and cut diagonally. Close the cap over the tube, put the chimney in place and the lamp is ready for use. If these directions are strictly followed it will, when lighted, yield a broad, straight-edged flame without a notch or indentation in it, and furnish a clear, pleasant, steady light. Try it and see."

SIMPLE REMEDIES FOR EMERGENCIES.—Very few young mothers are able to control their nerves so completely as to keep from being startled when confronted with a cut finger with dripping blood and the loud cries which announce a catastrophe. Sometimes she can not collect her thoughts sufficiently to recall any good remedies with which she is acquainted. One way to avoid this is to write out a list of help in trouble and tack it upon the door of your room, after the manner of hotel regulations. There is nothing better for a cut than powdered rosin. Get a few cents' worth of rosin, pound it until it is fine, and put it into an empty, clean pepper or spice box with perforated top; then you can easily sift it out on the cut; put a soft cloth around the injured member and wet it with cold water once in a while. It will prevent inflammation and soreness. In doing up a burn, the main point is to keep the air from it. If sweet oil and cotton are not at hand, take a cloth and spread dry flour over it, and wrap the burned part in it. It is always well to have some simple remedies in the house where you can get them without a moment's loss of time; a little bottle of peppermint, in case of colic, chlorate of potash for sore throat, and pepsin for indigestion. Have them arranged so that you could go to them in the dark and reach the right remedy, but be sure you never do it, even if you know they have not been disturbed; always light a lamp or the gas and make sure you have what you are after. Remember that pistols are always loaded, and that poison may be put in place of peppermint.

Observe that lime water and milk are not only food and medicine at an early period of life, but also at a later, when the functions of digestion and assimilation are feeble and easily prevented. A stomach taxed by gluttony, irritated by improper food, inflamed disease, or otherwise unfitted for its duties—as is shown by the various symptoms attendant upon indigestion, dyspepsia diarrhœa, dysentery and fever—will resume its work, and do it energetically, on an exclusive diet of bread and milk and lime water. A bowl of cow's milk may have four tablespoonfuls of lime water added to it with good effect.

BROOM AND CARPET SWEEPING.—I have found that brooms wet with boiling soap suds once or twice a week will become very pliable and tough, and will not cut the carpet in sweeping, and will last much longer; also that a handful of salt sprinkled over the carpet before sweeping will carry the dust along with it and cause the carpet to look bright and clean. A very dusty carpet may also be cleaned by dipping the broom in cold water, shaking off all the drops, and sweeping a yard so at a time, then wash the broom and repeat until the room is swept.—Germantown Telegraph.

THE COFFEE-POT.—Every cook who makes tea or coffee in tin pots knows that, after a few months, her results are not the same as when the pots were new. If she can afford it she throws them away and buys new ones. They can be cleansed in a very simple way, and so last a longer time. Put in enough water to nearly fill them, and drop a few live coals in the water; gases are absorbed, and the coffee, or tea-pot is fresh and almost as good as new.

TO MAKE JAPANESE CEMENT.—Mix the best powdered rice with a little cold water; then gradually add boiling water till a proper consistence is acquired, being careful to keep it well stirred all the time; lastly, it must be boiled for one minute in a clean saucepan. This paste is beautifully white, almost transparent, and well adapted for fancy paper work, or other things requiring a strong and colorless cement.

THE OLEANDER.—All parts of the oleander are deadly. A very small quantity of the leaves has been known to kill a horse. The flowers have produced death in those persons who have carelessly picked and ate them. The branches, divested of their bark and used as skewers, have poisoned the meat roasted on them, and killed seven out of twelve people who partook of it.

MARRIED WOMEN AS TEACHERS.—The New York City School Board is considering a rule not to employ married teachers in the future, and to dispense with the services of any teacher now in the schools who may marry. The chief reason urged for the measure lies in the fact that New York supports a Normal School at a very heavy expense, and its graduates, who are anxious and also qualified to teach, are unable to secure positions. One hundred and ninety-six of the female teachers have husbands to support them, while a great number of unmarried females want the places. Few changes are made among the teachers of that city, there being no annual election—once elected, it is for life or good behavior. As a consequence vacancies are few, so that not more than fifteen or twenty per cent. of the graduates of the Normal School can find employment. The rule presumes that married men can support their families—if no exceptions are made in the case of those who can not, the rule would act with great hardship. It is not urged that married women can not teach as acceptably as those who are unmarried, so that the question is resolved into one of public economy rather than of educational benefit. The fact that there are many applicants for employment as teachers in public schools is not peculiar to New York, where salaries are liberal and promptly paid. It is equally true in smaller and less prosperous cities. It strikes us that the chief consideration is to secure the best teaching talent—married or unmarried—and when there is no inequality in this respect, then to select for the places those who need them most. If teaching qualification is regarded as the first importance there will be less danger of using the schools as charitable rather than educational institutions.—Louisiana Journal of Education.

—The experiment of co-education at Michigan University has proved to be a thorough success. Prof. Donald MacLean, of the medical department, declares that though he went to Ann Arbor ten years ago with "deep and violent prejudices" against the co-education of young men and maidens, he is now "a most ardent advocate of the system," his former objections to it seeing to him, "in the light of experience, trival, untrue, despicable and ridiculous." The sexes pursue the same courses of study "without harm to any one or to any interest, but with the most unequivocal mutual advantage." Lady students no more require a lady principal, matron or guardian than the boys need a mother or elder sister to take care of them. Female candidates for graduation in the medical department have several times gained the highest number of marks.

—The education of the English army has made marked progress. Comparing 1861 with 1880, we find the proportion per thousand to be as follows: those who neither read nor write, 190 to 40; number who read but can not write, 197 to 34; number who can read and write, 539 to 249; number of superior education, 74 to 677. Regarding the nationalities of the men, the proportion per thousand of English, Scotch and Irish, respectively, were 697, 81, and 209, whereas in 1878 they were 593 91, and 308.

—Hearing recitations, Col. Parker says, is not teaching by any means. Teaching is the bringing of new ideas into the mind through objects, classifying ideas, comparing them, and combining them into new creatures of the imagination. All that a teacher can do is to lead the child's mind to act, to acquire knowledge. Rote learning is simply inculcating stupidity, both in pupil and teacher. It will be a happy day for the public schools when all teachers are made to understand these plain truths.

—Cleveland is to have a new institution, in the form of the lately incorporated "Wade Theological School." The necessary buildings are to be erected near the park presented to the city by Mr. J. H. Wade and it is supposed that Antioch College and Meadville Theological Schools, both of which are far from prosperous, will be removed to Cleveland and united with the new institution. Rev. H. W. Bellows has been invited, it is said, to become an instructor.

—The delegates of the National Educational Association who asked Congress last week for national aid for the public schools seemed to be agreed that an appropriation of $15,000,000 would place the Southern schools on a solid foundation, for the present at least.

—The catalogue of Beloit College, at Beloit, Wis., shows an attendance of 148 students at that institution. Of this number 58 are studying the regular collegiate course, the remainder being in the preparatory school. The faculty numbers twelve, including the president, the Rev. Aaron L. Chapin, D. D.

—Arrangements have been made for the reception of Jews at Harrow. Hitherto Clifton was the only great English public school where special provisions were made for Jewish boys. From its proximity to London, Harrow is better suited to the needs of the Jewish community than any other.

—The library fund of Harvard University has received additions during the last ten years amounting to $134,435. The sum, together with the accumulation of the unexpended portion of the income, has increased the fund to the amount of $139,191 81 over what it was in 1870.

—The election of a new president at Corpus Christi College, Oxford, will soon take place. It is understood that Prof. Henry Smith will not be elected, in which case Rev. H. Furneaux is thought to have a good chance.

—43 students are in attendance at the Chicago Theological Seminary (Congregational,) 4 being graduates, 6 in the senior class, 14 in the middle, and 19 in the junior. The corps of instruction numbers 8 professors.

—The Louisiana State University intends to establish an experimental sugar labaratory and give practical instruction therein, thus materially assisting the interests of the sugar industry in the Gulf States.

—Twenty-four states and territories are represented by the students of Lassell Seminary, at Auburndale, Massachusetts. The average age is seventeen and a half years. Seventeen of the students take lessons in practical cooking.

—A department for teaching the cutting, fitting and sewing of women's garments is about to be added to the girl's normal school in Philadelphia.

—A new college for technical education has recently been established in London. It will cost $125,000.

Changes Wrought by the Gospel in the Fiji Islands.

Strange, indeed, is the change that has come over these isles since first Messers. Craighill and Cross, Wesleyan missionaries, landed here in the year 1835, resolved at the hazard of their lives to bring the light of Christianity to these ferocious cannibals. Imagine the faith and courage of the two white men, without any visible protection, landing in the midst of these blood-thirsty hordes whose unknown language they had in the first instance to master; and day after day witnessing such scenes as chill one's blood even to hear about.

Slow and disheartening was their labor for many years, yet so well has the little leaven worked that, with the exception of the Rel Thelos, the wild highlanders, who still hold out in their mountain fastnesses, the eighty inhabited isles have all abjured cannabalism and other frightful customs, and have latrivi (i. e., embraced Christianity) in such good earnest as may well put to shame many more civilized nations.

I often wish that some of the cavilers who are forever sneering at Christian missions could see something of their results in these isles. But first they would have to recall the Fiji of ten years ago, when every man's hand was against his neighbor, and the land had no rest from barbarous inter-tribal wars, in which the foe, without respect of age or sex, were looked upon only in the light of so much beef, the prisoner deliberately fatted for the slaughter; dead bodies dug up that had been buried ten or twelve days, and could only be cooked in the form of puddings; limbs cut off from living men and women, and cooked and eaten in the presence of the victim, who had previously been compelled to dig the oven and cut the firewood for the purpose; and this not only in time of war, when such atrocity might be deemed less excusable, but in time of peace to gratify the caprice of appetite of the moment.

Think of the sick being burned alive; the array of widows who were deliberately strangled on the death of any great man; the living victims were buried beside every post of a chief's new house, and must needs stand clasping it while the earth was gradually heaped over their devoted heads; or those who were bound hand and foot, and laid on the ground to act as rollers when a chief launched a new canoe, and thus doomed to a death of excruciating agony; a time when there was not the slightest security for life or property, and no man knew how quickly his own hour of doom might come; when whole villages were depopulated simply to supply their neighbors with fresh meat!

Just think of all this, and of the change that has been wrought, and then just imagine white men who can sneer at missionary work in the way they do. Now you may pass from isle to isle, certain everywhere to find the same cordial reception by kindly men and women. Every village in the eighty inhabited isles has built for itself a tidy church, and a good house for its teacher or native minister, for whom the village also provides food and clothing. Can you realize that there are nine hundred Wesleyan Churches in Fiji, at every one of which the frequent services are crowded by devout congregations, that the schools are well attended, and that the first sound that greets your ear at dawn and the last at night is that of hymn-singing and most fervent worship rising from each dwelling at the hour of family prayer?

What these people may become after much contact with the common run of white men, we can not, of course, tell, though we may guess. At present they are a body of simple and devout Christians, full of deepest reverence for their teachers and the message they bring, and only anxious to yield all obedience.

Of course there are a number of men here, as in other countries, who themselves not caring one straw about any religion declare that Christianity in these isles is merely nominal, adopted as a matter of expediency, and that half the people are still heathens at heart. Even were this true, (and all outward signs go to disprove it,) I wonder what such cavilers expect. I wonder if they knew by what gradual steps our own British ancestors yielded to the light, and for how many centuries idolatrous customs continued to prevail in our own isles. Yet here all traces of idolatry are utterly swept away.—From Miss Gordon Cumming's "At Home in Fiji."

A River of Difficulty.

Between us and everything bright and beautiful and useful and prosperous there is a river of difficulty that we must cross. "O!" said the Israelites to Joshua, "I wish I could get some of those grapes!" "Well," said Joshua, "why don't you cross over and get them?" The grapes are always on the other side. You have to cross over to get them. That which costs nothing is worth nothing. God puts everything valuable a little out of our reach, that we may struggle for it. For the same reason he puts gold deep down in the mine, and pearls deep down in the sea, to make us dig and dive. We all understand that in worldly things; would God we understood it in religious things! Nobody is surprised to read that Cornelius Vanderbilt blistered his hands rowing a ferryboat. Nobody is surprised to hear that A. T. Stewart used to sweep out his own store. You can think of those who had it very hard who have got it now very easy. Their walls blossom and bloom with pictures. Carpets that made foreign looms laugh now kiss their feet. The horses neigh and champ their bits at the doorway, gilded harness tinkles, and the carriage rolls away, like a beautiful wave, on New York life. Who is it? It is the boy who once had all his estate slung over his shoulder in a cotton handkerchief. There was a river of difficulty between Benjamin Franklin with a loaf of bread under his arm trudging along the streets of Philadelphia, and Benjamin Franklin the philosopher, entalde of Boston, playing kite with a thunder-storm. An indolent man was cured of his indolence by looking out of the window at night into another window, and seeing a man turning off one sheet after another of writing paper until almost the day-break. Who was it that wrote until the morning? It was Walter Scott. Who was it that looked at him from the opposite window? It was Lockhardt, afterward his illustrious biographer.

It is push and struggle and drive. There are mountains to scale, there are rivers to ford, and there has been struggle for every body that gained any thing for themselves or any thing for the church, or gained any thing for the world. We all understand it in worldly things; why can not we understand it in religious things? You think it is a mere accident that that old Christian knows so much about the Bible. Why, he was studying his Bible when you were reading your primer. He got strong by running the Christian race. In fifty Solferines he learned how to fight. In a shipwreck he learned how to swim. It was by pounding at the anvil of trouble he became swarthy. Then when this Christian goes on and gets across all these other rivers of difficulty, there is the river of death still. To some it seems a dreadful river to cross, but here is the Christian coming. His priest, the Lord Jesus Christ, with bruised feet, goes right ahead of him. His breath grows shorter and shorter, and his last breath is gone as he touches the wave. But then all the billows toss their plumes, and begin to sing, "O, grave, where is thy victory?"

The time will come when we will cast off these sandals which we must wear because there are so many sharp places on the road of life, and with unsandled feet we will step on the soft bed of the river. Then with one foot in the bed of the river, with the other we will spring up the bank, and that will be heaven."—The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

The Convent of the Nativity.

The Convent of the Nativity, which covers the spot where it is believed our blessed Lord was born, is situated at the eastern end of the town, and is by far the most conspicious object which it contains. It is a very extensive stone edifice, irregular in its plan, from having been constructed a piece at a time, and at various and distant eras.

The Grotto of the Nativity is under the Greek Chapel. We descended a flight of marble steps into an irregular apartment—the stable, if we credit tradition, in which the Holy Virgin gave birth to the Saviour of the world. It is a long, narrow, rather low room, fitted up and much occupied for religious worship. The precise spot of the Nativity is marked by a large star made of silver and precious stones. Golden lamps continually burn over this consecrated spot. Here the pilgrims prostrate themselves, offering up their prayers, and kissing the star and the pavement around it. At the distance of about twenty feet from the Star of the Nativity is the manger where the infant Jesus was first cradled. The manger is a block of white marble, hollowed out in proper form. It occupies a recess in the Grotto and is less than two feet in height, by, perhaps four in length.

It is not very easy to determine what degree of credit is due to the tradition which has fixed the site of the church of the Nativity as the place where the Saviour was born. It had certainly obtained a general currency at an early period in the history of the Church, and unquestionably led to the erection of the Church and the establishment of the monastery in this place. This seems to me to be one of the cases in which, in the absence of all testimony, great respect is due to a tradition so ancient and respectable. I must confess, though the admission will not add to the weight of my opinions, that I found peculiarly agreeable, in wandering over these venerable places, to surrender myself to their inspiration, and listen reverently to the lessons of faith and gratitude which they inculcate.

I felt that it was good and edifying to be upon the spot to which the eye of the prophet were directed through the long future when he exclaimed, "And thou, Bethlehem, in the land of Juda, art not the least among the princes of Juda: for out of thee shall come a Governor, that shall rule my people Israel." Here, probably, in the very place covered by the church—unquestionably in Bethlehem—was born the adorable Saviour of the world, who brought life and immortality to light. Here he was cradled in the manger, and was worshiped by the wise men, who were guided by "the star that went before them, till it came and stood over where the young child was." What stupendous events, what immense interests, what revolutions in the present and eternal destinies of our human race, were brought into their embryo existence! What lights, what new ideas, what bright hopes, have gone forth from Bethlehem to illuminate and purify the nations of the earth!—Stephen Olin, D. D.

Great Old Trees.

The age of some specimens of the great trees of California is supposed to extend back to the time of King David, perhaps to that of Abraham. In a tree which was felled, eighteen hundred annual circles were counted, without including a great multitude around the heart of the tree, too intermixed to be distinguished. So, perhaps, when "Solomon began to build the house of the Lord which was at Jerusalem, in Mount Moriah," and sent a letter to Hiram, King of Tyre, saying, "Send me cedar-woods, fir-trees, and Algum-trees out of Lebanon," the great trees of California were sturdy saplings. Some, indeed, claim that these monstrous growths are four and five thousand years old, so that they were contemporary with the Biblical creation.

Eucalyptus trees which have been found in Australia tower to even greater height than the California red-woods. They are, native to Australia and the Indian Archipelago, but the grandest specimens exist in North Australia, where there are about ninety different species of the tree. The botanist Muller says that trees of one variety, four hundred and fifty feet long have been found lying on the ground, and one five hundred feet high is stated to be still standing. This giant would then overshadow the Strasburg Cathedral and the Pyramids of Egypt. The eucalyptus has far other interest than that of possibility of immense growth. About three-quarters of the Australian trees are of this genus, and their value is varied.

All of them make splendid timber, both for building and ornamental uses, and several yield valuable medicinal gums. The sap is refreshing, and can be made into pleasant beer; and from the leaves and bark of several species properties have been derived resembling those of the Peruvian bark or cinchona. The kind known as the "blue-gum" or "fever" tree, is believed to have remarkable virtues in absorbing the malarious influences of the soil, and to exhale an odor or influence which tends to prevent fevers of a malarious sort. An attempt has been made to naturalize the eucalyptus in different regions of America, with a view to its sanitary effects, and there seems every probability that the tree, which is free growing and hardy, will soon be widely scattered through the country.

A Spanish paper expresses the hope that England will cede Gibraltar to the pope, if she will not consent to surrender it to Spain.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelties than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

A PHYSICIAN'S OPINION.

A Physician, writing to The Journal of Health, in speaking of Brown's Iron Bitters, having carefully analyzed its ingredients says: "There is no other remedy in existence so harmless and yet so effective. No other compound should ever be used for general ill health and chronic diseases of the pulmonary, digestive, and urinary organs. It is mild, yet sure in its action, and gradually restores perfect health and strength to every function of the organs of life. Its action is so very mild that there is no room left for reaction and relapse, neither will its discontinuance bring on a craving for its use or renewal of past disorders.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

FRANKLIN, April 11.—The water has fallen one-half inch in the twenty-four hours ending this six P. M. The outlook is more hopeful. The people are cheerful, and consider the crisis as passed. The water is still running from the Teche to Bayou Salle. At Dancy plantation it is reported that about five hundred acres of cane are submerged. A fall in the bayou of four inches will relieve the Bayou Salle land, and the loss will be insignificant.

DELHI, La., April 11.—Franklin parish was visited by the heaviest wind, rain and hail storm last night, of the season. Many of the pieces of hail were as large as guinea eggs. The damage to young corn, fruit and gardens is very great. Many persons will be forced to replant their gardens.

CINCINNATI, April 12.—The cold has been steady since Monday, and has frozen the fruit and blooms of wheat. It has been cloudy, windy weather. There is now a slowly rising temperature, favorable to a minimum damage. The damage to fruit is believed to be partial. The wheat was far advanced and jointed, and the damage to it is universal in Ohio, Kentucky, Indiana and West Virginia, and is, at present reports, very alarming.

WASHINGTON, April 12.—Advices to-day indicate great damage to fruits and berries by the two days cold weather from Virginia to Kentucky and to Michigan. Louisville and Wilmington, Del., report more serious damage than points further north.

MEMPHIS, April 12.—The Avalanche's Helena, Ark., special says: The river is falling slowly, and the overflow in the city is going down also; in many places the streets are becoming free and not exceeding half the city is now under water. The scourge of buffalo gnats is somewhat lessening.

PHILADELPHIA, April 12.—Senator Hill, of Georgia, left here to-day to spend a week or ten days at Atlantic City, whence he will probably go to Old Point Comfort, Va. His physicians say he is getting along well, and they do not apprehend that he will have any further trouble with his throat.

ALBANY, N. Y., April 12.—Assemblyman Patterson to-day introduced a bill to incorporate the trustees of the John F. Slator fund. The bill names Rutherford B. Hayes, of Ohio; Morrisson R. Waite, of the District of Columbia; Wm. E. Dodge, of New York; Phillip Brooks, of Massachusetts; Daniel C. Gilmore, of Maryland; John A. Stuart, of New York; Alfred H. Colquitt, of Georgia; Morris K. Jessup, of New York; James P. Boyce, of Kentucky, and Wm. A. Slater, of Connecticut, as incorporators of the fund, to be called the John F. Slater fund. Rutherford B. Hayes is named as the first vice-president. The fund is to consist of one million dollars. Slater is a wealthy gentleman, of Norwich, Conn. In a letter to the board of trustees, Slater writes as follows:

"The general object of which I desire to have exclusively pursued is the upbuilding of the lately emancipated population of the Southern States and their posterity, by conferring on them the blessing of a Christian education. The disabilities formerly suffered by this people and their singular patience and fidelity in the great crisis of the nation, establish a just claim on the sympathy and good will of humane and patriotic men. I can not but feel the compassion that is due in view of their prevailing ignorance, and which exists through no fault of their own." Slater purposely leaves the trustees the largest liberty in making such changes in the methods of applying the fund as may from time to time seem wise. He suggests that the education of teachers for the colored race may be the wisest purpose to which the fund can be put. If, after thirty-three years, three-fourths of the trustees shall, for any reason, agree that there is no further use for the fund in the form it is now instituted, he authorizes them to appropriate the capital to the establishments subsidiary to visiting institutions of higher education, so as to make them more freely accessible to poor colored students under the present institution of the fund. He specially wishes that neither the principal nor income be expended in land or buildings for any purpose other than that of a safe and productive investment for income.

RICHMOND, April 13.—In the Senate to-day the Congressional reapportionment bill, recently passed by the House of Delegates, was defeated. Messrs. Hale, Lybrook and Newberry, Democratic Readjusters; Williams, Republican Readjuster, and Wingfield, Straight-out Republican, voted with the Democrats against the bill. If the bill had passed it would have given the Readjusters eight out of ten Congressional districts of the State. It was considered an extreme party measure.

NEW IBERIA, La., April 11.—The situation on the Teche is appalling. The height of the flood above the water is nearly seventeen feet. On the east side of the Teche, from Lorcauville to Pattersonville, one hundred miles in a straight line, north and south, is a lake extending from west to east to the high ridges of Bayou Lafourche, fifty miles wide. The losses in crops, stock, etc., are enormous. The storm of Wednesday last swept away forty-houses at Fausse Pointe. Corn cribs floated off with their contents. The destitution is great.

WASHINGTON, April 11.—The House Committee on Education and Labor directed Representative Sherwin to report to the House favorably the bill appropriating $10,000,000 for general educational purposes, and asked that it be printed and recommitted to the committee.

WASHINGTON, April 15.—A synopsis of the April report of the Department of Agriculture upon the area and condition of winter grain shows an increase of nearly one-half million acres, or two per cent. The estimated area of the previous crop was 24,340,000 acres. The condition of winter wheat is high throughout the West. Ohio alone reporting below one hundred, in the cotton States, and in Delaware, Maryland and Virginia.

HELENA, April 15.—The situation is becoming just a little brighter, and the water is falling steadily everywhere. The streets are, many of them, coming out of the overflow, but the lower places will yet be covered for several weeks. The planters think the prospect fair for a moderate crop if the water continues to fall at the present rate, and the levees are built up in time to protect them against the June rise.

MORGAN CITY, April 15.—The gauge stands at thirty eight, a fall of an inch in the past twenty-four hours. Rations were distributed for seven days this week for 1,320 people in Morgan City, and 280 in Berwick.

MORGAN CITY, April 16.—The water is falling; the guage stands thirty-six and one-half inches, a decrease of one and one-half inches in the past twenty-four hours. The agents of the relief commission issued rations to-day to several plantations adjacent to Morgan City, and to people from Bayous Boeuf, Waxia, Shaffer and Boutee. 12,549 rations have been delivered to date. Hon. J. Foster telegraphed to-day that this point would be required to supply all below Pattersonville. In this case 30,000 or 40,000 more rations will be needed.

PATTERSONVILLE, La., April 16.—The town of Pattersonville is from two to four feet under water, a fearful current sweeping through the streets at a rapid velocity. Just back of the town a settlement of colored people have built up quite a town. This place is from three to six feet under water. The houses are being washed off of their foundations by the relentless waves. To add to the horrors of our situation, a terrific storm came up last Wednesday night, causing the water to rise six inches in a few hours. During the storm many houses were washed from their places and sent drifting down the Atchafalaya.

HELENA, Ark., April 17.—Slowly as the retreat of a conquering army the water recedes and leaves us our homes. The principal streets are now clear of water and in a few days the city will be free from her visitant which, for two months, has held the floor against everything. The losses are beginning now to come to the surface, and the tumble-down condition of numbers of buildings and the loss of fencing and sidewalks tell heavily of the ravages of the stream.

MORGAN CITY, La., April 17.—The water fell one and a half inches in the past twenty-four hours. The gauge stands thirty-five inches above 1874. Total fall eleven inches. The Times-Democrat's relief boat came in this morning, and after a stay of few hours, which the officers and staff spent in examining the condition of the city, it proceeded to Franklin.

OUACHITA, La.—Most of the river land in cultivation in this parish, except the back lands, is free of water, and planters are busy plowing early corn and planting cotton. Reports from the hills are favorable, and indicate a large acreage planted in corn and small grain.

The total fall in the river at this point (Monroe) since the fourteenth of March, date of the highest water, is five feet eleven inches. At Logtown, some thirteen miles below, the fall, we learn, is scant three feet. The overflow east is falling, but rather slowly.—Ouachita Telegraph.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, April 11.—A dispatch to the Times from Paris says: The French government will dispatch eight different expeditions to take observations of the transit of Venus on the sixth of December. Four expeditions will be stationed in the Northern Hemisphere and four in the Southern Hemisphere.

ST. PETERSBURG, April 14.—Golos reports that M. Oliphant, representative of the committee to aid Russian Jews arrived at Lemberg to-day, interviewed the Governor, and afterward went to Broody to make arrangements for the emigration of 12,000 Jews to America.

Yours very truly,

MARCUS B. TONEY,
Ch'n Committee on Transportation.

Mr. R. J. Sherwin of Concord, N. H., writes: "I have a good old aunt who keeps house for wife and baby and me. Of late she has been groaning and complaining. Our family doctor could not find out what ailed her, and yet often she would keep her bed for several days. I persuaded her to try Brown's Iron Bitters, and to my astonishment she has never complained since. She now calls it 'her medicine,' and recommends it to everybody."

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AS possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.

2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.

3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.

4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an imported piano because their mothers and grandmothers used to have one of the same make. What was considered a fine piano a hundred years ago, would be called a thing now. What suited our ancestors would not suit our daughters. Music more than all other arts, is progressive, and the difference between the spinette on which Mozart, and even Beethoven, played is, in comparison with the concert pianos, say the Chickering of to-day, as great as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European makers adhere to their old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. Americans have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The American obtains durability by their iron plates and bars, volume of tone by over stringing, light touch by improved method of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board. If a European piano has a valuable, lasting ERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago. This progress very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which no other piano possess. Their plate black as of iron, the tuning pin bushed with maple, and the pins are inserted into the maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as many other pianos. There are about [illegible] in duties. If a better tuned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for [illegible] but that was not the time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since I am in business this palace, and take dealing, I have built up my business, referring with pride to the thousand families I have supplied with music.

VIA SOLITARIA.

AN UNPUBLISHED POEM.

BY HENRY W. LONGFELLOW.

Alone I walk the peopled city,
Where each seems happy with his own;
As friends I ask not for your pity—
I walk alone.

No more for me you lake rejoices,
Though moved by loving airs of June,
Nor lands, your sweet and plaintive voices
Are out of tune.

In vain for me the elm tree arches
Its plumes in many a feathery spray,
In vain the evening's starry marches
And soulit day.

In vain your beauty, summer flowers,
Yet do not greet these cordial eyes,
They gaze on other fields than ours
On other skies.

The gold is filled from the coffer,
The blade is stolen from the sheath;
I have but one more loop to offer,
And that is—death.

Yet well I know the voice of unity,
And, therefore, life and health must crave,
Though she who gave the world its beauty
Is in her grave.

Ah, O lost one! for the living
Who drew their earliest life from thee,
Who wait until with glad thanksgiving
I shall be free.

For life to me is as a station
Where I apart a traveler stands
Absent long from home and nation
In other lands.

And I, as he, who stands and listens,
Amid the twilight's chill and gloom,
Hears, approaching in the distance,
The train for home.

Death shall bring another waiting,
Beyond the shadows of the tomb,
Where sheaves of light are shining
Until I come.

Over fields are children playing,
Over there—oh, vision of delight!—
Are the child and mother straying
In robes of white.

Then, the longing heart that breakest,
Gathering the treasures one by one,
All these blessed when I am weakest
The Lord hath done.

China and Her People.

BY REV. C. W. LAMBUTH.

(Fifth Letter.)

My Dear Young Friends: I will now give you some account of the life, character and teachings of China's greatest man, who lived about two thousand and three hundred years since.

Confucius was born in the twenty-first year of the Emperor Ling, of the Chow dynasty, 519 B. C., in the state of Loo, now the province of Shantung. He was left an orphan at an early age. When quite young he amused himself with arranging sacrificial vessels as opposing armies, or as rulers and princes. When he grew up he had a remarkably high forehead, and for that reason he was called "Ker," or hill. At the age of forty he held the office of magistrate. It was not long before those in high places began to institute him, and he was soon appointed prime minister of Loo. At this time China was divided into small kingdoms, and the prince of a neighboring state, fearing Confucius would obtain too great an influence in the country, sent a band of female musicians to the ruler of Loo, and being accepted by that prince, Confucius resigned his office and left the country. He wandered about from kingdom to kingdom, and was often deprived of the necessaries of life, and taught his disciples under some tree. The Prince of Tsoo, hearing of the fame of Confucius, wanted to employ him as an officer; but one of his advisers said, "Confucius would never sanction our ambitious schemes," and so he was not called. He then returned to his native state, and gave himself up to teaching. At that time his disciples numbered three thousand, of whom seventy were most distinguished. His last work was a history of his own times. The greater part of his life was engaged in political affairs, and it was not until near the close of his life that he established a school of philosophy, and thus we see his system referring more to politics than religion. It is simply a scheme of ethics and politics, having no reference to things spiritual. When speaking of the government of a country, he compared it to the government of a family; and grounded the whole on the due control of one's self and right management of the heart, and gives the golden rule in a negative form: "Do not to others what you would not have them do to you."

In the teachings of Confucius, filial piety stands first. Reverence is required not only in youth; even in the latest period of life parents are to be treated with honor, and, after death, to be raised to the rank of gods. This is the origin of ancestral worship in China which exerts a mighty influence over China's millions. It is strange that, while Confucius recommended such excessive veneration for parents, he should have entirely overlooked the reverence due by man to the Creator of all things and the Father of our spirits. While he taught we should honor our parents, and thus tracing it up to our first parents, it is strange he should not have taught the people to look to him from whom all beings spring. But this reasoning of the great sage is a lamentable proof of the depravity of the human heart: that so intelligent and so learned a man, as Confucius was, should not have traced the origin of man up to the Creator of all men. But he taught his followers nothing as to the being, attributes and perfections of the one true and living God. Confucius taught nothing definite concerning God or a future world. His whole system is devoid of that great truth which forms the basis of all truth—the existence of an eternal and unwise God. When one of his disciples asked him which god he should worship, he replied: "You are mistaken; he that offends against heaven has no one to whom he can pray." At another time he said: "Life and death are decreed by fate; riches and poverty rest with heaven."

The followers of Confucius speak of a trinity—heaven, earth and man. Heaven and earth formed all things; but, as they could not speak nor instruct, man, that is, the sages, had to come to their assistance. There were but five or six sages who are said to be equal to heaven. Confucius was one. And for this reason his followers deified him. There are 1560 temples dedicated to him in China. At the spring and autumn sacrifices there are offered to him six bullocks, 27,000 pigs, 5,500 sheep, 2,800 deer, and 27,000 rabbits, making a total of 62,000 animals slain and offered annually to the spirit of Confucius. There are also 27,000 pieces of silk offered and burned in various parts of the empire. Besides these, many other offerings are made by private individuals. Thus the millions of China have deified the man who taught them that matter was eternal. The learned in China say a great deal about spirits; but they look upon them as far below man. Confucius said he did not know much about them, and, therefore, preferred to speak about other things. When one of his disciples asked how he should serve spiritual things, he said: "Not being able to serve men, how can you serve spirits." When the disciple wanted to know, "What about the dead?" Confucius replied: "Not knowing the state of the living, how can you know the state of the dead?" His maxim was, "Respect the gods, but keep them at a distance." With regard to the world to come the Chinese are as much in the dark as they are in regard to the existence of God. It is sad indeed to think that Confucius and his followers never knew anything of the love of God. And to this day his disciples follow him blindly, knowing nothing of the blessed promises of God to his people, or of the love of Jesus. If any people in the world need the blessed gospel of our divine Redeemer, it is these poor deluded followers of Confucius, who are without God in the world, and the first lesson they should learn is humility.

Confucius and his disciples taught that each man is born with a good disposition, and that by intercourse with others they become wicked; but, by studying the teachings of the sages, they are restored to their original purity. The well-know four books were written by the followers of Confucius, and contain an account of the sayings and doings of the sage and his first disciples—something like the four gospels and Acts.

It is strange that China should have given birth to two great men during the same period, and yet differing so widely in their doctrines and views. Each one founded a system of morals which spread all over China, and divided her people from their day to the present time. One was Confucius; the other was Laoutsz. They were always friendly, and respected each other's views about various things; yet they never could agree to unite their plans to instruct their countrymen. Confucius never spoke of what was strange or marvelous; but his whole aim seemed to be to get men to understand what the duties of the human relations were.

Laoutsz seemed desirous to teach the reverse of what Confucius taught. He taught his followers to have a contempt for the honors and greatness of this world and for all domestic happiness. He taught them that happiness was to be obtained by mental abstraction, and he professed to be able to communicate with spirits. Confucius was skeptical about spiritual matters, and Laoutsz was exceedingly superstitious. I will write in my next about Laoutsz and Buddha.

It is greatly to be lamented that the commentaries on the works of Confucius and his disciples are atheistical and materialistic in their character, and present a great barrier to the spread of Christianity in China. How sad to think that the man, who is looked upon by the Chinese as their pattern and guide, should have been guilty of telling a falsehood! Confucius was very fond of music, and on one occasion, while playing upon the harp, a man called to see him, and being told who he was, and Confucius knowing him to be a man who did not bear a very good character, told the servant to say he was not at home. The followers of Confucius plead that their teacher was justifiable in telling this falsehood because the man had not a good character. The style in which many of their popular books, romances, novels and such books are written have a tendency to demoralize the people, and make them untruthful and dishonest. Such books are in circulation everywhere in China, and are read and listened to by the great mass of people. Such books are great obstacles to the introduction of the gospel into China.

Pray, dear friends, that the gospel of Christ may be preached effectually and with power all over this land. May the Lord hasten the glad day when China shall be converted and saved, and when millions shall lift up their voices in praise and thanksgiving to our God. Pray for that blessed day, my dear young friends.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, March 8, 1882.

Distribution of the Conference Fund.

BY M. S. ANDREWS, D. D.

MR. EDITOR: I take the liberty of suggesting to the members of the approaching General Conference the propriety of carefully revising that part of the Discipline page 176) which refers to the distribution of the Conference fund among the several claimants. The present law dates as far back as 1851, prior to which time the fund was divided on the basis of what was called the preacher's disciplinary claim: $100 for himself, $100 for his wife, and a certain amount for each child under sixteen years of age. In this distribution all shared alike.

But now a financial board, of one preacher and one layman from each district, is appointed annually by the Bishop to divide the collection among the claimants "according to their best judgment of their several necessities." They are to report to the Conference, "which shall either approve, recommit, or amend their report." But the whole matter is virtually disposed of by this board, for their report is usually made at a late hour in the Conference session, and the money has already been counted, enveloped, and labeled to the claimants to whom any thing is allowed. To increase or to lessen one claim, or bring in a new one, is to derange the whole calculation; consequently, if a proposition of that kind is made, the members of the board at once show impatience, frown a little and tell of the hard, midnight work they did, and how earnestly they from time to time called for information; and then the Bishop looks ugly, raps the complaining brother down, and lectures him for not having gone before the board to complain of what he did not know existed or ever would exist. The report is then adopted.

Doubtless the Bishop does the best he can in appointing this board, and they in the distribution do the best they can with the information at hand. They know no one, and act without favor or partiality, and yet in the division, such is human weakness, there is often hardship, injustice, wrong, when all want to do right. Often members, especially laymen, know but little about the peculiar circumstances of a majority of the claimants. But some one, who is a man of will-force and also of sympathetic nature, happens to know a very necessitous case, a widow, possibly, of a dear old personal friend. He can't imagine a more worthy case, and with perfect honesty urges and obtains for her a liberal allowance. This is sometimes done to the detriment of the claims of others equally or more worthy.

But says one, "It is easier to point out defects in the workings of the law than to propose a suitable remedy." That may be so, but when there are manifest errors and weaknesses in every part of the church economy, it is the duty of those charged with the work of making and amending the laws to correct them as far as possible, and it is the privilege of every one who loves the church to call attention to them that they may be corrected.

Perhaps some may remember that I proposed to the General Conference at Louisville, 1871, a plan for the division of the Conference fund, based on the duration of service. It was the result of careful study of the whole matter and much conference with some of the prominent men of the church. From the secretary of the leading Methodist body of Canada I also received valuable suggestions, and conformed my plan largely to one in operation among them. They make length of service the basis of distribution. Beginning at fifteen years of continuous work, they allow each claimant $10 a year for every year of service. If one has preached twenty years before superannuating, his annual claim is $200. Those who fall before fifteen years of service have a special provision for them for a limited number of years, after which they have no claim. The idea there seems to be, if a man fails before he has preached fifteen years it is not because of the wear of the itinerancy, but because of some physical weakness for which the church is not responsible. But my suggestions were not adopted, and the old law remained in force. Since then, however, because of the difficulties of justly administering the present plan, much has been said and written about the propriety of radically changing it. Not long ago one of the Bishops said to me the matter ought to be carefully looked into by the approaching General Conference, and he urged me to give my views on it to the public, and invite discussion, that it might assume some definite shape before the meeting of that body.

I delayed writing that I might get the plans of some of the Wesleyan bodies of England for which I had written. Yesterday a letter from a highly cultivated and leading Methodist of London, whose name is not unknown in America, brought me the facts I desired.

After telling how they raise their funds, the writer adds: "The payments are determined by the number of years the claimants may have itinerated. On becoming a supernumerary (superannuate) $150 is granted for furniture with which to begin housekeeping. The same sum is allowed a widow for the same purpose. The preachers are divided into seven classes according to the number of years they have travelled, as follows: First class, 39 years or more, annuity to preacher, $250; to widow, $140. Second class, 34 to 39 years, annuity to preacher, $225; to widow, $100. Third class, 29 to 34 years, annuity to preacher, $200; to widow, $90. Fourth class, 24 to 29 years, annuity to preacher, $175; to widow, $80. Fifth class, 18 to 24 years, annuity to preacher, $125; to widow, $75. Sixth class, from 12 to 18 years, annuity to preacher, $100; to widow, $60. Seventh class, 12 years, annuity to preacher, $75; to widow, $50.

To the children of widows there is an annual grant varying from $12 to $60 for each. They have also a contingent fund to meet cases of special urgency and need, similar, I suppose, to our Preachers' Aid Fund in Alabama.

The Methodist New Connection, the oldest of the separated bodies, has a benefactory society, which divides its beneficiaries into nine classes. The first class comprises all who have traveled less than fifteen years; the second class all who have traveled not less than fifteen nor more than twenty years. Thus five consecutive years of travel make up a class till forty-five years are reached; those beyond that age compose the ninth or last, class. The allowance for the first class is $140; for the second, $150; and to each succeeding class there is an increase of $25 till the sum is $325 to the last class. It will be seen that the New Connection is more liberal than the parent body, and their provision for widows proportionately liberal. It is said they have fewer beneficiaries than the Wesleyans. Why I can't see, as the church has been organized eighty years.

With all the facts above before us I submit the following as a basis for the calculations of our financial boards. Let the preachers be divided into classes as follows:

First class, all who have itinerated less than ten years. Let the claim of each be $10 a year for every year of service rendered, to cease, however, when the number of payments has reached the number of years the claimant has traveled. Illustration: Say one has traveled six years, and superannuates; his annual claim will be $60 for the next six years, after which it will cease. Second class, all who have traveled from 10 to 15 years, allow each $100. Third class, from 15 to 20 years, $150. Fourth class, from 20 to 25 years, $200. Fifth class, from 25 to 30 years, $250. Sixth class, from 30 to 35 years, $300. Seventh class, from 35 to 40 years, $350. Eight class, from 40 years upward, $400.

Let the widow receive half the allowance of the husband, and if she have minor children let them be provided for by an annuity to each, based on the old law, until they reach sixteen years of age. Then let the Preachers' Aid Societies, or other Conference benevolent associations, look after cases of special need. Of course it would be well to increase the funds of those societies as much as possible. Before the war we had a large fund of this sort in Alabama; but, alas! most of it disappeared with the wreck of other things.

Now, I ask for this plan the careful, not hasty, consideration of the church, and especially of the ministry. Shall I indulge the hope that the General Conference will not entirely pass the matter by? If some prefer that the actual number of years of service be taken as the basis of division, as in Canada, I can see no special objection to it. The class arrangement seems to have worked well in England, and hence I suggested it. It is the principle, not the details, that some of us are after.

I am satisfied that the effect of the adoption of some such plan as I propose will be good. It is altogether likely that measures to increase the yearly collections, and also to raise a fund to be permanently invested for the benefit of the claimants, will very soon follow, and that hazy atmosphere that so often hangs like a London fog about the last quarter of a weary itinerant's life will in a great measure be removed.

In taking up his Conference collection every preacher will know how the money will be appropriated, and he can confidently and honestly appeal to both the sympathy and sense of justice of his congregation.

Of course objection will be urged to this or any other proposition that involves a change of law. No existing rule or custom can be altered without an honest protest by some. The conservatism which, in certain states, is found in all natures, is very strong and pronounced in some when something is proposed which may require them to adapt themselves to new conditions. Even extraordinary methods in bringing men to Christ they never like, because the regular order is disturbed. They would have rebuked the four for tearing up the tiling in Capernaum to let down their paralyzed friend before Christ. Faith must not show itself in any such unusual way.

It is said the present law is in the shape of a "compact" between the church and every itinerant preacher, and to materially change it will be violation of a solemn pledge. Then the change made in 1854 was a violation of a pledge, and the present law which substitutes it ought to be repealed in order to those then in the itinerant ranks. But why make this complaint if a better compact is proposed?

All the younger preachers entered on their work to continue it till providentially relieved. To think the contrary is to impeach their integrity. In not many years they will be the old preachers, and their seniors will all be sleeping. Should any one of them at an early age be disqualified for the active ministry he may plant a tree and hope to eat the fruit thereof, and he is still young enough to adapt himself to a secular calling by which a support, if not a fortune can be made. Consequently he will not need as much as a brother of seventy years, who has preached fifty years, and is too feeble now to work, and too fixed in his habits to adjust himself to a new calling. I have too high an appreciation of the intelligence and fidelity of the mass of our younger ministers to believe they would for any personal ends object to the change.

But it is said this provides equally for college presidents and professors, editors, and all manner of agents, with the poor itinerant, who was never out of what, by way of distinction, is called the regular work. Well, why not? Not belonging to these so-called privileged classes, and not expecting to, I make bold to ask the question: If a man is called by the proper authorities from the pastorate to edit a paper, or teach our children, or manage our connectional interests, who is to blame, he or the church? It is presumed he can do more there for Christ than in any other place, and certainly all desire that each laborer shall work in the field where he can be most effective in promoting the interests of Christ's kingdom. To charge him with seeking the place in an unwarranted way is as unjust and ungenerous as to say the preacher uses means to influence his appointment, which most of them will indignantly deny. But it is urged that many switch off, make their own contracts, teach private schools, or those that do not belong to the church, run insignificant local papers, etc., and yet manage year after year to have themselves appointed to these places. Ah, there is the rub! This abuse has long since been seen and complained of, but who has proposed a remedy? Who has been bold enough to stand up and denounce the iniquity? Possibly the adoption of some such plan as I propose will correct this very evil. At present it is quietly submitted to, because it is said when he gives out or dies, the financial board can discriminate against him or his family. But whoever heard of the board doing such a thing as that? Not I. But if there were no discretion as to the distribution of the funds, the Conference, in my opinion, would exercise its discretion, and dismiss from its membership all who persist in following a private calling. Thus many hangers-on would be relegated to their proper places.

But in some quarters another strange objection has been started. It is said if the length of service plan is adopted, some who have been in good appointments, fat places, and fared sumptuously every day, will share alike with those who have labored on the borders, in lean streaks, and had a hard time generally. Now, it seems to me if any brother has been envious on that account, he ought to rejoice that equality is reached at last. Certainly no one will complain when the Saviour places his more favored brother alongside of him in heaven. He will feel like congratulating him that he got in through all the temptations of a fat place.

I will notice but one other objection, which is, that the favored few have saved money, built them homes, etc., while those on the poorer charges, who have done the real work of the church and been poorly paid, when they break down, have not a dollar, and no shelter for their families. This is sad indeed, if it is so. But is it true? It would not surprise me if inquiry should develop the fact that many of those who have generally filled the so-called hard charges have saved more money and are richer in the world's goods than those who have been in the more prominent appointments. It is an open secret that stewards, as a class, know the value of humility in a preacher, and it is hard to induce them to vote a dollar beyond his necessary expenses, lest he be puffed up and proud. The man who saves money in the itinerancy is he who has his own home, keeps his family there, tethers out, and contents himself with such works as he can reach.

I have written enough. What I have said has been in the interest of a definite, and what seems to me just, plan of division of the Conference fund. If any has a better plan let him propose it. I trust something will be done.

MEMORIES OF CHILDHOOD.

BY INVALID.

When years, like ocean waves, have rolled
O'er memories of the buried past,
Forgotten—or "in shadows cast"

And many a place where oft we've strayed,
Is but a half-remembered spot;
Even faces fair, like pictures, fade,
And even names are oft forgot.

Yet there is one old place still dear—
On memory's walls a picture fair—
Tho' memory often lingers there.

Long years have passed since last I stood
Beneath that roof so far away,
Or wandered in the shady wood
When all the year seemed glad as May.

In fancy I can see it now—
A cottage looming through the years—
Like rainbows on the evening's brow,
Seen through the "golden mist" and tears.

The old gray roof, with moss o'ergrown,
O'ershadowed by the royal trees,
They "stand the storm," tho' years have flown—
Still rustle in the summer breeze.

The wild rose bloomed in the dell,
That nestled 'neath the wooded hill,
And by the cool, deep-hidden well,
There ran a crystal, sparkling rill.

The sweetest flowers grew on its brink,
And graceful willows o'er it swayed;
How often have I stooped to drink,
Or watch the minnows as they played!

How oft my childish feet have sped
Down from the hillside to the well!
The birds sang in the trees o'erhead,
Responsive to the chiming bell.

The gentle herds in meadows green,
The bleating lambs that ran and played,
All made a fair pastoral scene,
That never can from memory fade.

'Twas there I gathered childhood's flowers,
And listened to the bird's glad song,
Thro' spring-time's golden sun and showers,
Thro' all the fair, bright summer long.

Autumn, robed in cloth of gold,
Spread garments in "the king's highway"—
King winter of the realm of cold—

They say the grass is just as green,
As when I gathered daisies there;
Alas, could I only paint the scene,
The master sitting in his chair,

As once he sat, and on us smiled,
Upon "we children" at our play,
In heart he was himself a child,
But now he's lonely, old and gray.

Sunday-School Lesson.

Second Quarter—Lesson VI.

SUNDAY, MAY 7, 1882.—MARK VII. 24-37.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"The Lord is good to all; and his tender mercies are over all his works."—Psalms cxlv. 9.

SUFFERERS BROUGHT TO CHRIST.

Soon after the discussion with the Pharisees Jesus leaves for the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. There arriving, he tried to keep his arrival secret, but he could not be hid. His fame anticipated him at every point; as ointment poured out betrayeth itself, so he could not be hid. People kept up with the every movement of this wonderful Physician. The personal ministry of our Lord was confined, by the terms of his commission, to the chosen race, and it was the exception to his rule when he went out of the provinces of Judea, Samaria and Galilee. The divine economy was to the Jew first and to the Gentile, and so Christ instructed his disciples, in his final charge, to preach the gospel to every creature, but beginning at Jerusalem. This visit to Tyre and Sidon was one of these exceptional journeys; not as I conceive to find rest and retirement so much as to help this poor woman. It is an instance of the kingdom of heaven suffering violence, and the violent taking it by force. This Syrophenecian woman was one of the violent. Though his ministry was restricted to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, yet he himself remarked that this order was overridden by the impetuous earnestness and importunity of some who were not the children of Abraham. Heaven overlooked this irregularity in the Saviour's going beyond the limits of his circuit.

This woman, whose daughter was possessed of an unclean spirit, was herself a child of wrath. She belonged to a race of people whom, ages ago, God had cursed, and had commanded his people to extirpate, to root up stock and branch. The armies of Israel did carry out the order, but not completely, as they let some escape. This poor woman was of this accursed stock, a spared branch, who was let live as the hunter spares the scape-goat in the mountain for the blood upon him. Her very name, Syrophenecian, kept her from going into the country of the Jews. She had heard of this famous Prophet's power to heal persons afflicted with unclean spirits, but what good could it do her poor child. She dare not show her face in any Jewish province on peril of her life. The Jews had no dealings with this accursed nation. She despaired of ever coming to where Jesus worked, and did not for a moment think that he would venture in to the coasts of her deserted and desolate country. She kept up with his movement, for many out of her coasts went over to hear and see the great worker. To her unspeakable joy, suddenly he came into her very neighborhood. He has come into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon. He had made his way into this God-cursed country, where no Jew came. Might she not go to him with her case? He had overstepped his limits. Might she not take advantage of it, even though she was a Syrophenecian, a child of wrath, who had no lawful right to live, but held her life by carelessness of his people in obeying the command to destroy them? What good fortune; what an opportunity. She had not been a mother had she failed to seize this chance for her child. I could not go to him, but he has come to me. I will name my case to him at all events. This explains her coming and earnest appeal. The first great difficulty, all but inseparable, was overcome by his own act. She was in his presence. Who can measure the infinite distance he came to save you and me? But now a greater difficulty arises, amounting to a seeming refusal. He says: I am not sent but to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. It is not meet to take the children's bread and give it to the dogs. She has come to him who has the word of life, but there is no word for her. She has found the great Physician, and stands in his presence, but for her there is no remedy offered. She has reached the well of living water, but, alas! the well is locked. The disciples plead for her, but he who was so lavish of his mercies to all seemed pitiless now. Oh! Master, help her. Her woman's wit and her desperate need came to her aid, and she caught hope from his tender eye. True, Lord, but the dogs eat the crumbs that fall from the children's table. I accept the dogs' place, but the dogs have a place in and are part of the household, and the crumbs are their living; any place will do me, for any relation in this household has its blessings. She disarmed him with his own words. She turned his nay into yea. The woman's name is not given. To be nameless in worthy deeds is better than to be infamous with and have a name. This woman, who is only known by the name of her accursed nation, lives more enduringly in praise of men than Herodias with a name. You will find her name recorded in the roll of honor along with Abraham's, Jacob's, the Prince, and with the centurion soldiers, who added to his faith virtue. Christ granted her request, and praised her faith. He pointed out its grand characteristics, its humility, its intelligence, its courage and its quickness. Now, it was worth while for the Saviour to put himself out for such a woman. It was honoring to himself and a lesson in faith to the disciples. Upon a certain occasion Napoleon was reviewing his army when, riding down the line, his spirited horse, prancing and throwing his head, suddenly jerked the reins out of the general's hand. For a moment he was in imminent peril, but a young soldier quickly broke rank, ran and grasped the fallen reins, and returned them to the hands of the general. Napoleon said: Thank you, captain. The young soldier quickly responded: Of what company and regiment? The general answered: Of the guards. The drill over, and the private, post-haste, applied at headquarters for his commission. There was some reluctance on the part of the offices to comply. When did you become captain? The general called me captain, and he knows what he says. If he called me captain I am captain. The officer sent for the general, and reported to him the demand of the private. The general said: Make out his commission.

So with this woman. She was quick to seize any word of the Master for her benefit. She won her blessing out of Christ's own word, though that word put her in the humblest relationship to the good Shepherd of the fold. Her faith was of a noble kind. Maybe the centurion himself would have faltered if "the word only" spoken had been so humbling as this dog of the household. That which called him to Tyre and Sidon's desolate coasts being accomplished, he goes back to his accustomed field of labor. Blessed Jesus, thou will still go out of thy way to save a poor sinner who can not come to thee; thou didst even come to me and stand at my door and knock. This trip over into the coasts of Tyre and Sidon refreshed the Master and his disciples.

From the Work.

EUFAULA DISTRICT, ALABAMA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: I have recently visited some portions of the above-named district, and, having a mind to say something concerning it, my communication naturally gravitates toward the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, as I found that unexcelled organ very extensively circulated among the people, burning, indeed, like a beacon in almost every house.

This is, from all I can learn, one of the most prosperous districts in the Alabama Conference. It has for a number of years been steadily advancing onward and upward. It consists of about fourteen appointments, and every pastoral charge within its bounds, save one, has a comfortable parsonage. This district was brought into a fine condition, having new life and power infused throughout its entire bounds, by the administration of that most excellent preacher and thoroughly qualified officer, Rev. Henry D. Moore. He was succeeded by Rev. R. B. Crawford, a man thoroughly capacitated to conserve the ground already won, and to push the conquest further. He is now serving the fourth year of his presiding eldership. His administration has been, in every sense, a successful one. His devotion has been heroic; his zeal has been unbating; his labor has been unintermitting. He has advanced the district to a degree of prosperity that has made the hearts of the people rejoice, and kindled within them high hopes of still more glorious attainments. It is the prayer of the universal heart of the Eufaula district that he may long live to bless the church and the world.

At Eufaula Dr. Rivers is preaching with the force and fire of his prime, leading the people into green pastures and beside still waters, winning sinners to the cross by the beauty of his life, as well as by his matchless preaching of the gospel of love in its fulness and in its royalty.

Beulah lies west of Eufaula, and is composed of two churches, one at Spring Hill, the other at Batesville. The pastor is Rev. A. J. Briggs. He has recently moved with his family to Spring Hill, where a commodious parsonage has just been completed for his occupancy. It is a work of love, and corresponds to the spirit that fashioned it. It is compact, strong and roomy, pleasantly located, well furnished and fitted with every appliance for domestic comfort. The people gave the pastor and family a most cordial welcome—crowding the yard and the gateway with beaming faces and outstretched hands, they welcomed them with joy and gladness. It was an old-fashioned, unstudied, sincere welcome, such as many a heart has sighed for in this age of stilted forms and artificial society. Beulah rejoices in prosperity. All told, the membership are but a few over one hundred, yet they pay their pastor's salary promptly, and every claim of church and Conference is met without a public collection. One assessment includes every claim, and it is paid cheerfully and promptly. The attendance on the services of the church is earnest and excellent, and Sunday-schools are working faithfully and to a purpose. No jar or jostle disturbs the church's steady march to full strength and perfect manhood. All inquiry as to the secret of this prosperity I found the following the chief factors: The pastor is active, restless, untiring, a true propagandist, who seems determined to seek neither rest nor ease while there remains a sinner, here unsaved, or a field, wherein a sheaf may be gathered for the Master.

We find here that most essential prerequisite to success, the people realizing that they are called to be "fellow-laborers" in the cause of God. They work, feeling that each has a special mission to fulfill, a special duty to perform. As a result of this there are faith, zeal, charity, spiritual growth and a crowning prosperity.

At Spring Hill I found B. B. Carver, with his immense means, following in the footsteps of his sainted father, whose memory is like ointment poured forth in that community, leading in every enterprise of the church, and with R. E. Wright, Long, Swanson and the Alstons devising schemes, executing plans, making sacrifices for the glory of God and the good of the church.

At Batesville the corps is also efficient, strong and consecrated. A. H. Alston, Oattis, Fay, Bates, Smith, Tyson and Wilson, led on by that grand old South Carolinian, Col. E. S. Ott, whose large heart, catholic sympathies and Christian activity have won for him the love and esteem of his church and the admiration of his generation. These are men on whom the preacher can rely, and in whose hands, under the blessing of God, the weal of Zion is assured.

From all parts of this district comes encouraging news. In Eufaula I learn the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society is doing a great work. The cause of foreign missions in this country is overcoming a widespread prejudice which has militated against it, and is gaining a firm hold on the hearts of the people. This I rejoice to see, for my heart is with this great cause. I would fain live to see the last dagon hurled on the temple floor, and the kingdoms of this world become the kingdom of the Lord and his Christ. But while I rejoice unfeignedly in the efforts that are being made to save the heathen, and to gain the uttermost parts of the earth for Christ's possession, I am none the less ardent in my enthusiasm for our domestic missions, and I regret exceedingly that, in reference to this great cause, the church discharges not her duty. The collections fall far short of the demand. And, Mr. Editor, since I can not think that it is because our people are careless, indifferent, regardless of the spiritual destitution of their fellows, I have thought that it was perhaps because they had no just conception of how utter and awful that destitution is. During the last year I have traveled a great deal through the State of Alabama, from the Tennessee line to the bay of Mobile, and I have seen some sights that were appalling. I found that the old maxim, so true in social economies, "one-half the world knew not how the other half live," was still more terribly true in reference to spiritual things. It is not necessary for us to go to heathen lands to find men living without hope and without God in the world; they are right here in our own State. Shall we do nothing for them? Yes. Well, what shall it be? Education? That may help, but can not do the work that is needed. Shall we send them the manifold agencies of philanthropy? They may ameliorate their outward condition, but are futile for the work that is needed. No, there is but one efficient antiseptic for this moral gangrene that is eating out the social, national and religious life of portions of this country; it is Christianity in its official voices in the pulpit. Then let us rally to our domestic missions. Let us let the people know that there are in their own midst human beings, of their own complexion as well as of their own nature, who are as utterly degraded, lost and debased as the ignorant heathen who crouches beneath the power of the rain-maker, and trembles beneath the vassalage of hideous and cruel gods. Oh! that the universal church could be made to realize this, and, in realizing it, feel the comprehensive and awful significance of that solemn passage: "At the hands of every man's brother will I require the life of man."

VISITOR.

BURTONIA CIRCUIT, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Owing to this awful overflow I have been unable to go to any of my appointments since January. During all this time I have been entirely cut off from all my churches by high water. Two of my church houses, I understand, are washed off the blocks. So you may see that this country is in a deplorable condition. I have neither heard from the presiding elder nor any of the preachers on this district during all this long time. The present prospects of church affairs are very gloomy indeed, as the people in this swamp are nearly broken up, having lost their stock, and they are nearly ruined. We swamp preachers have nothing to encourage us. We can only do the will of our heavenly Father, and trust him.

The water is passing off slowly. Nevertheless, it is sure; and the falling of the water is beginning already to make quite a change in the appearance of affairs. We poor water-bound people begin to feel more hopeful. Some few of our neighbors are plowing, preparatory to planting their crops, others have re-planted their gardens. I wish to ask Bro. Moore one question, viz.: Suppose a brother joins Conference A., serves seven years, transfers to Conference T., serves eleven years, transfers to Conference M., serves nine years, one of our Bishops needs him in one of one small Conferences, and transfers him to said Conference, and he serves six years, and another brother serves the same Conference twenty years, they are both compelled to superannuate. The first has served thirty-three years in all, the second twenty years. Now, how would Bro. Moore settle with those brothers? and would Bro. Moore have this small Conference to pay this brother's pro-rata share for years which he served in other Conferences? Now, this is no imaginary case, my brother, as the history of our church proves. I think the law governing our Conference Boards of Finance is good. I hope our General Conference will make no change, and our people will be more liberal toward those worn-out servants of ours.

Desirable Legislation.

From the foundation of our church education has been recognized as one of its proper functions. Institutions of learning of various grades and character have been founded under Methodistic auspices, agents appointed, large sums of money collected and large sums squandered for this object; but the subject has never been brought under the systematic control and care of the church by suitable legislation. The Discipline, Ch. II, Sec. 2, Ques. 2, Ans. 2, page 72, provides for the appointment by the Bishops of "an agent or agents for the benefit of our literary institutions;" but what constitute "our literary institutions," how they are to be established, supported, or controlled, is no where stated.

Provision is also made, Ch. II., Sec. 1, Ques. 5, Ans. 13, page 62, for the quarterly investigation "what is doing for the cause of education;" but of what is the character of this work, by whom, in what way, or how it is to be done, not a word is spoken.

No arrangement is made for the collection of authentic statistics on this subject, the absence of which was felt at the last, and will be felt at the pending General Conference. The laborers in this important field, though, as a class, among the most devoted, laborious, and useful servants of the church, have no official recognition whatever. Legislation covering these points is desirable.

Of the propriety of this legislation it is scarcely necessary to multiply words. Nothing is more carefully defined, limited, and controlled than the school-work in our foreign mission fields. No statistical items are regarded as more important, or studied with more interest, than the reports from this department of mission-labor. In the manual issued by our Mission Board to applicants proposing to labor as missionaries and teachers, the following language is used: "All instruction is to be subordinated to the truth in Jesus. It is therefore expected that all who apply for position as teachers in our Missions shall be personally devoted to Christ, and close students of his word."

Has the church one standard for home operation among youth, and another for foreign fields? Is it not an anomaly that this matter commands such deep interest and careful attention from the church when considered in reference to heathen, but receives only silence in reference to the youth of her own land?

The following legislation, or its equivalent, will cover the case, and is respectfully submitted to the consideration of our lawgivers for discussion, amendment, and adoption:

1. To secure regular and accurate information by statistics and otherwise, add another question for the direction of the Annual Conference, Ch. II., Sec. 2, Ques. 4, page 47: Ques. 31. What has been done for the cause of education?

2. To give proper official recognition to the laborers in this department of church-effort, constitute the teachers of our church-schools, who are members of our church, members of the Quarterly Conference. Add to Ch. II., Sec. 4, Ques. 1, Ans., page 56, after the words "Sunday-schools?" Teachers in our church-schools.

3. To give better security, and wiser and safer administration of school-property, add to Ch. III., Sec. 16, Ques. 1, page 118:

Ans. 3. Trustees for our institutions of learning shall be appointed, in the absence of charters, under such regulations as each Annual Conference may establish.

To the same chapter, section, and page, in Ques. 2, Ans. 1, after the words "parsonages or churches," add: Schools Colleges, and Universities.

4. For the definition, control, and—in the distant future—the proper graduation of our institutions, let the following section be added to Ch. V., page 135:

SECTION VI.
OF EDUCATION.

Ques. What directions are given concerning Education?

Ans. 1. Let the teachings of our holy religion find a place among the studies of all literary institutions owned and controlled by us: let the officers and teachers be persons of solid piety, able, by example and precept, to lead the young to Christ.

2. Let the preachers, once a year, present the claims of Christian education to their congregations.

3. Let schools for primary and elementary instruction be organized under the direction of the Quarterly Conference, in connection with each of our congregations; let these schools be aided by our people so as to afford free instruction under religious guidance.

4. Let schools preparatory to our Colleges and Universities be organized under the direction of the District Conferences.

5. Let two or more Annual Conferences unite to the maintainance of a College or University for young men and young ladies.—Nashville Christian Advocate.

Obituaries.

CAMPBELL.—MRS. SARAH ROBERTSON CAMPBELL, daughter of the Rev. Martin Ruter, D. D., and wife of the Rev. Jewell Campbell, late of the Mississippi Conference, died at her home in Jackson, La., on the ninth of October, 1881.

One so intimately connected with the church, from her birth to her death, and who has served it so faithfully, ought to have some mention made of her in the organ of her church, even though so much time has elapsed since her death. She lived to be seventy-seven years, seven months and twenty-four days old, and was up to the close of her last illness as vigorous of body and as clear in mind as a person in middle life. She was possessed of remarkable energy, and was always employed either in working with her hands or in storing her mind with useful knowledge, or in doing good to others. She took delight in working in her garden and flower yard, and their artistic culture gave evidence of her skill and taste. She was enthusiastically fond of flowers, and had gotten together in her home a great variety of rare and beautiful specimens. In their cultivation she found employment that was congenial to her taste. She was quite literary also, and spent much of her time in reading. Her literary taste was very fine, and her criticism of books was just and discriminating. She was an authoress herself, having written many sketches and pieces for books and periodicals, all of which productions gave evidence of ability and culture. Perhaps the most notable of her literary productions is the biographical sketch of her own father, published in the volume entitled "Lives of Eminent Methodist Ministers." This appears alongside of biographies and sketches written by some of the most able and celebrated writers of the church, and yet her production suffers nothing from the comparison with those of her distinguished literary associates.

Among Sister Campbell's earliest recollections was the peculiar history of the struggles and triumphs of the Methodist itinerancy, known only to those who see the inside of the experiences of a minister's family. These experiences enabled her to see, too, the best phase of the character of the Methodist ministry. Her father was a minister of the highest type, scholarly, polished, consecrated, the morality which he wielded was such as to make the most elevating impression. His sermons were attended with power, conversions happening under almost every effort. Having the highest appreciation of education himself, he set himself to make a corresponding impression upon those around him. Almost entirely uneducated when he entered the ministry, by laborious and unremitting efforts he mastered several languages so as to read them as easily as his mother tongue, and also acquainted himself with the approved mode of education of his day. It is said that he was the first Methodist minister who ever received the honorary degree of doctor of divinity. His daughter received from him appreciation of learning and habits of study, which, clinging to her throughout life, proved the source of great pleasure and profit to herself and a benefit to her friends. Her conversational powers were of a high order, and when the theme happened to be the Methodists of earlier days the life sketches were the imagery flowing, and the narration full of interest.

In the death of Mrs. Campbell we feel that a link which binds us to the past has been severed. Her association with her father and with our husband—a man of mark and a leader in his day—together with her own striking individuality made her an historical personage. Uniting the simplicity and fervor of the last generation with the culture and progress of the present, she made her impression upon all possessing a type of character peculiar to herself. We look around in vain for some one to expend to the demands which her going makes, and yet among us have others been intelligent, others may be as literary and tasteful, while still others may be as connected to the church, but, aggregating the beautiful proportions peculiar to herself, and then to bring to this combination of character just enough of eccentricity to create additional interest we may not expect to find again. Her usefulness as an example upon the sick bed has been demonstrated throughout her entire life. When her spirit required, she would leave her own home to go and take charge of a patient, and her soothing fingers and unfailing management would do "good like a medicine." Many of those now living, as well as of those who have crossed the flood to whose sickness she has ministered with tireless and successful skill, will rise up to call her blessed.

Her life furnishes a remarkable illustration of the power of religion to sustain and even the deepest trials. Her husband was stricken with paralysis, and suddenly taken away in the midst of a useful and honored life. Our eldest son fell, while gallantly fighting the battles of the Confederacy as the sergeant of his regiment, and was buried by the hands of strangers. She watched by the bedside of two daughters and one son, while consumption did its slow but sure work, and finally laid them away in a permanent grave. Of a numerous and accomplished family only one son was left her. Many a heart less courageous than hers would have succumbed under the deadening strokes and have failed out a crushed life with its stunned, feeble feelings, but she continued as before to devote herself to life's duties with undiminished fortitude, and to gladden society by the brightness of her intercourse. Many a Christian would rather have lost faith, and declared that not a merciful God but pitiless chance ruled the world, or became rebellious, and said to his soul "Dost thou still retain thine integrity? Curse God and die!" But not so she; no word was ever known to escape from her lips that would indicate a want of confidence in God or of a ready acquiescence in all his providences. On the contrary, she frequently declared her appreciation of the goodness of God in giving her assurance of the salvation of her loved ones, and was fond of narrating incidents from their death-beds that made their experiences, in her estimation, to have been privileged beyond even the walks of common Christian life.

She lived death as she had lived life—self-poised, resolute. Remonstrated with by her kind friends for their faithful attention to her, even bidding her skillful physician not to trouble himself on her account. She, who had never spared herself when others were sick, now preferred to suffer rather than be a burden to her friends. On the Lord's day, in the bright but blighting autumn time, her soul peacefully returned to God; and on the next day, after a glowing eulogy from Rev. D. M. Rush in presence of a congregation of her friends, her lady was laid away to await the resurrection of the just.

CALLER.—FRANCIS MARION CALLER, son of James S. and Jane F. Caller, was born in Clarke county, Ala., on the 16th of August, 1857. In 1870, while a student at Mount Sterling High School, he joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Gaining, by three years' ardent application to duty, the laudatory "well done" from that eminent instructor, Prof. S. S. Mellen, in the fall of 1878 he entered the University of Alabama, and his noble spirit and manly conduct won the confidence and esteem of the professors and students of that institution. In July, 1880, he was graduated master of arts, and bore from our university two prizes—one for Greek, the other for oratory. On the thirteenth of February, 1880, in Tuscumbia, Ala., he breathed his last. His death was altogether unexpected. Possessed of a constitution apparently strong, he seemed eminently fitted for the labors of a long life. Among the finest specimens of manhood, and endowed with rare virtues, he was considered the embodiment of health and promise. Typhoid fever grappled him; his vital energies soon gave way, and his spirit returned to God.

His mission on earth has been accomplished. The seeds of his life are sown; the fruits are to be gathered in the great eternity.

We are prone to estimate men by what is seen of men. The unfolded results of the soul are known only to our Heavenly Father; and the good and true who die young are often his most useful ministers. Death is the common heritage of all; but when the young, and strong, and promising are taken from us, we can see the providence of God, and we feel the solemn warning that even in the midst of life we are in death.

To discharge faithfully our duties is the noblest work of life. Though not rational when summoned to death, Frank has left us his past life as an assurance that God has rewarded him in the other world. He was a man, socially, intellectually, religiously. Being one of his most intimate friends I knew him well. He had a warm, tingling heart, and a generous, sympathetic nature. His faith in God and religion was manifest in his words and works. Inspired by lofty purposes, an ardent lover of everything tending to the elevation of the character, he was loved by all who knew him. May God comfort those who loved him most, and make us all more zealous in our Christian labors.

Resolutions of the Uniontown Methodist Episcopal Church Sunday-school on the death of Prof. F. T. Caller:

Whereas, In the providence of Almighty God, we have been greatly bereaved in the death of our friend and brother, F. T. Caller, and desiring to give some public expression of the tender ties which bound us to him in life, and which even death can not sever: We, the Sabbath-school of the Methodist Episcopal Church, where he held his church relationship, do most earnestly Resolve, That in the loss of Bro. F. T. Caller we have sustained one of the saddest bereavements ever met with in our community, and our hearts stand still while we ask, Who shall fill his place? Not alone in the Sabbath-school and church, where his familiar form and gentle Christian character won all hearts, but away at the home of his childhood, where the gloom of this great shadow is settling down upon a mother's heart, and chasing the sunshine out of the lives of sisters and brothers, on whom his young life was so needful.

We shall miss him, and weep over his grave. But the tears of a mother for her boy, and of sisters and brothers for a brother, will flow on to mingle with that ceaseless stream of human woe that grows deeper and wider as the ages roll on.

Resolved, That we tender to the bereaved family our deepest sympathy, and the most earnest expression of admiration for the modest, manly, pure, unselfish character of the deceased, whose influence for good will be long remembered in our midst. Though he is dead, yet he shall live in our minds and hearts as a fit exemplar for the young men of our community. May the memory of his spotless purity, self-sacrificing life, and his deep faith in God be taken upon the hearts of those among whom he has so recently come, to prepare a welcome for those who shall miss him most.

Resolved, That this Sabbath-school wear a badge of mourning for thirty days, and that the usual privilege of decorating his grave with fresh flowers, during this period of mourning, be accorded his Sunday-school class.

T. C. TOWER, for Committee.

LUM.—BRO. WILLIAM J. LUM was born in Noxubee county, Miss., October 14, 1821, and died at his residence, in Claiborne county, Miss., on the 21st of September, 1881. He was married to Miss Lucretia Erwin January 6, 1847. The exact time of his uniting with the church is not known to the writer. Having been raised by a Christian mother his young mind was early impressed with the great importance of a change of heart, and in 1841, while attending a camp-meeting at Laurel Grove, he realized his change of heart, and from that time until his death he was a consistent and spiritual member of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Bro. Lum was one of the most substantial citizens. As a husband and father he was always true to his obligations. His Christian life and character had such an influence upon children as to cause the most of them to unite with the church early in life. His moral influence in the community was great. He commanded the respect of old and young. Though naturally timid, he served he was always willing and ready to cast his burden that the church and community had upon him. Soon after his conversion he was appointed class-leader, which position he held for a number of years, and was ever faithful in watching over the interest of Zion. He was a steward in the church thirty-two years, and recording steward twenty years. And thus often became secretary of the Quarterly Conference. The very quiet manner in which he discharged the duties of his office will long be remembered by the different members of Rocky Springs circuit, often a delegate to the District Conference, and more than once a delegate to Annual conference. Always at his post ready to do the bidding of his Master. Just half of his child-hood preceded him over the river of death. Although death came upon him suddenly and unexpectedly, we feel assured that all was well. We saw that it was enough. He had been ripening for heaven fifty-seven years, and at three P. M. he entered the city that awaits the faithful. Many of his servants, with a united mother, hailed his welcome as he entered the pearly gates of the Jerusalem. He leaves a widow and four children. They will greatly miss his prudent counsel and fatherly care. Blessed are the dead which die in the Lord; yea, saith the Spirit, that they may rest from their labors, and their works do follow them.

W. W. SIMMONS.

HUNTER.—Died at Waterproof, La., on the 9th of the eighth, 1881, MRS. AGNES SMALLEY HUNTER, wife of Peter Hunter, Esq. She was born in Bertie county, N. C., August 6, 1804, being at the time of her death the her eighty-th year. She was married in 1822. While quite young she joined the Missionary Baptist church. In 1838 she moved to Waterproof, La., when she connected herself with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in which society she remained a faithful member till the summons for her departure came. She lived to see her children's children unto several generations, and left a numerous family of descendants, scattered amidst the busy scenes of life, who toil, and bow their heads in sorrow, and mingle their filial grief around the grave of their dear departed parent. And she also leaves her aged, enfeebled and broken hearted husband to linger a few more years, or months, or days it may be, on the shore. He too, as she was, is ready, waiting the summons to meet her with whom he so long and so tenderly trod the path of life.

Sister Hunter died suddenly, but peacefully and resignedly conscious to the last, and entered the valley of death comforted by the rod and the staff that had been her stay for so many years of her pilgrimage. May all those who mourn her loss be already and equipped for the journey, and join her in that better land.

JACKSON.—WILLIE JACKSON, only son of J. H. and Lucy Jackson, was born at Trenton, La., August 14, 1867, and died at Columbia, La., March 2, 1882, aged fourteen years, seven months and fifteen days.

He was a member of the Sunday-school, and was loved by his teachers and all that knew him. His kind heart and manly qualities won him many friends. He was an affectionate son and brother, studying his fathers wishes.

A short time before he died he told his father that he was going to join his little sister (Hearlie) who died last summer. He leaves a devoted father and mother and one little sister to mourn their loss.

Three children have crossed over and joined each other in that bright world, where they await the coming of the dear ones they left here.

What a blessed religion is ours, which teaches us that our dead live with Jesus.

THE WORLD FOR CHRIST.

BY MRS. O. D. STONE.

O church of God, awake, awake,
Did you not hear the trumpet call,
Bidding you now your armor take,
And marshal your battalions all?

Too few have brought their wealth to Christ,
Too few enlisted for the war;
The enemy leads such a host,
And dark and deadly is his power:

Think not that you must move so slow,
And win a tardy victory;
Hasten, that all may Jesus know,
Before shall close this century.

Muster the youth, with purpose firm,
Boldly to wield the sword of truth;
Seize the strongholds, with mercy's arm,
And plant the standard of our faith.

Let pastors tried and true go hence,
To fill the ranks of those who fall;
And a new era now commence,
Of loving sacrifice from all.

Let rich and poor their offerings bring,
And lay them at our Captain's feet;
And let all Christendom now ring
With songs and prayers for warfare meet.

Our Leader is the mighty Lord;
His presence makes a valiant host;
Trusting his guidance and his word,
No battle fought can ever be lost.

Would that his zeal might fire all hearts,
To undertake this world to win,
By speedy conquest in all parts.
For Nineteen Hundred shall begin.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

The year 1819-20 was a memorable period. It was such to the country, to the church, and in my own personal history. Politically it was eventful. It marked the opening of a great struggle, which, like the low muttering of a distant storm, had been occasionally heard by prescient statesmen, but now assumed a definite and visible form of a portentous cyclone, overspreading the fairest and happiest land beneath the sky. I allude to the admission of Missouri into the Federal Union by Congress, when for the first time the the question of slavery divided the country by a geographical line. The culmination of that storm was the four years civil war of 1861-65. The deplorable results of that fratricidal struggle are too well known to require repitition or comment. The evils of it are inconceivable, and the responsibility for it must be decided by the only court of supreme jurisdiction. If I felt in any degree responsible for it I think it would craze me. Think God I do not!

Among other important events of that period were the promulgation and establishment of the "Monroe Doctrine" of non-intervention of foreign powers with the South American States and Territories; the right of the Federal Government to make internal improvements; the admission of Missouri, Mississippi, Illinois, Alabama, and Maine into the Union; the cession of Florida, East and West, and adjacent islands, to the United States by Spain, and the approval of the act establishing the Bank of the United States by Congress. The discussion of these topics in the Congressional and Legislative halls of the United States was like so many volcanic outbursts, threatening the very upheaval and destruction of the political frame-work of our Government. Fortunately Congress never was filled by so many great men. It was the war of giants. The tremors of that antagonism are not over, but occasionally throb in the body politic.

Some of these questions—the first named especially—was such as naturally and almost of necessity produced a great sectional sensation in Church as well as State relations. And thus the most delicate and dangerous of all moral, political, and economic questions, which might possibly have been peacefully and ably adjusted in the calmness of fraternal debate by patriotic, Christian statesmanship, became a wedge in the hands of impassioned partisans and uncompromising fanatics to rend and nearly destroy the boasted fabric of our National Union. The darkest page in Protestant history is that which records the Civil War in 1861-65. Great men, like powerful locomotives, are dangerous without a corresponding controlling power. An archangel would be a safe custodian of a nation, but without purity he would wreck and ruin it. Unfortunately our statesman proved unequal to the crisis.

To the church also this was an era of unusual importance. Our Methodism, in common with other Protestant denominations, had made gradual and decisive advances in every department of Christian enterprise. Revivals had been extensive, accessions of members unusually great, the number of candidates for the ministry had multiplied, and withal, their gifts, grace and usefulness indicated a higher grade of qualifications. Led and stimulated by her able and consecrated chief pastors and experienced preachers, and by the cooperation of the laymen, there was a forward movement all along the church-line. The watchmen had long prayed and anxiously looked out from their watch-towers; had responded to the cry "What of the night?" "The morning cometh, and also the night."

A crisis was at hand, but the promised day had not burst. The yearning heart and the eye of faith wistfully turned to read in the signs of the times the realization of a brighter era. Heaven had been preparing the church and the world for a great advance-step. As in the age after Julius Cæsar passed away the temple of Janus was shut: so when Napoleon Bonaparte, whose character and history strikingly resembled the Roman usurper, had been dethroned, white-robed peace seemed to have come down to dwell again among the nations.

This turbulent spirit, at once the terror of Europe, and the pride and scourge of France, having risen from obscurity by the combination of extraordinary political events, controlled by a masterful mind, had been chained, like a caged lion, in a lonely island of the ocean since 1815, and the world looked on and breathed free. By the treaty of Ghent England and America had made peace, while Spain and the tribes of Indians upon our frontier had joined us in new treaties of amity. Even theological warriors beat the "drum ecclesiastic" less long and loud, and Christians looked into each other's faces, and began to ask if the points in which they could agree were not as many and more important than those about which they differed. It soon appeared that while the different Protestant denominations had been at war among themselves about the unending romance of this part of missionary experience can be appreciated by every American lady. Then Mrs. Lin's Chinese breakfast has to be brought very early in the morning, and the people also come early to be taught, and the door has to be opened, so that my day begins about daylight and ends sometimes late in the evening, without my rest from the questions and the inspection of the people. As I could not stand such a life very long without intermission, I usually come home to Chefuh on Saturday and remain till Monday. Next year it will be much easier, for I shall be known in the places which I have already visited, and this will make a great difference."—New York Independent.

INDIA.—The Moratha mission last fall celebrated the fiftieth anniversary of the occupation of Ahmednagar as a missionary station by opening a new building for the girls' boarding school. This school was opened in 1838, "the number of students not to exceed twenty." It has, after forty-three years, one hundred and forty-five pupils, and is now devoted to the education of the daughters of native Christians. Of the one hundred pastors, teachers and preachers connected with this mission, the greater part are indebted to this seminary for their intelligent and excellent wives.

The appointment of a Vice-Regal Commission in India "to inquire into the working of the dispatch of 1854, and to consider the question of the education of the masses, and the encouragement of higher education by private enterprise," is made the subject of a lengthy and able article in the "Church Missionary Intelligencer." The dispatch provided for the maintenance of governmental schools in which no direct Christian instruction was to be given, but where the Bible was to have a place alongside the Vedas and the Koran. The idea was to continue this aid for a time in the hope of stimulating a desire for education which would lead to a popular demand, to be met by flourishing private institutions. As administered, it is claimed that the plan works for the benefit of the few, and they the rich: e. g., it is said that "the educational department in India is expending as much on educating one rich Brahman as would support a village school of eighty pupils"; hence the Vice-Regal Commission.

JAPAN.—Rev. M. C. Harris and wife, of the Japan mission, accompanied by Mrs. Soper and her children, were to sail from Yokohama, March 9, in the "City of Tokio," the return of the ladies being necessitated by the state of their health. "Bishop Bowman's visit," writes Mr. Harris, "was in every way a delight and blessing to us and the native church. His charming lectures and addresses in Japanese, and cordial friendly manner towards our native brethren, greatly endeared him to them, and they will never forget the kind-hearted Bishop and his helpful counsel."—Zion's Herald.

—There are now in Utah twenty-six church organizations, besides the Romanists, with buildings worth $24,000. There are 30 ministers; 32 Sunday-schools, with 180 teachers and 2,250 scholars; 31 Christian day-schools, with 129 teachers and 3,820 scholars. The real estate belonging to schools cost $145,000. The Presbyterians have 10 churches and 31 schools; the Congregationalists have 2 churches and 15 schools; the Episcopalians 4 churches and 7 schools; the Methodists 8 churches and 5 schools.

—Gray Cloud, a chief among the Dakota Indians, was sentenced to be hung for his part in the outbreak of 1862, but was pardoned by President Lincoln, and is now one of the most active Christian ministers in that region. These Indian Churches have a membership of 800, with ten pastors. Their contributions average nearly a dollar a month from each individual.

—Mikuwai Shimpo, edited by Aibara Hidekata, is the first Methodist paper ever published in Japan. It is run wholly by natives. The Methodist Episcopal, Canadian and Evangelical Methodists unite in its publication as they have done also to establish a Union Theological Training School at Tokio.

—The universities' mission has now in Africa a well-equipped staff of thirty-one missionaries under Bishop Steere, and has three branches of work, one on the island of Zanzibar, one at Magliar on the mainland north of Zanzibar, and one South in the Rovuma district between the coast and Lake Nyassa.

—The Gospel is winning its way in the New Hebrides. Ten years ago there was but one island in the group that could be called Christian, and now they are all open to the Gospel. In one place the people contributed $8,500, in arrowroot, to pay for the printing and circulation of the Scriptures.

—The Foreign Missionary gives the following as the present statistics of missionary work in China: Ordained missionaries and physicians, 270; ordained natives, 53; native helpers, 1,639; communicants, 18,707; pupils, 6,247.

Archdeacon Macdonald, of the Canada Episcopal Church, has a field of work on the confines of the Arctic Circle, and extending over about 20° of longitude. About 1,500 natives have been baptized, and more than 100 are communicants.

—The wife of the head chief of an Alaska village does the washing of the missionary without charge, saying, "He is teaching us freely, and I will wash for him in like manner."

—The Woman's Baptist Missionary Society at its tenth annual meeting, held in Philadelphia, reported over 50,000 dollars, an increase of three thousand dollars over last year. They have established a home for missionaries' children in Massachusetts.

—The American Home Missionary Society has relinquished to the New West Education Commission the further prosecution of the work of establishing and maintaining Christian common schools in the southwestern territories.

—Rev. J. W. Sanborn and the Rev. Joseph Tarkey ("Spitted Arrow") are completing a translation of a hymn book and the Book of Psalms into the Seneca language for the use of the Cattaraugus Indians.

Wm. E. Hooper and sons, of Baltimore, have started a library in the Theological school at Tirnova, Bulgaria, with $200 to be invested for the purpose. Let others help who can. Our Bulgaria work moves.

—In 1850 there were about 15,000 people under the influence of the various missions in Ceylon. In the approaching census it is expected that the number will be increased to 75,000.

—The schools for the blind at Beyrout, Damascus, and Tyre, have been made the channels of spiritual blessings to thousands who have hitherto been strangers to the gospel tidings.

—Mr. Sit Moon, the pastor of the Chinese Church at Honolulu, Sandwich Island, reports that 248 of his countrymen in those Islands are Christians.

—The Christians of America gave, last year, to foreign missions, one dollar for every $25,000 worth of property owned by them.

—It is estimated that 800,000,000 heathen, or two-thirds of the human race, are now open to the labors of Christian missionaries.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The demonstration at Inverness by Dr. Rainy in favor of disestablishment of the Church of Scotland has been followed by another on the other side, called by Drs. Kennedy and Begg. It is said great preparations were made and strenuous efforts put forth for a large attendance. The Presbyteries nominally represented contain 147 ministers, of whom only 42 were present. A correspondent writes:

"When we look closely at the names given in the newspapers, we find: 1, That at least three presbyteries did not send a single man; 2, that from Caithness there came but one man out of nineteen; and 3, that twenty-three of the whole forty-two, or a clear majority of the entire conference, consisted of ministers coming from localities, one of the localities being the district immediately around Dingwall. Eight out of the ten men who form Dr. Kennedy's own presbytery were there. The fact speaks for his personal influence, although there are circumstances which might incline one not to think very much of that either. Altogether, the impression has been distinctly created here that the demonstration has missed fire."

The agitation appears to be spreading. Dr. Rainy was not permitted at a meeting at Danse to state the case of his party. A lot of rowdies took possession of the hall.

THE COLONIZATION OF PALESTINE.—The Jewish Chronicle states that the Zion Society at Galatz (Roumania) has voted 10,000f. towards the project for the colonization of Palestine. At Jassy a committee, comprising the most influential members of the Jewish community, has been formed to collect subscriptions for the same object. The Palestine Colonization Society at Berlad, another Roumanian town, has sent a delegate to the holy land to confer with the governor on the subject of the purchase of land. In the event of his being able to make a satisfactory arrangement, it is proposed that a beginning shall be made during the ensuing summer, when ten well-to-do Jewish families from Berlad will settle in Palestine.

—At a recent meeting of the English Curates' Alliance a resolution affirming the principle that "the people should have a distinct voice in the appointment of their ministers" was lost, the majority regarding the step as being likely to lead to Congregationalism. The report suggested that, for the information of the Bishops, formal registers of the assistant-clergy should be kept in every diocese, recording their antecedents and attainments. This suggestion was adopted. From a statement of facts appended to the report it appeared there are 5,300 assistant clergy in work and between 4,000 and 5,000 unattached.

—On a recent Sunday there was a public disturbance in Exeter, England, when a detachment of the Salvation Army undertook to march through the town in procession. The mayor had previously issued a notice forbidding the procession, on the basis of sworn statements that such a demonstration would lead to a breach of the peace. The Army was pelted with stones and mud by a rabble. The police broke the procession up and arrested the captain.

—The average income of the clergy of the Scottish Episcopal Church is $1,015. Besides this, the parsonages are considered to be worth $100 a year. The average salary of the Bishops is $3,280. The total membership of the church is 57,483, an average of 334 to each congregation. While the strong congregations are mainly confined to the large towns, there are some striking exceptions to this, such as Forfar, with 900 members, Johnston, with 1,000, and Stonehaven, with 800.

—Fresh disturbances and outrages against the Jews are reported from Russia. The Austrian Government has issued positive orders forbidding all meetings avowedly for the purpose of anti-Semitic demonstrations and maintaining the duty of the government to protect the rights of every subject, regardless of politics or religion.

—Surrey Chapel, famous by Rowland Hill's ministry there, is to be converted into an engine factory. But the great and eccentric preacher's name and fame will not die with the disappearance of his chapel from the list of places of worship.

—The friend of India says there is a wonderful religious movement in Eastern Bengal, and that several thousand native Christians have seceded from the Catholic communion and become Protestants.

—The Salvation Army has opened a building, formerly used as a rink, in the West End of London. It accomodates 2,300 persons and is rented at $5,000 a year. An admission fee of a shilling was charged to non-members of the Army.

—Western Texas has 31 Protestant Episcopal parishes and missions; communicants, 838; Sunday-school scholars 728. The contributions for the past year were $9,175. Value of churches and chapels and other church property, $77,425.

—During six years 41,630 volumes have been distributed by Mrs. C. H. Spurgeon's book fund, "mainly to ministers who could not afford to purchase for themselves."

—Rev. Thaddeus Saltors, the first colored man ever admitted to the Protestant Episcopal ministry in South Carolina, was ordained in Charleston, S. C.

—The late census shows 25,053 Protestant churches in the United States with 74,052 ministers and 9,003,000 members.

—Syria has 80 foreign preachers, 300 native helpers, 1,000 Christians, and 120,000 church-goers.

—A Presiding Elders' Convention will be held in Chicago June 6, 7, and 8. Questions of vital interest to the Methodist Church are to be discussed.

—Quite a number of merchants in Madrid have determined to close their places of business on Sunday, whereat the International Sabbath Observance Society rejoices.

—The entire business of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South Publishing House at Nashville, last year, amounted to $178,748.72.

—The Christian Instructor of Chicago has been removed to Philadelphia.

THE MOON IS A LADY.

BY NELLIE M. GAGNANT.

The moon, the moon, the silver moon!
The moon is a lady fair;
She has a great room I, sailing free,
And long, bright shining hair.

I think way up amid the clouds
She lives in a palace bright;
She keeps the curtains drawn all day
And opens them by night.

And while she at her casement sits,
And spins with her fingers airy
A long white veil of moonbeams bright
To float upon the sky.

And then behind her flying steeds
She rides in her golden car
O'er fields where grows my flower
In just a twinkling star.

—Our Little Ones.

From Aunt Loretta.

DEAR NIECES AND NEPHEWS: "Once upon a time." Is that the right way to begin? "O yes," you say we like to read or hear a story that begins with "Once upon a time." But this is not a story, it is only an incident that occurred when I was a little girl.

As you like it I will begin then with "Once upon a time," I went to spend the evening and night with one of my playmates, whose name was Rachel. Her mother and mine were good friends and we were well-pretty much the same, thank you.

We had a grand time both before and after supper, just such times as you often have when you visit each other as I presume you all do sometimes.

After prayers Rachel's mother took us to her room where we were to sleep in a trundle bed. Dear little old trundle beds where are you now?

When we disrobed and were ready to lie down, Rachel knelt and repeated her prayers, but I laid down without kneeling, and said my prayer under the bed quilt. When Rachel laid down I felt a hand on my forehead, and throwing back the cover I saw Rachel's mother standing over me, she stooped over and said in a low sweet voice:

"Loretta, did thee say thy prayers?

"Yes ma'am," I answered.

"But thee did not kneel down; rise up now and kneel before thy Maker and say thy prayers."

There was no alternative for me but to obey the gentle command. I arose and knelt, and repeated my evening prayer in a whisper, and was in the act of rising from my knees when Rachel's mother, who was still standing by me, placed her hand on my head and said, "Kneel down again my child, and say thy prayers out loud." I did so, but all I could say was the little prayer, beginning with "Now I lay me down to sleep," and the "Amen" was pronounced with one foot on the floor and the other in the bed, for I had conceived a sudden fancy for that friendly quilt, and manifested considerable haste to get it over my burning face once more. Before I could carry out this design, that sweet woman stooped and kissed me on my forehead, and as the quilt went up, I heard the same sweet voice say:

"Loretta, thee must never be ashamed to say thy prayers when thou art away from home."

AUNT LORETTA.

From Leesburg, Mississippi.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: I see so many little letters in the young folks column, I have decided to write one and see if you thought it worth publishing.

I have one brother two years older than myself. And one in heaven, younger. Precious little angel! we still miss him so much, though he has been dead eight months. We speak of him often, and hope to meet him over on the other shore. I have one little sister four years old. We make a great pet of her, as she is the youngest. We have no Sabbath-school out here, but recite a lesson to papa or mamma every Sabbath morning, and read a chapter in the Testament every night, unless we have company, and sometimes then.

Our faithful pastor, Mr. A. H. Miller, generally calls on us once a month, and we are always so glad to have him come. You may know he suits us well, for this is the fourth year. We would regret so much to give him up. Our presiding elder, Uncle Gam I call him, calls on us occasionally also, and I know there is no little girl prouder than I to see him. I could say more, but am afraid this is too long. Your little friend, OLA B.

More Promises for Mexico.

MR. EDITOR: I noticed a letter in the ADVOCATE sometime ago from Annie and Olive Sorrest, and since then one from another correspondent, who wants all the little folks to help them out in their "Big Idea." I have been thinking ever since how I would make my money, so I could write and tell them. I have three sisters and two brothers that are going to give something. Sister Ora is going to make her money by raising pears. Sister Maddie has a missionary hen. Brother Charlie and myself are going to have a cotton patch. My little brother, Oscar, says "he is going to hire his sister to pick cotton this fall to get some money for the missionaries. Sister Sallie has not decided how she will make hers yet; but she will make some "somehow." And among us all we expect to raise five dollars. Now let us hear from some of the rest. We must not let Annie and Olive's "Big idea" fall through, it is too good a work. So let us press onward. Respectfully,

About A Queer Man.

Many hundreds of years ago lived a very strange man whose name was Diogenes. His home was in the city of Athens, in Greece. The people of Athens are very polite, but this strange man took pride in being very impolite. He made himself very disagreeable. People started at him and laughed at him. This was just what pleased Diogenes. Many people called him a great man. This pleased him more yet. He was so odd, and behaved so strangely, that after a while a good many tried to imitate him and to act as strangely as he did. This pleased him, perhaps, most of all. Sometimes Diogenes slept in the sand and sometimes on the verandas of houses or in doorways. Sometimes he used to take a tub around with him. When night came he would curl himself up like a kitten and go to sleep in the tub. One bright, sunny day, when the city was full of people, he took a lighted lantern and walked down the street. He looked as if he were hunting for something. 'What are you looking for with your lantern in this bright daylight?' the people asked. 'I am looking for an honest man,' growled Diogenes.

At this time there lived a great warrior and emperor who had made himself more famous than any one else in the world. Great crowds followed him and threw up their hats, and cheered. His name was Alexander. Perhaps he was really the greatest man in the world. So he was called Alexander the Great. One day Alexander marched by where Diogenes sat sunning himself in the sand. The people were cheering as usual and making a great noise. But Diogenes sat quite still, caring nothing about the emperor. When Alexander passed by Diogenes he noticed this. He wondered why this poorly clothed man paid him no attention. Then he turned to Diogenes with a frown, and said in a very haughty manner, 'Do you know that I am Alexander?' Everybody thought that Diogenes would turn pale and be very much confused. But he only looked up and answered with as much pride as if he were an emperor himself. 'Do you know that I am Diogenes?' Perhaps we may all admire his independence as much as Alexander is said to have done. Diogenes always lived this queer sort of a life. He was an old, old man when he died.—Our Little Ones.

"Stop-A-While."

There is in Africa a thorn called "Stop-a-while." If a person once gets caught in it, it is with difficulty that he escapes with his clothes on his back, for every attempt to loosen one part only hooks more firmly another part.

The man that gets caught by this thorn is in a pitiable plight ere he gets loose. You would not like—would you, boys, to be caught in this thorn? And yet many, I fear, are being caught by a worse thorn than "Stop-a-while." Where do you spend your evenings? At home, I do hope, studying your lesson and attending to your mother's words; for if you have formed a habit of spending them on the streets with bad boys, you are caught in a thorn worse than "Stop-a-while." If you spend your evenings at home, do not allow any of your playmates to persuade you to go out and join them for one evening only, for if you do, the desire to go again will be strong; you will have laid the foundation of a bad habit, and you will have a harder struggle to escape with life than if in the brambles of "Stop-a-while."

Boys and girls who disobey their parents, who loiter about on the Sabbath instead of going to Sabbath-school, who take the name of the Lord in vain, are caught in the worst of snares, from which it will be more difficult to extricate themselves than from the African thorn; for bad habits are strong, and constantly lure on their victims to pleasures which satisfy not.

The boy who roams the streets at night has fallen into one of the worst of habits. It soon teaches him to neglect his studies, adopt evil practices, and to corrupt his heart; while he who spends his evenings at home escapes evil and grows wiser, and better, and happier.

Mr. Longfellow's First Poem.

When our great poet was nine years old, his master wanted him to write a "composition." Little Henry, like all children, shrank from the undertaking. His master said,

"You can write words, can you not?"

"Yes, was the reply.

"Then you can put words together?"

"Yes, sir."

"Then," said the master, "you may take your slate and go out behind the school house, and there you can find something to write about, and then you can tell what it is, what it is for, and what is to be done with it; and that will be a composition."

Henry took his slate and went out. He went behind Mr. Finney's barn, which chanced to be near by, and seeing a fine turnip growing up, he thought he knew what that was, what it was for, and what would be done with it.

A half-hour had been allowed to Henry for his first undertaking in writing compositions. In a half-hour he carried in his work, all accomplished, and the master is said to have been affected almost to tears when he saw what little Henry had done in that short time.

MR. FINNEY'S TURNIP.

Mr. Finney had a turnip,
And it grew, and it grew,
And it grew behind the barn,
And the turnip did no harm.

And it grew and it grew,
Till it could grow no taller.
Then Mr. Finney took it up
And put it in the cellar.

There it lay, there it lay,
Till it began to rot.
When his daughter Susie washed
And she put it in the pot.

Then she boiled it, and boiled it
As long as she was able.
Then his daughter Lizzie took it
And she put it on the table.

Mr. Finney and his wife
Had but one dish to sup,
And they ate, and they ate,
Until they ate the turnip up.

Hating Covetousness.

This was to be one of the qualifications of those whom Moses, by advice of Jethro, was to appoint as subordinate rulers. The term is at least forcible and suggestive, conveying, as it does, the idea of repugnance to the dominion of avarice. To hate covetousness is to be as far as possible from countenancing it, and this not in others so much as in ourselves. A ruler's danger would not arise from covetousness in others nearly as much as it would from inordinate desire of gain in himself. Covetousness is a hateful thing to the upright and devout in whatever form it may appear. It is repulsive as seen in our friends, in our neighbors, and it is something to be dreaded as possibly threatening our own integrity. Christ warns us to "take heed and beware of covetousness," and Paul describes it as "idolatry." It is, therefore, one of the worst and most degrading sins that can overtake us, and it is probably one of the most difficult for men to detect in themselves.

It does not usually stand alone. The love of money is a root of all evil. There is scarcely any vice, or kind of wrong doing, that it does not foster. It is one of the strongest factors in the wide-spread evil of intemperance. It promotes licentiousness, gambling, fraud, and seems to be accessory to almost all wickedness. But, apart from outward vices, it may dwell in the heart. The sober, honest, industrious may be idolaters, and the love of money be in them the ruling passion. When connected with corruption, in magistrates and rulers, it excites our loathing, and also when it is revealed by dishonest and infamous practices. It is more readily recognized in the character and conduct of others whether it has these manifestations or not.

The most difficult achievement is for a Christian man to discover this mammon worship in his own heart. Possibly it may excite our aversion in others, while we unconsciously tolerate it in ourselves. It is in the number of those secret faults from which David prays to be cleansed. In the penitent sinner it is likely to be the last sin to be exposed and renounced; and in the believer it is the most dangerous temptation. If there be in justified persons any residue of sin it is likely to be this sin of covetousness. In many it seems to be the last stand of inbred sin. It appears the most difficult of errors for grace to uproot.

It is often charged that there is much covetousness in the church. There is reason to fear that this is the case. To a great extent it is a sin of the heart, in many it may be exclusively so, and therefore beyond the reach of Discipline. We can not well accuse the brethren specifically, or by name. God only reads the heart, and knows what is in man. When we consider how little of their substance even Christians consecrate to God, and how difficult it is to carry on the religious and benevolent enterprises of the church, the suspicion is raised that there is covetousness in the camp of Israel. There is talk and preaching about Achans, and buried wedges of gold, but we can not certainly tell in whose tent the spoils are hid. There are other things that keep religious people from giving to missions, as lack of intelligence and lack of faith, and overmuch devotion to pleasure and luxury. But, with all charity, we may safely say that covetousness is at the bottom of most of this hard-shell opposition and indifference.

The most subtle, the most pervasive, the most secret, the most difficult of detection of human sins, it is among the worst in enormity. To hate covetousness, rightly and thoroughly, is to detect it in ourselves, and to cast it out. It must be recognized as a dangerous intruder, as a serpent whose venom is surely fatal. To hate it is to give it no quarter, to fight it until it is exterminated, and to seek for the blood that alone can cleanse the heart from the foul pollution. To hate it is to realize that it is idolatry indeed, more degrading to character, and more offensive to God than the pagan worship of stocks and stones.

To hate covetousness is the more delicate test of character, because covetousness is itself almost beyond detection. It almost defies definition. There are so many right things that resemble it, we can not easily distinguish the false from the true. We have it clothed as such angels of light as economy, justice, enterprise, lawful accumulations and necessary capital. "Money answereth all things." It is right to seek it, to make it, to save it. Everybody needs money. Abraham and Job and David were rich. Where are we to draw the line, and what is covetousness? It is the idolatry of money, the supreme love of it, the inordinate desire for it. Men hating covetousness are not perplexed with any obscure casuistry about it; they are not the willing dupes of a devilish sophistry. They hate it as they hate darkness, and as they love light; as they hate Satan and as they love God.

"Men hating covetousness" describes in a sordid age, those who are the farthest possible from selling their souls or soiling their consciences for gain. They stand out in strong contrast with the prevailing mania for the accumulation of riches, and with the spirit that adopts the most reckless expedients, and tramples upon every principle of rectitude. Such men are the sound material of the social fabric, the kind of men that are needed for rulers, legislators, magistrates, and as the leaders in the marts of trade, as merchants, financiers, and men in all business enterprises.

Hardened Hearts.

In the storm the disciples seemed not to know that the eye of their absent Master was upon them. Nevertheless, "he saw them toiling in rowing." Their affright in the tempest was not lessened by any remembrance of the miracle which they had witnessed only a few hours before. The new miracle, of stilling the winds and the waves, filled them with amazement and wonder. Somehow the feeding of the five thousand was not laid to heart. It ought to have been fresh in their minds, and the recollection of it should have quieted their fears, and prepared them for the deliverance which the Saviour brought. The fault was in not considering the recent miracle. For the lack of this consideration, they were overwhelmed with amazement and trouble. Hardness of heart was exhibited in this way. It was unbelief, doubt, springing from this source. "For they considered not the miracle of the loaves; for their heart was hardened."

This particular illustration of hardness of heart was afforded by the disciples of Christ. As far as it has application now, its lesson may be directed to those who claim this character. Our proneness to forget, or our failure to recall what God has done, is manifest in the time of sudden trial. In other days he has wrought signal deliverances. The whole past life has been a miracle of loaves. Not miraculous, possibly, in a technical or theological sense, but providential care has been displayed. There have been answers to prayer, there have been unexpected ways opened of escape. These experiences should fortify against distrust in any pressing emergency, and sustain and cheer under sudden calamities. The disciples, toiling in rowing, seem to have been strangely forgetful of Christ, and of his power and love. Just when they should have thought of him, and of his tender care over them, he seems to have been altogether out of their minds.

This is the trouble with many Christians still. There is a certain hardness of heart that takes this shape. And not alone in reference to God's providence, but there is also failure to consider the promises. Depravity is manifested in the memory. There is a tendency to forget the things that should be most remembered. There is a moral quality in our forgetting. A bad memory about some things indicates that there is something wrong in the heart. The appropriate promise eludes us when everything naturally tends to help us in recalling it.

It may be that the failure to consider is not always forgetting, but rather a failure to rightly interpret. The disciples did not penetrate the meaning of the miracle of the loaves. While remembered, they had not thought much about it. Beyond the momentary sense of something wonderful, it seems to have made no definite and strong impression. They had not given the subject the deep reflection it merited. There was in it a wealth of comfort. It was a revealing of Christ in his benevolence, in his power, and as the bread of life to all hungering souls. His glory as Creator shone in the miracle; and, as the Lord of nature, he multiplied the loaves. After that there was nothing too hard for him to do. It was not a greater thing to calm the troubled sea, nor a more beneficent. The miracle, while possibly not forgotten, was not adequately interpreted. Its deep meaning, as unfolding the character of Christ, had escaped them.

It is not altogether then the remembering, but it is the understanding, that determines the value of the works and the words of God. Herein is our failure also. Our studies of them are on the surface. They stand as declarations, or as events barren of such deep meaning as to shed light upon our trials, or to cheer us in the time when, boisterous seas threaten. This aspect of the hardened heart, so often seen in the history of the disciples, up to the resurrection of their Lord, is not unfrequently seen in ourselves. Christians, respecting many things in the providence and word of Christ, do not remember, or they do not understand.

It is hardness of heart, not manifested in crime, not exhibited in cruelty or vice, nor displayed in infidelity, but such hardness as sometimes overtakes those who aim to be true to their divine Master. It comes to notice especially in seasons of peril, and under stress of conflicting and discouraging circumstances. Where the life is mainly right, where the conscience is tender, where the chief elements of Christian character are unchanged, this defect crops out. It is perhaps the one flaw, the single blemish, the infirmity that stands alone among qualities of great beauty and excellence. Presence of mind in sudden danger is an admirable trait. But this moral presence of mind, this power to consider, what is needed for our strength and comfort in trouble, is much more admirable. It is a grace to be sought and to be cultivated.

"The Spirit of Faith."

There appeared in Demorest's Magazine, not long since, a beautiful steel engraving, entitled "The Spirit of Faith." It is a copy of an admirable work by Matthew Noble, the eminent sculptor. Faith is a lovely figure standing on the rock of Truth, one hand clasping the cross, the other pointing heavenward. The composition is almost as beautiful as its inspiring lesson. The cross, the emblem of mercy and victory, is entwined with the olive and the passion flower. Above her head shines a single star, showing that in this vale of tears there are shadows and darkness, while her hand points far above, with the exultant confidence that there is no night in faith's eternal home. This is faith's hope and triumph. It is the victory that overcometh the world. Out of all earth's worry and care, it points the soul to the land of rest and peace, where the smile of the Lord is the rapture of love. Faith makes "angel-ladders out of clouds." In every dark night of sorrow or trial it plants a star in the skies, and robes it in fire.

Faith is the strongest, grandest element of character. It has given to the world its heroes and apostles, its patriots and martyrs. There has been no brilliant achievement without it. All the saints of God, canonized in Scripture, were splendid examples of faith. It gave heroism to their characters and immortality to their memories. Kings and princes have passed into oblivion, but the fame of humble faith shines on bright as the eternal fires of heaven.

Faith cheers the heart of despair. We sorrow not as those who have no hope. Beyond this weeping and parting there will be reunions without separation and joys that have no end. Thus we are encouraged never to despair. Weeping will endure for a night, but joy cometh with the morning. The hand of faith is ever pointing upward. Leaning upon the cross here, it looks aloft to brighter worlds and sweeter pleasures.

Faith exalts us to fellowship and kingship with God. Out of worms of the dust, it makes us kings and priests. Abraham was honored with the double title of "father of the faithful" and "friend of God." Every child of faith, however humble, is God's chosen friend. What a companionship! And this is the glorious inheritance of faith. Throughout the eternal years we may enjoy such an association.

Faith ennobles life's aims. Every soul has a purpose, and every day has its duties. We are not here to breathe a few years and die, but to labor and never die. To faith there is no death. We live in the accomplishment of God's plans. To achieve goodness, if not greatness, is faith's aspiration. No history, however little known on earth, is a failure, if written by the hand of faith. We may step from earthly obscurity to heaven's glory and felicity. Possessions and titles do not make character. Moses left the pomp of Pharaoh's court to be an exile and homeless wanderer. But his life of faith has rendered him immortal, while the great Egyptian monarch is remembered only to be despised.

This spirit of faith may be the possession and inspiration of all. None so poor it will not enrich; none so fallen it will not exalt; none so prodigal it will not bring back to the Father's house; none so timid it will not embolden with dauntless heroism; none so lost it will not find and crown with song and praises. What a heritage and hope! For this blessed spirit of faith let us earnestly pray, and, when given, let us carefully watch and diligently cultivate.

Alabama Notes.

Our prospects in these parts seem to be better in almost every respect than they were this time last year. The oat crop is larger and more forward, many fields being now all headed out, and some even ripe enough to feed on. This will relieve the country of the necessity of buying so much corn, which, at $1 and $1.25 per bushel, would soon run the people hopelessly into debt. An unusual amount of wheat also was planted last fall, which is said to be unusually good. The mild winter and early spring permitted the grass to grow so constantly that the hogs and cattle are all looking well. The fruit crop is more promising than for years past. Indeed, the trees are loaded, and we are looking forward with deep interest to the coming of old-fashioned peach pies and apple dumplings. The blackberry pickers are already at work and are fetching in this delightful fruit at five cents a quart. The chicken crop, too—a crop of immense importance—is exceedingly interesting. The hens have done their best, both in laying and hatching. The corn has nearly all been planted, and much of it has been plowed and hoed out to a stand. The prevailing purpose is to raise supplies at home, and hence more corn and less cotton will be cultivated this year than for several years past. Some cotton is coming up, but most of it is yet to be planted. There seems to be a spirit everywhere of cheerful, hopeful industry among the farmers.

The merchants were nearly all hurt by their business last year, and have very generally determined to do business less on credit than heretofore. Hence, while they are not selling so much, yet their bank accounts are better. If they will stick to this policy they will do much to restore prosperity. Manufacturing interests are all doing well. Prattville is a manufacturing town. The best gins in the world are made here, and Bro. Pratt, the owner of the shop, is one of the cleverest men in the world. The other shops are all doing well. Cotton mills are multiplying in the State, and, when they become as numerous as they should be, wealth will accumulate with great rapidity.

A revenue officer told me the other day that the prohibition of the liquor traffic, which is only in certain counties, had diminished "Uncle Sam's" income, in the northern district of Alabama, at least $10,000 per annum. Now, think of that! If $10,000 were paid by the liquor dealers to the government as tax, how much was paid by the buyers of the stuff to the dealers? Certainly not less than $750,000. Then see how much crime this $750,000 would cause, and how much money would be spent in its prosecution and defense in the courts! Oh! for the day when there will not be a dram-shop left in the land.

Under these circumstances, as might be expected, the church seems to be looking up. I believe there is a general expectation of a good year in religious matters. The missionary spirit is a true index to the state of the church, and this spirit is evidently reviving. The Woman's Missionary Society is doing much to awaken and sustain this feeling. These societies are on the increase, both in number, in knowledge and in zeal. Their own excellent paper, together with the letters of our missionaries, and other kindred matter to be found every week in the whole family of Advocates, furnish the knowledge necessary to spring their energies. And they communicate their zeal to the entire church. It is reported that a gentleman in Montgomery has given the society of that city $200 for the education of Chinese children. The society here has undertaken to educate one to be called Esther Pratt, in honor of the sainted Sister Pratt, formerly of this place. The Greenville Society already is engaged in this noble work. Doubtless other societies will do as much. There has never been a time in our history when we have had such opportunities as are now presented in China, Brazil, Mexico and our own frontier. Dr. Allen's Chinese College ought to be endowed. Dr. Patterson should have all he wants in Mexico, and Dr. Ransom all he asks for in Brazil. The church can meet all these demands, and all at home, too, if she will. May God give us eyes to see our duty, and heads and hands to perform it.

We are looking forward with interest to the General Conference. Dr. Finley, in the Texas, and Bishop Pierce, in the Nashville, stated the general feeling of the church when they said that the main business would be to look after the missionary matters and elect new Bishops. The church needs, or will need in the next quadrennium, at least four new Bishops—wise and devoted men. We also need a better adjustment of our missionary and educational functions, and a few words taken out of our sacramental services. But about change of name, and organic unity with other churches, and Dr. Searrit's plan and Dr. George's plan, the less said the better for us all. It would be a calamity to the best interests of Zion should these matters, any of them, agitate the church at this time.

Shreveport Letter.

Mr. Editor: Yesterday was a grand day with the Baptists of Shreveport. Their church, erected at a total cost of $21,500, was dedicated, Rev. W. W. Landrum, of Augusta, Ga., preaching the sermon. The Presbyterian and Methodist congregations, no services being held in their churches, were with their Baptist brethren, and the auditorium was filled to overflowing. Bro. Landrum was the pastor of the Shreveport Baptist Church during 1875, and is a son of Rev. S. Landrum, D. D., of your city. When last in New Orleans I listened to a clear, strong, searching discourse from the father, and now, having heard the splendid effort of yesterday, I am sure that the Landrum name will not lose its luster in the keeping of the son. At four in the afternoon there was held in the Baptist Church a mass meeting of the Baptist, Presbyterian and Methodist Sunday-schools. We had a profitable time. Rev. J. A. Hackett, the Baptist pastor, has engaged the services of the Purser brothers, who are expected to-night on the John D. Scully. They are the evangelists who have been lately preaching and singing with success at Pike's Hall, in Baton Rouge. They will at once open fire upon the sinners of our city, and my ardent prayer is that they may reach them and get them converted. Truly converted people will let go of "the world, the flesh and the devil." Churches of all denominations, so far as I can see, here and elsewhere, stand sorely in need of people so converted that they will not only renounce, but forever let go of the triple enemy.

This dedication reminds me of another, and the more I think it over the more convinced am I that there is no good reason why we Shreveport Methodists should not have a dedication also before the year has gone; or, at latest, in the early spring of 1883. I respond with a hearty amen to what you said in a late Advocate: "May the good work go on auspiciously and promptly in spite of floods."

At our quarterly meeting a committee was appointed to buy suitable lots, and they promptly purchased 80x150 feet at the head of Texas street, thus securing a site which is almost unanimously conceded by our church members, and by our citizens generally, to be the best for the purpose in Shreveport. A committee on plan and a building committee were also appointed, and nothing remains but for them to break ground and build. The people have a "mind to build," and the building committee, so soon as they shall begin, will find not only our own members, but members of other churches, and the citizens at large, Jew and Gentile, full of sympathy, and ready to help on the work to completion. I believe our building committee are men of that sort of faith which is seen in works, and that they will push the matter with proper energy.

I heard from Bro. Borden last week, and his labors in the cause of Christian education are meeting with much success. Mansfield Female College must surely prosper more and more, as the years roll on, and the Methodists ought constantly to pray and labor to this end.

Let us not forget the circulating for signatures of the temperance petitions prepared by Bro. Pipes and endorsed by unanimous vote of the Conference. My heart goes out in sympathy for our Bro. Galloway in his not seeing the result he hoped for in the vote had in the Mississippi Legislature. May we have many such noble temperance workers throughout the connection. The battle lost in Mississippi, Louisiana, Texas or elsewhere must be at once renewed and fought straight on, for victory must come at last.

J. T. SAWYER.

Shreveport, La., April 3, 1882.

New Orleans District Conference.

This body met in the Methodist Church, in Baton Rouge, April 11, at nine A. M. Bishop Keener was present, and presided during the session. The attendance of ministers was good; but the laymen were scarce—there being only two present besides those belonging to the church in which the Conference was held. The reports, in regard to the spiritual interests of the church, indicate some improvement since the last session. While there have been few revival seasons in the churches, in several instances there is manifested a deeper work of grace and power. Some remarkable conversions have been noted. The subject upon which the Bishop laid special emphasis, and concerning which he propounded very searching questions, and delivered unequivocal words, was the subject of missions. The burden of the missionary talk during all the session was, how to devise and put in operation a plan that would provoke all our members to contribute to this cause? No conclusion was reached, and no plan adopted. The Conference, however, put in execution the resolution, adopted by our last Annual Conference, in regard to sending a special deputation to the district "to hold mass meetings, deliver addresses, distribute tract papers etc., in order that our people may come to understand fully and strongly the vitality of the great principle of the gospel of the Son of God." A deputation of two—a minister and one layman—was appointed to visit each pastoral charge in the district in the interest of the missionary cause. Each deputation by correspondence with the pastor of the charge to which it is sent, is to arrange for the time, etc., of the meeting. It is thought that the execution of this plan will result in benefit to the church in various ways. The missionary mass meeting was held Sunday evening. There were addresses by Bishop Keener and Dr. Walker, and spirited singing by the choir, and then the inevitable collection which amounted to $130.

The Sunday-schools were reported in good condition; some of them having grown largely in number since the last session. Our own Sunday-school literature is used in all the schools, and it was the pleasure of the Conference to adopt this resolution:

"Resolved, That this District Conference heartily commend and approve the action of our Sunday-school secretary in the adoption of a supplemental catechism on the articles of our holy religion, appended to the International lessons."

The finances received a good share of attention from the Conference. In some charges the church keeps up, but in most of them she follows at a great distance. The overflow has poured its drenching flood even through the fair fields of the church. This finance is the old, old trouble, and we reckon that when the work comes to an end the church will still be in debt for the gospel, and the future alone can reveal how the account will be settled.

A most interesting report from the trustees of the Seashore Camp Ground was presented to the Conference. The trustees reported a large gathering at the last camp meeting, and a work of great grace and power among the people. They also reported that the debt which had hampered them in the past was cancelled, and the future was bright. The following gentlemen were elected trustees for the ensuing year: J. H. Keller, O. L. Rayne, J. H. Campman, W. H. Foster, G. W. W. Goodwyn, P. Hallaran, Capt. J. H. Pharr, T. Carver.

At the Saturday evening session there was an election for delegates to the next ensuing Annual Conference. The following brethren were elected: E. P. Muckle, Rev. Thomas J. Carver, J. D. Nettles and W. H. N. Magruder. The alternates elected are: A. J. Louden and J. H. Campman.

Religious services were held morning and evening during the session, the congregations being attentive to the word, and evidently appreciating the preaching of the truth.

It was this writer's privilege to look many old and true friends in the face once more, and to feel again the thrill of a renewed Christian friendship. The steamboat J. H. Hanna, Capt. J. W. Blanks, received the unanimous thanks of the Conference for delicate and unobtrusive favors. The Conference resolved, by vote, to hold its next session in the Carondelet Street Church, New Orleans.

C. W. CARTER, Sec.

An Important Message.

President Arthur's recent message to Congress, April 1, on the improvement of the Mississippi river, will be exceedingly gratifying to the people of the Mississippi valley. It is a clear, just and timely deliverance. The message is as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives.

I transmit herewith a letter dated the twenty-ninth ultimo, from the secretary of war, inclosing a copy of a communication from the Mississippi river commission, in which the commission recommends that an appropriation may be made of $10,000,000 for closing existing gaps in the levees in addition to a like sum for which an estimate has already been submitted.

The subject is one of such importance that I deem it proper to recommend an early and favorable consideration of the recommendations of the commission.

Having possession of and jurisdiction over the river, Congress, with a view of improving its navigation and protecting the people of the valley from floods, has for years caused surveys of the river to be made for the purpose of acquiring knowledge of the laws that control it and of its phenomena. By an act approved June 28, 1879, the Mississippi river commission was created, composed of able engineers. Section 4 of the act provides:

That it shall be the duty of said commission to take into consideration and mature such plan or plans and estimates as will correct, permanently locate and deepen the channel and protect the banks of the Mississippi river, improve and give safety and ease to the navigation thereof, prevent destructive floods and promote and facilitate commerce, trade and the postal service. The constitutionality of the law making appropriations in aid of these objects can not be questioned, while the report of the commission submitted and the plans proposed for the river's improvement seem justified as well on scientific principles as by experience, and the approval of the people most interested, and also desire to leave it to the judgment of Congress to decide upon the best plan for the permanent and complete improvement of the river and for the protection of the valley.

The immense losses and widespread suffering of the people dwelling near the river induce me to urge upon Congress the propriety of not only making an appropriation to close the gaps in the levees occasioned by the recent floods, as recommended by the commission, but that Congress should inaugurate measures for the permanent improvement of the navigation of the river and the security of the valley. It may be that such a system of improvement would, as it progresses, require the appropriation of twenty or thirty millions of dollars. Even such an expenditure, extending as it must over several years, can not be regarded as extravagant in view of the immense interests involved.

The safe and convenient navigation of the Mississippi is a matter of concern to all sections of the country; to the Northwest, with its immense harvests needing transportation; to Alabama and to the inhabitants of the river valley, whose lives and property depend upon the proper construction of the safeguards which protect them from floods. It is of vital importance that a well-matured and comprehensive plan of improvement should be put into operation with as little delay as possible.

The cotton product of the region subject to devastating floods, is a source of wealth to the nation and of great importance in keeping the balance of trade in our favor.

It may not be inopportune to mention that this government has imposed and collected $70,000,000 by tax on cotton, in the production of which the population of the lower Mississippi is largely engaged, and it does not seem inequitable to return a portion of this tax to those who contributed it, particularly as such an action will also result in an important gain to the country at large, and especially so to the great and rich States of the Northwest and to the Mississippi valley.

At the Council of the Protestant Episcopal Church, of the diocese of Louisiana, held in New Orleans last week, the following items on the state of the church were reported:

The Rev. Dr. Dalzell, on the part of the Committee of the state of the church, reported that the work of the church in Louisiana was steadily, though perhaps slowly, progressing. An increase of 7 per cent, in the number of baptisms occurred during the year over the previous one. There are now 3782 communicants. In the diocese, against 3556 for the year previous.

During the present year the sum of $80,850,86 may be credited to the church against $61,013 27 for the previous one. There were 391 confirmations in 1881 and 426 in 1880.

The Committee urges, as was done by the same committee last year, the necessity for more earnest missionary work in the diocese, and especially in the city of New Orleans. Missionary enterprises in New Orleans are now more few and feeble than they were some few years ago.

After referring to the fact that the Bishop had assumed charge of Christ Church as the Bishop's Church and appointed a clergyman to carry on the services of this, the mother parish of the diocese, the committee expressed themselves as gathering hope for the future of that large outlying portion of this city which properly comes under its jurisdiction, and in which it has, at times in the past done much good and successful work in the diocese.

On motion of the Rev. J. F. Girault Mr. William Wright was re-elected Treasurer.

The committee on procuring a residence for the Bishop reported slow progress, and strongly advocated the necessity for greater liberality in order to attain the object in view.

Wm. F. Booth, Esq., son of our brother, Mr. Edward Booth, of this city, writes as follows to the New Orleans Times-Democrat, concerning the Sunday law agitation in San Francisco, Cal. The communication is dated San Francisco, April 8, 1882:

I notice in your columns an interesting article in the form of an interview with Judge McGloin, of New Orleans, on the subject of the Sabbath and the proper observance thereof. Thinking it might interest some of your readers who take thought on such matters, I will state the condition here of the same question, as it is creating quite a furore in San Francisco.

Twenty years ago the Legislature enacted a "Sunday Law," requiring the cessation of all secular business upon Sunday, excepting certain transactions businesses and callings therein enumerated. The law lay dead for twenty years, when some enterprising fellow swore out a warrant under it and the case was finally carried to the Supreme Court, which, both in Department and in Banc, affirmed the decision of the lower court, sustaining the constitutionality of the "Sunday Law." A "League of Freedom" was organized consisting of those whose special business—as liquors, cigars, etc.,—demand a Sunday trade. Of course the press is divided. The Daily Report, a bitter Republican sheet and the city organ, naturally lifts its sonorous voice on high in support of the "League." On the other hand a counter organization entitled the "Home Protection Society," was formed, consisting of clergymen and old temperance men. The latter society is pushing matters. More than 500 arrests have been made in this city alone. But a swell of business hampers the court, and jurors can not be obtained. Out of a venire of forty only one was yesterday obtained. The others were excused by the prosecution because they said law or no law they would not convict a man for doing that which they considered no crime.

So it stands. The "Home Protectionists" have the law, the police, and the courts; the "League of Freedom" has the people, the money, and the means for successfully violating the law. As the Hon. Tweed used to say: "What are you going to do about it?" The League says it will elect the next Legislature and repeal the law, and there is no doubt this will happen, for those composing the League are here as elsewhere, all-powerful. In the meantime in San Francisco no convictions are likely to be secured. Gentlemen will continue to violate the law, suffer arrest and enjoy immediate cash by the League's Secretary.

Rev. J. P. Drake, writing from Bolton, Miss., April 22, says:

Still the clouds pour out water. Scarce a single week since the first in January without a few heavy rains. Sometimes every day for a fortnight; a very light frost, April 16. Warm weather again. Forests and meadows suggest Bowery May. But planter's fields remind us of March. Some sickness lingers among us. Parsonage debt fully paid. Interest in religion advancing. Our church lifting up her heart and eyes to "The hills whence cometh our help."

Rev. W. C. Black writes from Natchez, Miss., April 22, 1882, as follows: Your types make me say "There has been during the last four years a remarkable development of the grace of liberality." I wrote few years.

On the night of the nineteenth our city was visited with a storm of wind, rain and hail. Fences were blown down, trees uprooted and a few houses seriously damaged. No lives were lost. Great damage was done to crops and gardens by the hail. You can form some idea of the fury of the gale from the fact that six hundred and sixty panes of glass were broken in one side (the west side) of our church. As the windows are of stained glass, the cost of repairs will be considerable—probably not less than $150.

Thirty-six names have been added to our roll during the present year—eighteen of them by certificate. Next week we will commence a protracted meeting, assisted by our beloved presiding elder, Bro. Woodward, beloved everywhere, but especially so here where he recently served out a pastorate of four years. We hope to have the Spirit's presence.

Rev. Robt. Randle, writing from Natchitoches, La., April 7, and remitting seven dollars for expenses of delegates to General Conference, says: "The health of the community is good. The planters are rather behind with crops, but progressing well now. The overflow has affected us only sympathetically, as it has produced a general depression of financial and spiritual forces. My work is doing as well as last year, and I believe is in better spiritual condition. I am expecting a gracious revival of God's work during the year. Pray for us, my own family is well."

A REMINDER.—Mr. Editor:—It may be well enough to say to the advocates of temperance throughout the State, that those petitions asking an amendment to the constitution ought to be well filled with names, and sent into the Legislature by the second week in May. This ought to be considered a gracious opportunity for the cause of temperance and humanity.

J. P.

MANSFIELD, LA.

DEATH OF A VETERAN.—Rev. Thomas S. Abernathy, a superannuated member of the Alabama Conference, died at Dayton, Ala., April 13. Bro. Abernathy was born in Virginia, March 26, 1803. He had entered his eightieth year at the time of his death. He was a faithful and most earnest preacher, and we believe there was no break in his long itinerant career. Rev. J. G. Jones, of the Mississippi Conference, who knew him intimately and was associated with him in their earlier ministry, has furnished a very interesting biographical sketch of Bro. Abernathy, which will appear in the next number of this paper.

—We regret to learn that Mrs. A. E. Young died in Selma, Ala., on Thursday, April 13. Sister Young was for many years a resident of New Orleans, where she was known as an exemplary Christian, and a devoted member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. She had been ill for more than a year, we believe, and, during her protracted sufferings, was always patient, and filled with the peace of God which passeth all understanding. Calmly and serenely she passed away surrounded by her children who now rise up to "call her blessed." We tender to them our sincere sympathy. We knew the mother, whom they all revered, well, and would bear testimony to her great worth as a model Christian matron.

—Charles Darwin, the famous naturalist, died April 20, in the seventy-third year of his age. No scientist of the age was better known, and none has left a deeper impress upon the thought of his times. "The origin of species by means of natural selection," and "the descent of man and selection in relation to sex," were the two most important and best known of his works. The doctrine of evolution is associated with his name, and "the survival of the fittest" is a term of his which has become familiar to all classes of readers. He was a patient and industrious investigator, and whatever may be the fate of his theories, his immense accumulation of facts can not fail to be of great service.

—Rev. Philip Diefenwerth, a superannuated member of the Louisiana Conference, passed through the city with his family last week on his way to Florida. Bro. Diefenwerth has resided for many years in Tensas parish, La. His home has been ruined by the overflow, and in his old age he seeks a new home in Florida. He has long suffered from Chronic Bronchitis, and his health is quite infirm. His postoffice is "Clearwater Harbor, Hillsboro county, Fla."

—On Thursday night last, a lecture on talking and talkers was delivered at the St. Charles Avenue, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, by the pastor, Dr. J. B. Walker. The lecture was highly entertaining, the audience good. After "the feast of reason and the flow of soul," refreshments were furnished in the chapel by the Ladies Aid Association. It was altogether a very pleasant occasion.

Mrs. Young J. Allen, wife of Dr. Allen, is expected says the Western Christian Advocate, to reach New York by the first of May. She is now en route with her younger children, Miss Millie remaining in China with her father, whom she is helping nobly. Mrs. Allen will remain two years or more, making her home in Oxford that she may look after the education of her children, as she could not do it in China. Our honored sister will receive a warm welcome to Oxford, where her eldest son, Edgar Pierce Allen, has been for nearly three years "getting ready to help his father do missionary work."

WANTED.—Our well known and highly esteemed contributor, "Invalid," is thinking of publishing a volume of poems bearing the title of "Wood Notes." She desires those wishing to subscribe for the work to inform her by postal-card, address: Miss Maggie R. Beale, Canton, Miss. Miss Beale is a writer of decided merit, and we have no doubt that "Wood Notes" will be an attractive and valuable work. We commend the gifted author and her work to the considerate and generous attention of our readers.

Books and Periodicals.

—"Missions of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South," is the title of a neat 18mo, 144 pages, by A. W. Wilson, D. D., published by Southern Methodist Publishing House, Nashville, Tenn.

It is a succinct and detailed history of our missions, and a statistical exhibit of what the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has done, and is doing.

The titles of the chapters are: Preliminary; Missions Among the People of Color; Indian Missions; German Missions; French and Cuban Missions; English Speaking Missions; China Missions; Mexican Border Missions; Central Mexican Mission; Brazil Mission; Woman's Missionary Society.

This is a most valuable and much needed work, and our able secretary, Dr. Wilson, has rendered to the church a timely and important service in preparing it. The volume is now ready, and is sold at fifty cents a copy. We hope there will be a prompt and wide demand for it. It is a work that every preacher, and every Southern Methodist should read.

—The Quarterly Review of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, April 1882, contains the following articles: "Halieutics." This, it will be seen by reference to Webster's Unabridged, means a treatise upon fish, or the art of fishing. Dr. Summers, the author of the article, appropriates the word ecclesiastically, and he says it means "the cause of missions." Just as well to have made that the title of the article, but in that case every body would have understood it. It is a very clear statement of the object, methods and reasons for missionary enterprise.

"Dr. Adam Clarke and his biographers," by George John Stevenson, M. A., gives a summary and estimate of the rather numerous biographies and memoirs of Dr. Clarke. A very readable and instructive article.

"The Ecumenical Conference," by Rev. David Morton. This is a condensed account by an eye-witness. It tells in a concise manner what we have already heard ad libitum. "The late Bishop Wightman" is the discourse on Bishop Wightman, delivered by Dr. Summers in the chapel of Vanderbilt University. The Bishops life, character and work are portrayed by one who knew him long and intimately, and who loved him sincerely. The portrait is well done.

"The approaching General Conference," also by the editor, Dr. Summers, outlines the work which this body will have prominently before it. The election of Bishops occupies much space in the article.

"John Wesley, neither an autocrat nor a bigot," by Rev. H. M. DuBose, is a vindication of our founder from charges which have but little currency or significance at the present day.

"The first duty of the church," by H. C. Kelley, D. D. This first duty is in the support of foreign missions. It is argued with care, and the authority of scripture is adduced, and most forcibly exhibited. Our pastors will find in this article much helpful ammunition for their assaults upon the ignorance and covetousness of their anti-missionary hearers.

"The New Revision Reviewed," is another blast by Dr. Summers against the New Revision. This work goes bravely on. The most part of the Christian world will hold on to the authorized version. The new will be used for reference. "Literary Notices" and Notes and Queries are lengthy and generally good. The Quarterly, the publication of which was inaugurated at the last General Conference has, we believe, been self-supporting. It has proved a success, and will of course be continued. Under all the circumstances the committee, publisher and editor are to be congratulated and commended.

—The Theological and Homiletic Monthly, R. N. Sledd, D. D., editor; James and Sledd, publishers, Ashland, Va., in its April number, has the following articles: The Bible in India; A Tentative Venture, Theological; Be Still and Know that I am God; Unconditional Benefits of the Atonement; A Sketch—Paul and Silas in Prison; The Faithful Ministers Toil and Reward; An Exposition; Christian Cradlehood; Sermon Outlines; Miscellany. Published at Ashland, Va. Price $2 a year.

—The Southern Pulpit, April, 1882, has a good table of contents. Among the sermons is one by Bishop Wightman on "David serving his own generation by the will of God," and one by Dr. A. A. Lipscomb on "Discipline of the Virgin Mother." This is one of the best numbers of this able monthly. Jackson and Lafferty, publishers, Richmond, Va. Subscription $1 50 a year.

—The Louisiana Journal of Education, for April, is a good number of this valuable monthly. Rabb. M. Lusher and Wm. O. Rogers, editors and proprietors. New Orleans, La. $1 a year.

—Nicks Illustrated Monthly Magazine, for April, is as tastefully illustrated as usual, and contains much useful information. Published by James Vick, Rochester, New York. Price $1 25 per annum.

—American Agriculturist, for May, is one of the best numbers of this splendid monthly. Published by the Orange Judd Company, New York. Terms, $1 50 a year.

—At the conclusion of the harvest home at Slaugham, Sussex, the chairman asked permission of Dean Hook to print "the magnificent sermon" which the latter had delivered on the occasion, offering to copy it legibly for the printers. "That will never do," answered the dean. "I will copy it in a slovenly hand myself," remarking, with a twinkle of the eye, that if the copy were legible it would be given to the worst compositors, whereas, if it were written indifferently it would be put into the best hands, and the work would be well done.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 235 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

How beautiful is the exhibition of humanity in the young. A little boy found a poor, half-frozen wasp in the garret and placed it upon a chair before the parlor fire to thaw out. When sister Mary's beau called that evening, he glanced at the chair and seating himself in it, murmured, "Ah, bless her heart, how thoughtful she is of my comfort!" Two minutes later there was as much noise and racket in that parlor as if it had been turned into a den of demons. The wasp had thawed out; this is why Mary isn't married yet.

Dr. Bloomfield, Bishop of London, was once caught napping while listening to a lengthy sermon. A companion, seeing his reverence nodding, and fearing that he might snore, which would be quite unepiscopal, gave him an occasional nudge. When the discourse was ended, the Bishop shook his neighbor warmly by the hand and said, "One of the most awakening sermons I ever heard!"

Beneficent nature seems to have planted in every clime the proper remedies for the diseases incidental to it. Laplace's Indian Tonic Pectoral Balm is made of an herb which grows all over the Gulf region, and it has never failed yet to cure all kinds of coughs and colds.

A young curate having preached before his vicar for the first time, asked that worthy at the close of the service which passage in his sermon he thought the best; to which the vicar made reply: "Your passage from the vestry to the pulpit was very fine; but commend me to that from the pulpit to the vestry for downright, heart-relieving effect."

"Isn't that a beautiful color?" said the fish-dealer, as he cut into a large salmon. "Yes, said Folsom, "I suppose he is blushing at the extravagant price he is getting for himself."

They were out sleighing. "Gussie, dear," said she, as she leaned a tender cheek on his manly checked ulster, "why are these snow-flakes like your mustache?" This pleased him even to have it noticed. "I don't know, pet," he murmured innocently. "Why are they?" "Because they are slow coming down." He drove with both hands after this.

"You haven't opened your mouth during the whole session," said a legislator to a fellow-member. "Oh, yes, I have. I yawned through the whole of your speech," was the complimentary reply.

FOR MY HANDS.

BY MRS HATTIE L. PEET.

I know many a page has been written,
And the gifted have sung, in the praise
Of lily-white hands and fingers,
In a score of poetical ways;
This is all very well for a lady
Who lives among diamonds and silks,
But sometimes in life a farmer's wife
Is obliged to do housework and milk
And woman's best mission thro'out our dear land
Is fulfilled in the strength of the little brown hand.

When the roses are idyssling the sweetest,
And the vines climb up to the eaves
When the robins are rocking their birdies
To sleep 'mong the maple leaves,
The sunshine smiles down 'cross the thresh'old
When the labor of love seems but rest,
Whether rocking the household birdies
Or keeping the dear home-nest
Oh! I pity you all who can't understand
The wealth and worth of a little brown hand.

If I were a man with a fortune,
A million laid by on the shelf—
If I were a youth—if I wasn't, in truth,
If I wasn't a woman myself.—
I know what I'd do in a minute
While fingers have often misled,
I'd seek after those whose rich thinking shows,
Acquaintance with puddings and bread.
I'd use all the eloquence words could command,

HOW TO CARE FOR CHICKENS.—In order to obtain the greatest success young chickens should be colonized. They should be placed where they are to grow up and remain, and this saves an abundance of trouble in after days. Like other farm stock, the poultry should have grounds and buildings devoted to their use exclusively. They become a nuisance if allowed the run of all the farm buildings, the yards and gardens, and oftentimes do much damage. They frequently soil the water that farm stock are compelled to drink, as well as the hay and feeding troughs. Give them a place by themselves, and raise the chickens in their own habitation, where they are to remain. Where many fowls are kept they require a large range, and where the farm buildings are so situated that the fowl-house may occupy a position nearly in the centre, it is better for them. Fowls are great foragers, and some are quite given to rambling. Among the latter class may be reckoned the Dorkings. In this respect they resemble the turkey, going to long distances, but always coming home.

Young chickens should be colonized and kept separate from the adult birds. Each colony should be as nearly of one age as possible. This saves much time and trouble. They are then all ready to eat at the regular feeding time, and it requires little more time to feed one hundred than twenty-five. There should never be more than twelve chicks in a brood at night. They may all mingle together during the day, but at night each dozen should have a separate mother. Their yard should be enclosed with a good fence, either long pickets or wire, thus protecting it from the intrusion of animals, and of sufficient height so that the fowls from the outside may not scale it. The yard requires plenty of shade—close, dense shrubs and trees, either ornamental or fruit trees. These form hiding places and protection from hawks, as well as grateful retreats from the scorching rays of sun. Chickens require equally sun and shade, and while they can not exist without the full rays of the sun, as it is their life and strength, still when kept where it is constantly pouring its fierce heat from rising to setting, in the middle of summer, it becomes unbearable. For this reason they must have shade.

All poultry requires the morning sun. An hour of the first rising beams is worth the whole day to the young. The coop should be a substantial miniature building, which will turn off the wind an rain. They should have a good substantial flooring, and be cleaned each day, and some kind of litter, either sawdust or ashes, strewn thereon, for the sake of cleanliness. These materials act as absorbents, and hold the moisture as well as the odor of the droppings. Chickens raised out of doors in this way, are to be preferred before those reared entirely in buildings, as they make stronger, hardier birds, mature earlier, and are more vigorous and profitable. After they are a week or ten days old they will take care of themselves, in respect to rain or wet weather, either by seeking refuge in the coop where the mother hen is always confined, or beneath the dense shrubbery.

Regularly trained cats should always have access to the yards, and be allowed at all times to go about the coops. When this allowed there will be found little danger from rats or weasels, if the coops are so fashioned that they are rat proof at night when closed up. Cats which have been brought up with the chickens and well fed, will not catch or disturb, but protect them. I frequently lock my cats in with the fowls at night. They never disturb the eggs, and the fowls suffer no fear from them, and when the old cat catches a mouse the hens often take it away from her and eat it themselves.—C. B., in Country Gentleman.

A DURABLE WHITEWASH.—A correspondent of the Scientific American gives the following directions for a good wash: For one barrel of color wash, half a bushel white lime, three pecks hydraulic cement, ten pounds umber, ten pounds ochre, one pound Venitian red, quarter pound lampblack. Slake the lime; cut the lampblack with vinegar; mix well together, add the cement, and fill the barrel with water. Let it stand twelve hours before using, and stir frequently while putting it on. This is not white, but of a light stone color, without the unpleasant glare of white. The color may be changed by adding more or less of the colors named, or other colors. This wash covers well, needing only one coat, and is superior to anything known, excepting oil paint. I have known a rough board barn washed with this to look well for five years, and even longer, without renewing. The cement hardens, but on a rough surface will not scale.

WORK AFTER SHOWERS.—A cotemporary says farmers do not always form a proper estimate of the advantage of stirring the soil unless too wet after showers, before it hardens. The field, the garden and the truck-patch should be worked over after every rain as soon as it is in proper order—"quick movement is worth a good deal at such times." It is a great saving of time, labor, patience, wear and tear. The weeds are or should be killed and kept down before they make much growth, or before they grow, and the crop is soothed and nourished by the moist, crumbling soil; and, if roots and spongioles are broken they heal rapidly, and their growth and extension is greatly facilitated.

The wear and tear of plow points, harrows and cultivators in hard, dry soils, especially if they be clay, is not to be considered, and the expenses of keeping tools in order when compelled to be used in such soils are items of considerable magnitude.

Plants that are worked in moist seasons, if the roots are broken, do not faint or wither, and require reaction, but proceed in luxuriance and growth. After showers there is generally a pleasant coolness, and the men and teams do more and better work and with increased ease and comfort perform the day's labor. "While there is season, plow and stir." The stirring and pulverization is then more complete, and the crops receive the full tillage. All this being true, and a great deal more that might be said, the motive for prompt exertion must be apparent, and no good farmer or gardener would neglect the use of opportunities that add so much to the reduction of expenses and labor.—Mobile Register.

FORCING RHUBARB.—Outside of places, where there are professional gardeners, the forcing of vegetables is very little known in this country. People in general are content with "things in their season," and do not trouble themselves to force or retard. Perhaps the easiest vegetable to force is rhubarb; and by taking a little trouble, material for pies and sauce may be had some weeks in advance of the supply from the open ground. The things needed are clumps of rhubarb roots, soil, and a dark, warm place. The roots should be dug before the ground freezes, but in most places there is usually an "open spell" any month when it may be done. As fine rhubarb as we ever saw was forced in a barrel or cask; the roots packed in on a layer of soil, and surrounded by it, the cask covered tight, and set near the furnace in the cellar. A box to hold the roots, and set in a cupboard or closet in the kitchen will answer; or a box or barrel may be placed in the kitchen. Keep moderately warm, and see that the roots are sufficiently moist. A few roots will give an astonishingly abundant supply much more tender and crisp and less violently sour than the out-door crop.—American Agriculturist.

SEED-POTATOES.—Dampness undoubtedly favors the growth of the potato disease; and therefore where there is any chance at all of the disease existing in the roots, they ought to be stored as dry as possible. Those which are to be kept in this general way should be especially seen to in the case of seed-potatoes. Since the potato-beetle came among us, it is clear that we have had the very best results from early planting, and by the use of the earliest varieties. Now, these early kinds are more easily affected by warmth than the late ones. They sprout easily; and coolness is, therefore, more essential for them. Some people think that it makes but little difference whether seed-potatoes sprout or not before planting. We have known people to tear off sprouts several inches long, and cut up the tubers in full faith that they will sprout again, and be none the worse for it. They do generally grow; but there is little doubt that they are constitutionally weaker and much more liable to disease than those which do not sprout until ready to go in the ground.—Germantown Telegraph.

GIVE THE BOYS A CHANCE.—Martin Parvis writes to the Ohio Farmer of a farmer who gave his boy the use of a quarter of an acre: The boy was wide awake and set it to strawberries; in two years he owned two acres, and now, three years from the beginning, he owns five acres of land, and last season he cleared $500 above all expenses on strawberries alone. It is a pity that more farmers do not give their boys a chance to follow their bent in farm management. If he likes stock raising give him a few sheep or cattle; if gardening or grain raising suits him, let him have a piece of land for his own use, and don't after he has got his produce ready for market, sell it for him and pocket the money, for if you do, ten to one your boy will be filled with ambition to figure behind a counter or study law or medicine, or go into some other business where a dozen are waiting for an opening, while millions of acres are being slowly but surely robbed of their fertility for want of just such men as these bright boys will make to handle them skilfully.—New York Herald.

THE PEPPERMINT CROP.—The peppermint crop of the United States has for the past few years reached the amount of 70,000 pounds per year, of which about 30,000 pounds were annually exported. Two-thirds of the peppermint oil of this country is produced in New York, and about one-third in Michigan. The plant is a perennial one, and is planted in the spring. The next year it is ready for cutting, and generally may be cut for three years. The best yield is given in the first and second years of cutting; in the third year the plant becomes bitter. After the plant becomes four years old it is not cut, and the field is plowed over and a new crop planted. The usual method of planting is in rows, and in August the plant is ready for cutting.

TWO-YEAR-OLDS.—It is thirty per cent. more profitable to premature and dispose of fattening cattle at two years old than to keep them up to three years. On an average it costs twelve cents for every additional pound of flesh added to the weight of a two or three-year-old fattening steer. In this country the market value of store cattle can be increased thirty per cent. during six months in finishing by good feeding. In order to secure a safe profit no store cattle beast, well done to, can be sold at less than four cents and a half per pound live weight.—Prof. Brown, Canada.

MULCHING THE SOIL.—The Germantown Telegraph says that many old pear and other fruit trees in Germantown are kept in a fine growing and bearing condition by earth ashed over the roots. The journal recommends drawing earth and spreading or scattering it over the surface of the ground and about the trees, requiring but little labor and costing nothing else. The benefit appears to be two-fold; the earth serves as a mulch and it covers the roots when they are too near the surface. If, in addition to the earth, ashes, slops, &c., were added, they would do no harm. The autumn application of manure should depend on the fertility of the ground as shown by the annual growth. If this growth is short and feeble the tree needs a a fertilizer spread over the whole surface.

Household.

LEG OF MUTTON.—The following two modes of cooking a leg of mutton may be acceptable to economical housekeepers: 1. Boiled Shank.—Cut the leg of mutton cleanly across the meat and bone from the shank down, with as much meat as will suffice for the meal. Rub it and flour it all over, but specially the cut meat surface. Plunge it at once into a sauce-pan or pot of boiling water to cover it, together with some salt, a few grains of pepper and a bunch of parsley. Draw away from the fire and allow the water to cool almost completely; then put once more on the fire and cook slowly according to weight till quite done to taste. Serve with parsley, onions, caper, sorrel or any sauce preferred; garnish with meat or potato rissoles. The flour and the plunging into boiling water will prevent the juice from escaping and the meat will cut just as finely as from a whole boiled leg of mutton. 2. Mutton Steak.—From the rest of the leg of mutton cut cleanly and evenly a slice from the full round of from two to three inches thick. Pepper and flour both sides at once and insert a piece of shallot onion into the bone eye. Broil the meat slowly on a beef steak griddle or pan, covering the upper surface with chopped beef marrow, butter or mutton kidney fat. Prepare a brown gravy with fried shallots, brown stock, a few peppercorns, two cloves, some lemon rings or juice or a spoonful of tarregon vinegar. Strain, add a few split cloves or pounded anchovies and serve with pats of mashed potatoes, turnips, parsnips or any suitable vegetable.

The following three recipes Daisy Eyebright contributes to the Country Gentleman:

Delicate Pudding.—Butter a mold or basin and line it with Sultana raisins; then put in a layer of sponge cake, cut in inch thick slices, and the raisins alternately, until the mold is filled. Beat two eggs to a stiff froth, and turn in a pint of milk, a tablespoonful of sugar, and a grated lemon peel. Pour it over the cake, and put the mold into a steamer or a large pan of boiling water. Cover the pudding closely and steam twenty minutes. Serve with whipped cream, or any kind of pudding sauce.

Pudding Sauce.—Stir a teacupful of white sugar and two tablespoonfuls of butter smoothly together; add the juice and half the grated peel of a lemon, and the well-beaten yolks of two eggs; beat well together and set it on the fire to become well heated. Beat the whites to a stiff froth, and stir in quickly for one minute; turn into a sauce-boat and serve at once.

Mince Veal and Eggs.—Take some slices of roasted veal, trim off all the browned edges and mince finely. Chop one small onion very fine. Put a tablespoonful of butter into a sauce-pan, and fry the onion to a light brown. Shake in a little flour from a dredging-box, and add two or three tablespoonfuls of the gravy left from the roast, with pepper and salt to taste, and a tablespoonful of chopped parsley. When boiling hot turn in the minced meat. If not sufficiently moist add a little boiling water. When it has simmered five minutes on a hot platter with small diamonds of wheat bread fried in butter for a garnish, and three or four poached eggs upon the top of it. It makes an excellent breakfast or lunch dish.

ROAST MEAT.—An "Old Housekeeper" writes: "I would like to tell "Young Housekeeper" my way of cooking rib roast, which is a very good piece to bake. Have your butcher take out the ribs and roll up the meat nicely and keep it together by tying a piece of clean cord around it; skewers are in the way and prevent carving nicely. Have your oven about as hot as to bake bread, and keep the same heat until the meat is done. A five-pound roast requires three-quarters of an hour in the oven if you like it quite rare. Pepper and salt your meat and put it in the dripping pan without any water or dripping; to be perfect it must be basted with the drip from the meat. When done, remove the meat, set the pan on top of the stove, and stir in as much flour as you need to thicken the gravy. When brown, thin with boiling water."—New York Tribune.

TO MAKE LIGHT ROLLS.—I have tested the following recipe for two years, and I know it to be good: Take from your light dough on baking day the amount required, and shorten as for biscuit, adding a tablespoonful of sugar. Knead well, and let it rise; knead again and let it rise. Now roll out as you would baking powder biscuit, or a little thinner, and grease well with butter. Cut out with cake-cutter, and fill your pan just full enough to not more than touch when baked. Moisten on top, and bake in a quick oven from eight to ten minutes. These rolls are delicious for tea.

CUCUMBER CATSUP.—Three dozen full grown cucumbers, eight white onions, peel both and cut as fine as possible, on this sprinkle three-fourths of a pint of fine salt, then put the whole in a stove and drain for eight hours; then take a teacupful of mustard seed, half a cup of ground black pepper, mix them well with the cucumber and onion; then put the whole in a stone jar and cover with strong vinegar, closing it tightly. It is fit for use in three days, and will keep a long time.

When cucumbers are scarce take half green tomatoes and cucumbers, and it will make an excellent catsup.

LEMON SYRUP.—Take the juice of twelve lemons, grate the rind of six in it, let it stand over night, then take six pounds of white sugar and make a thick syrup; when it is quite cool strain the juice into it and squeeze as much out from the grated rind as will suit the taste; a tablespoonful in a goblet of water will make a delicious drink on a hot day, far superior to the stuff commonly sold as lemon syrup.

FOOD FOR DYSPEPTICS.—Beat up an egg in a bowl; add six tablespoons of cold water, mixing the whole well together. Add two tablespoons of farina of potatoes; let it be mixed thoroughly with the liquor in the bowl. Then pour on enough boiling water to convert it into jelly and mix it well. Take it alone, or add a little milk where the stomach is debilitated or the person is consumptive. It is a light, delicate and nourishing dish, and excellent for dyspeptics.

POTATO BALLS.—Use mashed potatoes left from the dinner, or mash them for the purpose; add the yolk of an egg, and make it into flattened cakes. Dip these in egg and cracker crumbs, and fry, or place upon a greased griddle and brown evenly on both sides.

Scientific.

DANGERS OF IGNORANCE.—Nitro-glycerine itself is a dense, yellowish liquid, but, in order to diminish the danger attending its use, fine earth, ground mica, sawdust, or some similar powder, is saturated with it, and thus the various blasting-powders known as dynamite, mica-powder, giant, rend-rock, etc., are formed. These compounds can be transported with comparative safety. But the nitro-glycerine easily drains off from the powder and oozes from any crevice in the vessel in which the compound is kept. Drops of it thus bedewing the edges of a box may very easily be mistaken for oil escaping, and if workmen ignorantly endeavor to nail the box tighter or to open it for examination there will be a disastrous explosion. Several have occurred in past years in this way. The victims knew, no doubt, that nitro-glycerine (or the compounds) may be exploded by a blow (contact with fire is not needful,) but they did not suspect that the innocent-looking oil was nitro-glycerine. Why should not youth be taught in schools somewhat of the practical dangers of these substances which are coming into such common use? They would pursue the study with interest, especially if there were judicious experiments. A Missouri story is that a teacher confiscated a small metal box which a pupil was playing with in school hours, and, thinking it contained chewing-gum, tried to break it open with a hammer. It was a dynamite torpedo of the kind used on the railroad track as a danger-signal, and large bits of it had to be cut out of the lady's cheek. Would it not have been well if she had known somewhat of the aspect of torpedoes? Was it not more important to the journeyman plumber who threw the lighted match into the pan of camphene, mistaking it for water, by which the great printing establishment of Franklin Square was burned some twenty-eight years ago, to know camphene by sight than to have memorized many of the matters prominent in a public-school course? Surely workmen, especially "raw hands" in establishments where these things are used, should be systematically instructed in advance, and the courts are now enforcing this principal.—Benjamin V. Abbott, in Popular Science Monthly.

—Mr. Huggins, of London, has recently secured a photograph of the spectrum of the nebula of Orion, showing new bright line in the invisible ultra violet. The picture was made on March 6. He was just in time to save anticipation by Prof. Henry Draper, of this city, who only a few evenings later also succeeded in getting a photograph of the same thing, before the news of Mr. Huggins's success had reached this country. There is a curious difference, as yet unexplained, between the two pictures. Dr. Draper's photograph does not show Mr. Huggins's ultra violet line; but it does show a line in the violet ("h" of the solar spectrum) which is missing on the English picture. Probably some difference in the sensative plates or in their development is the cause of the discrepancy, which, however, must not by any means be regarded as a contradiction. Dr. Draper would have been earlier in his spectrum photography had he not been earnestly occupied with the much more difficult task of photographing the nebula itself. He was the first to obtain a photograph of the nebula, two years ago, and during the past season he has got several new negatives, one of which far exceeds anything ever done before, showing nearly everything that can be seen by the eye with a large telescope.—New York Independent.

—Many plants either droop their leaves or close their upper surfaces at nightfall. In all cases the motion of the same plant is either always in one direction or another. Mr. Meehan records in the last issued volume of the "Proceedings" of the Academy of Natural Sciences of Philadelphia that Robinia hispida, that common rose acacia, has a double motion. Toward nightfall the leaflets, at that time horizontal, commence to droop. By dusk opposite leaflets almost touch each other by their under surfaces. At daylight they resume their horizontal position, rising, however, till by noon, on a warm day, they almost touch by the upper surfaces. Each leaflet, in fact, makes half the revolution of a circle in twenty-four hours, instead of but one-fourth, as in the ordinary cases of the "sleep of plants." It was further noticed that some leaves became paralyzed, from some cause, and, though apparently healthy so far as color indicated, wholly lost the power of motion. The whole observations confirm the suspicion already extensively entertained of the analogy between plant and animal motion.

—Mr. W. H. Harrington, of Ottowa, Ontario, in a recent address called fresh attention to the depredations of insects. The chinchbug, no larger than a grain of wheat, destroys millions of bushels of that and other grain annually. The damage wrought by them in 1864 was estimated at $100,000,000. The cotton-worm causes a yearly loss of $50,000,000, representing an amount raw material sufficient to furnish cotton to clothe our whole population (Ontario) for at least five years. The phylloxera, a species of plant-louse, has ruined 700,000 acres of French vineyards, and entailed a loss greater than the German indemnity paid at the close of the Franco-Prussian war.

—A German Chemist proposes the following as a serviceable water-resisting cement: Dissolve five to ten parts of pure dry gelatine in a hundred parts of water, and then add 10 per cent. of a concentrated solution of bichromate of potash. The articles united with this glue are exposed to the light of the sun when, the bichromate becoming reduced, the gelatine thus attains great strength and flexibility. Glass ornaments and utensils when broken may be neatly and efficiently repaired with this mixture. Of course the cement must be kept in the dark in order that it may act as desired when used.

—Mr. P. W. Sheafer estimates the production of anthracite coal in Pennsylvania at 20,000,000 tons per annum. At the present rate of increase the annual production will reach 50,000,000 tons in 1900. Keep that rate up, and the anthracite fields will be exhausted in the year 2065. There is no cause for immediate alarm, however. The area of the bituminous fields is four-hundred times the anthracite area, and so there is fuel enough for a population of 50,000,000 souls to last about 75,000 years.—Popular Science Monthly.

—M. Hauhourg, a French engineer, claims to have devised a means of transporting large vessels over isthmuses, however steep, and an experiment is shortly to be made at Argenteuil by lifting a 2,000-ton ship from the river, and taking it on rails to another point on the river.

Copperhead Sketches—No. 24.

BY A. M. JONES.

A WITCH STORY.

I am not responsible for the following strange story, nor for the incredulity of my readers. Neither do I believe the remarkable phenomenon, the result of witchcraft. There is more superstition in the country than is generally supposed, but none in my nature. As to the facts, the evidence is conclusive, they being known to the entire community, a dozen physicians having been consulted from time to time, three of whom, personally known to the writer, who freely conversed with him on the subject. After a few commonplace words at the gate, the old gentleman selected a handsome copy of the Testament, and, handing me the money, said: "I have a daughter in a strange condition." In answer to my question, he continued: "When she was eighteen years old a young lady came to the house one day, and for some cause the two girls disagreed, which resulted in a quarrel, during which my daughter ordered her from the place. Very indignantly she dashed through the gate into the public road, and then turning round said, in an angry tone: 'I will have revenge on you this before six months.' In a few days the unpleasantness seemed to have passed away, and apparently the girls were as friendly as ever. It was a month or six weeks, perhaps, after the difficulty when L.'s friend came in late one afternoon, and said: 'I have brought you all something nice,' and handed each of us a cake. When she came to L. she said: 'Yours is better than the others; you must eat it all yourself, and let no one else have a bite.' About two hours after my daughter had eaten the cake she became suddenly sick, which resulted in a severe spasm. The spasms continued for several weeks, until she had more than five hundred. When the spasms ceased she sunk into a long, lingering spell of sickness, which lasted for years. Finally, we discovered hard substances, just under the skin, on her throat, arms, hands, and other parts of the body. We immediately called a doctor, who split the skin, and, with tweezers, extracted pins, needles, fish-hooks and pieces of wire. This was several years ago, and up to the present various doctors have taken, in different parts of her body, one hundred needle, six hundred and forty-six pins and needles, four fish-hooks, and two pieces of wire, one more than twelve inches in length, and the other more than three. These pieces of wire were extracted from her side." By this time I had become much interested, and, having an opportunity, asked if his daughter were yet alive. "Yes; her health is as good as usual, but she is not at home now. She and her mother went out visiting this afternoon." I was amazed that she was living, and equally as much so to learn that she could walk. He then produced a dozen or more of the pins and needles, and the two pieces of wire, which are still in my possession. After examining them for a moment, and pitying the poor woman in my heart, I asked the cause of this dreadful affliction. "The doctors are not agreed. Some say she swallows the pins, others contend she puts them under her skin, and one asserts she is bewitched. I was in my shop, some months ago, when a stranger walked in and said: 'Good morning, Mr. ——.' Good morning, sir; but I do not know you. I know you don't, but I know you and your daughter, too. I know what is the matter with her, and have come to see her.' On entering the room, and asking him to be seated, he said: 'No; I have work to do here, and put six new pins.' Having placed two of the pins in a perpendicular position, with heads up, in the seam of the floor, in front of the fire-place, he stuck the point of the other in the end of a rocking switch, and, kneeling down, held it on a coal already prepared on the hearth, and blew it three times. Without rising from his knees he then took the pin between his thumbs and forefingers, and bowed his head toward it three times. Placing it on the coal again, he blew it twice, and then examined it carefully. I was watching him with all the attention possible, and, while the pin was on the coal the third time, all of a sudden it expanded to the size of a lead pencil, and a woman, whom I immediately recognized, stood before me, face to face. I was on the eve of speaking, but the doctor motioned silence." Just at this point I interrupted him, and asked if his wife saw the woman. "No." Did your daughter see her? "No; no one saw her except the doctor and myself." That was exceedingly unfortunate, as a little proof seemed so important. That doctor, having called up the cruel woman, and failing to exhibit her to the entire community, deserves a public rebuke, and the censure of all the witch-believing people in the land. What a pity! He continued: "The woman vanished in a moment, and the doctor informed me she was the witch, and the seeds of the pins, needles and other articles were in the cake my daughter had eaten so many long years before. He could not give immediate relief, but promised that she would gradually improve until his second visit, when the cure would be final and permanent. The spell will return to the witch, and, when my daughter recovers, she will begin to pine away, and finally die." Up to the time I left the community the witch doctor had not returned. The old gentleman was not less than sixty years of age, conversed well, used good language, rather intelligent, and, while relating this remarkable story, seemed to be uttering what he believed to be the truth. What is more astonishing still, I was impressed that he expected me to believe it. A drive of a few miles, where the night was to be spent, gave me time for reflection, and in my perplexity I confess to have felt much anxiety to know something more of this wonderful woman. As to the witch, and the seeds of the metalic substances being in the cake, I did not believe a word. But where all those articles came from, how they got into her flesh, and how she lived after enduring such suffering, were the questions continually suggested to my mind. We were scarcely seated in the parlor, after supper, when I asked the gentleman of the house if he know Mr. ——. "Yes; I've known him for years." Do you know his daughter? "Yes; I have known her ever since she was a child." The old gentleman related a remarkable story about her as I came on this afternoon. "Yes, that's his hobby; and I told him, years ago, if he would stop the morphine and opium the pins would stop coming. When she first grew up she was a nice, pretty, intelligent girl, as much so as you will find anywhere, but she has ruined herself by the use of opiates. It takes most of the money her father can make to keep her supplied, and for ten or twelve years they have been trying to create a sensation about the pins. At first the people were much interested, and hundreds went to see the pins cut out, but the excitement has long since passed away, and none except strangers ever give it a thought. The visit of the witch doctor, of which you speak, is something new, but years ago the old man drew the picture of the witch, and shot it with a silver ball. He has always been a curious man, and full of superstition." This threw light on the mystery, and, while passing the road the next week, to satisfy my curiosity, I called and conversed with the afflicted woman and her mother. She was at that time thirty-nine years of age, tall and slender, with a grief-stricken, sorrowful face, the very picture of sadness and dejection. During my short stay she seemed entirely at ease, deliberately answered my questions, exhibited a good deal of intelligence, and related, almost verbatim, the cake and spasm story I had heard from her father the previous week. The pins, though not so numerous, were still coming, but some were so deeply buried in the flesh that the pain deterred her from having them cut out. Her father was then gone for a doctor to have two extracted. One of those, which appeared an inch long, was just under the skin, on the knuckle of the forefinger, and the other on the back of the same hand, a short space below the wrist. Placing my finger on those hard spikes, which almost made me shudder, I asked if she know how they got into her flesh. Very deliberately she replied: "No more than you do, sir." Do you think it possible to swallow them while asleep? "I think not; they would kill me." Do you think you could put them under the skin during your sleep? "I think not. They would make a sore, and I would see it next morning." Then, how do you account for them getting there? "I don't know." I hesitated, but finally said: "Do you suppose you are bewitched?" "Yes, sir; I think I am." To say the least, this is a strange phenomenon. The two pins or needles, to be cut out that day, first made their appearance just below the elbow, and for months had been gradually moving to the present positions. A physician who had treated the case, said: "The sensibilities having been lulled by the continued use of opium, without giving the least pain the pin may be inserted, and, by the application of the skin of an egg to the fractured part, it will heal within twenty-four hours, not leaving a scar." Why it is that this unfortunate young woman submits to being mangled in such a style is wonderful beyond all comprehension. The medical books contain records of similar cases, but none more astonishing. My readers had better endure all manner of pain, and quietly go down in peace to an early grave, than contract the terrible, the fearful, the destructive, the ruinous and the almost incurable habit of using opium. Having found so many of these unhappy opium wrecks in my humble travels, "I speak that I do know, and testify that I have seen."

THE LAW DOWN.—Prof. Phelps thus rebukes aesthetic ministers who look down upon the working classes. One of them wrote to him:

To whom the Professor replies, "Very well; he could not make a better throw. If he saves a 'shoe-town' morally, he lifts it up intellectually to an immense altitude. In the process of doing this he lifts his own mind to a level of culture and of power which no conservatism or refinement ever overlooks. Do not the first ten inches of an oak from the ground measure as much in height as the last ten of its topmost branch? When will the ministry learn that the place where has very little concern with the intellectual worth of the work done? The uplifting anywhere is essentially the same, but with the chances of success all in favor of lifting low down. To the mind of Christ the whole world is a 'shoe-town' intellectually. To give it a lift everywhere is the intellectual glory of the pulpit. Deliverance from the pettiness of a select ambition is essential to the power to lift it anywhere."

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S —MANUAL—

EDITED BY GEO. E. WARING, JR.,

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations.

Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

What remedy is leading the sale of all other remedies?

Ans.—Brown's Iron Bitters.

What medicine is proving itself to be of miraculous merit in restoring lost health, strength and vigor?

Ans.—Brown's Iron Bitters.

Among the languages of civilized nations English is the most widely spread. It is the mother-tongue of about 80,000,000 people: German of between 50,000,000 and 60,000,000; French of between 40,000,000 and 50,000,000; Spanish of 40,000,000; Italian of 28,000,000, and Russian of between 55,000,000 and 60,000,000.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

NEW YORK, April 19.—The Herald has the following:

IRKUTSK, Siberia, April 18.—I have this morning received startling news from Mr. Jackson, special commissioner, who was sent in search of the Jeannette's survivors. He apparently forwarded the dispatch by courier. It ran as follows:

From the Banks of Aldan River, April 6, 1882.—I have just met a courier bearing dispatches from W. H. Gilder, Herald correspondent with the Rodgers, whom the courier had accompanied from Kalymak, on Kolima river, to Verkhavansk, four hundred miles north of Yakutsk. Gilder had made the journey of 2000 versts among the Chuckches. He was sent forward with the news that the Rodgers had been burned and sunk; that Lieut. Robert M. Berry, with the officers and crew, thirty-six in number, are at Tlapka, near Cape Serdze; and that a vessel should be sent for them as early as possible.

WASHINGTON, April 19.—The steamer Iroquois, now at Mare Island, has been ordered to the relief of the crew of the Rodgers.

MONTGOMERY, Ala., April 19.—There was an immense fall of rain here and in other portions of Alabama last night. At Evergreen, one hundred miles south, on the Mobile and Montgomery railroad, the wind blew a church down, unroofed the brick depot and blew down one side of it, and trees were leveled in all directions. So far, no loss of life is reported.

SEDALIA, Mo., April 21.—The total number of deaths, reported to date from the tornado at Brownsville and in the neighborhood, is eleven, and several others are expected to die.

CAIRO, April 22.—A fearful tornado passed over this city about five o'clock this afternoon from a westerly direction. Although but of a few seconds' it blew down the Colored Methodist Church and several other buildings, unroofed ten or fifteen buildings, and blew over two loaded freight cars on the Wabash railroad. It also did considerable damage to the city gas works by overturning a gasometer; also completely destroying telegraph and telephone communication. No lives were lost but two or three persons were slightly hurt. The tornado was accompanied by a heavy hail storm which did considerable damage to windows and skylights.

HOMER, La., April 22.—A destructive cyclone passed four miles north of Homer about five A. M. yesterday. The full extent of the damage is not yet known. Your correspondent witnessed a part of its progress. Many negro cabins, out-houses, etc., were wrecked, fences laid flat and timber blown down. No lives were lost so far as yet known.

SHREVEPORT, April 22.—One of the heaviest rain, wind and hail storms experienced for many years, passed over this place about daylight this morning. Trees and fences were blown down in all parts of the town. St. James Colored Church was lifted up off the uprights and blown some distance.

BROOKHAVEN, Miss., April 23.—Monticello, situated twenty miles east of here, was visited yesterday at quarter past twelve P. M. by a destructive cyclone. The town was completely destroyed, only three houses in the entire place being left. They were dwelling-houses on the outskirts of the storm. Nothing like it was ever seen in this country. Ten persons were killed instantly—five whites and five colored. The names of the whites are as follows: H. Wetherby, chancery clerk; Allen Sharp, Mrs. Campion and baby and Rev. S. W. Dale. Out of a population of about one hundred and fifty very few escaped without some injury. Between fifteen and twenty were seriously injured, some it is thought, fatally. Ex-Sheriff Butler, and wife are painfully injured. Jake Myer had his collar-bone broken and was injured about the face. Charley Cohn had his leg broken. The store of Mr. Cohn, after being blown down, was struck by lightning and entirely consumed. There was not a tree left standing in the place. Samuel Hickman's fine residence, four miles southwest of Monticello, was entirely demolished; no one was hurt. The track of the cyclone is estimated at half a mile wide.

WASHINGTON, April 24.—The debate on the Mississippi river improvement bill was not concluded, as it was expected it would be. The Senators are beginning to realize the importance of the bill, and wish to put themselves on record in regard to it. Mr. Pendleton, of Ohio, made a particularly strong speech in favor of the bill. It was a broad gauge speech, in which he took the ground that the government had as much constitutional authority to build levees as to build piers and breakwaters on the great lakes.

FRANKLIN, La., April 21.—The water has fallen four and a half inches in the last forty-eight hours. The current in the bayou is very slow. Great destitution prevails at Morgan City and in that neighborhood, requiring immediate relief. The water has almost disappeared from Bayou Salo.

MORGAN CITY, La., April 21.—The water fell three and a half inches in the past twenty-four hours. The total fall is seventeen inches. People are becoming more cheerful. Mr. Allen A. Moore, bridge builder, has arrived here, to be on hand in case of accident to the railroad bridge, as the current will be very strong as soon as the waters gets within its banks.

HELENA, Ark., April 24.—The water is falling steadily, and we will be out of the overflow in a few days. The high lands are all right now, but the lower bottoms are under yet to quite a depth. The country just below the city is covered, and from present indications will not be free from water for two or three weeks. From the St. Francis and Longville rivers, I hear favorable reports. The people are in many places plowing and preparing for the coming crop.

CINCINNATI, April 24.—Although the Sunday law was only partially observed yesterday, the effect was very apparent in the police court dockets today, there being eight drunks and other misdemeanors. The charges were also reduced to about a quarter of the usual Monday's slate. The number of saloons reported kept open Sunday were about 500 out of 1,000.

FOREIGN.

VIENNA, April 18.—Two hundred Jewish refugees passed through Lemberg, Sunday, on their way to America. Two hundred more were expected to arrive from Brody.

LONDON, April 18.—At Reading today Lord Chief Justice Coleridge charged the Grand Jury in the case of Roderick MacLean, who attempted to shoot Queen Victoria at Windsor on the second of March. His lordship said: The rules laid in England have been rare, but the law bearing on the case, though over five hundred years old, was undoubted. The facts are narrated in the depositions of witnesses of the assault, and clearly supported the charge. Baron Huddleston was also on the bench. Sir George Bowyer, is the foreman of the grand jury. The grand jury returned a true bill for high treason against the prisoner, who was at once placed in the dock. He pleaded "not guilty" in a firm but low voice. Sir Henry James, Attorney General, opened the case for the prosecution. He said it was a very aggravated one. The jury had a grave responsibility in determining the condition of the prisoner's mind at the time he committed the crime. The evidence for the prosecution went simply to prove that MacLean fired a shot. The witnesses were not cross-examined. Montague Williams, opening for the prisoner, made insanity the ground of defense. He said it could be shown that MacLean had a homicidal mania for years, and had imagined the English people were against him, and also that it could be proved that MacLean had been confined in an asylum. The superintendents of Salisbury and Broadmoor Asylum testified to MacLean's insanity. They said they believed him incapable of appreciating the nature or quality of any of his acts. Williams asked for acquittal of the prisoner on the ground of insanity. Lord Chief Justice Coleridge summed up the case, and the jury returned a verdict of not guilty on the ground of insanity.

LONDON, April 20.—After the jury in the case of Roderick MacLean, the Queen's assailant, had rendered the verdict of acquittal on the ground of insanity, it was ordered that MacLean be detained in custody during her Majesty's pleasure. The deliberations of the jury occupied but five minutes.

CONSTANTINOPLE, April 23.—The International Sanitary Commission is taking precautions against the spread of the plague, which has broken out in Persian Kurdistan.

LONDON, April 24.—The body of Darwin will be buried in Westminster Abbey, in close proximity to that of Sir Isaac Newton.

CLAY-EATERS.—Much has been written about this practice, and many speculations and suggestions offered about "fatty clays" and "earths rich in organic matter," but recent research and experiment have shown that the mere presence of solid material in the stomach is sufficient to allay the sensation of hunger for a time, so that in all probability these savages swallow the earth only to appease the cravings of nature until food can be obtained. The hunters and trappers of the far West make pills of calcined oyster shell and white of egg, which they swallow occasionally to stave off hunger and its disagreeable concomitants when on a long journey and their rations are exhausted. Tea or coffee would answer the purpose better, as, though affording no nourishment in themselves, they prevent the waste of tissue.—Chambers' Journal.

Yours very truly,

MARCUS B. TONEY,
Ch'n Committee on Transportation.

Mr. Richard Crawley, of Salem, Mass., says: "I can, from personal experience, recommend Brown's Iron Bitters as being a permanent cure for indigestion, dyspepsia, sick stomach, painful urination, etc. It really strengthens the whole general system. Its effect is most wonderful.

We have heard of a race-boat made so narrow and so easy to overset that the oars-men had to part their hair in the middle before they took their seats in it so as to keep it in trim. Even so there are some churches, some little churches, in which the pastor needs to walk very circumspectly, so as not to put more weight on one side than the other. It is a very great mistake to suppose that it takes more grace and skill to manage a large church than a small one. Far otherwise. The largest man is needed for the smallest place.—The Religious Herald.

LONG DAYS.—The day grows longer or shorter as the traveller goes north or south of the equator. The longest day at London is sixteen hours and a half; at Hamburg, seventeen hours; at Stockholm eighteen hours and a half. St. Petersburgh, the capital of Russia, has eighteen hours in the longest and five hours in the shortest day. In Finland the difference is greater still—twenty-one and a half for the longest, and two and a half for the shortest; while at Spitzbergen the longest day is three months and a half.

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE. And possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European scientists, who claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS—NONE GENUINE UNLESS STAMPED.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an old-fashioned piano like their mothers and grandmothers used to have, one of the square make. What was considered a good piano of years ago, would be called a tin pan now, what suited our ancestors would not suit our children. Music more than a hundred years, is progressive, and the difference between the spinette on which Mozart and even Beethoven, played is, in comparison with the concert piano, say the Chickering of to-day, is as great as between the mail coach of our fathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European makers have improved and perfected a style of construction, that cannot be excelled. The Americans claim durability to their pianos and have a volume of tone by over stringing, light touch by improved mechanism of action, vibration by equalizing sounding board. How European pianos has attained to such perfection will be seen by the following extract from the London Graphic of April 8th. "There is no piano of any importance manufactured in England, which does not contain some of the improvements originated by the Americans." Take, for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago, this progress is very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which no other pianos possess. Their pin blocks of iron, the holes are bushed with bronze, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as any other piano. Their tone is not unlike that of the Steinway, but more delicate, and in my opinion, more pleasing to the ear. Their touch is more elastic, and responds more readily to the player's touch, and their workmanship is more thorough and complete in all its details. The tone of their upright pianos is also very fine, and I have no hesitation in saying that they are the best uprights made in this country. Their square pianos are also very fine, and I have no hesitation in saying that they are the best squares

IN SUMMER FIELDS.

BY C. M. FRASER-TYTLER.

Sometimes, as in the summer fields
I walk abroad, there comes to me
A strange a sense of mystery,
My heart stands still, my feet must stay
Am in such strange company.

I look on high—the vastly deep
Of blue outreaches all my mind,
And yet I think beyond to find Something more vast—and at my feet
The lilly bryony is twined.

Clouds sailing as to God go by,
Earth, sun, and stars are rushing on
And faster than swift time, more strong
Than rushing of the worlds, I feel
A something is, of name unknown.

And turning suddenly away,
Grown sick and dizzy with the sense
Of power, and mine own impotence,
Be the gentle cattle feed
Dumb, unthinking innocence.

The teasing rooks, the milking-sled
And awful silence overhead;
Below, the muddy pool, the path
The thirsty herds of cattle tread.

Sometimes, as in the summer fields
I walk abroad, there comes to me
A sense of mystery,
My senses reel, my reason fails
As in such strange company.

Yet somewhere, dimly, I can feel
The wild confusion dwells in me,
I, in no strange company,
The lost link twixt him and these,
The touch him through the mystery.

China and Her People.

BY REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

(SIXTH LETTER.)

My Dear Young Friends: I promised my last to tell you something of the old man, Laoutsz, who lived at the same time with Confucius, five centuries before the Christian era, and also of Buddha who lived in India. The sect which he founded is called Tao, which means way or path, or a principle from which all things proceed. It also means a word or to speak. Laoutsz is called the "venerable philosopher." He is always represented as an old man with long gray beard. His followers believe he existed from eternity, and they think he created all things. They say he is the venerable prince, the root of heaven and earth, the commencement of all things." He is said to have appeared on earth fourteen centuries before the Christian era, then 604 B. C., and again in A. D. 123. His followers affect to despise wealth, ease, prosperity, and they believe everything ends with this life.

Confucius visited him to learn what his doctrines were, but he found them were too speculative for him. Gradually his followers introduced Buddhistic doctrines. At first there was no idolatry connected with it, but now they are notorious for their worship of idols and their gross superstition. The whole system is now materialistic. They have no knowledge of the personality of God, and simply talk of order and reason as the great and universal principle which governs all things. The common people speak of heaven and earth as a personal and intelligent being, and often say, when we tell them of the true God, "He wants us to worship heaven and earth." The priests of this sect are very superstitious, and profess to have intercourse with and control over evil spirits in the invisible world. They say their high priest never dies, but is immortal and rules over hades. Charms written by him are sold at high prices, and are used to expel evil influences; but I will tell you more of this another time.

The third sect is that of Buddha, the founder of this system of atheism called Shakyamuni Gautama Buddha. He is said to have lived in the sixth century before the Christian era, and died 543 B. C. He was the son of one of the kings of India, and until his fifteenth year is said to have led a very dissolute life. At that age he left his home and became a recluse, visited the four schools of India, but was not satisfied, because, by all their studies, old age, sickness and death could not be avoided. He went to the mountains, and after a probation of sixteen years, it is said, he renounced all vicious tendencies and arrived at that point where he had no feeling; and finally entered the state of nirvana, or annenity, or, in other words, was annihilated. It is said by his followers that this was not the first appearance of Buddha, but that he had appeared five hundred and fifty times before; and one, mine which he bears now in China, is Szu-in-fuh, which means will come again. This idea of returning, like many other incidents, was no doubt borrowed from the Christian religion in modern days.

Shakyamuni Buddha taught voluntary poverty and celibacy; he taught atheism and deified humanity, and believed in transmigration. When Shakyamuni Buddha came the last time he was said to have been born of a virgin, the bride of one of the kings of India, and the name of this virgin was Maya, which very much resembles the name of our Saviour's mother. When he was born heavenly beings came near, and a great light announced his birth. When he was baptized an old man took him up in his arms and spoke of his future greatness. At the age of seven no teacher could be found wise enough to instruct him. He was led into the wilderness, and "wise men from the east" came and made offerings to him. He preached in the open air, and proclaimed everywhere that all things are vanity. He went about from place to place clad in rags, and with his alms-bowl begging his bread. He is also said to have worked miracles, but they were mere tricks of jugglery. He is said to have ascended to heaven and went down to hell. Near the close of his life he is said to have been baptized with fire. When on a mountain in Ceylon, while preaching, a bright light is said to have descended upon him. When his end drew near heaven and earth trembled, and loud voices were heard lamenting his departure. We see here many incidents like those in the life of our Saviour. He is said to have come from heaven, was born of a virgin, and his birth heralded by angels; was welcomed by an old man; was taken to a temple and baptized with water, and afterward with fire; astonished many learned men by his wisdom; was led into the wilderness, and was tempted of the devil; and afterward went about preaching and working miracles; when on a mountain was encircled with a halo of light; goes down to hell, and then ascends to heaven. With the exception of the crucifixion almost every incident in the life of Christ has been ascribed to Buddha, and yet he lived and died more than five hundred years before the Christian era. Some would have us believe the Saviour visited India and borrowed all this from from the life of Shakyamuni Buddha. But we have history to prove that all this is of modern origin. There was nothing of this in the early life of Shakyamuni Buddha. The words and ideas of the "Light of Asia" were taken from books published since the fifth and sixth centuries of the Christian era. Buddhism was introduced into China in the first century of the Christian era from India.

In the year 61 A. D. the Emperor Mingte, of the Han dynasty, had a dream in which he saw an image of gold, and having heard of some great man in the west which no doubt was our Saviour, sent messengers to invite him to come to China. They went as far as India, and there they were persuaded that the wonderful personage of whom they had heard was Buddha. They returned to China, in A. D. 75, accompanied by a Hindoo priest, an image of Buddha, and one small book. The prime minister opposed the introduction of Buddhism into China, and for this he was banished to the southern confines of the empire. The emperor had the book translated, and thus Buddhism was established in China. It was in Thibet that Buddhism gained its greatest triumph. In the seventh century many Buddhist priests fled to Thibet from Mohammedan persecution. In the eight and ninth centuries many of the reformers of Thibet, being dissatisfied with the Buddhist system, and, hearing of the Nestorians in China, went to visit them, and there they became acquainted with the life and character of Christ, and the ceremony of the Catholic Church. They at once adopted many of their doctrines, traditions and ceremonies, and, returning to Thibet, they reorganized the Buddhist Church, and introduced many forms similar to those of the Catholic Church. And here we have all those incidents in the life of Buddha which coincide with those in the life of Christ.

The Buddhist Church in Thibet has its Pope, cardinals, bishops, priests and nuns. They have their infant baptism, their confirmation, mass for the dead, rosaries, chaplets, candles and holy water, the processions, saints and fast days. These Catholic ceremonies found their way into the Buddhist religion in China; but not to so great an extent as in Thibet. So striking was the resemblance between the Chinese and Roman Catholics that, when they came to China, some of their Bishops thought Satan had induced the pagans to imitate the holy mother church in order to expose her ceremonies to shame.

Authors of such works as the "Light of Asia" would like to shake the faith of Christians in the true record of the life and character of Christ, and would lead many to believe that the history of the Redeemer was but a borrowed one.

The remains of Buddha were severed by his followers. A hair, a tooth, or a piece of bone, were preserved in temples, and, in many instances, pagodas were erected over them and are held sacred. Buddhist priests take a vow of celibacy, shave their heads, live in temples, do not eat animal food, take no wine, and live on the public contributions of the people. The gods they worship are the three precious Buddhas, the past, present and future. They also worship the goddess of mercy, the holy mother of heaven, the goddess of small-pox, the god of wealth, and others. They have no Sabbaths for periodical seasons of rest, but observe the new and full moon for public days of worship. They observe 162 fast days in the year. Their prayers are in the Sanskrit which few understand, and not understood at all by the people. Buddha's name is often repeated, to which they attach great merit. In their books they say: "Think of the devil, and you will become a devil; think of Buddha, and you will become a Buddha." Shakyamuni Buddha said: "If any one repeating my name fail to obtain life in my kingdom, I would cease to be a god." The land of his kingdom is made of yellow gold. Its gardens and palaces are all adorned with gems. All the sages of heaven and earth are there. But there are no women, for they are all changed into men. The only way to gain this paradise of the west is to depend on O-me-to-Fuh (Amida Buddha.) You need but this single word.

Such is the heaven of Buddha and the way to obtain it. These poor heathen repeat the name of Buddha as rapidly as they can, until quite out of breath, and taking another breath they continue in the same way. The worshippers of Buddha talk a great deal about compassion; but it is only extended toward beasts and ghosts, while the poor among men are left to suffer. It is very common for them to feed hungry ghosts. The priests prepare a feast, and make a great display of flags and lanterns, and, at the same time, gongs and drums are beaten to inform the ghosts that the feast is ready. The priests then repeat their prayers, and work their fingers in a strange manner, by which they believe the gates of hell are opened and the spirits are set at liberty. I will write more of the Buddhists and Taoists in my next.

Death of Rev. Thomas S. Abernathy.

Who should rehearse the noble qualities of Jonathan, and mourn his death in the most pathetic strains but David, who loved him as he did his own soul? And who should write a brief memoir of the long and useful ministerial life and happy death of Thomas S. Abernathy, late of the Alabama Conference, but the only remaining one of his early colleagues in the itinerancy? By special request from a deeply-bereaved heart the attempt is made. Rev. Thomas S. Abernathy was born in Brunswick county, Va., March 26, 1803, and died in Dayton, Ala., April 13, 1882, having just entered his eightieth year. When a small boy his parents moved to Giles county, Tenn. Giles county was even then the hot-bed of Methodism and nursery of young preachers. When about fourteen years of age Thomas was converted at a camp meeting at Mount Pisgah. Soon after his conversion his father moved into a new settlement where there was no preaching, and but little religious society, in consequence of which he suffered a decline in his spiritual enjoyment. Soon, however, Thomas Stringfield, hearing of their destitution, took them into his circuit and organized a society at his father's house. Thomas, the boy Christian, soon had his heart warmed with his first love and became greatly exercised about preaching. He kept these exercises to himself, and tried to excuse himself from entering the ministry on account of his extreme timidity and want of a suitable education; but still the subject was interwoven with all his meditations. He essayed to put it away as the creature of his own imagination; but still the voice of the Spirit sounded in his heart: "Go preach the gospel." He secretly promised he would, if the way should be opened without any agency on his part. One day, after preaching, Ellison Taylor stopped at his father's house, and proposed to him to get his horse and go with him around his circuit. This was an unexpected shock to his feelings; but he had secretly promised the Lord to attempt to preach if the way was opened to begin without any agency on his part, and he dared not violate his solemn pledge. Bro. Taylor soon had him reading, praying and exhorting in public, and there commenced his career of fifty-nine years in the ministry. The heavy burden of hesitation, doubt and fear fell off his young heart, and, after a full consecration of his life to the work of the ministry, he spent the remaining part of 1823 traveling with Ellison Taylor in Limestone, and James W. Allen on Madison circuit. He obtained, with many other young men, a recommendation for admission into the Tennessee Conference, which that year met in Huntsville, Ala., November 26, 1823. John R. Lambuth, though then quite young, had been traveling some time in the Alabama part of the Mississippi Conference, and, seeing the great need of additional laborers, repaired to the seat of the Tennessee Conference to solicit volunteers for Alabama. He found five young men, including T. S. Abernathy, willing to volunteer for the Mississippi Conference, and, after consulting Bishop George as to the legality of the transaction, he got their consent to withhold their certificates of recommendation, from the Tennessee and present them to the Mississippi Conference, which was to meet in Natchez, December 25, 1823. The five volunteers repaired in a body to the residence of Alexander Sale, the presiding elder of the Cahawba district, who was on the eve of starting to Natchez. Bro. Sale received the young men with great cordiality; but told them, as it was not necessary for them to be at Conference to insure their admission, he would save them a horse-back ride of five hundred miles to Natchez, perhaps, to be sent back to Alabama, by placing them on circuits soon to be vacated by his preachers going to Conference. This arrangement was cordially adopted, and they commenced work at once. They were all gratefully received at Conference, and from then until now, with the exception of the short time that he was local, arranging his domestic affairs, his honored name has appeared on the Conference roll. I shall not occupy any space by recounting his different fields of labor. Before his marriage he traveled extensively—mostly in Alabama. After his marriage to Miss Martha Lacy, in the fall of 1827, there being no parsonages in those days, he settled his family in Marengo county, which from thence forward was the center of his itinerant operations. Let us now look at the subject of our memoir. He was a man of medium size, rather spare, and built for activity and endurance; had an open, genial countenance, and polished, agreeable manners; he had a clear, sonorous voice; his articulation was very distinct, and his style of delivery above mediocrity. His sermons were on the Wesleyan model, and clothed with well-selected and forcible language. His administration as a pastor was safe and conciliatory. He never aspired to the higher offices and positions of the ministry. His beau ideal of a happy and useful life was that of an elder on a rural circuit. He was several times compelled to take a supernumerary relation to the Conference; but he persisted in trying to be effective until 1872, when he was dangerously prostrated with bronchitis and asthma, which, after eight years of intense suffering, ended with his life on the thirteenth of April. As he had the misfortune to lose his parchments of ordination and could not recall the dates, I will here state that our journal shows that he was ordained deacon by Bishop Roberts, at Washington, Miss., December 14, 1825; and elder by Bishop Soule, at Natchez, Miss., December 23, 1827. He was one year my senior in the Conference, and from our first acquaintance we blended together as congenial spirits in mutual love which only increased with the long roll of years. After he was set off with the Alabama Conference we kept up an affectionate correspondence to the close of his life. His last letter to me was written about one month before his death, and was full of the mature Christian's peace, love, joy, hope and bright assurances of soon being home where many of his family had gone before. As he neared the heavenly gates he had glorious visions of celestial convoys coming to convey his departing soul to his eternal rest. Of all who belonged to the Conference, when we entered in 1823-4, I alone am left. I can but weep in my solitude; but, bless the Lord, I am happy, and shall soon overtake my dear old colleagues. May the Lord bless and comfort her who for so many years was the faithful partner of this good and true minister. Wish I could dare to write more.

HAZLEHURST, MISS., April 20, 1882.

Letter from East Tennessee.

MR. EDITOR: Hiwassee College is located seven miles east of this place in what is known as the "Hiwassee purchase," a beautiful country lying along the Hiwassee river, from which both it and the college are named.

Hiwassee is one of the sweet flowing names given by the Cherokee Indians, whose language is as euphonious as that of the Greeks. It stands in the broad country lying between the Cumberland and Alleghany mountains, in sight of both, and is surrounded by the Batt creek knobs, a chain of singularly constructed mounds, some of which are said to be four hundred feet high. It is in the midst of a community of thrifty, frugal, intelligent and religious farmers, and is remarkably free from all corrupting and disturbing influences. Hiwassee College has been in operation thirty-three years, during which it has graduated and sent out many young men who now stand in the front rank in the different learned professions in this and other Southern States. Rev. J. H. Brunner, D. D., A. M., is its president, and has been through most of its history. He is mild in disposition and manners; firm in administration; apt to teach; and wise to govern. His professors, in the male department, have been selected from the alumni of the college. It is not contended that Hiwassee College is better than the colleges of the South. No; if parents are able to educate their sons at home, and their sons are able, physically, to be educated at home, let them do so; and should I find students here, whose constitutions require a more Southern climate, I shall not hesitate to direct them to Centenary, Whitworth, or East Mississippi. But Hiwassee makes its appeal on the grounds of health and economy. There are many young men in the South who have both the means and disposition to avail themselves of collegiate advantages, but are unable, physically, to endure a four years' tuition in the depressing climate of their own section, and must, therefore, either be educated from home, or not at all.

The people of this country, many of them, live to a very great age. The following inscription is taken from a tombstone now at our depot: "J. C. Hardin, born December 25, 1775, and died January 3, 1881." William Browder, a soldier of the war of 1812, now ninety years old, is a member of our church in Sweetwater circuit, and is wonderfully preserved both in body and mind. He walks, rides horseback, and attends to business with about as much facility as a man of sixty. Rev. James Axley died, at this place, in the year 1838, but his widow is still living a few miles from Hiwassee College. I have cited the above cases as specimens of the health and longevity of this country. People are constantly coming here from both North and South seeking health, and in most cases they are benefitted. This college makes no pretensions to fine buildings, or splendid appointments; but, in a modest way, offers first-class educational facilities at the lowest possible cost. Its patronage from the South has been, and is now, liberal.

Victoria College, the female department of Hiwassee, is located at this place. Sweetwater is noted for its refined society, its high moral tone, and its exemption from the vices so common to small towns. But little is ever heard of parties; nothing of dancing. It is a town of churches and schools. Victoria is wisely located. Rev. E. M. Grace, A. M., the sweet spirited, genial Christian gentleman and minister, the ripe scholar, and the wise instructor of the young, is its president, under the general direction of President Brunner. Bro. Grace was for many years a member of the Alabama and North Alabama Conferences, and was connected, as president and professor, with several of their Conference colleges, and is too well known there to need commendation. I take great pleasure in commending both him and his college to friends in other portions of the South. The same advantages that are offered to young gentlemen at Hiwassee are secured to young ladies at Victoria.

Miss Annie Green, an accomplished teacher from Tuscaloosa, Ala., has recently been added to the literary department of the school. And what shall I say more? For the time would fail me to tell of Emory and Henry, of Martha Washington, of Sullins, of Peoples, and of Asheville, whose friends rise up and praise them, and whose works testify of their worth. Worthy institutions they are; but I only promised to write you of the schools of this portion of Tennessee.

W. H. LEITH.

SWEETWATER, TENN., April 20, 1882.

Seashore Camp-Ground.

MR. EDITOR: Please call attention, through the ADVOCATE, to the action of the trustees at last camp meeting fixing the time of the commencement of the Seashore Camp Meeting permanently hereafter on the second Wednesday of July, which, this year, 1882, will be on the twelfth of July, on which day the eleventh annual camp meeting will open, as usual, and continue from eight to ten days. It is desirable that the people take early note of the time and make all needful preparation beforehand. Lots can be had for building on, and tents already built can be hired, at reasonable prices, for the term of camp meeting, or for the season, on application to any one of the trustees. Several new tents are being put up this spring to be in readiness for the meeting. We hope our brethren will not delay this action, but commence at once. Building can be done now on more favorable terms than at a much later period, when every one wants his work done first, and artizans and laborers are pressed and hurried to complete their contracts, and the time of getting ready is carried over and lapped on to the sacred hours of worship. Do not delay. The liberal action of a few of the trustees and friends of the camp meeting last summer, a subscription of $2 500 to enable the trustees to pay off and close out forever the indebtedness of the camp ground, accompanied by the purchase [illegible] grounds, erection of a large and [illegible] of tabernacle and other [illegible]

and clearing up and improving the grounds, was timely and most praiseworthy. Warm and hearty thanks are due to these good brethren. Their record is woven in the history of Seashore Camp Ground; their deeds are registered on high. The church may now rejoice that they have, free from debt, one of the finest camp grounds in the Southern country, or in any other country, held by an incorporate board of trustees—just as other church property is held: "for the use of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in the worship of Almighty God"—of an estimated value of $20,000.

The improvements embrace a commodious tabernacle, which will pleasantly seat a congregation of 1,200 to 1,500, a prayer hall for more private and social meetings, a large and comfortable restaurant, seven large sleeping tents, one large company tent covering three lots of ground, and capable to accomodate from 150 to 200 persons, five district or pastors' tents, one Bishop's tent, forty-four private tents, and twelve other tents of various sizes held by the trustees to rent, or otherwise, for the accomodation of the public. Good bath-houses afford to the people the luxury of cool, refreshing sea bathing. An abundant supply of cool and healthful water is afforded from both wells and springs, gushing out from the clear sands and gravel beds. The religious character of the meetings from the first has been excellent; perfect order has prevailed, and the preaching has uniformly been good—at times of a high order and seldom excelled, always practical, spiritual, and adapted to the occasion. The Lord has been in the congregation of his people, and they have been abundantly blessed with all spiritual blessings in Christ Jesus, and sinners have been fed to repentance and gathered into his fold.

The prospects for the approaching camp meeting are considered very encouraging. Letters from various parties at a distance, who have never before visited our grounds, make inquiries and expressing intentions to be present in July next.

The invitation is extended to all. Comfortable accomodations for board and lodging will be provided at reasonable prices, and the preachers will be cared for free of charge. Again we say, make early arrangements; do not delay. Come, and come praying.

New Orleans District, Louisiana Conference.—R. O. L. Rayne, J. H. Keller, G. W. W. Goodwyn, John N. Pharr, Thomas J. Carver, Philip Hallagan, John H. Thompson, William H. Foster.

TRUSTEE.

Good Words.

Rest follows labor
Even so;
Yet side by side
They like were go.
Each to the other
Dear akin.

For life well spent Brings peace within
This is the test
That all may win.

—If there is true spiritual life, it grows. All the elements of piety grow. Love of God becomes stronger, leading to more complete surrender, more ready self-sacrifice. Purity gains dominance over the heart; impure thoughts become more hateful, and are the more promptly expelled. The man takes larger views of duty; his eyes daily open to take in new fields of duty, within and without; his standard is constantly rising; he is never satisfied with his attainments. His love for his fellow-man becomes real, eager, all-embracing; he has no enemies; she is glad to deny himself; he realizes that he never before knew what self-denial was; and, better and more wonderful, he never knew till now the divine joy that there is in self-denial. All his ideal of holiness becomes higher, so his knowledge of his own deficiency, his sense of his failings, becomes more marked, and he is more filled with humility. This growth, once begun, is life-long.

—The ordinary influence of religion, like the light of day, is so gentle in its approach, and so all-pervading, that most men are not aroused by it from the slumber of their indifference and alienation from God. They seem to need a sudden and vivid lightning-flash, which, while it reveals the glory of heaven from whence it descends, displays, also, the dismal abyss on the brink of which they are standing.

—It was a saying of old Dr. Sharpe, of Boston, that a man who doubts and only half believes, does not believe at all. One can not believe a thing and have even the least doubt about its truth. Belief is equivalent to knowledge. A man can not believe a thing which he is not wholly convinced is true. "I know that my Redeemer liveth," expresses the frame of mind in which we should approach the great truths of the gospel.

THE ENDLESS STORY.

BY MARY AINGE DE VERE.

A freshening wind, an April shadow,
A bird-song, trilling clear and fast,
A gleam of violets from the meadow,
A builded nest, and the Spring is past.

Warm, golden blooms that break asunder,
The calm of full perfection wear;
A lightning spark, a crash of thunder,
And scattered rose-leaves, the Summer's done.

Swift-wandering leaves of gold and red;
An empty nest by the wayside lying,
A mateless bird. Ah! fair Autumn's dead.

And fringed eaves dripping in the sun;
Then floating ice to the great sea going,
And the endless story is again begun.

SUNDAY, MAY 14, 1882.—MARK VIII, 1-26.

THE LEAVEN OF THE PHARISEES.

The Master held the multitudes absent Decapolis in wondering astonishment while remaining there several days in this place of chosen retirement, for the purpose of instructing his disciples. By his fame he attracted to himself a very great multitude from the surrounding country. His preaching and miracles held them in his audience until their supply of food was all exhausted. The Lord's compassion was stirred by their want, which he knew had resulted from their desire to be near him. "They have been with me three days, and have nothing to eat." He keeps account of how long they have been with him, and how far they were off from their houses, and, casting all together, resolves to supply them. I suppose the Lord yet takes an exact estimate of the self-sacrifice of each act of worship. I wonder what he thinks of those worshipers who are put out of humor by a sermon or service which keeps them a half hour too long, and spoils the warm Sabbath dinner. They will not tarry one moment over time, and a sermon which exceeds the limit they have fixed is remembered against the preacher no matter what the importance of the occasion.

"If I send them away fasting, to their own houses, they will faint by the way; for divers of them came from far." The Master puts the matter to the disciples as a question, without the slightest intimation of his intention of supernaturally supplying their want. The disciples answer him as if they were not informed of the recent miracle of the feeding of the five thousand. They answer as if the demand of the present moment had no precedent. From whence can a man satisfy these thousands of men and women and hungry children here in the wilderness? Had the former deliverance been forgotten so soon? Had they come to look on him as a man merely? This question implies that they did not have the slightest conception of the possibility of the Master by his own creative power supplying the bread for these people. This unbelief in the disciples, clearly implied in their question, is simply unaccountable and inexcusable. How easily men relapse into the deadness of unbelief. The mighty interpositions of God's hand fall out of our memory whenever a new difficulty arises; to unbelief, at each recurring necessity, it seems as though the wonders of God's grace were exhausted, and had come to an end. Memory shall have to answer for many monstrous acts of ingratitude in the judgment. We have no right to forget God's mercies. No doubt the disciples were as much astonished at the miracle as if they had never seen the like. They acted as if they were totally unconscious of the result to be expected, just as you and I, who have an experimental knowledge of Christ's power to forgive sins, stand in wonder and surprise at every new conversion. We did not expect it.

To unbelieving, forgetting humanity, every manifestation of Divine energy is new and wonderful. Our unbelief shows itself in a whole life of marveling. More faith on our part, and there would be less marveling. Christ says to Nicodemus: "Marvel not." His very marveling was the voice of his unbelief.

The striking lesson in this miracle is that it shows how God duplicates his mercies in spite of our unbelief. If we fail at last to be saved, every interposition in the way of miraculous mercies oft repeated shall be charged up in evidence of our persistent rejection of the Lord.

The Master next encounters the unbelief of church in the persons of the Pharisees, her then best representatives. They question him, seeking a sign from heaven; tempting him, intimating that they were not satisfied with the miracles he was performing. There was scope for delusion in these; indeed, they were bold enough to insinuate that for aught they knew these might be the works of the devil, that Satan might have his hand in all these wonders. It was a miracle of the nature of phenomenal curiosity they wanted, not for a moment considering the folly of demanding a spectacular exhibition, in the material kingdom, to establish his claims to a spiritual kingdom. They were willfully blind to all signs of the times then appearing in the crisis of their history. The Law-Giver and the Scepter had departed from Judah. Their unbelief and opposition to him evoked a sigh from his Spirit. He speaks to himself, reflectively bewailing: Why doth this generation seek after a sign? They have plenty of signs in their nature, in their own hearts; their history is full of them, from Sinai to the prophets; they have no need for more. Verily, I say unto you, there shall no sign be given unto this generation. He left them; he would not press his mercies upon them. Saddened by being thus forced to leave, he took his place in the vessel, and departed for the other side. His mind was full of thoughts of these Pharisees, whom he was leaving to their fate, when he opened conversation with his disciples by warning them against the Spirit which animated these Pharisees. Take heed, beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the leaven of Herod. The stupidity of the disciples in receiving these words of the Master as suggestive of their failure to secure bread for the journey; their spiritual dullness, shown in their literal acceptance of his words, refute the idea of one of school skeptics, who teach that many of the spiritual ideas and doctrines imputed to Christ were originated by the evangelists. So far from originating them man can not, unaided by the Holy Ghost, comprehend when they are comprehensively stated by him in his own words. He heard their thoughts, and he turns upon them with a series of questions, which show how deeply he was grieved at the want of appreciation of himself. In their answers they showed that they remembered every circumstance of these two miracles, even to the fragments, but the spiritual lesson had escaped them. The rebuke he gave them was merited. They listened, as nine out of ten disciples do in this day, to his words. The word of the gospel is preached, and men take home with them the mere illustrations and the stock of anecdotes the preacher told. What amused them left its impression, and what was intended to touch their conscience fell out of their memory.

Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, Mississippi Conference.

Minutes of the fourth meeting of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, of the Mississippi Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, held at Crystal Springs, Miss., April 6, 1882.

MORNING SESSION.

At the call of the president, Mrs. W. L. Nugent, the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society, of the Mississippi Conference, assembled at the Methodist Church in Crystal Springs, Miss., April 6, 1882, at ten o'clock A. M.

In the absence of the president and vice-presidents, by request, Rev. Mr. Lewis, pastor of the Methodist Church at that place, called the meeting to order. The exercises were opened with an anthem by the choir. Mrs. L. A. Kidd was nominated and elected president of the meeting, and Miss Annie H. Gibbs acting secretary. After prayer, by Rev. Mr. John G. Jones, the missionary hymn, From Greenland's Icy Mountains, was sung. Then followed an address of welcome, read by Miss Loretta Barnes, of Crystal Springs.

The minutes of the last meeting were called for, but could not be produced. Report of the corresponding secretary was read and approved by the society. The treasurer being absent, no report was made. The names of the auxiliary societies were called, and, as the names were called, reports were read by their delegates. Twenty societies were reported; only eight delegates present. Rev. Mr. John G. Jones and Rev. C. B. Galloway addressed the meeting. The meeting adjourned, to meet at three o'clock P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The meeting met pursuant to adjournment. The president was in the chair, and called the meeting to order. Prayer by Rev. Mr. Johnston. The society then proceeded to business. The following resolution was offered by Miss J. Potty:

Resolved, That it is the desire of this Conference society that each auxiliary should hold a public anniversary meeting for the purpose of enlarging missionary zeal and intelligence.

Miss Annie E. Linfield offered the following:

Resolved, That we heartily approve of the proposed orphanage to be established in Brazil, under the direction of J. J. Ransom, and each auxiliary to give it all possible aid.

Resolved, That $15, or so much as may be needed, be appropriated to purchase stationery for the corresponding secretary, and for distributing missionary literature.

Miss Annie E. Linfield was elected as a delegate to the General Executive Association, to be held at Nashville, in May, Mrs. L. A. Kidd and Mrs. C. B. Galloway alternates. The society then proceeded to the election of new officers.

Mrs. W. L. C. Hunnicutt was elected president of the Conference society for the year 1882. Vice-presidents: Jackson district, Mrs. Stedman; Vicksburg district, Miss Mat. Hardy; Woodville district, Mrs. Bon. Jones; Seashore district, Mrs. J. M. Weems; Meridian district, Miss J. Potty; Brandon district, Mrs Judy Mayes; Brookhaven district, Mrs. H. F. Johnson. Recording secretary: Mrs. Kate Marshall. Corresponding secretary: Miss Annie E. Linfield—re-elected. Treasurer: Mrs. Annie DeMoss—re-elected.

The next meeting of the society is to be held on the first Thursday in April, 1883. Madison station is the next place of meeting.

Miss Annie E. Linfield offered the following:

Resolved, That we extend to the ladies of Crystal Springs our thanks for the welcome and hospitality accorded us during this pleasant session of our Conference society.

The meeting closed with a hymn, and the benediction by Rev. J. L. Forseyth.

MRS. L. A. KIDD, President.
MISS ANNIE H. GIBBS, Sec.

At night, notwithstanding the inclement weather, a good many were out to hear a lecture from that eloquent divine, Rev. C. B. Galloway, in behalf of the Woman's Missionary Society. If all of our ministers were as much interested as he, much more could be accomplished. We are willing, however, to do all in our power for the cause of missions, and hope ere long to see every woman of the Methodist Church a member of this society.

Names of the auxiliaries, and the delegates present at the annual meeting of the Woman's Missionary Society, of the Mississippi Conference.

From the Work.

GRAND CHENIER, LA.

MR. EDITOR: I have just held a quarterly meeting at Grand Chenier, which closes my first round of quarterly meetings, as published in the ADVOCATE. This is an old appointment, which has been served by such men as Joel Sanders, Seaborn J. Graves and others. The people are hospitable, intelligent, many pious, and all ready to receive the gospel and gospel ministers as a necessity. From some cause this appointment has been left without a preacher for a time, which perhaps will be a good and wholesome lesson to the people, as well as to the church, for, for the want of cultivation by a living ministry, a wild growth was springing up in the field, a dearth was imminent, and all was looking toward desolation, proving that while the church must be aggressive, extending her borders by opening new fields of labor, she must not, if possible, neglect the cultivation of old ones, upon which she has spent so much labor and money, as they will certainly run to waste and utter ruin.

I felt much concerned about this work and Calcasieu mission, determining to visit them as early as possible, if they could be reached at all. No preacher had been assigned to them by the Conference, as had been the case for several years previous, but, in the providence of God, as early as February I secured the services of Bro. James L. Hoffpauier, who willingly went to Grand Chenier, and was kindly received and welcomed by the people, and he has been doing a good and faithful work, in visiting, gathering up the old members and some new ones, establishing Sunday-schools, getting subscribers for the NEW ORLEANS ADVOCATE, and circulating our literature. Grand Chenier is in Cameron parish, one among the few parishes in the State where the Sabbath is kept and everybody go to church if they have preaching, where no whisky or any intoxicating liquor is sold or drank by any one, nor has been for several years; drunkards are compelled to be sober, or seek some place where license is granted for the sale of that which ruins men and society, and entails a burdensome tax upon the people, for they can not find it in Cameron, and perhaps never will again, as they have realized from its expulsion small taxes, few criminal prosecutions, people moral and law-abiding, parish out of debt, with sixteen hundred dollars in the treasury. The stewards found it very difficult to obtain wine for the sacrament at the quarterly meeting. For temperance it is sending out an influence that is felt. Coming to this appointment, I spent about forty-eight hours on board the good schooner Lavonia Perkins, Capt. A. Rolling, loaded with railroad ties, and bound for Indianola, Texas, and during all that passage I saw no intoxicating liquor of any kind, not even a glass of wine, I heard no swearing, nothing boisterous, no loud talking, no loud or harsh commands. All the captain's orders were given in an undertone of voice, and were obeyed in like spirit, the captain controling his crew like the government of a well-regulated family, in all mildness, a religious influence seemed to pervade through the whole ship's company, impressing me with the fact that man can serve God, if he will, in all the lawful occupations of life, whether on water or land. What instruction does the management of this vessel impart to captains of steamboats, steamships, sail ships or railroad agents, showing that men can be governed by moral suasion, without brute force.

I found Calcasieu mission also a very interesting and important field, all white to the harvest, extending over a large portion of the parish, having about fifteen appointments, on creeks, in neighborhoods tolerably thickly settled, and, if supplied now with a preacher without a family, could soon be made self-sustaining, I think. Bro. J. Henning, an excellent local elder, is doing a good work as a preacher in a few settlements, but the claims of his family prevent him from extending his appointments throughout the whole of the work, leaving the larger portion unsupplied, and, although they send up the Macedonian cry, we have no preacher at present to send them. I visit them as extensively as my other engagements will allow, and preach to them, which affords them some encouragement.

During the time of the quarterly meeting at Rose Bluff I attended, with Bro. Henning, the funeral of Bro. J. M. Hilliard, M. D., who died March 31, 1882, a great loss to his family and to the community, and much regretted by all.

MADISON, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Madison circuit lies midway between two of the best stations in the Mississippi Conference—Jackson and Canton. We are to have the District Conference here this year, and the Woman's Missionary Conference Society meets here next year, on the first Wednesday in April. We have had some prosperity, especially in the way of improvement in church property, and prospects of going forward in other directions. Last year we spent $125 on the parsonage, and this year will spend $75 more. The Rev. C. B. Galloway delivered his lecture, on "Illustrious Dunces," here a short time ago, the proceeds to go to the erection of a pastor's study for this circuit. The sum of $25 was realized, though it was a rainy evening. I hope his success here will stimulate other places to ask him to repeat it for them. By the way, is not this the better way to raise money for these smaller enterprises of the church, rather than resort to church festivals? I think so. We are booked for another treat, the third of May, by the Rev. W. C. Black, the proceeds for the benefit of the Protestant Orphan Asylum, Natchez, Miss. The corner-stone of our study was laid yesterday by an Ohio woman, of course without much ceremony, but when the first stone was laid, and placed to her notion, she said: "Amen." After reflection I asked what was included in that amen. Was it that the study commenced might be completed? or was it that the present and future pastors that should occupy it might be consecrated men of God, and that, with increasing and rolling years, the prayers offered and sermons prepared there might bring Christians nearer and sinners to God. Upon reading this to her she said, in her heart, that it might be a resting-place for the weary itinerant, as well as a place where they might prepare themselves for their arduous duties. With the prayer accompanies a handsome donation. Come up to our District Conference, which will be in June or July. We have a pleasant and hospitable community, and you shall have the best of attention.

The strawberry season is upon us, and the business is on a "boom." There are nearly two hundred acres in this pleasant and profitable fruit at this place. The heavy and disastrous rains are interfering with it and other business. Crops are generally late, while vegetation is far in advance of any previous year of our recollection. Cattle and sheep, that run upon the old fields, are fat already, while it is generally in May before they are ready for market. Gardens, where planted early and well cultivated, look well, and are remunerative. The spiritual condition of the country is fair. As little drinking and wicked amusements are engaged in as any portion of our beloved State. The people generally attend church, and are good hearers of the word. A most pleasant and profitable love-feast last Sabbath in connection with our Quarterly Conference services. We have a literary society that our young people interest themselves in, rather than engage in sinful pleasures of dancing and card-playing.

P. A. JOHNSTON.

MADISON, MISS., April 22, 1882.

WINONA CIRCUIT, NORTH MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The second Quarterly Conference for the Winona circuit met and adjourned April 13. Bro. T. Y. Ramsey, the presiding elder, was at his post. The general state of the church here is ordinary. There is nothing that our people need more than a revival. We are as clever and honest as anybody, but this is not enough, holding to and claiming as much as we do. Are we, as Methodists, doing as much, in proportion to our numbers, as our fathers did.

The enemies of prohibition are having quite a jubilee over their success in the last Legislature, but the end of prohibition is not yet. Bro. C. B. G., in your paper of last week, strikes the key-note with his silver trumpet. Much good has and will be done. Let all who are lovers of humanity take up the sound. If you have but a ram's horn, blow wherever you go, until the walls of this Jericho are down.

The crop prospect is good; some corn worked out, some cotton up. The prospect for a fruit crop was never better. The grazing is as good as it usually is in May, but it is cold and cloudy, and the end is not yet. We love the ADVOCATE up here, and subscribe for it.

Obituaries.

WASSON—ELIZA BUSH WASSON, nee COPELAND, was born in Green county, Ga., August 12, 1809, and died March 24, 1882. She joined the Methodist Church in early life; at what age no one now living remembers to have heard her say. At the time of her marriage she was conspicuous for her piety; yet, strange as it may appear, she married a man of more than average impiety, whom she finally won to the service of Christ, and who triumphantly passed over before her about three years ago. She removed with her husband to Mississippi about thirty years ago, and settled on the main road, then a stage road of great importance, between Louisville and Lexington. Here her hospitality was shown for many years, until the tide of travel was diverted to the railways. Yet her home was still known as the preacher's home, and such as he is always glad to find—a place of rest and retirement. Though fond of conversation, and especially that of religious, she never obtruded her company upon a preacher, if he showed a disposition to be left to privacy. She was zealous at camp and protracted meetings; regular, consistent and strict in her home religion. As a mother and manager of the young she had remarkable gifts, as also a remarkable fondness for the young. This she proved in her care for twelve orphan children taken to rear after her seventieth year. It was a pleasure to pay that home a visit. A Presbyterian lady, happening to spend a night there, wondered that twelve children could be kept so orderly and quiet at table as these were. When asked how she did it, she replied: "I believe in God and the children, and they don't deceive me." Beautiful faith that has two good arms: one grasping the divine blessings, and the other holding to the representatives of the third generation of the future! It is unnecessary to state that she saw every child and most of her grandchildren hopefully converted. Some of these went before her to the better land; but many remain to mourn her loss, not without joy in the faith of eternal life. One of her sons has been for years a local preacher, while I believe every one will lead in public devotions. The entire community testified their appreciation of her worth by attending her funeral. I have seldom preached to a larger audience upon such an occasion. Their attentiveness was remarkable, and at times nearly the entire congregation wept. I need only say her last words were, "Blessed Jesus!" Calmly and almost insensibly her spirit glided away from earth to heaven. She was buried at Liberty Chapel, near her home, and within sight of the camp ground pulpit, at whose altars she wept and rejoiced with so many penitents struggling from darkness into light.

BLANKS—LITTLEBERY BLANKS was born in Green county, Ga., March 6, 1794, and died, near Notasulga, Ala., March 18, 1882, in the eighty-ninth year of his age. He was married to Elizabeth Perdue while yet a young man. They moved to Alabama in the year 1839 or 1840, and lived in the vicinity of Auburn for a number of years. His wife died some years before the late war, and left him to fight life's battles alone—his children all having married and left him.

His early opportunities were limited; in fact, he had none, and grew up to manhood without even knowing how to spell or read. Yet he was remarkably successful in life as a financier, and amassed a handsome fortune, which he lost as a result of the war, except his landed estate, which was afterward sacrificed to meet the claims of post bellum creditors. He was then left homeless, and was taken and kindly cared for by Mrs. M. N. Reynolds, a sister of one of his daughters-in-law, who he cared for in her orphanage, and she, assisted by her husband, willingly tried to repay the debt of gratitude by providing for him in his old age, which they did cheerfully and nobly. We could not claim for Uncle Blanks exemption from fault. He had his faults and weaknesses. For some years of his life he was addicted to strong drink, but under grace he became a sober man and died a Christian; and, if he ever failed to meet an obligation, it was from want of ability; a man truthful, just and honest. He professed religion at the old Salem camp ground, in Russel county, Ala., and often referred to the circumstances of his conversion.

The writer was with him only once after he became so feeble from age that he was unable to go out. He then spoke freely and hopefully of his future prospects, and heartily expressed a desire to die if it were the Lord's will. And we have many reasons to believe that the Lord has taken him unto himself.

H.

BLOUNT—JAMES ANDREW BLOUNT, son of William and Mary Blount, died at the home of his parents, in Lawrence county, Miss., March 25, 1882, aged twenty-six years—lese one month and one day. His parents were consistent members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and brought him up in the nurture and admonition of the Lord. At the early age of fourteen he professed and became a communicant of the church, and fully consecrated his life to God. In youth he retained his integrity, and was true, noble, manly, pious. In every respects an exemplary young man. But in the morning of life, while all is clear, beautiful and hopeful, and a radiant day with a golden sunset is promised, we see the cloud of disease gathering and the light of life fading, as by the inevitable doom of the consumptive he goes down to the dark valley. Patiently, submissively, he suffered. He often talked on the subject of religion, and looked out into the future and expressed his perfect resignation to the will of God, and his implicit trust for life and salvation. In his conflict with the last enemy, while in death's empire, he was as exultant as one that had already conquered.

The shout of victory was only prevented by the weariness of the outward and sinking man. Twice in the conflict he rejoiced in spirit, and those who wept around rejoiced with him as they said, "He is happy." He asked them to sing, "Jesus, lover of my soul," and other pieces. As they sang he was raised to ecstacy of joy. When passing away he exclaimed: "I am going!" "A happy go," replied a loved one that sat by: to which he nodded assent. Afterward he kissed all good-bye. Then arose from the gloom of death, as quietly and as majestically, as the glories of the golden dawn of a resplendent day.

B. S. RAYNER.

WALSH—Died in Newark, N. J., March 18, 1882, Mrs. ELIZABETH WALSH, an "elect lady," one who, like the first Elizabeth of whom we read, it may be said, "walked in all the commandments and ordinances of the Lord, blameless." His word was as "a lamp unto her feet and a guide unto her path," and, by its light, duty to all in distress, within the scope of her influence, became paramount to all other consideration, and many deeds of charity, love and kindness were unostentatiously performed.

It was her privilege to claim that she was reared in the lap of Methodism, and early indoctrinated in its peculiar tenets. Her father's house was a home for the preachers, men who, like Paul, worked with their own hands for their support, while day and night, for the benefit of others, they made the word of God their constant study. No wonder that from these vivid impressions the sacred page had taken so deep a root that its language was for her the usual expression of thought, and educated her so eminently for the position she long held as teacher of a Bible class for young ladies, who owe to her faithful instruction their first knowledge and their present enjoyment of the comforting truths of Christianity. This lady was a faithful wife, a devoted mother and a kind friend. Affable at all times, she was overflowing with a genial humor which was irresistable in its effects. Dear sister, our parting is not sad, because it is not final.

PRATT—SISTER ISABELLA PRATT was born in Marion district, S. C., July 30, 1823, and died at her residence, near Morton, Scott county, Miss., in the triumph of the Christian faith, surrounded by all her weeping family, saying to them (just before she passed away) "Meet me in heaven."

Her disease was asthma, of which she suffered many years; but through it all she had the support of Divine grace, which enabled her to bear the intense suffering without a murmur. Sister Pratt joined the Methodist Episcopal Church about the year 1838, in which she lived a faithful member until she was released from her sufferings. She was united in marriage to W. W. Pratt, January 15, 1840. She was a daughter of Capt. Wm. and Frances Page, of Marion district, S. C. She was possessed of great catholicity of spirit. Her husband and several of her children joined the Baptist Church. She interposed no objection to their doing so, but said she could not go with them because of close communion. She said to her husband that Christ had but one church, and she thought there should be no barriers set up at the Lord's table; but thought they should act as their consciences dictated. The writer was called on to perform the funeral service, and does not know that he ever witnessed an occasion of the kind where the father and so many grown up children seemed to feel so deep their great, irreparable loss. May the Lord sanctify this dispensation of his providence to their good.

The subject of this sketch was born and reared in the community in which he died. From a child he exhibited the most marked devotions to his family and friends. He was especially considerate of his mother's comfort, wishes and wants. Industrious in his habits, orderly in his deportment, polite in his manners, and select in his associations, he commanded the respect and love of all. He made a public profession of religion, and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, September 7, 1881. On the first Sunday in March, preceding his death, he was at the communion table for the first and last time on earth—a happy witness of the power of regenerating grace.

From the commencement of his illness he persisted in the conviction that he would not recover, and frequently spoke of happy reunions on the other shore. His last words were those of a faithful soldier: "Ready! ready!"

J. M. PATTON.

MCCLEAN—Born in New Orleans, La., April 17, 1860, J. F. MCLEAN (after his father's name) began life's career tended by a mother's loving care, and was a father's worship and sister's devotion. He was an only son, possessing great ambition and noble spirits.

About his tenth year his parents moved to Adamsville, Miss., and there he received his last parental instruction. He united with the Methodist Church several months before his death, holding on with temperance and reverence toward the last.

He left home for Moss Point, Miss., and while there on the ninth of April, A. D. 1882, death claimed his body, as if to commemorate Christ's rising from the tomb he laid down his life.

We offer to the bereaved family our deep sympathies, commending them to the only Comforter.

TO THE SUFFERING ONES.

To live, and not to do;
Only to wait and wait;
To watch the passing of other feet
Within the heavenly gate;
To see the kindling light
On many a long-loved face,
As one after one the Master calls
Up into the higher place.

To feel the loosened clasp,
To catch the parting smile,
To hear the whisper from dying lips,
"Only a little while."
Only—and yet we weep;
God hides them from our love;
It sometimes seems so hard to rejoice
That they are there—above.

To live, and not to die;
To suffer, not to reign;
Out to the dreary dark with the night,
To wrestle hard with pain;
They with the crown of peace
Full on each calmed brow;
We with the sharpness of thorn and cross
To fight on still below.

Silence, O restless heart,
In quietness be strong.
Well knoweth the Lord, who watcheth thee,
The pain of suffering long.
He knoweth—yet his love
Is stronger than the tears—
Shall he let thee miss thy full reward,
For all thy coward fears?

Many a boat would sail
Into the shining west,
Into the haven where she would be,
The land of quiet rest;
Afar o'er the darkening sea,
Through mist, and cold, and fear,
Cometh sweet a voice that biddeth peace:
"Patience—thy Lord is near."

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

After the accession of Mr. Monroe, in 1817, to the Presidency, a vast amount of fertile land, recently obtained from various Indian tribes, was offered for sale at public auction by the Government, especially in the Southwestern States. Immigration poured in like a flood—the land speculation mania rose to a high pitch. Capitalists formed associations to purchase extensively and to put down competition. The "Land Sales" became scenes of the wildest disorder. The plain and honest immigrant, who came with moderate means to secure a home, found it needful to join a company to prevent being crushed, and even then had been compelled to pay a high price for his home by the grasping speculators. Mr. Monroe, in a tour of personal observation through the States, visited Huntsville, Ala., after such a scene had occurred there, and attended a great public dining given him. The occasion was unusual—the personnel of President Monroe, his history as a soldier, and patriot statesman, and the vast and intelligent concourse present made it an impressive day. A toast was offered, complimentary to the distinguished guest and to the Government, closing by allusion to the high price for the public land by the people to swell the coffers of the General Government. In reply, the President arose to his feet, and gracefully responded to the compliment. He was large, finely-formed, and of noble mien; and standing in the midst of the most wealthy, finely-dressed, and intelligent crowd which the South could show; he appeared in a blue home-spun coat, cut in military style of the Revolution; light colored vest, and pants, cocked hat. A shade was said to have passed over his face as he closed by saying he had been made sorry by hearing that those who wished for homes for their families had been obliged by speculators to pay high prices; that the United States wanted citizens and actual settlers on her lands, and only required the cost of them. The sentiment was a right one, and some present winced under it. In many cases those who had agreed to pay from twenty to sixty dollars per acre for land were obliged to forfeit them after they had made one or two annual payments for them and were embittered by having to surrender them to others. In parts of Alabama this was specially the case. The immigrants were generally, however, of the better class of citizens from the Southern Atlantic States, and from Tennessee and Kentucky. They made fine citizens. In order to supply religious influence to meet the wants of this great rush of people to the Southwestern territory, Bishop McKendree, who attended the Tennessee Conference for 1819-20, announced early in the session that volunteers for Alabama, Mississippi, and Louisiana were wanted, and requested that candidates for work as itinerant preachers let the fact be known. Having resolved to devote my life to the cause of Christ, and to go wherever the church might think I could do most good—a principle I have never knowingly violated—I announced promptly that he might consider me a candidate for any place where, in his godly judgment, he might think I was most needed and could do most effective service. Ebenezer Hearn and Meredith Reneau said the same, and at the close of the session we were read out for different circuits in South Alabama.

This Conference, like that immediately preceding it, was held in Nashville Tenn., and began about Oct. 1, 1819. Nor did it differ materially in its tone and temper from it. If it did it was in its intensity of opposition to the bestowment of orders and offices upon slaveholders and those suspected of sympathizing with them. To such a degree was this carried that, however worthy and well qualified in other respects on trial or for ordination as local or traveling preachers a candidate might be, he was sure to be rejected if connected with the great evil. It mattered not though the State laws forbade it, or any other thing else rendered it improper or impracticable. The question was not whether slavery was an evil, but how to remedy it. Both admitted it was a social and political evil, and in many cases a moral evil, but the South generally claimed it was not evil per se, but an evil inherited, the only proper remedy for it being a gradual emancipation under the sanction of legislation, after due notice and preparation. So stringently was the opinion of the ultraists carried out by the majority at this session that a large and able minority felt constrained to sign a protest against their action, and forward it to the General Conference to meet the next year. They were T. L. Douglass, W. McMahon, Lewis Garrett, T. D. Porter, Barnabas McHenry, Wm. Stribling, John Johnson, Thos. Stringfield, Henry B. Bascom, Benjamin Edge, and others. Of course none of them were elected to the General Conference. One thing that served to indicate the unfortunate partisan feeling which pervaded the whole action of the majority in this affair, was that under their influence at the General Conference, May, 1820, the Tennessee Conference was divided so as to bring the Kentucky line to the Cumberland River at Nashville, and just below there across the river, and thence west; thus throwing several circuits and a large territory out of its proper relation. By this process the new Conference was larger and far more compact and desirable than the other, leaving the old Tennessee Conference a long, narrow strip, reaching from the Alleghany Mountains to the Mississippi River, with only four small districts; two of these lay east of the Cumberland Mountain. Of course all the delegates, except one or two who got presiding eldership, fell into the Conference. This kind of ecclesiastical gerrymandering appeared wrong to some of us, and I set myself against it henceforth. The result, however, was, we had peace afterward.

At the close of the session I was read out for Tuscaloosa. It was a mission work, including twenty-eight appointments in the form of the figure 8, the village of Tuscaloosa being the intersecting point. It covered an immense territory; starting from Tuscaloosa, it went north; thence west across the Black Warrior, and Northfork; thence between Columbus and Tuscaloosa, curving round to Tuscaloosa; then south by Savannah and Erie, toward Demopolis, Greensboro, and Marion to Cahawba, across the Alabama River to Walker's on Cedar Creek; thence recrossing the Alabama River at Selma; then north and west, crossing Cahawba River, and along the lower part of Jone's Valley, by Dudley Hargrove's and back to Tuscaloosa—a circuit of over 325 miles. Thos. D. Porter was again my presiding elder, to whose Christian and gentlemanly character and bearing I here gladly bear my testimony after several years of intimate acquaintance. It was the year immediately before his marriage. We were companions, traveled, preached and often slept together; I think I knew him thoroughly, and that he was a pure and noble man. Such I believe he will be found when the "Judge" shall come. From this Conference W. McMahon and R. H. Brown were sent to my last year's circuit; H. B. Bascom to Louisville, Ky.; T. Stringfield to Limestone; while E. Hearn and Meredith Reneau were, like me, sent to the Alabama mission-field.

This world is full of sorrow. There are only a few hearts that do not ache at times. Where you seem to be passing through society which is blithesome and all joyous, if you knew the secrets which often stir in the depths of human souls, you would find untold and unforgotten sorrows which have been slightly healed or comforted, but have left their traces forever.

There is no pen that can reckon up the number of hearts and lives that have been abandoned to despondency and to shame as the heavy pressures of powerful sorrow have come upon them while none have afforded consolation or sympathy. Many a young man and woman bereaved and left alone has gone to the world for consolation and found none. They have sought diligently there, and then plunged into shame and sin, with their natures now hardened by that which should have made them better.

Religion alone contains true consolation. It is the one balm for the sorrow-stricken heart. It is the oil of healing to the bruised spirit. It is the one sweet song of music for the ear of the mourner. It is the only star of hope for the lonely pilgrim whose comrades lie dead in the dust. Other things there may be to which the heart may be directed, but they are all but as the noise of dancing to the soft strains of heavenly music falling on hearts of deep anguish.

There is something in the very thought of the existence of a blessed God to whom we are sweetly reconciled by the death of his Son that gives us consolation. If he is God he must be our Father; if he is our Father, tender, powerful, and loving, then we have strong consolation who have laid hold of the help set before us. We do not know, we can not see, we cannot at first even feel that it is real, then faith takes hold of Father's hand. Our Father knows what is best. How full of consolation!

We present Christ in his full and blessed saving power: we offer him with his covenant of eternal life to all who believe on him as the one great consolation to all sorrow and grief. Long ago, and now, and always, he himself was, and is, and eternally shall be, our unfailing and inexhaustible comfort. He bore our sorrows and carried our griefs.—Itol. Telescope.

THE FIELD IS THE WORLD.—Whenever we make an appeal in behalf of the heathen, it is constantly urged that there are enough of heathen at home, that there is enough of work to be done at home, and why roam to more distant lands? I strongly suspect that those who are most clamorous in advancing this plea are just the very men who do little either for heathen at home or at a distance. At all events it is a plea far more worthy of a heathen than a Christian. It was not thus that the apostles argued. If it were, they would never have crossed the walls of Jerusalem. There they would have remained contending with the unbelieving Jews till caught by the flames that reduced to ashes the city of their fathers; and if we act on such a plea we may be charged with despising the example of the apostles and be found loitering at home till overtaken by the flames of the final conflagration. "The field is the world," and the more we are like God, the more our nature is assimilated to the divine, the more nearly will we view the world as God has done. "True friendship," it has been said, "has no localities." And so it is with the love of God in Christ. The sacrifice on Calvary was designed to embrace the globe in its amplitude. Let us view the subject as God views it, let us view it as denizens of the universe, and we shall not be bounded in our efforts of philanthropy short of the North or South Pole. Wherever there is a human being there must our sympathies extend. —Dr. Duff.

MISSIONARY.

—The Methodist mission in Foh-Chau is blessed with a remarkable revival. The Rev. Sia Sok Ong, presiding elder, and the native preacher are carrying on the meetings. Sia Sok Ong is a man of power and influence and is developing, we are told in the slips furnished from the mission rooms, into "a thorough-going American revivalist." He preaches every evening, closing his sermon by inviting those who are decided to be Christians to come forward. The missionaries are present to help. On one occasion twelve persons came forward; one after another, and three of the boarding-school girls besides, who are from Christian families. The theme of Sia Sok Ong's sermon on a certain Sunday morning was: "Christ the Living Bread sent down from heaven." He is the manna, the food for a famishing world. China's spiritual condition was illustrated by the horrors of the North China famine, when men ate such uneatable things. Starving China, he said, was eating, worshiping the dead men of the past; but now that Christ, the living bread, the satisfying portion has come, who would longer eat the uneatable things of the past? "It was a wonderful sermon," says a correspondent, "and strangely moved the people." A notable part of this work is the interest taken in it by Mr. Ahok, the liberal Chinaman who has purchased the bank building for the Methodist Anglo-Chinese College. He is a man of large business and brings from twenty to thirty of his porters, clerks, and servants to church regularly. Twelve of the college students have united with the church, only four of whom have Christian parents. Indeed, only a few remain undecided. Mr. Ohlinger writes: "I believe, if we had three hundred students now, the majority of them would yield to the power of the Word at this time. The most hardened, as well as some of our newest accessions, seem unable to resist the mysterious influence." This movement has naturally had a good spiritual effect upon the theological students. The revival efforts are not confined to Foh-Chau alone, but extend throughout the whole Foh-Chau district.—New York Independent.

—After his trip down the west coast of South America, Bishop Harris sailed from Valparaiso (Chili) in the Liverpool steamer Britannia. Passing through the Straits of Magellan and up the coast of Patagonia he reached Montevideo (the headquarters of our South-east South American mission) on January 16. Everybody was pleased with him, and his first impressions of South-east South America seemed very favorable. This Episcopal visit to that distant mission will mark an epoch in its history, as it has only been visited once before, and then but top briefly, by Bishop Foster, nine years ago.—Central Christian Advocate.

—Heathenism is being slowly overcome in the New Hebrides. A chief on Tongoa Island recently arrayed himself in a tin red coat, and, with a few companions, he walked to Pele, the chief village in the enemy's land. Going to the public square, he said: "Here I am, come to you to-day, armed with this hymn-book. Shoot me, if you will." He gave his fine coat to the chief, his enemy, and proceeded to preach to the people, who grounded their arms and listened to him.

—During the past eight years, which will measure the time of actual service of the Protestant missions in Japan, the work has been so far advanced that at present there are one hundred and sixty missionaries and fifty churches, with a total membership of 8,000. There are also schools, dispensaries, colleges and publishing-houses which circulate the Scripture and religious reading in all parts of the empire.

—The annual report of the Mahrattah mission has just come to hand, on the whole a very encouraging pamphlet. Self-support is being vigorously entered upon by many of the churches.—the Ahmednuggar and Kalgan Churches wholly so, the latter now for the first time. More recently Mr. Fairbanks says, "It seems as if this were to be a year of the right hand of the most high."

—So far the various Woman's Boards of Missions connected with the Presbyterian Church which have held their annual meetings report a total of receipts reaching nearly a quarter of a million of dollars. There are those who object to woman's work in the church even in this direction, but even they might find a reason for waiving their objections in the face of such magnificent results.—Christian at Work.

—During the Southern Baptist Convention this year at Columbus, Miss., it was stated that during the fourteen years succeeding the war—considered in the South as years of depression and poverty—the receipts of the Home Mission Board exceeded the contributions of the fourteen years preceding by over $71,000.

—Rev. Dr. Cuyler in a recent letter gave a glowing account of his visit to Athens. He took special care to mention the mission of the Southern Presbyterian Church in that classic city, with which the Rev. T. R. Samson is connected. The prospects of the mission are brightening, as tranquility is being restored in Greece.

—The Rev. Thomas Boswick has arrived at Brisbane, and reports that four teachers, with their families, connected with the London Missionary Society, had been massacred by the natives in New Guinea, without any provocation; and that consequently all the teachers employed in outlying districts have been collected at Port Moresby.

The orthodox priest who recently withdrew from his church in Bulgaria and became a Methodist, is selling books in Tirnova as a colporteur. The missionary writes: "We are very much pleased with him. He is active, wide-awake, and earnest, and has within an acute understanding. I believe he will make a first-class worker."

—Rev. C. W. Green, admitted to the Philadelphia Conference at the last session, and expecting to graduate at Drew Seminary at the coming commencement, is under appointment for the Central China mission, and expects to leave New York in June by the overland route.

—The successor to the late Dr. Punshon in the Wesleyan Missionary Secretariat is the Rev. G. W. Oliver. He had only a small majority over another prominent member of the Conference, and if there had been a full attendance of ministers present he would not have been elected.

—Rev. Wm. Arthur says of the work in Paris: "I have addressed more people in evangelistic services during the last four years than ever I saw collected together in religious services during all the previous years I have known Paris."

—The report of the treasurer of the Board of Foreign Missions of the United Presbyterian Church shows that the receipts of the past year from all sources were $65,467.97; the expenditures for the same period were $65,-305.61.

—The legacy of the late Mrs. Lapsley, of New Albany, Ind., has yielded $250,000 for the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions, and there will be about $50,000 more when the estate is fully settled.

—During the last forty years one hundred and twenty missionaries have fallen victims to the climate of the West Coast of Africa; but the converts to Christianity number over thirty thousand.

—It was reported, at the recent Evangelical Alliance Conference, that King John of Abyssinia had agreed to allow the circulation of the Bible in his kingdom, but was averse to Protestant missionaries settling there.

—While there were, last year, some seven converts to each of our preachers in the United States, there were some seventy converts to each of the missionaries in Asia.

—The French Methodist Conference held its session this year in Paris. It reports 168 chapels, 29 ministers, and 1,775 members.

—A native Paraguayan who speaks Guarani, has been stationed in the interior of Paraguay by our mission.

—There is only one lady missionary to eight hundred thousand Chinese women.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—An English publication, the Christian Age, has two articles, unsigned, criticising the Salvation Army. It is alleged that the reports of the Army are not satisfactory exhibits of the amount of income and the expenditures. Mr. Booth has stated that the income is £57,000 a year. The report states it at £50,000 in one place and £57,000 in another. Mr. Booth's son says it is about £30,000, besides £7,000 from outsiders. The critic says:

"There is no summary of the receipts as given under their separate heads, excluding loans, mortgages, sales, etc., in these accounts; but, as far as we understand them, the charitable contributions received at headquarters, excluding the 50, 57, or £60,000, which ever it is, amounted to £13,050 13s. 4d., all of which is accounted for, but only in jump sums, as, for instance, 'salaries and expenses of officers, including the traveling of the officers, etc.' No man's salary, no man's expenses are here detailed. There seems to be a serious loss in the printing department. It is stated as £331 9s. 11d.; but, as a grant from the book room stands on the other side, amounting to £261 2s. 9d., the actual loss would seem to be over £795."

It is pointed out that all the property of the army is held by its "General," Mr. Booth, who is sole trustee. Another complaint is that women are permitted to preside at the Lord's Supper. He concludes thus:

"The Wesleyan Methodist body has been much disturbed by the action of its president and others commending the appeal of Mr. Booth for money to purchase a large building, as the permanent headquarters of the army. Deep regret has been expressed even by some whose names are appended to that recommendation at their hasty and ill-considered action. Some who have never supported their own Christian ordinances or their own home missionary efforts are seen figuring as large supporters of this movement. They exercise their Christian liberty, if not strict fairness. There are hot and excited party feelings respecting the whole affair on every hand. May there not be expected out of all this some sad consequences, if Christian men will not calmly weigh the alleged necessity for this movement, its actual form, the predominance of one man and one woman and their family in it, and its probable influence on the future of the Church of God in these realms? Some of the wisest and best of the Christian workers of the land have written expressing their dread of the reaction which they are sure will set in before long."—New York Independent.

—A Congress, under the auspices of the Church and State Separation Society, has been held in Paris, Victor Hugo, Louis Blanc, and Gen. Garibaldi being honorary presidents. The duties of chairman were performed by M. Beauquier, deputy for Doubs. A resolution was sent to Garibaldi, at Palermo, saluting the "honorary president," deploring the old enmity fomented by the Papacy, and affirming the necessity for the friendship of France and Italy, on a basis of fraternal equality. Speeches are said to have been delivered "with varying degrees of violence against the church, the Concordat, and religion in general." Pastor Hirsch, a Protestant, suggested that the Catholic Church might become more powerful through persecution, whereupon he was denounced as a clerical in disguise.

—The Ritualistic Churches in London and vicinity are steadily increasing, as appears from the annual table of statistics. Some 37 churches out of 907 now use eucharist vestments, against 11 in 1869. Last year there were 35. Ten use incense, against 8 in 1869 and 11 last year; 59 have altar-lights, whereas 36 had them in 1874. Forty-five have candles on the altar, and in 270 against 71 in 1874 the "eastward position" is taken. The gain the past year in the number of churches is 20. Forty-six churches have daily communion and 476 have supplied choirs. Three hundred and nineteen have free seats.

THE REVISED VERSION.—It is stated that before the new version of the New Testament was ready for publication the orders received for it at the Oxford warehouse alone were in excess of a million, and that the orders which have arrived since that date are rapidly bringing the total up to two millions. In fact, on Thursday a notice to the trade was posted in the shop of Mr. Henry Frowde, to the effect that no orders from the trade could be supplied that were not booked prior to the end of April.

—The Preachers transferred from one Conference to another in the Methodist Episcopal Church during the last Conference year numbered only 280, or one in eighty-three of the effective list.

—The Memorial Church to the saintly and martyred missionary, Bishop Patterson, at Norfolk Island in the Pacific, was recently consecrated. It cost $25,000.

—There are 281,061 Baptists in Great Britian and 2,236,327 in the United States. The latter number includes an increase of 153, 293 made last year.

—Fifteen Indian youths from Capt. Pratt's school, Carlisle, Pa., was recently received into the Second Presbyterian church at that place.

—The Liberals in the Reformed Church in Basle have carried a decision that unbaptized children may be admitted to confirmation.

—The old Catholic College in Berne has only nine students, for whom there are five professors.

THE SELFISH OYSTER.

There once was a selfish old oyster,
Who lived like a monk in a cloister.
Safely housed in his shell,
Like the monk in his cell,
Though the bivalve's apartment was moister.

This lazy old party did stay.
Nor cared he to roam
Very far from his home,
For exertion, he thought, did not pay.

And you will be wondering, I think,
What he did for his victuals and drink.
Well, the oyster was sly,
And when young crabs came by,
He would catch them as quick as a wink.

Then in him the poor crabs had to stay,
Till in time they had melted away.
So the oyster got fatter,
And the crabs—but no matter,—
For crabs have no souls, people say.

"And oho!" said the oyster, said he:
"What a lucky old party I be!
Like a king in his pride
I wait here, and the tide
Every day brings my living to me."

But there came a grim star-fish, who spied,
Our friend lying flat on his side:
"For the greedy old sinner
I had just had his dinner;"
And now could not run had he tried.

With a spring to the oyster he came,
And he threw his five arms round the same.
He shut off his breath,
And he squeezed him to death.
Then he ate him, nor felt any shame.

The point of this story, my dears,
Just "as plain as a pikestaff" appears.
But please give attention,
While briefly I mention
The moral again, for your ears.

Don't be greedy and live but to eat,
Caring only for bread and for meat;
Nor selfishly dwell
All alone in your shell,—
Don't be oysters, in short, I repeat.

But you'll find it much better for you
To be kind, and unselfish, and true,
Then you'll not lack a friend
Your cause to defend,
When a star-fish rolls into your view.

MR. EDITOR: I saw in the ADVOCATE a good while ago that "Annie" and "Olive" wanted their little friends to help them raise money to build a church in Mexico. I will try to help them a little, and to get my friends around town to give something also.

It will be a small amount, but I hope it will be acceptable. I will send the amount sometime this summer.

My father is the pastor of the Methodist Church in this place.

We have a good Sunday-school, and father has charge of it since our superintendant left. I have a good Sunday-school teacher. She talks to us and explains the lessons to us after we have recited. HENRY LEWIS.

Curiosities of an Owl's Nest.

It is commonly known that owls have two or three sets of young in the course of a season; but as far as I can make out, after sitting upon the first egg or pair of eggs, and hatching the birds, no further effort in incubation is made. Directly after the owlets are out of the shell, the hen-bird lays one or two more beautiful white eggs, but does not set, devoting herself to feeding the insatiable little monsters she has started into life, and the warmth of their bodies hatches the next owlet. This one hatched, another egg is laid with the same result, that it is vivified by the young ones' warmth escapes from the shell, and once more an egg or two occupy the nest, so that in the same corner in a shallow downy spot may be seen an owlet three-parts grown, another half-grown, another a few hours old, and a couple of eggs—four stages in all; and, if inspected by day, the three youngsters will be seen huddled together in very good fellowship, one and all fast asleep, and the eggs in the coldest place outside. The sight is not pleasing, as may be supposed from the description of the young owls; but if the eye is offended, what is to be said of the nose? Take something in a bad state of putrefaction and arithmetically square it; the result will be an approach to the foul odor of a nest of owls in hot weather. The reason is not too far to seek, when it is borne in mind that the owl is a bird of prey; but all the same I have visited the nest earlier in the season, and found the place quite scentless, and that too at a time when ranged in a semicircle about the young were no less than twenty-two young rats and full-grown mice, so fresh that they must have been caught during the preceding night, the larder being supplemented by a couple of young rabbits. If, then, a pair of owls provide so many specimens of mischievous vermin in a night, they certainly earn the title of friends of man.

It may be argued that, inhabiting a pigeon-cote, the youngsters were the offspring of two or three pairs; but as far as I can make out, a single pair only occupy the cote from year to year, the young birds seeking a home elsewhere; and I may say for certain that the old birds do not come near their young and eggs by day, generally passing the time in some ivy-shaded tree while the sun is above the horizon, far away from the cote containing their sleeping babes. When fully fledged and nearly ready to fly, if the strong scent is risked and a visit paid, the birds start into something approaching to wakefulness, and, huddling up together, will stare and hiss at the intruder, ready to resist handling with beak and claw—and a clutch from a full-grown owl's set of claws is no light matter; for nature has endowed them with most powerful muscles, and an adaptability for their use that is most striking. When hunting for food, the owl glides along on silent wing beside some barn or stack, and woe betide the cowering mouse or rattling that is busy on the grain! As the owl passes over, down goes one leg, and four sharp claws have snatched the little quadruped from the ground, the four points seeming to slope toward a common center, so that escape is impossible. Every seizure is performed with the claws; the beak being reserved for dividing the animal when too large, and not degraded into forming an instrument for seizure or carriage of prey. I have had owls calmly seated upon my hand, but for a very short time, and I can not recommend ladies to try them for pets; for the sooner they are perched elsewhere the more pleasant it is for the skin, their claws being exquisitely sharp.—London Graphic.

Farmer Penn meant to have his wheat all cut by night, but the reapers he had hired did not come.

But one harvester, a small, spry chap, was hard at work on his own account. He enjoyed it and was not lonesome. He was not working for wages, nor reaping on shares, but all he gathered he took away for himself.

He wore a striped ulster, and yet did not seem too warm. He did not take it off and hang it on the fence, as the reapers would have taken off their coats.

Every now and then he sat down, folded his hands and gave a long whi-r-r! which was his way of laughing at the thought of his good fortune. His hands were paws, and his name was Mr. Chipmunk.

He lived close by, in a hollow tree, beyond the fence around the field. His house and his granary were one. Farmer Penn had never seen a reaping or threshing machine, but little Chipmunk knew a good deal about such things. At least, he carried in his head some very curious helps to harvesting.

That afternoon the two boys of the family, George and Gardner, went to the wheat field, and saw the squirrel helping himself. They hid behind a rock at the edge of the field and peeped out to watch him. The cunning little fellow was too busy to notice them.

How swift his motions were! No man could swing his arms like that. Chipmunk bent down the wheat, a stalk at one time. With his tooth he shelled the head clean of kernels in one moment. Not having any use for the straw, he left it where it was.

"What will he do for a bag to carry the wheat away in?" whispered Gardy. "Will he take the bag on his shoulder, as father does?"

"Don't you see his cheeks swell out?" asked George. "They are all the bags he needs."

"Oho!" whispered the little boy again, "isn't Chipmunk a funny chap? His cheeks look like yours when you had the mumps last winter, Georgy." Georgy could hardly help laughing aloud.

When Chipmunk had stuffed his cheeks with wheat, he ran away through the fence, with his tail over his back. The boys waited till, in a very short time, he came leaping back, saying Whi-r-r! His cheeks were empty, ready to be filled again.

"I'm sure," said the older of the brothers as they set off for home, "that he has as much as half a peck of father's wheat already stored away for winter. It won't make much difference, and a squirrel lives by eating, like you and me. If there were many such thieves around, though, we might have to trap or shoot them. The field will be reaped to-morrow, then Mr. Chipmunk will be obliged to finish his harvesting on nuts."—Our Little Ones.

Things Money Can't Do.

Some boys and girls have an idea that money can do almost anything, but this is a mistake. Money, it is true, can do a great deal, but it can not do everything. I could name you a thousand things it can not buy. It was meant for good, and it is a good thing to have, but all this depends on how it is used. If used wrongly, it is an injury, rather than a benefit. Beyond all doubt, however, there are many things better than it is, and which it can not purchase, no matter how much we may have of it.

If a man has not a good education, all his money will never buy it for him. He can scarcely ever make up for his early waste of opportunities. He may say, as I have heard of men saying: "I would give all I have if I had only had a good education and a well trained mind;" but he will say it in vain. His money alone can't obtain it.

Neither will wealth itself give a man, or a woman, good manners. Nothing, next to good morals and good health, is of more importance than easy, graceful, self-possessed manners. But they can't be had for more money.

A man who is what is called "shoddy," who has not taste and correct manners, will never buy them—though he would, no doubt, like it. They are not to be had in the market. They are nowhere for sale. You might as well try to buy sky, or cloud, or sunbeams.

Money can't purchase a good conscience. If a poor man, or a boy, or girl—any one has a clear conscience that gives off a tone like a sound bell when touched by the hammer, then be sure he is vastly richer than the millionaire who does not possess such a conscience. Good principles are better than gold. All the gold of Golconda couldn't buy them for a man who hasn't them already.

MORAL COURAGE.—In every school the difference is clearly marked between the boy who has moral courage, and the boy who is mere pulp. The one knows how to say "No." The other is so afraid of being thought "verdant" that he soon kills everything pure and fresh and manly in his character, and dries up into a premature hardness of heart.

Five lads were once gathered in a room at a boarding-school, and four of them engaged in a game of cards, which was expressly forbidden by the rules. One of the players was called out. The three said to the quiet lad who was busy at something else,

"Come take a hand with us. It is too bad to have the game broken up."

"That makes no difference," exclaimed the players. "We'll show you. Come along."

Now that was a turning point in that lad's life. He nobly said,

"My father does not wish me to play cards, and I will not disobey him."

That sentence settled the matter and settled his position among his associates. He was the boy who could say "No," and henceforth his victories were made easy and sure. I well remember the pressure brought to bear in a college upon every young man to join in a wine drink or to take a hand in some contraband amusement. Some timber got well seasoned. Some of the other sort got well rotted through with sensuality and vice. The Nebuchadnezzars at college have been Nebuchadnezzars ever since. The boy was father of the man.—Band of Hope.

FELIX R. HILL,
LINUS PARKER,
CHRISTIAN KEENER,
Sub-Committee.

From this time on, until the winter, our Southern Methodism will be specially active in revival work, in holding camp meetings and District Conferences. It will be a favorable time for the pastors and presiding elders to represent the ADVOCATE, to present its claims, and to urge upon the people the necessity of taking a church paper. Our list ought to be greatly increased during the active campaign now opened in every department of church work. We earnestly urge our old subscribers to renew, and appeal to the preachers and friends of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE to secure as many new subscribers as possible. We shall aim to improve the paper, but, in order to do this, the circulation must be sustained and enlarged.

The ADVOCATE will contain the proceedings of the General Conference, which opens its session at Nashville, Wednesday, May 3, one day before the date of this number. The editor leaves the hopper pretty well filled, and during his absence at Nashville will furnish a weekly letter on General Conference matters. The session of the General Conference will hardly extend beyond the twenty-fifth of the month. Some are looking for a shorter session, but, at furthest, we think three weeks will cover the limit. All important business can be done well in this time. It could probably be done in less time, but there should be no unseemly haste, and free and full discussion has its advantages. May the Head of the church preside over the deliberations, and direct to safe and useful conclusions.

The floods are receding, in some places rapidly, in other places slowly. To repair damages, and to plant a crop, will require much enterprise, and in many cases more capital than can be readily commanded. It is useless to advise our friends to plant food crops, and to aim chiefly to make bread and meat. The prices of provisions are enormously high, and may continue so for months to come. Our preachers have suffered with their flocks in the general devastation. We sincerely hope that they will not be permitted to suffer more than others, and that stewards will do their best to support them. The sections that have escaped the overflow generally have promise of excellent crops, and they must increase their collections for missions, and other connectional objects, or there will be embarrassing deficits. Let the more fortunate and favored churches bear this in mind in their contributions.

Our letter from Georgia, this week, tells of revivals of remarkable power. From our Northern exchanges we gather that the churches in that section have enjoyed times of refreshing, and that the number of conversions has been unprecedentedly large. We are longing to see the revival fire kindling and spreading throughout the country. It would gratify us especially to see Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana in a blaze. We wish to have our columns, from week to week, enriched with reports of numerous conversions, and of churches baptized with fire. Some years seem to be specially favored with the Spirit's power. The indications are that this is a revival year. The sound of the going is in the tops, and the time to advance and to conquer has come. Why should we not look for a general and powerful awakening, and for a harvest of souls at least five-fold greater than last year? It is not that we may glory in numbers, but because the people are perishing in their sins, that we should most earnestly work and pray for the revival of the work of God. The preaching should be to this end always, but particularly now. Let the preachers stir up the gift that is in them, and let every lover of Jesus strive together with them in prayer.

A Sunday or two ago, sermons on the observance of the Sabbath were delivered in several of our city pulpits. This was done at the instance of the Lord's Day League. We hope there will be still more preaching on the subject, and that there will be line upon line and precept upon precept.

We have now entered upon the season when some forms of Sabbath desecration are peculiarly prominent. These Sunday excursion trains are a great temptation, especially to the poor. The fare is merely nominal in comparison with regular rates, and Sunday is the only leisure day with many. Here is a test of Christian fidelity which we fear some professors of religion will not stand. In that far off good time, which we hope is coming, there will be no Sunday-mails; no Sunday excursions, and no open saloons or stores on the Sabbath. In the millennium, we confidently predict that the Sunday newspaper will be a thing of the past, and that every newspaper press will stop on Saturday, and be not again started until Monday. If Satan could only be bound for a thousand years, how goodness would grow in the world, and what blessed Sabbaths there would be! When he is bound Sunday observance, and prohibition of the liquor business, will be among the signs following.

As we have often said in these columns, so now: Let Christian people, the members of our Christian churches, keep the Sabbath holy themselves, and let the desecration of the Sabbath be treated as an immorality in the administration of church Discipline. And let the preachers be careful in this thing, that they do no unnecessary traveling on Sunday. A preacher may reach his appointment, or leave it, in such a way as to destroy the good of his preaching. The Sabbath is not a secondary matter. It is a part of the Decalogue; it is vital to the temporal and religious welfare. The world needs stricter and better examples, and more teaching on the subject.

Something to Encourage.

We refer to the declaration that God wills the salvation of all men. "Who will have all men to be saved, and to come unto the knowledge of the truth." This, at any rate, is the will of God concerning ourselves. He is for us in the endeavor to work out our own salvation. He is more earnestly desirous that we should be saved than we are ourselves. However deeply concerned the penitent sinner may be, the Father of mercies is still more deeply concerned. Before the prodigal came to himself the father's heart was yearning for the recovery and return of his son. There may be hindrances in the believer's way, apparently insurmountable obstructions in his path. He is weak, and the enemy is strong. In his darkest hour God has not forgotten him nor forsaken him. The heart of God is with him, and all the resources of an infinite love are engaged in his defence. God will have us to be saved. If our will be in harmony with his there can be no failure.

In reference to those who are very dear to us, we know what God wills concerning them. Parents may agonize for their children, but the Father of all has anticipated them. He goes along with them in their strong love, and in their consuming anxiety for the salvation of their offspring. The desire of parents, that their children may come unto the knowledge of the truth, is also the desire of God. While they are doing what they can to this end, God is also doing what he can. It is possible that his will may be frustrated by obstinate impenitence and unbelief, but we have the assurance that in the endeavor to save our children we are co-operating with infinite wisdom and love. A perfect and hearty co-operation is the condition which, in most cases, will insure success.

As we look out upon the world, in its widest aspects, we have the same cheering truth to strengthen our faith. God has passed by none; he is indifferent to none. He will have all men to be saved. To bring them to the knowledge of the truth is his great purpose, and the end of his plan of redeeming grace. We are to pray for all men, because God will have all men to be saved. If there were any obstructive purpose on his part it would be vain to pray. But the will of God is in harmony with the universal prayer. The broadest scope of evangelical enterprise can not go beyond the purpose of God in redemption. Christ died for all men, the Holy Spirit is given to all. The church is commanded to go into all the world and to preach the gospel to every creature.

All this is in accord with the thought of God. As he will have all men to be saved, prayer is to be made for all men, and Christian enterprise is to be characterized by the same wide and boundless benevolence. To aim at the conversion of the world is to plant ourselves upon the ground which God occupies, and it is to pitch our endeavors upon the same high plane of enlightened and self-sacrificing love. Whatever may have been the result in the past, or whatever it may be in the future, God will have all men to be saved; has desired it from the beginning. That all men are not saved can not be the fault of God; that many are not saved may be ours. The co-operation with the Divine purpose may not be complete. We may have narrower conceptions, and we may have limited our faith and our effort, and thus placed ourselves in discordant relations with the Divine plan. This may be the root of the mystery, and the reason, in a certain degree, why those whom God will have to be saved are not saved.

Our hope of saving any must be built upon the broad foundation of aiming to save all. Narrowness is spiritual death, because it is in conflict with God; a universal sweep of love and aim is life, because we are then in the movement of him who could not love without loving all. The life of the church, and the individual Christian life, are thus dependent upon this spirit of expansion. Without it we can not claim that God is fully with us. This is our encouragement, that in working abroad, and for the whole world, we place ourselves in perfect harmony with the Divine will. God is with the broad-minded and the large-hearted. He will have all men to be saved, and the church will prosper in its great mission just in proportion as it has the mind and heart of God. To a weak faith and to meager intelligence, the larger aim would seem to defeat all results. To attempt to save the world seems futile, while the endeavor to work a narrow field at home apparently promises most. The reverse of this, however, is true. And because God is with the liberal and enlarged soul. His Divine purpose, his love, the provisions of redemption, his preventing grace are in accord with nothing else, and with nothing less, than the deliverance of the race.

Working for the conversion of the world, we are cheered with the Master's presence, and in that presence is our hope of success. Working for less than this, that presence is forfeited, or, if not altogether forfeited, the highest gift of power is withheld. The gifts of tongues and of miraculous healing may never come back to us, but the gift of power doubtless would, if the church were imbued with the lofty purpose to bring the world to Christ. The missionary spirit is the inspiration which flows fresh and pure from the heart of God. It rises toward the source from which it comes, and is clothed with the beautiful garments of infinite light and power.

"Christian Cradlehood."

The book which bears the above title is the latest and, perhaps, the best production of a somewhat voluminous author. Contrary to what we should expect of one now well advanced in years, the writer gives us here not only about the best, but one among the briefest works of his prolific pen. The author seems to have collected the finest thoughts of a lifetime, and, having crystallized them into smaller forms and purer gems, to have strung them here as an ornament, about the neck of infancy, that mothers may admire and study them for all ages to come. Without pretending to be philosophic or scientific, he gives the world, in this little treatise, sound philosophy, and science of the most useful and practical kind. Appearing not to be theological, he teaches the very essence of all theology so far as it relates to man. His aim is to discover a more efficient method of applying the doctrines of the Bible to the race of man. He affirms that a large part of all preaching is wasted, because it is heard too late. "Church preaching alone," says he, "is a demonstrated failure." He holds that Christianity is applicable to humanity in all stages, and especially in its earliest stages. He insists on the great principle of obedience to proper authority as of fundamental importance to the welfare of States, communities, families and individuals, and urges its inculcation during the earliest periods of infancy. He believes that all children should be trained religiously, in the church, from their birth. It is usually easier to tell what ought to be done than how to do it. The author's criticisms upon parental discipline are generally striking, and sometimes severe. For instance: "A mother frequently tells her children fifty lies in a day." Whipping he repudiates. "Whipping children with a rod or other instrument of torture is a simple, cruel, unmitigated barbarity." He thinks parents deserve the punishment which they have allowed their children to grow into the need of. It is the duty of parents to uproot the seeds of sin in children by the time they have germinated, or before. His urgent suggestion to ministers to give more time and attention to the smaller children of their charges is both important and timely. Too much stress could scarcely be laid upon that point.

Though there are repetitions in the book, they are perhaps not too frequent for the character of the subject and the object of the book. Moral didactics must ever be repetitious. The Bible abounds with repetitions. As to our duties, we all need line upon line, precept upon precept. To say that this book is capable of benefitting every mother and father, and through them all children, is to assign it a place of rare usefulness among the teeming issues of the press. It is especially an excellent manual for mothers, as its doctrines are most applicable at an age when fathers have but little to do with children.

Whatever may be thought of this book, its subject is one whose transcendant importance none can question. We must improve our methods of Christianizing mankind, or fail altogether to Christianize them. The peculiar modes of proclaiming and receiving the gospel, which have been more or less common for the last hundred years, have passed away, not to return. To many during that period the gospel was new, startling and overwhelming. Now it is not so. Thousands in our day are well-nigh incurably hardened in their sins before they are out of their teens. The gospel has proven to them a savor of death unto death by their willful and persistent rejection of it. The church that fails to train up her children in the belief of her doctrines, and in the practice of her worship, must ere long cease to be a church at all. Romanists understand this, and Protestants might learn a lesson from them on this point. Public schools can teach no religion; Sunday-schools are inadequate; God has appointed parents to do this work. The transmission of godliness from parent to child is a command of God and a law of Providence. "And ye shall teach them diligently to your children" has been the law from the beginning.

A very high authority has said: "It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord." It is good, not to the Lord, but to the giver of thanks. It is good, inasmuch as it recognizes that God is the Author of all good and the Giver of all good things. It is good, because there is in it a recognition of the moral obligation of thanksgiving. It is good, because it is the actual performance of a recognized duty. It is good, because it is an acknowledgment that blessings have been received. It is good, because it shows a disposition to accept the events of Providence as intended for our benefit. It is good, because it brings us into direct communication with heaven, and is pleasing to our Father above, and causes him to turn his loving eye upon his children. It is good, because it affords an opportunity to turn away from the burdensome cares of life, and leave its harrassing business, while we seek the holy quiet of the Divine presence.

The duty of thanksgiving to God is very plain, and the good resulting from thanksgiving to God is very great. The question then is: Where shall we begin? For what shall we give thanks? The answer of the apostle is: "For all things." How broad that appears to be. What, shall we really be thankful for everything? No; he does not say "for everything give thanks," but "for all things give thanks." When he uses the expression, "everything" in regard to thanksgiving, his injunction is: "In everything give thanks." This is not a "distinction without a difference." We are told by the apostle that all things are working together for good to the Christian, and he can therefore give thanks "for all things," taken together, when perhaps he could not be thankful for everything separately. If we take things apart from each other, and look at each separately, we shall not find a great deal to be thankful for, it may be. When we do this we take things out of their proper relations, and by this we divest them of their real meaning, and of course lessen their true value. The estimate we put upon anything depends largely upon its known relations to other things. It is only as we view things in the relations which they sustain to other things that we can have any sort of appreciation of their significance. Take a steam engine to pieces, and its cylinders and rods and pistons and wheels and valves are worth just about the weight of old iron. Put it together properly, and you have one of the finest triumphs of inventive genius. So, if you take this life of ours to pieces, and try to find in these separate pieces something to be thankful for, you will very often be disappointed, and at these times of disappointment you will be ready to ask the question of infidelity, "Is life worth living?" and you will be as miserable as any cynic that ever lived. Take your troubles and pains and cares and sickness and sorrows apart from your pleasures and joys and ease and health and blessings, and brood over them, and sigh over them, and tell your lugubrious tales of woe into the ears of everybody you meet, and sadness will enthrone itself upon your countenance, and melancholy take up its abode in your soul, and your life will be a somber caricature of the religion of peace and joy. But take the troubles and blessings, the pains and pleasures, the sorrows and joys, the cares and ease, the sickness and health, and these things, taken together, make life, and life is the grandest gift of God, because it contains and includes every other gift. In the tiny bud is packed the full bloom, fragrant rose. So life is packed full of all possible good. It takes all possible things to make life as it is. Everything is related, in some way, to every other thing, and these related things constitute life. Hence we see how we can "for all things give thanks."

The next question is: When shall we "give thanks for all things?" The apostle answers with emphasis: "Giving thanks always for all things." If all things are working together for our good this must be a continuous working, and at any point of time we may lift our hearts and voices, and give thanks to God for all things. The whole material and intellectual and moral universe, all things visible and invisible, are in movement which will result in the greatest amount of good to those who love the Lord. "Oh! that men would praise the Lord for his goodness, and for his wonderful works toward the children of men." C.

Letter from Georgia.

That was a wise exhortation, Mr. Editor, with which you closed your article on the General Conference. While the machinery must be kept in order, and relieved, as far as possible, from all friction, yet the great work of the church is the conversion of the souls of men, through preaching of the word. A railroad locomotive, by the loss of a single bolt, may be broken down, but the church, with three-fourths of her present machinery gone, if anointed with the Holy Ghost, can run to the ends of the earth. While there has been great interest among all classes of our people in the approaching session of our quadrennial Conference, it has neither absorbed their attention nor diverted them from the great work of soul-saving. Scarcely, in my recollection, has there been so many revivals so early in the year. The fires are burning now in well-nigh every direction throughout our Conference. Each week the reports are coming, from the mountain and middle circuits, from the villages and towns and cities, of how the Holy Spirit is being poured out upon the people. There are ten meetings of power now in progress in Atlanta, so a friend writes me; that at Trinity, under the direction of the pastor, Rev. T. R. Kendall, leading all the rest in interest and the scope of its influence. Oxford, the seat of Emory College, has just had a wonderful season of visitation. It is a rare thing that a boy graduates from Emory without having first given his heart to Christ. There are meetings of great interest now going on at Marietta, Griffin, Milledgeville and Augusta. In the latter place I understand that the manifestations have been of a remarkable character. And, while others are rejoicing, I also am filled with the spirit of praise and thanksgiving for the blessing of God on my own charge. Three weeks ago we began our meeting, with services in the open air, upon which hundreds attended. Our church has not furnished sitting room for our congregations during the week, and on Sundays we have had no room for altar work on account of the crowds. The Lord has been present with power, and the entire community aroused. Scores professed conversion, a number of them members of the church. We closed last Sunday night with thirty additions, upon profession, and many others to follow, besides those who will go to other churches. Some of those who have joined are among our leading citizens. There has been nothing wild or unhealthy. The community is left under a deep religious influence, flowing out from the church, and which will be kept up. We have taken a step higher, by which we hope to go higher still. Is there anything more delightful in this world than the joy which flows into a preacher's heart as he sees the people whom he loves, and among whom he labors, coming home to God? These gracious manifestations, in so many places, we believe are but the beginning of what the Lord is going to do for us this year. I suppose that there have been nearly, if not quite, one thousand conversions in the North Georgia Conference since the first of January. But the spirit of expectation seems to be universal. Beyond all question, the church will need the power which comes from this mighty baptism. We have before us the bitterest political campaign which Georgia has known since the war. Into it will come the accumulations of all the personalities which have disgraced, of late years, the political history of our State. Without special grace, the church in many places will be torn asunder, and hundreds of our members fall away into an apostacy that may prove to be final.

The small-pox has made its appearance among us. Twenty well-defined cases are in Atlanta, with additions almost every day. There are a few other cases scattered about the country. The only case here proved fatal yesterday, but the victim, before he reached this place passed through three large plantations, coming in close contact with at least a hundred people. If there are new developments they are to be looked for in the next two or three days.

The rumor of a million for educational purposes, which has been afloat in this section for some time and which many had hoped was for our church schools, has found its fulfillment in Mr. Slater's gift for the colored people. It is indeed munificent, and must prove a great blessing to the negro, but the complexion of the Board of Trust is a little different from what his best friends in the South would have desired.

W. W. WADSWORTH.

NEWNAN, GA., April 25, 1882.

"In the Air."

What is in the air? Nothing but some bacteria—always there—and we know how they get there—and we know how to prevent their pathological development. The simplicity of certain Northern men, and a few sympathizers in the South, is marvelous. "In the air," indeed! "Organic union of the two Methodisms, North and South." Do the foregoing figures intimate that we need organic union? We think we can stand alone. A venerable man—not a minister—seeing some of those things about organic union "in the air"—assures us that if so preposterous a measure were adopted he would seek another communion. A prominent minister to whom it was mentioned said the same thing. It is not necessary that I should say it here, as I have said it in the current number of the Quarterly Review, and oftimes before. Do men think we are crazy? Are we so daft as to surrender our autonomy to be the fag-end of an overgrown, conglomerate connection, which would laugh at our protest against the weakening of our Episcopacy, the unscriptural and unmethodistic addition to the terms of communion, and the prescription of what is absurdly ycleped "unfermented wine"—in the Lord's Supper? I ask again, Do men think we are crazy?

I have some right to speak on the subject, and some of my friends think it is my duty to speak. Well, I have no axe to grind, no favors to ask, no frowns to fear. I stand where I have stood from the beginning. I have been among the foremost to promote fraternity; the record shows it. I was on the same platform with Dr. Olin, with whom I had a pleasant interview at one of the New York Conferences, pending the church suit. He said truly, we were shut up to separation; and he who thinks the abolition of slavery alters the case is prodigiously mistaken. This we have shown so often that we need not dwell upon it now. We wish our Northern brethren all possible success; we rejoice especially in their missionary prosperity; we say, in the language of the text on which we heard Dr. Robert Newton preach his great sermon before our General Conference in Baltimore in 1840: "The Lord God of your fathers make you a thousand times so many more as ye are, and bless you." But we want no entangling alliances with you, and will never submit to be governed by you.

Let a religious regard be paid to the Cape May settlement, "the true inwardness" of which, we were told by members of the commission, was in keeping with the Plan of Separation.

It is perhaps useless to suggest to certain secular editors, North and South, that they "meddle with things too high for them" when they volunteer their counsels and their predictions. The bacteria which they put "in the air" will have no development. When we need their valuable services we will call them in—till then they may spare their pragmatism.—Dr. T. O. Summers, in Nashville Christian Advocate.

"He or She."

Under the above title, Prof. C. M. Mead contributes to the New York Independent, an article which we commend to all to whom it may apply. Pro. Mead says:

May I be allowed to speak of a matter which properly belongs to a professor of sacred rhetoric? There has grown up of late years a most absurd and reprehensible habit among our younger clergymen of pretending the sex distinction in their sermons and prayers. Nothing is more common than to hear such petitions offered as that "we may be faithful men and women." The words "manly" and "manhood" are seldom used without being coupled with "womanly" and "womanhood." And most of all, in general statements, the masculine pronoun "he" is thought to be as uncomfortable as unmated Adam, until it is supplemented with a "she"—e. g., we hear such expressions as this: "Any of my hearers, whoever he or she may be." Recently I heard a minister speak of what his hearers used to do "in their boyhood and girlhood."

Now, if there were any rhetorical necessity for such clumsiness of language, it would have to be tolerated; but there is none. It may be unfortunate that the one word "man" has to serve the double purpose of denoting both a human being and a male adult; but it does serve that double purpose. It is sufficient, in order to express the truth of human mortality, to say: "All men are mortal." To say "All men and women are mortal" would not help matters and would even suggest that children are excepted. Equally true is it that in general propositions the masculine pronoun is properly used to cover both sexes. When it is said, "If any man will do his will he shall know of the doctrine," everybody understands the statement to cover mankind in general. But the ministers to whom I refer, if they were to express the truth in their own style, would have thought it necessary to add a "woman" and a "she" to make the sense complete.

Now, what possible reason can there be for this unnecessary and indelicate protrusion of the quality of sex? No rhetorical advantage is gained. The truths of the gospel are the same to both sexes. In Christ there is neither male nor female. Wherever there is any need of referring to the distinction, of course, it should be done, just as, when there is need of particularizing the parts of the body, it should be done. But it would not improve Paul's injunction, "Glorify God in your body," to make it read "Glorify God in your head, neck, limbs, and bowels." And so there is no rhetorical or other gain; but, rather, a great loss in lumbering language with these allusions to the distinction of sex, when the only thing accomplished is to draw the attention of the hearers away from the subject of the discourse to the fact that the preacher has a lively consciousness that the distinction exists.

Let us see how this practice would work when applied to some biblical passage, say Gal. vi, 1—7: "Brethren and sisters, if a man or woman be overtaken in a fault, ye which are spiritual restore him or her in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself lest thou also be tempted. Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfill the law of Christ. For, if a man or woman think himself or herself to be something, when he or she is nothing, he or she deceiveth himself or herself; but let every man or woman prove his or her own work, and then shall he or she have rejoicing in himself or herself alone, and not in another. For every man or woman shall bear his or her own burden. Let him or her that is taught in the word communicate unto him or her that teacheth in all good things. Be not deceived. God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man or woman soweth that shall he or she also reap."

Does any one want the revised Bible to read after this fashion? If not, why preach after this fashion?

Death of Mrs. W. T. J. Sullivan.

Our hearts are saddened by the death of Sister Sullivan, wife of our brother, Dr. W. T. J. Sullivan. She died during the forenoon of to-day, after having long been the subject of feeble health and bodily suffering. For some weeks past she had been confined to her room and bed. Yesterday evening, from a condition of comparative hopefulness, as to the final result, she changed rapidly for the worse, and it soon became apparent that the end was nigh. The night passed in anxious vigils on the part of her husband, faithful daughter and other weeping friends, who watched, expecting every hour to be the last. When the morning dawned and the light again shone through her chamber windows, she seemed to arouse as from a long and deathly slumber, opened her eyes intelligently, looked at her friends and knew them. On mention of her son, absent at school, she asked with eager interest: "Is my boy here?" She gave comforting assurance of her preparation for death, expression to her hope of reunion with loved ones in heaven. "Yes, I'll meet them all in heaven." Long a subject of affliction, she knew how to sympathize with the sufferings of others. During the recent severe sickness in the writers family, where wife and five children were prostrate with lingering fever, Sister Sullivan, notwithstanding her own delicate health and the inclement weather, found her way to the bed side of the sick, and by gentle ministrations, such as she well knew how to supply, she beguiled away their sufferings. Gentleness was in her heart, and the law of kindness on her lips. Her memory is embalmed in our hearts by deeds of kindness. An appropriate memoir will doubtless, soon be furnished for publication.

Death of Leroy M. Lee, D. D.

The Richmond Christian Advocate announcing the death of this eminent and venerable minister, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, says:

Dr. Lee died at his home, in Ashland, Va., on Friday afternoon, the twentieth instant, at a quarter to four o'clock. For years he had been battling with disease, which, day by day, was sapping his strength and life. Lately it weakened him by rapid and torturing attacks. He remained night and day in his chair, wakened from short sleep by severe paroxysms. In the intervals he joined in genial and mellow converse, or attempted to use his pen on some paper for the press or note to a friend.

He could not write at a table. He was wishing to contribute a Semi-Centennial article to the Advocate, and especially to prepare a letter for the children's department. We sent him from this office a movable desk, that could be fastened to his chair and brought to any angle and distance.

Alas! his hour had come. The enemy was in the citadel. A rigor seized him. He recognized the icy touch of death, and called to his friends to lift him to his bed, exclaiming: "My work is done!" As his head sank on the pillow he died.

On Sabbath, at half-past two, his body, borne in the arms of his brethren of the ministry whom he loved so well, was placed before the chancel of the old Centenary church. The iron casket bloomed with a wealth of flowers, which churches, students, and friends heaped up. There were crowns wrought of blossoms. And above the tired old man ran in rich letters of pure and perfumed petals, "Rest."

Had he lived until next Monday Leroy Madison Lee, D. D., would have been seventy-four years old. He was born in Petersburg, April 30, 1808.

His paternal grandparents were among the first in this State to unite with the Methodist societies, having [illegible] and received into the [illegible] in 1772, by the pioneer of Methodism in Virginia and the South, Rev. Robert Williams, one of the first Wesleyan missionaries to America.

On Sunday night, April 1, 1827, a little more than fifty-five years ago, Dr. Lee was converted in his native town under the ministry of the late William A. Smith, D. D. On the following Sabbath, April 8, he was received into the church. In the month of November of the same year (having meanwhile filled the positions of class-leader and local preacher) he was recommended by the Quarterly Conference under the presidency of Hezekiah G. Leigh, as a suitable person to be received into the traveling connection; and at the session of the Virginia Conference, held in Raleigh, North Carolina, in February, 1828, (Bishop Soule presiding) while not yet twenty years of age, he was admitted on trial. He was received into full connection, and ordained deacon in this city by Bishop Soule in 1830; and was ordained elder in Norfolk, Va., by Bishop Hedding in 1832.

Of the twenty-two young men admitted into the Conference with him only one survives, namely, Rev. S. T. Moorman. His first appointment was Campbell circuit as junior preacher. He was next sent as preacher in charge to Washington and Plymouth, N. C.; then to Newbern, N. C.; then he was put in charge of Prince Edward circuit; then of Brunswick circuit; was next stationed in Elizabeth city, N. C.; then in Portsmouth, Va.; and from there he was appointed, in February, 1835, to Trinity station in this city. About four months after he had entered upon his work here the church edifice was destroyed by fire, but was soon rebuilt. In February, 1836, he was chosen editor of the Conference paper, at that time published under the name of Christian Sentinel. He edited the Sentinel one year, when failing health caused his resignation. In 1839 he resumed editorial control of the paper—the name of which had been changed to Richmond Christian Advocate—and remained editor until 1858, when he retired and entered the pastoral work, and became presiding elder of the Norfolk district.

A representative of the Richmond Dispatch interviewed several ministers in Richmond, Va., on the subject of the German movement in that city against a Sunday law. Among others, our friend, Rev. John Hannon, of Park Place, gives his views in the following characteristic style:

Germany gave us the Protestant Sabbath when she gave us the Reformation. We can not even afford to let Germany take it away. The "Sunday liquor-law" is a bloom upon the tree which Martin Luther planted. For our German citizens to pluck this bloom would not destroy the tree, but it would rob us of the fruit of that tree. The public conscience has been bribed into silence too long. "Ice houses" on a hot day—confectionary stores for young people of different sexes—these are the outposts of the forces moving against our Protestant Sabbath. The smoke of a Sunday cigar-store seems a small matter, but these cigars have been but the "smoke-stacks" of a fleet of "ideas" manned with such principles as these German ideas—nations which are invading our homes and our land.

Since that consecrated thunderbolt Luther flashed upon the world the German mind has been wonderfully free of cant. This movement of our German citizens is God saying, American, "heal thyself."

We need not go to the Bible for proofs of the necessity of observing the Sabbath. Carefully-prepared statistics, I am told, echo the injunctions of the Bible. Those waters that are not fished in on Sunday yield, it is said, most in the year. That rolling stock lasts longest which does not run on Sunday. The bonds of those cities where Sunday is observed outsell others in the market. So in Wall street, in railroad iron, and in the waves of the sea, the Divine finger has writ as truly as upon the "Table of Stone" "Remember the Sabbath-day to keep it holy."

Let America and let all the peoples say Amen!

In the same paper we find the following report of the position of a Roman Catholic Bishop, Right Rev. Bishop J. J. Keane. It is quoted from the Daily Dispatch of March 8, 1882:

Right Rev. Bishop J. J. Keane, who is an earnest advocate of the cause of temperance, and who is untiring in exhorting those under his care against the selling or buying of liquor on Sunday, had the following circular read from the pulpits of the different Catholic Churches on Sunday last:

"At the beginning of this holy season of Lent I again appeal to all Catholics engaged in the liquor business, and beg of them, for the love of our Lord Jesus Christ, not to sell liquor on Sunday. This practice, which deserves the severest condemnation at any time, is especially unworthy of this holy time of penance and prayer. It is my earnest hope that none will refuse what I ask of them for the love of our crucified Saviour.

"I also most earnestly entreat and exhort all Catholics never to buy liquor on Sunday, nor to enter any place where it is sold on that day.

"May God's abundant blessings attend all who comply with these admonitions.

"JOHN J. KEANE,
"Bishop of Richmond."

Rev. J. W. Chambers, writing from Clinton, La., April 25, 1882, says: "On my way home from Conference, I promised you twenty new subscribers. I have sent you thirteen, and I think I will get the others before the end of the year. My work is taking a move upward. I trust that God will help us to come out far better this year than last. Congregations serious, collections good. The missionary assessment will be met in full on this work.

Bishop Bowman, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, has been for some time seriously ill at his home in St. Louis. We are glad to learn that he is improving. The Central Christian Advocate, of April 26, says:

The condition of Bishop Bowman during the past week has, on the whole, been more comfortable, and there appear good grounds for saying that the improvement is permanent. But we are not yet relieved from anxiety, although much more hopeful. We have reason to expect that before another week passes he may be declared convalescent.

—Judge Wm. B. Spencer, a well known citizen of Louisiana, and recently an associate justice of the Supreme Court of Louisiana, died at Cordova, Mexico, Saturday, April 29. Judge Spencer was an upright and able judge, a good and successful lawyer, and a highly esteemed and valuable citizen. His death will be universally deplored. We tender to the sorrowing wife and children our sincere sympathy in their great bereavement.

—A communication which we publish this week announces that Mrs. Sullivan, wife of Rev. W. T. J. Sullivan, D. D., died at Starkville, Miss., April 25. This will be sad news to the many friends of Sister Sullivan, and a deeply afflictive blow to Prof. Sullivan. We tender to him and all the bereaved ones our sincere sympathy.

Rev. T. J. Hough, writing from Opelousas, La., April 25, 1882, says: "My church is decidedly on rising grounds. I have received twenty-one members this year, and have others to join. Three Roman Catholics have joined, a most excellent gentleman, a Romanist by birth and education joined last Sunday, and will make us a useful member. I am still building and beautifying the parsonage. Our class and prayer meetings are good, and the spirituality is improving.

Temperance agitation throughout the West, says the Standard, was probably never more intense or wide spread. What has recently been done in Ohio is well known. In Indiana temperance people are, for the time at least, overlooking party affiliations in defense of proposed anti-liquor enactments. Indianapolis was the scene of a large and enthusiastic state temperance gathering last week. The Good Templars of Wisconsin have sent to Washington a vigorous protest against the Logan Whisky-Education bill. Kansas is preparing to give an overwhelming reaffirmation to its prohibitory vote of '80. Nebraska is making arrangements for an uncompromising campaign against the traffic. Iowa will contend for the adoption of its temperance amendment to the constitution as for life. And we doubt if other Western States are far behind.

Information, says the St. Louis Christian Advocate, of April 26, has just been received of the death of Rev. Jesse Faubion, of the Missouri Conference. He died in great peace on the fourteenth instant.

Also of the death of Rev. A. L. Davis, of the Illinois Conference, who died in peace on the twentieth instant, aged seventy years.

Rev. J. J. Billingsley, writing from Mansfield, La., April 22, 1882, says: "I am working ahead with all my might, relying on the Lord of Hosts for help. Mansfield Female College is more successful than it has been for years. We are looking forward to the next session of the Louisiana Annual Conference with much joy.

Joseph Cook is making a sensation in Bombay. In five lectures he has drawn the whole native city around him until the largest hall could be filled ten times over. The Free Church Monthly (Scotland) says: "Our Bombay brethren, writing independently, declares that no such effect has ever before been produced by a public speaker in India, and anticipate much good fruit from this defence and exposition of Christ's teaching in the face of the false philosophies and faiths of the East. Mr. and Mrs. Cook were to spend two months in India thus, and then leave for China, Japan and San Francisco."

The officers are gentlemen of the highest standing in the business and social circles of our community. One glance at the tabulated statement will show the great saving to insurers by this new plan as compared with Life Insurance conducted on the old plan. A tender recollection: An old man with a head as destitute of hair as a watermelon, entered a drug-store and told the clerk he wanted a bottle of hair restorer. "What kind of a hair restorer do you prefer?" "I reckon I'll have to take a bottle of red hair restorer. That was the color of my hair when I was a boy."

A Few Words on Pianos.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

One of our esteemed professors says his wife is not at all esthetic. He says she does not even know the fitness of things. THE BEST REMEDY
FOR
Diseases of the Throat and Lungs.

Diseases of the pulmonary organs are so prevalent and fatal, that a safe and reliable remedy for them is invaluable to every community. Ayer's Cherry Pectoral is such a remedy, and no other so eminently merits the confidence of the public. It is a scientific combination of the medicinal principles and curative virtues of the finest drugs, chemically united, to insure the greatest possible efficiency and uniformity of results, which enables physicians as well as invalids to use it with confidence. It is the most reliable remedy for diseases of the throat and lungs that science has produced. It strikes at the foundation of all pulmonary diseases, affording prompt and certain relief, and is adapted to patients of any age or either sex. Being very palatable, the youngest children take it without difficulty. In the treatment of ordinary Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Clergyman's Sore Throat, Asthma, Croup, and Catarrh, the effects of Ayer's Cherry Pectoral are magical, and multitudes are annually preserved from serious illness by its timely and faithful use. It should be kept at hand in every household, for the protection it affords in sudden attacks. In Whooping-cough and Consumption there is no other remedy so efficacious, soothing, and helpful.

The marvellous cures which Ayer's Cherry Pectoral has effected all over the world are a sufficient guaranty that it will continue to produce the best results. An impartial trial will convince the most sceptical of its wonderful curative powers, as well as of its superiority over all other preparations for pulmonary complaints.

Eminent physicians in all parts of the country, knowing its composition, recommend Ayer's Cherry Pectoral to invalids, and prescribe it in their practice. The test of half a century has proved its absolute certainty to cure all pulmonary complaints not already beyond the reach of human aid.

THE CITY HOMESTEAD.

BY SARAH H. BROWN.

Forever sacred to the spot
So beautified and blest
Alike by summer's leafy robes
And winter's snowy vest.
More fresh and healthful than the breath
Of those Elysian climes
Which Fable peopled with her myths
Far in the elder times.

Not that the earth was greener there,
Though green as emerald's hue;
Not that the skies were bluer there,
Though like the sapphire blue;
But memories of such love and peace
Have shed a radience round
That paints the turf, that tints the sky,
That glorifies the ground.

And yet it was an humble home,
Upon a lonely hill,
Whose slopes, and swells, and stretches basked
In sunshine soft and still.
A hearth which splendor never marked
With gilded gauds and toys,
But ever filled and satisfied
With simple household joys.

Sweet are the ministries of love
In such a hearth and home,
Pure are the streams of influence
That from such fountains come,
Pleasant the clustering memories
Which sanctify the spot,
They make the cold heart young again,
Nor e'er can be forgot.

—Golden Rule.

DURRA, DHURRA, OR RICE CORN, ETC.—In June, 1880, I succeeded in procuring a small quantity of the seed of the Dhurra, or so-called "Rice Corn," from Kansas, and on the sixteenth of that month planted it on stubble land, from which a crop of wheat had just been taken, without manure. The Dhurra received no fertilizers. The portion, 0.22 acre, thickly drilled in rows four feet apart, gave a yield of 45.4 bushels per acre, the other portion, 0.25 acre, planted in rows four feet apart, and from twelve inches to eighteen inches in the row, a yield of only 16.3 bushels per acre. The great difference in the two yields is explained by the excessive tillering of the thinly planted portion—the plants formed more heads than they were able to ripen. The stalks, of which no account was taken, attained an average hight of about eight feet. The grain was plump, and weighed sixty pounds to the bushel. As an abundance of rain fell, the drouth-resisting powers of the plant were not put to the proof. In 1881 a piece of stubble was thoroughly plowed and harrowed immediately after the removal of the wheat; and planted the first week in July, a very fertile portion, two and a half acres, in Indian corn, and a very thin portion immediately adjoining, two and one-fifth acres, in Dhurra. No manures were used on the preceding wheat crop, but four hundred pounds of the same fertilizer was drilled in with both the corn and the Dhurra. The two portions were planted on the same day, and their subsequent culture was the same. That the fertilizer in consequence of the drouth, seriously injured both crops was shown by six unfertilized rows of Dhurra, the superiority of which could be noticed at a considerable distance. When the long mid-summer drouth set in, the Indian corn was in full tassel, from eight feet to nine feet high, and gave promise of a fine yield. The Dhurra was hardly half the hight, but while the corn was twisting and burning up from the want of rain and the terrible heat, it scarcely wilted, and continued fresh and green. The drouth dwarfed it, but did not interfere with the filling of the heads, which were almost as large as those of last year, while the stalks were but little more than half as high.—Prof. J. M. McBryde, in American Agricultural.

PLANTING A FOREST.—The first, the fundamental point in tree-planting on a large scale, that is, in planting what may be called a forest, is to consider the trees as a crop, like any other crop, only this requires a much longer time than ordinary crops to come to maturity. This will at once put the subject to many if not to most persons in a new aspect. Accepting the idea that trees are to be planted like corn or wheat, as a crop, there follows at once the necessity of care and cultivation and the consideration that these are the conditions of success. We do not expect to harvest any ordinary crop, and one that will yield a satisfactory pecuniary return, without having bestowed upon it care and labor. No more should we look success in the larger growths of the forest without a corresponding culture. And when we come to look upon the growth of a forest in this light we shall easily, almost inevitably, regard our ordinary native forests, where the trees are simply suffered to grow up in complete neglect, exposed to injury from the intrusions of cattle and from other causes, as at best only a partial utilization of the fields which Nature has provided for our comfort and profit. It is true that trees will grow and come to maturity in rough places and on poor soils, where nothing else will grow or where the cultivation of other crops is impracticable and unprofitable. It is true also that the growth of these great forest-crops, instead of impoverishing, enriches the soil. Hence there is no use of our poor and what we call waste lands, which abound more or less everywhere, at once so economical and profitable as to devote them to the growth of trees. Left to themselves, as our forests and woodlands generally are, they are remunerative. But they might be made much more remunerative. They would be, if, instead of regarding them as one of the accidental products of Nature, we were to regard them as one, of our staple crops, something to be managed and cared for by us.—From "Methods and Profit of Tree-Planting" by N. H. Eglestan, in Popular Science Monthly.

PRESERVING FENCE POSTS.—I have tried a number of methods of preserving posts, and none have been satisfactory except perhaps one to be mentioned presently. Heart oak, if seasoned, will last a great many years without any application whatever—how many I am not old enough to say. Sap wood will not last. Coal tar has some preservative effect, but after having used it on thousands of fence posts, I am almost convinced that its application does not pay. In fact I am so nearly without faith in its efficacy, that I have not used it at all on fence posts recently set, although I have a barrel on hand purchased chiefly for that purpose. About my yard and premises I have set, since the war, a good many posts of pine, that being the only sawed timber I could get. These have had to be replaced in four or five years after setting—some have completely rotted off in three years, though heavily dosed with hot coal tar.

Now for the exception referred to above. Ten years ago I built a grapery at the end of the house, as a screen against the western sun, using sawed pine posts. Anticipating the difficulty of ever replacing these posts after they became covered with vines, I took the extra precaution of completely saturating the lower ends with kerosine—common coal-oil—before applying the tar. These posts are now perfectly firm, and almost as sound as they were when put in. All other pine posts set at that date have entirely perished. The result of this experiment so thoroughly impressed me with the value of coal oil as a preservative of timber under ground, that I now use it on all posts in building, afterwards covering with hot coal tar. This is essentially the plan proposed by Mr. Parker Earle.

I add this, however, which I think will doubtless prove of great value: I bore a one-half to three-quarter inch hole in the post near the ground, slanting downward and reaching beyond the centre; this is to be filled with kerosine from time to time—perhaps once in three or four years will answer. I feel sure that insects very greatly hasten the decay of timber, to say the least; and kerosine being repellant to them, makes it a valuable application at any point when they are likely to do mischief.—Vaniz, in Country Gentleman.

SHEEP IN ENGLAND.—Long grass is distasteful to sheep; they never feed it down evenly, but will trample down half of what they eat. They always seem to do better on the aftermath of seeds, but they should not be allowed to feed it too close, or it will be long recovering. A frequent change from field to field is better than giving them a long range; the latter often encourages them to rove, and makes them discontented. When they have to be moved it should be done while they are on the feed; if they are lying down it is better to leave them awhile. Clover in a moist state is dangerous to lambs, and old sheep are often secured by it unless they have been on it some time. When sheep have foot rot and remain long in one field it becomes tainted, and if sound sheep follow them they are certain to become affected. Heavy rains act as a purifier and bring the land into sound condition. Foot rot is such a distressing malady, and throws sheep out of condition so fast that it is better to leave unsound pastures unstocked for a few months even in summer rather than run any risk of incurring the disease. I have tried many remedies for this complaint, but they all fail if the land is not dry and firm under foot, and even then it frequently breaks out afresh from no apparent cause. I find the best plan, after applying the lotion of dressing, is to put all the lame sheep by themselves near the homestead; then with care and frequent attention they speedily recover, but if they are put with sound sheep they are certain to affect them very soon.

HOW TO TELL GOOD POTATOES.—The San Francisco Call has a secret about potatoes which it imparts to its readers, as follows: Take a sound potato, and, paying no attention to the outward appearance, divide it into two pieces with your knife and examine the exposed surfaces. If there is so much water or "juice" that seemingly a slight pressure would cause to fall off in drops, you may be sure it will be "soggy" after it is boiled. These are the requisite qualities for a good potato, which must appear when cut in two: For color a yellowish white; if it is a deep yellow the potato will not cook well; there must be a considerable amount of moisture though not too much; rub the two pieces together and a white froth will appear around the two edges and upon the two surfaces; this signifies the presence of starch, and the more starch, and consequently froth, the better the potato, while the less there is the poorer it will cook. The strength of the starchy element can be tested by releasing the hold upon one piece of potato, and if it still clings to the other, this in itself is a very good sign. These are the experiments generally made by experts.

SELECTING NURSERY TREES.—Nurserymen know what purchasers will not believe, that short, stocky trees are better for an orchard, more likely to live, come quicker into bearing than tall, slender trees, whether apple, peach, pear, plum or cherry. The reason is simply this: Tall trees in the nursery rows for some reason get the start, overtop and overshadow those started later; the sap of the tree consequently pushes its growth upward, and in the foliage, while the roots are long, slender and few; consequently it does not bear transplanting as well, or do as well after being transplanted, as was expected from its fine appearance in the row. Stocky trees, on the contrary, being overshadowed, make a shorter growth, with branches and foliage near the ground, with numerous short roots that do not waste their substance in bleeding or by absorption from the soil, that cause the tree to start off in a rapid growth and outstrip its slender rival, and also come quicker into profitable bearing.—Indiana State Journal.

ONIONS.—The yellow Danvers is the most profitable kind to grow. Onions are sometimes affected by blight, for which there is no remedy. It is said that sowing lime salt broadcast at the rate of eight bushels to the acre will stop the ravages of the worm which feeds upon the onion. Care should be had to get fresh seed, as poor seed is apt to produce scallions. The old notion of rolling a barrel over the onion bed to cause them to bottom better has been abandoned by extensive onion growers. The time of ripening, which is usually about the middle of September in this latitude, is indicated by the tops drying up; then they should be pulled and thrown in heaps of from six to eight bushels, where they should remain for three or four days. After they have sweated in the heaps and are dry they should be carted and stored in a dry, cool place, being spread out on a floor. Here they should remain until ready to market, at which time the tops should be cut off.—Rural New Yorker.

WHITE-WASH FOR WOOD.—A wash made simply of fresh or caustic lime and water, and applied during a dry and warm period, penetrates the pores of the wood and renders it more durable, even if the exterior is all washed away in time. We have found a mixture of fresh water-lime and a small portion of fine sand, with some sulphate of zinc, to endure weather longer; but it may be no better for the wood. A peck of fresh lime, first slaked to a dry powder, and then reduced with water to a wash, with the addition of a pound of sulphate of zinc and half a pound of common salt, makes a pretty good and durable wash.—Country Gentleman.

GRAHAM BREAD.—One pint sponge, butter size of an egg, two tablespoonfuls molasses, half a pint warm water and mix with Graham flour.

Household.

HOUSE CLEANING.—A subject of engrossing interest once or twice a year is that of cleaning the house. A few practical remarks by one who herself engages in it from time to time, may be of help to some one whose experience is limited.

I overheard two elderly gentleman talking last spring. "Don't you always dread house-cleaning time?" said one. "I scarcely ever know when house-cleaning is going on," was the astounding reply. It was a fact, too, so quietly and with so little bustle is this stupendous thing got along within that happy man's household. In the first place, it is the part of wisdom to clean one room at a time, and put it in perfect order before disturbing another room. Have the curtains washed and ironed, if they need it, before cleaning the room. It will rest you to know that there is one room settled, and the work there ended. Not to make home hideous, and herself unattractive, should be the cleaner's aim, and it will be a praiseworthy achievement, if, in addition to putting the house in good order, she has also been able to live, and let the family live cheerfully and even comfortably, during this period of hard work.

Some weary women with aching head, with hands burned, scratched and bruised, may think it is asking a great deal of her to expect that she shall pursue the even tenor of her way while she is working twice as hard as usual, and is subjected to the many annoyances unavoidable at this time. But is really asking her simply to hoard her strength. It uses up a great deal of vital force to fret and scold while engaged in any hard undertaking, and if she feels uncomfortable, or a little ill-natured, let her express herself through the broom and scrubbing-brush.

"If I wish to sweep my house and not feel it much, I let myself think of the 'Solid South' and the 'Chisholm Outrage,'" said a friend of mine; "then the corners are dusted, I assure you."

Do not try to do anything else on the day set apart to clean closets; it is very fatiguing to take out, deliberate over, and put back the usual belongings of a closet. Everything should be thoroughly aired. Have just as few things as possible in the closets opening out of sleeping rooms; old shoes and soiled clothes poison the air. When the bedrooms are aired each morning, the closet door should be left open that it may have its supply of fresh air.

If new paper is to be put on the wall, and you have any doubts as to the healthfulness of its coloring, take a piece to a chemist; he can at once, by a simple test, determine if it is wholesome or loaded with arsenic.

After washing woodwork, always wipe with a soft cloth; this prevents drops of water being left to dry on and to discolor the paint. A danger which all ambitious but delicate women should avoid is trying to accomplish too much in one day. The temptation to do just one thing more, and then another thing, is so great that much firmness is needed to resist it, but we must not yield.

House work rarely kills, but imprudence frequently does. Running out doors with sleeves rolled up and head unprotected when you are heated are needless exposures, certain to be followed by more or less suffering. Every one ought to feel that she is of too much consequence in her family to be laid aside for a day, and she owes it to those who love her, even if they do not say much about it, to take the best possible care of herself.—Household.

HOUSEHOLD ADORNMENTS.—Fire Screens.—I saw while in England a fire screen of quite a novel design, a brief description of which may be found of some use to any one who might intend making one of those useful and ornamental articles. The foundation of each side was of scarlet cloth, cut in the shape of a banner, and suspended on a brass stand, so arranged that it could be raised or lowered at will. On the right side of the screen was arranged a sea gull, its white and grey feathers contrasting most beautifully with the bright scarlet cloth. My host while visiting at the seaside had found this gull badly wounded after a heavy storm; and it being a very beautiful bird, the idea struck him to have it preserved, which he did; and then he determined to mount it as a fire screen, and so make a pleasant memento of his seaside visit. The sea gull was arranged as if both wings were spread, and looked as in the act of flying. By any one living near the sea coast, the birds doubtless could be obtained without very much difficulty; with those living inland the case would be difficult; still any kind of a bird could be preserved and mounted in a similar manner. If found impossible to preserve and mount the entire bird, the wings alone might be used, arranging them in any tasteful manner on the bright cloth.

Table Covers.—I have seen lately quite a number of pretty covers for small tables, made of various dark rich shades of double faced canton flannel. One in particular I thought very handsome and effective in design, which I will attempt briefly to describe. A yard square of olive green canton flannel was button-holed all around the edge with gold colored silk, the stitches being taken some little distance from each other. A band of garnet flannel three inches wide was placed at a distance of four inches from the edge of the cover. The band or border, before it was placed on the olive green flannel, was first embroidered at intervals; little Japanese fans and butterflies alternating with each other. Each fan was the size of a silver dollar; its outlines only were embroidered in stem-stitch with gold colored silk, their handles being worked also with the same color. The butterflies were embroidered in various colors, the upper and lower wings generally of some bright contrasting colors with gold spots. This border was fastened with feather-stitching on the table cover; and in each corner of the cover were embroidered with crewels, gramps of field flowers, daisies and sunflowers in two corners, cat-tails and poppies in the remaining ones. One can buy beautiful designs of flowers, &c., already worked, which require only to be sewed neatly on your material; these can often be purchased most reasonably, and at a less cost than you could procure the materials for working them, thereby saving all the time it would take otherwise while embroidering the design. A table cover of garnet flannel with a band of old gold would be pretty, and look very handsome with groups of daisies in each corner.—Edna Church, in Country Gentleman.

PERSEVERANCE BRINGS SUCCESS.

We must not hope to be mowers,
And to gather the ripe gold ears,
Unless we have first been sowers,
And watered the flowers with tears.

It is not just as we take it,
This mystical world of ours;
Life's field will yield as we make it
A harvest of thorns or of flowers.

—The citizens of Amsterdam celebrated on the ninth of January, 1882, the two hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the establishment of their "Athenieum Illustre." This school has long been considered as efficient as the state universities, but it was not until 1878 that the government granted a charter enabling the city of Amsterdam and the Province of North Holland to create two additional faculties and to name the institution "University of Amsterdam." The new university is in an excellent condition. The number of its students is five hundred and seventy-seven, or ninety-two more than the highest number in a state university. The faculty of medicine alone has three hundred and forty-three students, while the total number of medical students in all the three state universities is only 327—viz., 158 at Leyden, 89 at Utrecht, and 80 at Groningen.

—A complaint is prevalent in England that the universities themselves have long since abdicated their teaching functions. Most of the real teaching, it is said, is provided by the unauthorized and outside system of private tutors, who exist independently of the colleges and have, in a great degree, superseded them. In too many cases the candidate for an ordinary degree, if he wish to pass, is compelled to make use of a private tutor. His college does, indeed, provide him with a certain number of lectures, but the number is usually quite inadequate; and even if it were greater in several instances the teaching provided is not nearly so well calculated for the needs of the pupil as is the better-arranged teaching of the private tutor.

—Subscriptions of $118,000 toward the increase of the endowment of the Episcopal Theological Seminary of New York City have been made within a short time, and paid, except about $2,000. The Hoffman family has given about $75,000 of the same, the father contributing $25,000 for an endowment for a special purpose. The present Dean is of the family, and, together with a brother and sister, has given $50,000 toward the office which he holds, but the income is not to be used for that purpose while the present Dean continues in office. While he occupies the chair it may be used for the general expenses of the Seminary. An appeal is made for additional contributions to raise the endowment to $250,000.

—The alumni and undergraduates of Yale College have raise money sufficient to purchase a park for athletic sports, to be the property of the students. The grounds comprise six acres of sloping land on the western side of the city are to have an incline of one foot in five hundred feet. The walking and running track will be a quarter of a mile in length. Inside the oval made by the track will be the tennis-ground. On the south side of the track will be the grand stand, and south of the stand the ball-field and the lacrosse and cricket-grounds. A place will also be devoted to archery.

—The French Senate has adopted the first clause of the Obligatory Primary Education Bill, as passed by the Chamber of Deputies. This bill was introduced in 1879. Its object was to make primary education gratuitous, obligatory, and of lay character. The principal provisions of the bill are: primary instruction is obligatory for all children, of both sexes, between six and thirteen. This instruction may be given in public or private schools or at home. Industrial training appropriate to local wants and resources shall be given in the advanced primary schools.

—Hungary has two universities—Budapesth and Klauaenburg. Budapesth has 3,278 students (82 in Catholic theology, 1,546 in law, 956 in medicine, 175 in pharmacy, and 419 in philosophy) and Klausenburg 423 (64 in Protestant theology, 38 in sciences, 210 in law, 94 in medicine, and 20 in pharmacy.) The polytechnic school at Budapesth has 481 students. For secondary education there are 179 gymnasiums, with 34,504 students, and 26 realschulen, with 5,044 students.

—Dr. Hoffman, of Wurzburg, Bavaria, reports that short-sightedness in Bavarian schools is alarmingly on the increase. Last year the number of short-sighted pupils was but a little over five per cent. of the total school attendance, while this year it has risen to more than twelve per cent. The higher classes show the heavier percentage.

—A gift of $10,000 has been made to the Mount Holyoke Seminary for the purpose of building an observatory, with all the modern improvements and appliances. The money was placed in the hands of Professor C. A. Young, of Princeton, who is also a trustee of the former institution. The name of the benefactor appears to have been kept a secret.

—Franklin and Marshall College, at Lancaster, Penn., has an attendance of 97, exclusive of 32 students pursuing their studies at the Theological Seminary, under the same management. The faculty numbers thirteen, under the presidency of the Rev. Thomas G. Apple, D. D.

—It is a fact worthy of credit that the United States has as many institutions for the instruction of the blind as either Germany or England, and has more educational institutions for the deaf and dumb than any other country except Germany.

—Harvard College has the largest freshman class in its history, numbering 250. Amherst has 97, Williams 85, Yale 255, Brown 70, Tufts 33, Dartmouth 45, which, including specials, is much the smallest class for many years.

—Among the nineteen graduates at the Women's Medical College in Philadelphia last month three of the ladies were from Massachusettes, two from Maine, and one each from Denmark, the Hawaiian Islands, and Burmah.

—Dartmouth College has an attendance of 426 students, 234 of this number being in the academic department. The attendance is thirteen less than that of last year.

—It is proposed to hold half-day sessions for the smaller children in the Worchester (Mass.) schools.

INCIDENTS OF THE WAR.

It is a warm November night, 1881, and the family have just retired. While all alone, occupying the elegant, well-furnished parlor of the hospitable home of Capt. R. C. Gamble, Limestone county, Ala., I will pen the substance of the interesting conversation of the evening. This is the homestead of the family, formerly occupied by the captain's father, who accumulated a large estate, and died in 1855. When the late civil war broke out, and, like mildew, began to cast its withering shades over the land, young Gamble was here with his lovely wife and innocent children, in the enjoyment of a handsome fortune. Early in the struggle he entered the army, but, on account of ill health, returned to his home just before the enemy invaded north Alabama. Among the first of the advancing foe was a brigade of very rough men, from the suburbs of New York City, commanded by Col. Biggs, formerly of the State of Ohio, who established his headquarters near Monsville. These men, giving unrestrained vent to their evil passions, already fired and fanned by war, showed the helpless and defenseless citizens no mercy, but captured their horses, mules, cattle, hogs, and everything else in the store-houses, barns, fields or wood. As ruin and starvation seemed to look them in the face, and not knowing what time their houses would be reduced to ashes, of course they were alarmed. Late in the afternoon of a gloomy day, the captain having recently been deprived of more than a thousand dollars worth of property, a faithful negro man came to the back door of the hall, and hastily said: "Massa Ruff, I's bin to see dat 'ar yankey man dey calls colonel, an' he says he wants you come an' see him in de mornin'." The captain replied to the good-natured man, whose teeth, like ivory, were shining through his dark lips, and a happy smile playing over his ebony features, that he had no idea what the colonel wanted with him, and doubted the propriety of going. "O, yes," continued Turner, "you mus' be sure go; he say he know ole massa long time ago, an' I tell you he gwin to do somethin' mighty good for you." Under all the circumstances, the captain finally decided it might be better to do as his faithful servant advised, and at an early hour the next morning, with Turner as his escort, was at the headquarters of the Federal officer. The colonel was engaged with gentlemen, who were there looking after lost property, but Turner, catching his eye, said: "I's yer my young Massa I was tellin' you 'bout yesterday; he come to see you." With a smile, and in a very pleasant manner, the officer advanced, at the same time extending his hand, and said: "Capt. Gamble, I am truly glad to see you; come in and be seated. At that spring where I first met your father, many long, long years ago. I was here then trading in horses—a stranger. He was kind to me, and entertained me in his house. It may be that I can now return his kindness to you. If you need any assistance, in any way, let me know. Have you lost stock, or other property, by the army?" On being informed that the soldiers had taken from his plantation eight or ten horses and mules, a hundred sheep and thirty head of hogs, he told an officer to make a note of their value. The horses and mules were readily estimated at $80 each, the sheep at $2 50 a head, but when they came to the hogs inquiry was made as to their weight. Turner, the colored man, ever faithful to his master's interest, and knowing that he knew but little about the hogs anyway, on hearing him say "one hundred and twenty-five pounds," pat his woolly head in the door, and exclaimed: "Why, Massa Ruff, dom 'ar hog weigh heep more dan dat; I feeds 'em. Dey weigh more than two hundred pounds apiece." When the vouchers were made out, and properly signed, the officer in command, placing them in the hand of the son of his old Southern friend, said: "I will leave here in a few days, but if you will come to my headquarters at ——, within the next two weeks, you shall have your money." Amidst the activities of war, during the next few weeks Col. Biggs moved his headquarters several times, but in less than a month Capt. Gamble found him at Huntsville, Ala., where he received the value of his property in gold, simply because many long, long years before his father had been kind to a stranger. Within a few hundred yards, just in the front of this mansion, in a beautiful grove, Gen. James A. Garfield had his headquarters, for a few days, in 1863. At that time Capt. Gamble was in the service, his family in Mississippi, and the gentleman to whose care his vast possessions were committed had entirely deserted the place, leaving house, furniture and all to the merciless revenge of the enraged enemy. Discovering the house unoccupied, a number of lawless soldiers decided to burn it, and, arming themselves with fire-brands, even started to put their detestable design into execution. This intended outrage being reported to the general, he immediately dispatched a courier to stop them, placed a guard around the premises, and, on retiring from the community, left strict orders that the property should not be molested. By many other acts of kindness this distinguished officer endeared himself to the people of Limestone county. Though at that time an enemy in arms, yet Capt. Gamble especially remembers him both as a friend and protector. Retaining such pleasant recollections of this great and good man when the question of strife was forever decided by the force of arms, peace, with her golden smiles, again restored to the country, military rule abolished, and Gen. Garfield elevated, by the voice of the American people, to the Presidential chair of the United States, none, in any part of the Union, rejoiced more in their chief magistrate than did those of Monsville and vicinity. None felt more contempt for the dastardly, cowardly act which so suddenly and so unexpectedly cut him down in the midst of his usefulness and honor. And, finally, when the news of his death, on the morning of September 18, 1881, flashed over the wires of the world, none mourned more sadly. A kind word or act is never lost. "The righteous shall be in everlasting remembrance."

Faith—A Story.

Many years before our Lord Jesus was born into the world, prophets had foretold his coming, and some believed and were comforted thereby; even as we are comforted by his coming and the day that reminds us of it. Pastor Harms, in "Good Words," tells, as an illustration of this same faith, how he had stood by the bedside of a sick laborer who had a wife and four children. He had lain sick for three weeks, and the sickness had exhausted all his means. Noticing that he was weeping while we sang a precious song of Zion, I asked him why he wept? was he troubled with the thought of parting with his wife and children? He looked at me steadfastly, almost reproachfully, and answered:

"Does not Jesus stay with them. Has not the Lord said he is a Father, to the fatherless and a Judge of the widow? No; they are all cared for. I have prayed the Lord that he would be their guardian. Is it not so, wife? You are not troubled; you are not afraid; you believe in Jesus."

"Surely," she replied, "I believe in Jesus, and rejoice that you go to Jesus. I shall follow you, with the children in his own time. Jesus will help me to train up the children through his Holy Spirit."

"Why do you weep then?" I asked.

"For joy; for I thought if the singing is so beautiful here, oh! how beautiful it will be when the angels help in it! I wept for joy that this blessedness is so near."

Then he motioned to his wife. She understood, and went to the shelf and brought down a little saucer in which her husband kept his money. There were six grochen (about seven pence) in it, all that remained of his store. He took them out with trembling fingers, and laid them in my hand and said: "The heathen must have these that they may know how to die in peace."

I turned to his wife, who nodded assent and said:

"We have talked it over already. When everything has been reckoned for the funeral these six grochen remain."

"And what remains for you?" "The Lord Jesus," she replied. "And what do you leave for your wife and children?" "The Lord Jesus," he said, and whispered in my ear: "He is very good, and very rich."

So I took the six grochen, and laid them in the mission box as a great treasure, and it has been a struggle for me to pay them away. But if they had not been paid away, the dying man's wish would not have been fulfilled.

That night he fell asleep. And neither his wife nor his three children wept—neither in the church nor at the grave. But the youngest child, a boy of about five years, who followed the body, wept bitterly. I asked him afterward why he wept so bitterly at his father's grave, and the child made answer:

"I was sorry that father did not take me with him to the Lord Jesus, for I begged of him with my whole heart that he would take me."

"My child," I said, "your father could not take you along with him; only the Saviour could do that; you should pray to him." "Ought I then to pray to him for it?" he asked.

"No, my child, if the Saviour will take you, he will call for you; but if he will have you to grow up you must help your mother, and have her live with you; will you?"

He said:

"I would like to go to Jesus, and I would like to grow up that mother might live with me."

"Now then," I replied, "say to the Lord Jesus that he must choose."

Vital Questions.

Can you say before him who is the searcher of hearts; before him at whose dread bar you must soon appear, can you say that God has made you to differ from what you once were? Can you say that God has called you out from living in sin and made you a sensible sin-burdened, sin-convinced and sin-hating soul? Can you say that you have that in your soul which you did not once possess, that will not allow you to go on in sin? When the fear of the Lord is implanted in the soul, that sinner can not live and delight in transgression and sin as formerly. Can you say that God has called you away from trusting in any works of your own, and that you have felt it solemnly settled as a certain fact in your mind that you are not only guilty and ruined but lost and undone forever, for anything that you can do toward saving yourself? Without a true, sound beginning to a man's religion, even that which God has traced out in his word, the "fear of the the Lord," and a conviction of sin, all is false and rotten and will leave the soul at last to find that all was delusion. Proverbs ix, 10. John xiv, 16, "I called my son out of Egypt." Can you say that God has not only showed you that you are naked, guilty and ruined by union to a fallen parent and you own actual transgressions, but that if ever you are cleansed and clothed it must be in the blood and righteousness of Jesus?

Other refuge have I none,
Hangs my helpless soul on thee.

Though we seem to move,
His spirit all the motion gives,
By springs of fear and love.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL
Edited by GEO. E. WARING, JR.,
Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health;" and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

600 Octavo Pages--Over 200 Illustrations.
Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

DON'T DO IT.

Don't seek the temporary feeling of health and strength resulting from the use of beer and ale or other malt and alcoholic compounds. The after-effects make you feel worse than before. Permanent health is sure to be found in that best of all preparations, that friend to temperance and long life known as Brown's Iron Bitters.

A new sort of Adventists have sprung up in Indiana, called "Soul Sleepers." They believe that the body sleeps till the resurrection, the soul being in a state of quiescence till that time.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

ST. LOUIS, April 25.—United States Senator Ben Hill, of Georgia, his wife and son, C. D. Hill, and Dr. J. L. Wright are in St. Louis, resting at the Southern Hotel. They are on the way to the famous Eureka Springs, where it is their intention to give the medicinal qualities of the waters a thorough trial in the Senator's case. A call on the Senator was responded to by his physician and young Mr. Hill. They talked freely about the Senator's physical condition. Mr. Hill said:

We do not disguise the fact that the Senator is ill and weak, while the very nature of his disease makes his recovery a slow process. Recently it was telegraphed all over the country that he was rapidly recovering. I fear that there was some flattery in the statement as to ultimate recovery. The doctor would only say, "That question belongs to the future." There is no telling what may arise hereafter, but I can say present indications are favorable to his recovery."

The party left Atlanta, Ga., last Friday, and will proceed on their journey to-morrow.

STARKVILLE, Miss., April 25.—Mrs. Sullivan, wife of the Rev. W. T. J. Sullivan, professor of mathematics in the Agricultural and Mechanical College, died here to-day.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 26.—Another Tucson dispatch gives the following from the Tombstone Citizen: The Indians attacked an American mining camp at Bacuachi, Sonora, on the twentieth of April, killing Messrs. Lowrey, Ray and Rickey, three others made their escape. The Indians carried off all the camp property of value. Many Americans are in the neighboring hills, and more murders are expected. Gov. Salazar has ordered soldiers and volunteer to pursue the Indians and take no prisoners.

WASHINGTON, April 26.—Dispatches to Denver newspapers and from Arizona by way of San Francisco confirm the massacre at Galeysville, Arizona, but reduce the number of lives lost to thirty; also that twenty persons were killed at Clifton to Gila river. Col. Forsythe's command was to start this morning from Stein's Pass in pursuit, and the Mexican Gen. Turo, with 200 troops, is marching north in Sonora to intercept the renegades. A dispatch from Willcox, Arizona, reports the Indians within four miles of that town.

CONCORD, Mass., April 26.—Considerable anxiety is felt about Ralph Waldo Emerson, who has been quite ill for some days past, without marked change of any kind—certainly not for better.

Ralph Waldo Emerson is reported to be hopelessly ill, though his death is not expected immediately. He is gradually growing weaker. His physicians to-night are not at all hopeful of his recovery.

WASHINGTON, April 26.—The Senate to-day confirmed Alphonzo Taft, of Ohio, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary to Austria, and Wm. L. Dayton, of New Jersey, Minister Resident to the Netherlands.

VICKSBURG, April 27.—At Delta, La., and in the vicinity, the high lands are reported clear of water, but the lower bottoms are yet to some extent submerged. Just below the town, there is considerable land, under water, and those who know say that it will be at least two weeks before it has entirely disappeared. At Tallulah the condition is growing more and more encouraging, and no small amount of planting is in progress.

WASHINGTON, April 27.—Intelligence has this moment been received that Ralph Waldo Emerson is dead.

BOSTON, April 27.—Mr. Emerson died at nine o'clock. His disease was pneumonia. He was supposed to be in a fair way of recovery at one time to-day, but suffered an acute attack and died in a few moments.

SAN FRANCISCO, April 28.—The anti-Chinese convention last night adopted a plan of action which includes a scheme to divide the Pacific coast into districts, which shall be notified to remove the Chinese within a specific time. Failing such action, the district is to be proclaimed dangerous, and peaceably disposed citizens are to be warned to abandon it, and if the Chinese are still harbored in the district the league is to remove them by force, using as little force as may be necessary until the country is rid of them. The convention then elected an executive committee and adjourned sine die.

MEMPHIS, April 28.—The safe of the burned steamer Golden City was recovered this morning. Money amounting to about $1,000 and the papers it contained were in good condition.

WASHINGTON, April 29.—As predicted by your correspondent, Chalmers, of Mississippi, was lifted out of his seat to-day by a strict and decisive party vote. He secured considerably cut up about the matter, as he confidently believed the strong legal phase of his case would carry him through. The Republicans openly declared, however, that they did not intend to regard the legal aspect of the case, and that declaration shut out all the hope of Chalmer's success. The result of this case virtually settles all other contested cases. The Democrats will not undertake to filibuster in any of them. They could not if they wanted to, because the Mississippi delegation would not act with them.

BATON ROUGE, April 29.—Mr. Merritt Barrow, from Eldorado plantation, on Bayou Marlgouin, reports the water falling rapidly. The land in that vicinity will soon be entirely out of water. The cane which was thought to be a total loss a few days ago, is sprouting again, and a fair yield will be made on about one hundred acres of the Eldorado. Mr. Barrow says the cane is doing well on other places in the vicinity. Great numbers of stock are still dying. As the animals are removed from the rafts, the skin peels off from the hoof to the knee, which make them very weak and unable to graze.

BATON ROUGE, April 30.—The trains on the New Orleans Pacific railroad resumed their regular trips to Baton Rouge to-day, bringing the mail, which is the first we have received from that source since April 8.

NEW YORK, April 30.—An attempt was made yesterday on the lives of W. H. Vanderbilt and Cyrus W. Field, by sending them explosives through the mails. Fortunately the dangerous character of the packages was discovered en route to the postoffice station, where they where to be delivered at the residences of these gentlemen, and so a possible loss of life was prevented.

MEMPHIS, April 30.—The graves of the Confederate dead in Elmwood Cemetery were decorated to-day. Hon. Henry Craft delivered the oration.

MORGAN CITY, May 1.—For the twenty-four hours ending at six P. M. April 30, the water fell two inches, for the last twenty-four hours, three inches. The last of the ration supply will be delivered here to-morrow. Two men were sent before the District Court for stealing rations. The refugees at Pattersonville are returning to their homes. There is no work for the laboring classes at Morgan City.

WASHINGTON, May 1.—The Secretary of the Treasury to-day issued the 113 bond call, including the residue of continued 68 of 1861, amounting to about $11,000,000.

RALEIGH, N. C., May 1.—All of the buildings belonging to Col. Bingham's school at Mebanesville were burned. They were of wood and sixteen in number. Loss $30,000; insurance $20,000.

NORFOLK, Va., May 1.—A private dispatch from Mebanesville, N. C., says: Bingham's Military Academy and Barracks burned to the ground this morning.

PLAINFIELD, N. J., May 1.—At the Williams Street Cemetery yesterday two sisters fought a pitched battle over the remains of their mother. The mother and all of the family but one daughter were Catholics. When the mother died the Catholic children were unable to bear the funeral expenses, and the Protestant daughter agreed to bury the mother, and was about to do so, when the procession was interrupted at the cemetery gates by the woman's Catholic children four in number, all grown men and women, who threatened violence if the body was interred in the Protestant burial grounds. Finally, by the aid of the police, interment was completed, but violent demonstrations of the Catholic children of the dead woman, and their sympathizers amounted to riot. An attempt was made to kill the Protestant daughter.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, April 26.—Darwin's funeral and interment took place in Westminster Abbey to-day. The coffin was covered with wreaths of flowers. The procession was merely within the precincts of the Abbey; the pall-bearers were, Minister Lowell, and Duke of Argyle, Lord Derby, Prof. Huxley, Sir Joseph Hooker, Sir John Lubbock, Alfred Russel, Wallace and William Spottiswood.

LONDON, April 27.—The marriage of Prince Leopold to the Princess Helen of Waldeck took place at St. George's Chapel, in Windsor, to-day. Windsor was gaily decorated with flags and bunting in honor of the event. The shops were closed and the town was crowded with visitors. Salutes were fired during the day by the war ships at Portsmouth and other places, and they were decorated with flags. The weather was fine. The marriage ceremony, which was conducted with great pomp, was concluded shortly after one o'clock this afternoon. The Archbishop of Canterbury was the chief officiating clergyman.

VIENNA, April 29.—The Free Presse reports fresh outrages on Jews in Kamiensee, Podolsk and Walkowich. It says in spite of orders from St. Petersburg for prompt punishment of the persecutors, several notorious offenders have been released from custody.

LONDON, April 30.—Prince Maria, wife of Prince William of Wurtemburg and sister of the Duchess of Albany, is dead. She was recently delivered of a still-born child.

LONDON, May 1.—In the House of Commons this evening the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain, president of the Board of Trade, announced that the government had concluded to stop work on the Channel tunnel until further action had been taken by Parliament in the matter.

Home Education.

The following rules are worthy of being printed in letters of gold, and placed in a conspicuous place in every household:

1. From our children's earliest infancy inculcate the necessity of instant obedience.

2. Unite firmness with gentleness. Let your children always understand that you mean what you say.

3. Never promise them anything, unless you are quite sure you can give what you say.

4. If you tell a child to do something, show him how to do it and see that it is done.

5. Always punish your child for wilfully disobeying you, but never punish him in anger.

6. Never let them know that they vex you, or make you lose your self-command.

7. If they give way to petulance or ill temper, wait till they are calm, then gently reason with them on the impropriety of their conduct.

8. Remember that a little present punishment, when the occasion arises, is much more effectual than the threatening of a greater punishment, should the fault be relieved.

9. Never give your children anything because they cry for it.

10. On no account allow them to do at one time what you have forbidden, under the same circumstances, at another.

11. Teach them that the only sure and easy way to appear good is to be good.

12. Accustom them to make their little recitals with perfect truth.

13. Never allow tale-bearing.

14. Teach them self-denial, not self-indulgence.

HOW THE JAVANESE DIVIDE THE YEAR.—If the length of the shadow on the twenty-first of June is divided into four equal parts, and the length on the twenty-first of December into two equal quarts, we shall have six equal measures of length corresponding with six unequal intervals of time; these intervals may then be distinguished according to the length of the shadow. The Javanese avail themselves of this peculiarity of shadows in their country to adjust the division of the solar year, the first day of which corresponds with the twenty-first of June of the Gregorian reckoning. They divide the year into twelve unequal months (mangsa,) which are respectively 41, 23, 21, 25, 27, 43, 43, 26, 25, 24, 23, and 24 days long. Independently of this division, the farmer plants his rice and other crops according to the height of Orion and the Pleiades above the horizon. This height is taken either at night-fall, half an hour after sunset, or in the morning, half an hour before sunrise. The following are the names of the calendar months, and the most important observations and farmers' rules that are connected with them:

First month (Kasa,) forty-one days, from the twenty-first of June to the thirty-first of July inclusive. Orion and the Pleiades are visible in the east, respectively 25° and 45° above the horizon. The sun turns back toward the south; a man's shadow at noon reaches four feet south. The fresh-water fish iwak bettik has one spot on its head. It is time to plant the second crop of rice.

Second month (Kara,) twenty-three days long, from the first to the twenty-third of August. The Pleiades are in the zenith, Orion 70° above the eastern horizon. The iwak bettik has two spots. The sun goes further toward the south. A man's shadow at noon measures two feet south.—From "the Javanese Calendar," by J. A. C. Ondeman's, in Popular Science Monthly.

Mr. F. G. Delaney, of Norfolk, Va., writes: "It gives me great pleasure to experience once more that gloriously good feeling of perfect health. I was buried in despair, my back constantly pained me, and from head to foot I felt thoroughly ill. I could not walk across the yard without fatigue. Nothing I ate agreed with me. Doctors could do me no good. I tried Brown's Iron Bitters. They have given me perfect health and strength."

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists, claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.

2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.

3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.

4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS—NONE GENUINE UNLESS STAMPED.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. They say they prefer a piano like their neighbors have, or to have one like those they heard two hundred years ago, while I quite agree with them; what is the use of having Mason & Hamlin's organs, Mason & Hamlin's Parlor Organs would be much more appropriate, and every Beethoven played in comparison with the common piano, and the Chickering and Cabinet Grand as between the mail coach of our forefathers and the railroad express train. While I would adhere to their old forms and styles, American inventive genius has improved and made a grand advance in the construction of the piano. American pianos have improved and made a grand advance in the construction of the piano. The American originality by their peculiar and late volume of tone, its evenness of register, its French repetition action, which has by changing reduced the weight of touch to a valuable feature. American makers do not. There are pianos in every department of the trade from the commercial CHICKERING piano of poorly proportioned and unmusical tone, to the very choicest of musical. So have the MATHUSHEK piano of which I have the honor to be the sole agent in this city for many years, and which I possess. There are pianos

LIFE'S CHANGES.

Laugh were all the sad and fair and young,
And sweet for both the joy-bells rung,
When gaily parting on the way
Love seemed a long, bright summer day.

And be they older, maybe a year,
And worn with many a care and fear,
When meeting on the winding way,
They speak of a ripe autumnal day.

With sheaf and flow, with fruit and sheaf,
With fragrant flower and crimson leaf,
As world goes by. They watch and pray
Till life be merged in heaven's own day.

The Bishops' Address.

BELOVED BRETHREN: We join all in rendering thanks to our Lord Jesus Christ, for his good hand upon us in bringing us to meet again in his name.

Twenty-four years ago the General Conference met here. Many and great changes have occurred in the outward world; but the church is here, in the midst of them, the same in spirit and purpose, with suitable adaptations in methods and plans to the times and circumstances—thus showing her identity and vitality.

You who were members of that body will hardly fail to note how large a proportion of those who sat by your side, and took counsel with us then, have been called to give account of their stewardship. Let us, with a due sense of responsibility, address ourselves to what is before us, conferring together on things pertaining to the kingdom of God, and we can not have a better rule for securing personal edification and unity in counsel than the old one which the fathers printed in the Discipline, for the General and yearly Conferences: "It is desired that all things be considered, on these occasions, as in the immediate presence of God." "Let us have an especial care to set God always before us."

A review of the progress of the church for the four years just past, and a statement of its present condition and prospects, afford cause for humility and gratitude. We have enjoyed great opportunities. Our land has had peace and health. There has been neither adversary nor evil occurrent. Open doors have invited us on every side. By preaching the gospel with more fidelity, and pressing its truths upon the consciences of men; by a more tender pastoral care and faithful administration of discipline; by works of mercy according to our ability, and by being liberal, as God has prospered us, in supporting his cause; by habitual invocation and co-operation with the grace of his Spirit, and consecration of the blessings of his providence—we might this day have in the kingdom of our Master more thoroughly established and widely diffused in the earth that it is.

But God has been pleased to accept the service of imperfect agents. To an extent calling for our grateful acknowledgement he makes his pleasure to prosper in our hands.

The force of itinerant preachers under appointment to active labor in our thirty-nine Annual Conferences and our mission fields is 3,704—being an increase in the last quadrennium of 247. We have never known fewer failures on the part of preachers to go to appointments—many of them involving special hardships, covering as they do new ground, where the line of things has been made ready to hand. The people receive them heartily, and are improving in the provision made for their support. Our itinerant system is effective.

The membership has increased from 798,862 to 850,687. Thirteen thousand of these were added to the communion of the church last year. The amount of church property and accomodation for congregations has increased in proportion. Houses of worship have been built and remodeled on a better style of architecture, and there has been, in a marked degree, a general clearing out of old debts.

The condition of our mission work, at home and abroad, may be ontlined in the following statements:

The amount raised for foreign missions, from May, 1874, to June, 1878, was $212,433 98; from June, 1878, to April, 1882, $354,371 99—an increase in the last four years of $111,438 01.

In the same years were contributed to domestic missions, within the bounds of the Annual Conferences, the sums respectively of $216,016 67 and $226,850, the amount in the last quadrennium being in excess of the former by $9,934 31.

In the prosecution of our Western work, especially through Colorado and New Mexico toward Arizona and Southern California, we have made an appreciable addition to the itinerant force of the Denver Conference, which includes that territory—as large an addition as the funds appropriated for their support by the Board of Missions would allow. Very much more requires to be done in that direction. At least as large an expenditure should be made upon the western extremity of the line. In connection with the Los Angeles Conference, and coming eastward through Arizona. A vigorous policy is called for if we would do the duty that lies next to us. We have special adaptation and reponsibilities for occupying this territory, newly opened and rapidly filling up with an enterprising population. In the neglect or tardy performance of this duty we shall suffer much loss, and be cut off from our own proper lines of operation.

A considerable mission field in connection with the Northwest Texas Conference has been taken under the care of the board, a field requiring men and means beyond our present supply, but giving promise of early and large returns.

The German work, lying principally in Texas and Louisiana, is making progress—not rapid, but sure. Its opportunities are great and increasing, but its means comparatively limited.

In the Indian Territory, on our Western frontier, is a church labor possessing peculiar interest. The Indian mission has steadily grown. We have now in that Conference over 5,000 members—Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, besides several hundred white people and negroes, who have obtained citizenship or right of residence among the natives. The gospel and the ordinances of the church are dispensed to them by more than thirty traveling preachers—most of them Indians—and one hundred and twenty local preachers. There is improvement in the direction of self-support in this mission. In church schools and building houses of worship more is being done by the Indians than heretofore.

The Mexican border mission, on our Southern frontier, has extended its territorial limits. The number of members is near 1,000; native preachers, 17; churches have been built, and more projected. The wants of all that region, on both sides of the Rio Grande, demand our attention, and will repay our toil.

The Central Mexican mission has been strengthened by the addition of two missionaries. The enlargement of the field required this, and, if it continues in the same ratio, more missionaries will be needed within the next four years, not to do the work of native preachers, but to supervise districts extending beyond the present boundaries of the mission. The way is open, and there is nothing to hinder extension but lack of supplies.

In China three additions have been made to the laborers under care of the Board of Missions, and another is about to sail, by way of Europe, in company with an older missionary, who has been using his enforced visit and stay in this country to fit himself for a wider range of employment. The arrival of these two brethren will give our board eight active and efficient American laborers in that field. The addition of stations and preaching places, however, has been such that this number is inadequate to the exactions of the situation, especially in view of the success attending the opening of the educational work lately projected by the superintendent, Dr. Allen. There is immediate need there of six additional missionaries to teach, as well as preach. The difficulty, as stated by Dr. Allen, in the conduct of his high schools, is not the want of pupils, but the scarcity of teachers to take charge of the Chinese youth who seek instruction at his hands. One lady, also, has been added as a teacher in the schools under the direction of the board. The new missionaries sent out to this and other fields have given proof of the possession of the qualities necessary for their high calling.

Two missionaries have been added to the Brazil mission. There is just now need of two or three more; and a sufficient expenditure should be made to put our enterprise in that empire upon a footing that will cause the people to recognize its permanency.

It is becoming here to make mention of a name withheld from publication, during his lifetime, because of the modesty of its bearer. We are indebted to the late J. H. Buffington, of Covington, Ky., for benefactions which have materially advanced our cause, and furnished an example worthy of all honor and imitation. He might have retired from the anxieties and toils of business with ample provisions for himself and family in his declining years; but, as he himself said, he would continue in business that he might give the proceeds to the Lord. His first gift was $6,000, in September, 1879, to build a church and boarding-school in Soo Chow, China; and this memorial of him, lately dedicated, stands in the midst of that populous and literary city an attestation of his love and faith. To this sum he, from time to time, added other gifts for various mission uses in Mexico and China, until his donations, when his lamented death occurred in June, 1881, amounted to more than $16,000. Yet he was not a man of great wealth. They are many in our communion who, with equal consecration, would be able to furnish larger material for the world's conversion.

A donation made in 1879 by a brother in Georgia, still living, secured the building of Trinity Church in Shanghai, which greatly strengthened our mission, and has been a blessing from the auspicious day of its dedication.

The mission offerings of these two persons have given character to the hopeful operations of the last four years. We may be permitted also to notice the fact that the first schoolhouse in China—the Clopton—for planting the leaven of Christian education among heathen children, was the gift of a Christian woman of Tennessee—the proceeds of the sale of her personal jewelry, laid on the altar of foreign missions—six years ago.

Instances of this kind ought not to be isolated. While abating nothing of concerted effort, and gathering systematically and rising economically smaller gifts, let it be borne in mind that not a few of our people have opportunities for well-doing that are exceptional. Urgent calls are upon us. Men moved by the Holy Ghost are preparing themselves in our schools and colleges to respond. Who will send them? Who will provide them with the material outfit and appliances necessary for holding the word of God as a light in the dark places of the earth, and claiming the uttermost parts of the world for the Saviour's possession?

In view of these pressing wants and the possibilities of sanctified wealth, let us fulfill the apostolic injunction: "Charge them that are rich in this world, that they be not high-minded, nor trust in uncertain riches, but in the living God, who giveth us richly all things to enjoy; that they be rich in good works, ready to distribute, willing to communicate; laying up for themselves a good foundation against the time to come, that they may lay hold on eternal life."

We suggest that the General Conference take measures, if practicable, to anticipate the wants of our enlarging missions. The present arrangement, which throws the assessment and collection of funds through the Annual Conferences several months behind the appropriation and expenditure, puts the board under the necessity of procuring advances through the treasurer. This is inevitable, until by some means the collections and expenditure shall be made to proceed simultaneously, or the income precede the outlay.

The evangelization of heathen lands must be, under God, carried on mainly by converted and trained natives. America can not send enough laborers to China, now or hereafter, for that harvest; but, by such schools as have lately been inaugurated there, we see promise of the possible occupation of that field at no great distance of time. A Providential preparation seems to have been completed, and our church is about to see fruit where faith has waited long. Let us be equal to the full measure of the opportunity and the undertaking. It would be well, in view of the native helpers already engaged and preparing, and the encouraging outlook, for you to make provision for organizing the Shanghai Annual Conference, within the four years next following. The same provision might safely be made for the Central Mexican mission, where we have now 1,150 members, 32 native preachers, and 23 day-schools, besides Sunday-schools.

A new chapter is to be written in this connection. That timely auxiliary, the Woman's Missionary Society, correlated by the General Conference four years ago, has done well, and justified the recognition then made. So far as results have appeared its affairs have been managed efficiently, economically, and judiciously. The management has adhered to the line of collection and disbursement prescribed by law, and instead of lessening the amount flowing by ordinary channels into the treasury of the missionary board, it is our opinion that the money reported by the Woman's Missionary Society is a clear gain. By their excellent monthly paper useful information has been circulated, and by their personal efforts the zeal for missions has been generally quickened. The society has sent out five well-chosen missionaries—two to China, one to Brazil, and two to the Mexican Border mission, who co-operate with the Board of Missions harmoniously in their respective fields as teachers. The society is also building at Laredo, an important station on the Rio Grande, a boarding-school for girls, and its agents are occupying two such school buildings, erected by its own funds, in China. Ground has been secured, and plans made for a girls' boarding-school in Pericicaba, Brazil. Money raised to date, $64,-910. Their Missionary Advocate has paid its own expenses, and brought $1,000 into the society's treasury. We are advised that a memorial will be sent up requesting certain readjustments of the society to the Board of Missions, and to its own recognized field of operations. It is needless that we recommend it to your most cordial and prompt consideration.

An organization without complex machinery, simple but efficient, and of connectional extent, by which the strong could help the weak in the work of church-extension, would meet a want that has found a general expression among our people. The missionary board can not conveniently aid feeble societies in new settlements securing suitable houses of worship, and thus occupying new stations. This is aside from its main purpose, and, in the opinion of some, trenches upon its constitutional powers.

It is with pleasure we notice the increase of parsonages, both in number and quality. A home for the itinerant's family is essential to the thorough maintenance of the itinerant system. We advise, in order to promote this interest, and to avoid misunderstanding, that you provide a method by which a common property in the parsonage may be equitably divided when it becomes necessary to divide the pastoral charge.

The Sunday-school department has made progress during the past four years. The increase in the number of schools is over 2,000, and of pupils 71,000. There are now 9,310 schools; 62,342 teachers; 462,321 pupils—increase last year, 21,707.

The Sunday-school literature has been improved in quality, reduced in price, and increased in circulation. In 1778 the aggregate circulation was 250,000 monthly issues; it is now over 400,000. Several new books and catechisms have been published, adding to the general Sunday-school catalogue. The Sunday-School Magazine has been increased from 32 pages to 48 pages, and reduced in price from one dollar to fifty cents. As the financial condition of the Publishing House improves, plans should be matured for enlarging the operations of this department. No part of our church work is more prosperous and promising. The church and the Sunday-school are drawing closer together. Pastors and Quarterly Conferences are coming into their true relations to it. Greater attention is being given to doctrinal teaching. Juvenile missionary societies have increased in numbers and efficiency. And best of all, revivals of religion frequently begin in the Sunday-school which reach to the church and community. The increase in church membership from this source has been most noteworthy.

Last May, in pursuance of a request made by the Sunday-school editor, about twenty Conference Sunday-school secretaries met in Nashville, and continued in session for three days. These representative men, from as many Annual Conferences, consulted on matters pertaining to the conduct and development of the Sunday-school, and their suggestions will be submitted to your consideration.

Not a few of our Sunday-schools are afflicted with an irresponsible literature, teaching erroneous and strange doctrines, or no doctrines at all, imposed upon them by various devices. This ought not so to be. The General Conference would do a timely service, for catechetical instruction in the family, the Sunday-school, and the church at large, by creating a commission to revise the catechisms in use among us, and to prepare a graded system, suited to all, from the infant to the Bible class, to be published under suitable regulations. We believe that we hold the truth, and duty and safety require us to teach it, and to teach it to all. A thorough inculcation of our doctrines and polity would promote stability and robustness of spiritual life, alike in young and old.

The condition of our Publishing House has been materially changed, and for the better, since the General Conference last had its affairs under consideration. The wisdom of clothing the Book Committee with powers adequate to the emergency has been vindicated. The church is greatly indebted to the committee—composed mostly of laymen—for the eminent patience and skill and fidelity with which they have served in connection with the book agent and the business manager. Their statements, in detail, will be before you, from which it will appear that four years ago the claims against the Publishing House amounted to over $300,000, drawing interest at the rate of $60 a day, and the liabilities exceeded the assets by more than $100,-000. The reports now show assets above liabilities by more than $50,-000, and the remaining indebtedness in manageable shape, being almost wholly in four per cent. bonds on long time. Also, that the manufacturing facilities of the House have been increased, and its business put on a cash basis.

These facts point to a gratifying increase in the business of the House, including the circulation of its periodicals and the manufacture and sale of religious books. The bond scheme devised by the Book Conference was responded to by the church and its friends; business revived, confidence was restored, and the disaster which threatened us four years ago has been happily averted.

While the ministers, who have been employed, both in the agency and in the committee, have done their duty well, as has been their custom whenever the church called for their services, let us not forget how much we are indebted to lay agency for the redemption of the Publishing House. Lay delegates, in the committee-room at Atlanta, brought their business training and capacity to the difficult problem and put it in the way of solution, and laymen in the book-room at Nashville gave their financial skill to working it out—and so, by the blessing of God, we have the result. This may teach us what the church has gained, in the various enterprises which admit of it, by calling into her counsels the co-operation of her laity.

A publishing house conducted by the church is not a mercantile, but chiefly a moral, scheme. It must be conducted on business principles, but for religious ends. We trust the day is not far distant when the ideal shall be realized of a Christian literature, published under the guarantee of a competent supervision, cheap and widely diffused. The issues of our press must supplant those of infidelity and vice by their cheapness, as well as their value—by their accessibility as well as their purity. To this consummation let us tend constantly and as rapidly as our recuperating Publishing House can bear it. The church, to be justified in engaging in a work having so many secular aspects, must keep the religious function stealthy and prominently in view. Printed truth, like preached truth, must reach the people—the poor as well as the rich. It is printed to be read, and is read to do good—to enlarge the heart, to enlighten the mind, to quicken the conscience, and to sanctify the soul. Cheapness, in order to its circulation, is a prime quality. The connection has a monopoly of valuable publications, and also, within a certain sphere, of an extensive book and periodical trade. This advantage, created by it, and justly belonging to it, should inure to the benefit of its literature, and be so used as to bring down the price within reach of all. And while local interests and private enterprises, not having the same facilities, must be allowed their full liberty and mission, we submit that no protective legislation in their behalf should be allowed, to defeat the church in one of the principal objects contemplated in publishing religious books and periodicals.

Our educational institutions have had an unequal prosperity. Some have enjoyed munificent gifts from abroad, and others have languished for the support home to which they were entitled. High schools, under the care of District Conferences, were brought to your attention in our last address; and their success in portions of the connection is not only a gratifying fact, but a suggestion of enlargement in this direction. No doubt, colleges and universities have been undertaken too often among us without counting the cost of their erection, equipment and maintenance. The consequences have been such as are not pleasant to contemplate—harassing debts, ill-paid faculties, and sometimes a lowered curriculum, followed by a lingering death. It would, we think, be in the interest of higher Christian education if a sentiment should grow up among us discouraging new enterprises of this sort until those we have are endowed sufficiently at least to insure their stability. The provision made by civil and municipal governments for lessening the illiteracy of the masses does not interfere with the work the church proposes to do. Methodism can not remit the higher education of her children to other churches, or to the State. Without entering into the question of the moral right of taxation in order to carry free education for all to this point, the Methodist Church has found her safety and her spiritual profit in cherishing academies and colleges for our youth of both sexes. It is possible we have been too sensitive to the appearance or the charge of sectarianism in this matter. Not negative but positive results are sought, and these alone can justify the church in entering this field. Moral unity in our teaching and governing forces, and a pronounced religious influence exerted upon pupils, would be consistent with detailing so many of our able ministers every year to this department, and with the amount of money collected and the large attention bestowed in our ecclesiastical assemblies on this cause.

As authorized and directed by the last General Conference, we took measures to have our branch of Methodism represented in the Ecumenical Conference, which met in City-road Chapel, London, September 7-20, 1881. Thirty-eight of the four hundred delegates constituting that body were allotted to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and there were present thirty-six.

Of the proceedings of that delegated Conference of the Methodist branch of the catholic church, embracing about 5,000,000 of members, we need not speak particularly, since they have been published in a volume and widely circulated. The hospitality and liberal provision of our English brethren were equal to the demands of the occasion. They left nothing undone for the comfort of their guests or the success of the Conference. It was an epochal event. In that historic place the various families of Wesleyan Methodism throughout the world realized their substantial unity, reasserted their cardinal principles, took account of their forces, surveyed the fields to be occupied and the work to be done, and exchanged views as to the best methods of doing it; and, after two weeks of harmonious deliberation and edifying fellowship, they repaired to their various climes and countries to carry on the work of God.

Before another session of this body the first hundred years since Methodism in America was formally organized will be completed. Its proper celebration would be a means of grace. The last General Conference took tentative action on this subject, but it remains for you to act more definitely. It might be well for this body not only to take advanced steps for concerted action in this direction with our brethren of other churches, but to designate the objects upon which the liberality of the people may be directed on that centenary occasion, in their thanksofferings. The centenary of the organization of American Methodism is an event too rich in suggestion and too important in its bearings on the religion and civilization of our land to pass without suitable celebration. We have before called your attention to the undue facility with which supernumeraries and superannuates are made. This evil has been partially checked in the Annual Conferences by their using more than formerly the law for beating inefficient, unacceptable, or secular preachers. These relations, however, are too often loosely, if not abusively, employed to keep men nominally in the itinerant ranks who have rendered little service there, and who, in time, share a stipend with aged and worn out ministers who have borne the burden and heat of the day. The sympathies of brethren sometimes so overcome their judgments as to put on the superannuated list men who have not graduated to elders' orders. This practice, in our opinion, reacts damagingly upon the collections for these worthy claimants, works injustice to those who really have claims upon this fund, and discourages active laborers from continuing in the regular work until they are worn out. If a remedy for these evils, capable of general application, could be devised, it would be a timely service.

The journals of all the Annual Conferences will be submitted to your supervision. As executive officers of the church, charged with seeing that the laws are carried out, it is a gratification to us to know that in this difficult way, our administration, in every part, is to be brought to the notice of its highest judicatory, and thus any errors may be corrected.

Our observation is that the business conduct and the journals of the Annual Conferences have been improved by this periodical scrutiny of their official records on the part of a superior body. A like improvement, and one much needed, would be realized to the Quarterly Conferences, if the laws were more specific, which gives the District Conference authority to supervise their records. It would take a few steps more, and be according to the genius of our system, to complete the plan of supervision by having the records of the church Conferences, and the manner of keeping registries, supervised annually by the Quarterly Conference, and the records of the District Conferences supervised by the Annual Conference.

The negro population of the South and Southwest, upon which our church, in time past, bestowed much labor, but which for several years has been turned away from us, is again becoming accessible to our influence. Opportunities to preach to their congregations should be diligently improved. The Colored Methodist Church, in America, organized by us a decade ago at the request of the remnant of our colored membership, has maintained its integrity and made some progress. They are in great need of facilities for providing themselves with suitable pastors and teachers of their own race. Whatever assistance we can render them, in this respect especially, will be well bestowed; and we invite to this subject your favorable consideration.

We have little legislation to recommend. The great body of the ministry and membership are thoroughly in accord with the doctrines, usages and polity of our church; and our relations with other ecclesiastical organizations were never more satisfactory. Not statute law, but life, and life more abundantly, is the want of our day. A low spiritual experience is the greatest danger of Methodism. Whatever you can do to promote personal, family and social religion, will prove our best defense against the enemies that war against the soul. Let our existing laws be judiciously and faithfully administered, and it will be found that persons who live in the violation of their baptism covenant can not live within the church.

We have been able to preside at all the sessions of the Annual Conferences save five. The number of effective superintendents, the extent of territory, and the general preference for full sessions, which we have endeavored to gratify, have not afforded the best conditions for our ABANDONED.

One night, after an earnest appeal made to sinners, on the striving of the Spirit, and seeing many who evidently knew they were rejecting Him, my thoughts continued to run on the danger and folly of such conduct, and found expression in the following lines. They are designed to represent some of the anguish that attends the reflections of a lost soul.

To-day the Spirit strove,
And urged me to repent;
He wooed me by the Father's love,
And with the Son's lament.

He pressed on me in every way,
By things in hell and heaven,
And often cried, "O soul to-day
Repent, and be forgiven."

But I withstood him to his face,
His voice I would not hear,
I spurned the offers of his grace,
Through many a sinful year.

At last my heart grew hard and dead,
The fatal line I crossed,
From me the Holy Ghost had fled,
And then my soul was lost.

God's Spirit had abandoned me,
Gainst me his anger burned,
And then, through all eternity,
From me his mercy turned.

But on I lived, without a doubt,
And every fear was calmed,
I did not think my soul cast out,
Or feel that I was damned.

But, still 'twas so, O dreadful thought,
For, while my pathway blossomed,
On me the door of hope was shut,
And I was surely doomed.

At last, in death, I sank to hell,
My state was then revealed,
To peace and heaven I cried "Farewell,"
For then my doom was sealed.

O if from here I might be sent,
To warn of deep despair,
My cry would be "to-day repent,
God's wrath no longer dare.

"Repent and harden not thy heart
God's spirit cries to thee,
Or else from these thy ill soon depart
To all eternity."

GOLDEN TEXT: "That ye may know that the Son of God."—MATTHEW XVI. 16.

SEEING AND CONFESSING CHRIST.

The Master in his journey had just arrived at Bethsaida when a blind man was brought unto him by some friends. They approached, beseeching Jesus to touch him. He was brought because he could not find his way to the Healer alone, or may be because his friends had more faith than he, and what he could not be induced to do of himself they did for him. The way in which men are brought to the Saviour is frequently as wonderful as their cure. These friends beseech him to touch him, as if the touch was necessary to the cure. Christ willingly responded to their prayer. He took the blind man by the hand, and led him out of town. Behold the Son of God leading the blind man by a way he knew not. No doubt the blind man's confidence increased with every step. His expectations were raised, and confidence became hope, as he felt the steady, careful guidance of that gentle hand. Thus many are led by Jesus to the place where they are converted; they know not why they are led from one place to another; this path blocked up, and another opened to them, until at length they find that all was arranged to bring about the blessed end, even the opening of their blind eyes. Why he did not cure him there, and at once, we can not tell. The Lord often now leads a soul a long way apart from the busy world before he will reveal himself; the darkened chamber of sickness in the day of desertions, when money and friends have departed, are often the time and place Jesus chooses. When the town was left Christ spat on his eyes, and put his hands on him, and asked if he saw aught.

Why did the Master thus do we can not answer, but no doubt for the best of reasons. This was the best way for this man of no faith and of no acquaintance with the Lord's methods. This was the means he used to inspire confidence in the man. It, moreover, teaches us that it is God's prerogative to work how, when and where it pleaseth him. He used these means to draw out the attention of the man to the processes of his restoration rather than to himself. He asked him if he saw aught; he would make him use what power of sight he had received; he would have him exercise the little faith he had as a condition to receiving more. The man looks up toward the source of light; he saw certain moving forms; trees, he should have accounted them from their height, but men from their motion. The Lord increased his strength for this ready act of obedience. He touched his eyes again, and he looked up again, and was restored, and saw every man clearly. The man was as good as cured just as soon as Jesus took his case in hand, but he came to the consciousness of his cure very gradually, and by progressive steps. One operation restored the eyes, and the others imparted the faculty of using them. The opening of eyes of the spiritually blind manifests these same progressive steps. The delay, however, is always in us, not in God. In fact, conversions are always instantaneous, but the consciousness of it is not always. Conversion of the soul has a wonderful effect on the eye; all things become new; they are seen in their true relations, and have their right proportions. A man never feels more natural, as if his bearings are all right, than when he is converted. The morning after the evening of your new birth you see the sun rise for the first time. So it was with Jacob after his all-night wrestle. He leaned on his staff, and the sun rose upon him, and a note of the first sunrise is put in the history. Don't you want to see light? The light which is the life of the world. Then look up; there is life for a look. Look to the Lord; he is lifted high. Look and live; let this Sun of Righteousness shine upon your eyes; his rays will exhale all the tears of your penitence, and fill your soul with glory. Appropriately with this seeing of Christ is the confessing of Christ to be the Son of God. Christ never appeared so much God as when he was working with light, or making eyes, which is the same thing as making a sun for the creation of one, involves all the principles of the creation of the other. To make an eye is to establish forever a claim to Divinity. The clearest and distinctest announcement of his eternal sonship was made by himself to the born-blind, who, when he saw him with his eyes, worshiped him as the Son of God.

Peter's great confessions follows this miracle of sight, and Peter's bold eye caught the reflected glory of God in the face of Jesus just after this miracle in which he had demonstrated himself to be the true Light which lighted every man that cometh into the world.

Colportage Sketches—No. 26.

BY A. M. JONES.

A BUGLE STORY.

It was a lovely day in early spring, 1878. The birds were happy, hopping from branch to branch, building their nests, and singing their cheerful songs. All nature, forest, fields and gardens rejoiced in their beautiful robes of green, so recently put on. As my horses drew up at the gate the lady of the house, a woman of medium size, pretty face, neatly dressed, and near twenty-five years of age, was sitting in the door. In answer to my question, she said: "No." Do you have a Bible? "No; and if I had one it would do me no good. I can't read. But my husband can read, and is a member of the church, and if you will go down to the mill he may git one if he has any money." Being both astonished and sad that a woman of her appearance could not read, I said: Madam, you are young, why don't you learn to read? By a little effort you could do so in a very few months. At this she seemed to become excited, and, rising to her feet, exclaimed: "What! me larn to read at this age, and a married woman too? Did you ever. You must be crazy. Now, wouldn't I cut a nice figor settin' down here with a book, an' all these children cryin' round me. Why, I would git mad, an' run every-body off the place." Do you get mad often? "When anybody troubles me I do, an' they hear from me too." It may have been rude and inexcusable in me, but the temptation was great, and I said: Do you scold when you get mad? "Scold! I recon I do when anybody troubles me." Do you scold your husband? "When he needs it I do, an' that's often enough." I expect he is getting very tired of being scolded. "Well, he needn't be, for he will git a many one before he dies yit if he lives long enough." Just at this stage of the conversation an old bugle story, of which I had not thought in years, and which I never saw in print, though it may have been published, occurred to my mind. Madam, I know a remedy for a scolding wife, and if you wish me to do so I will relate it. "What is it, then?" was the very curt reply. I heard of an old man whose wife had been scolding him for more than thirty years, and, though he tried various means to break her, yet she continued. One morning, after giving him a severe round, just as he was leaving the table, she angrily said: "You have now got your till again. Go and hunt that calf. That cow is in the pen, to this time of day, starvin' to death." A few weeks before a new doctor had established himself in the community, and already, by some remarkable cures, had created quite a sensation. For some days the old gentleman had been meditating the propriety of calling on him for a remedy for his wife's bad temper, and now resolved to do so without another hour's delay. Having passed through the gate, instead of going for the calf, as the old lady, in her rage, had so peremptorily ordered, he turned toward the doctor's office with a heavy heart. On entering, and finding the doctor alone, he earnestly and hastily said: "I come down to see if you can fix the old woman up a little." "Well, perhaps so; what is the matter with her?" "Matter, I tell you thar's matter enough. I have had no peace, for her scolding, for more than thirty years, an' this very mornin' she has bin scering it to me ever sense daylight. I tell you, I has bin mighty tired of it a long time, an' has tried to break her, but she always gits worse. I'll never try, myself, any more. They say you can cure everybody, an' I thought you might cure her too. Do you think you can fix her up." "Yes, I think we can, very easily." "Now, doctor, you say we. I tell you I don't want to have anything to do with it, an' of you tell her I told you this, and told you to come thar, you'll never want to see her agin." "I could, very readily, stop her scolding while there, but that would do you no good. After leaving she would scold you still more. I can tell you, however, how you can stop her almost immediately, and within three days effect a permanent cure." At this assertion he became excited, rose to his feet, and, with animation, exclaimed: "Well, doctor, how? Will it hurt her? I tell you, I wouldn't hurt that old woman for anything. If she did not scold she is jist as good and smart as anybody's wife." "I assure you it will not hurt her in the least, though at first, and for a little while she will try to scold worse than ever. Will you try it?" "Yes; if thar's no danger. What is it?" "Do you know what a bugle is?" "Yes." "Go to the tin-shop, and have one made, eighteen or twenty inches long. Tell the tinner you want it to blow, and blow loud. When it is finished attach a string to each end, put it around your neck, after the fashion of a hunter's horn, and return to my office. I will then tell you what to do." Equipped with the bugle, as directed, the old gentleman, eager for further instructions, was back in less than two hours. Taking the bugle in his hand, the doctor gave a loud, shrill blast or two, and pronounced the instrument perfect. "You will now return to your home, and before getting in the house, no doubt, the old lady will begin to scold. When she does, without saying a word, you blow. If she scolds easy you blow easy. If she scolds loud you blow loud. As long as she scolds you blow. When she stops you stop, and when she begins again you do the same. Every time she speaks, in a scolding tone, you blow. Be firm. If she takes the broom or shovel to you get out of the way, but by all means continue to blow." Lingering between hope and fear, with grave doubts agitating his mind as to the propriety of his course, the old man slowly began to retrace his steps, and was seen at the gate. The wife, within, being in a greater rage than usual, on account of the tardiness of her husband, hearing his footfalls, in a moment was at the door, and shrieked out: "Where in the world have you bin all this time? Where is that calf?" And then discovering the new tin glittering in the sunbeams: "What is that thing you've got on? O, me, that poor cow is starvin' to death in the pen." The scene that followed is difficult to describe. As the contest was now upon him, the old man, having previously weighed all the dangers of the perilous step, felt equal to the occasion, and, hastily placing the bugle to his lips, began: Toot, toot, to—o—o—o—t, toot, to—o—o—o—o—t. These terrible, piercing, grating, deafening blasts continued for some minutes, during which time the old lady raved, stamped her feet, and raved again, but all to no purpose. He would not stop. Finally, when well-nigh exhausted from loud talking, and almost blinded with rage, she became quiet, and the trumpet's hoarse voice was immediately hushed. Gazing at him for a moment, as if in doubt what to do next, and seeing he was ready at a word to blow again, she contemptuously turned away, saying: "You are a fool." It was now time to look after dinner, and as she, not in the most amiable manner, entered the kitchen the old gentleman seated himself in the front room of the house. While kindling the fire the cow, still in the pen, gave a long, pitiful, hungry low, which so vividly reminded her of the calf, and her husband's disobedience, that she arose, and, in a moment, confronted him again with the exclamation: "Put up that thing, and stop that noise; I will have no more of it. Git me some wood to git dinner, and then go and hunt that calf. I tell you that poor cow is starvin' to death." The old gentleman, having entered the warfare with the full determination to carry out the minute instructions of the doctor, adjusted the instrument, and again, in the most terrific, deafening strains, sent forth blast after blast, and peal after peal, until his incensed and persecuted wife, in wonder and amazement, silently stood before him. She had raved, smote with her hands, stamped with her feet, stood on tiptoe, and raved again, but, notwithstanding the orders, the offensive roar continued. Not hearing her own voice, and knowing every word was lost, in almost a breathless state, though convulsed with rage, she ceased to speak. As the last notes of the detestable music died away, while rapidly leaving the room, amidst the awful stillness which ensued, she once more turned upon her naughty husband, and vehemently said: "You are an old fool." The blowing and scolding had now been going on for fifteen or twenty minutes, and a dozen or more boys had been attracted by the excitement to the scene of conflict. As the distressed and almost frantic old lady passed from the hall to the back yard, on her way to the kitchen, she heard voices of merriment, and saw the boys peeping through the palings, and knew they were laughing at her. As lightly and as rapidly as a lady of her age could walk, she went to the kitchen, thence to the wood-pile, thence to the well, all the time casting about in her mind for some way of relief. Finally, as if unable any longer to endure such an outrage, she made for the house, but, on entering the hall, hesitated, and went on tiptoe to the door. Though so very softly, he had already heard her step, and prepared to blow. Seeing this, and knowing at the first word he would give another hateful blast, she stopped and peeped in, as if in doubt how to proceed. After a moment's excruciating suspense, though trembling from head to foot, she made a circle around him, and went to the mantle. After standing there, in such perfect silence, for a minute or more, mechanically passing her hands over the board, as if searching for some article, her pent-up rage became too intense for longer suppression, she suddenly turned, with a startling, piercing gaze, and looked upon him, but dared not speak. There he was, motionless sitting before her with that frightful thing in hand, ready to blow, with his eye steadily fixed upon her, eagerly watching every movement and motion. It would not do to speak in an angry tone. She knew he would blow. Already she was equally as tired of the blowing as he was of the scolding. This state of affairs was entirely new. It was all unexpected. She could not understand it. For the first time in her married life she was at a loss how to act, and felt forced to silence. Again the sound of the insinuating laugh of the incorrigible boys floated through the quiet atmosphere, into the room, caused the violent, suppressed storm of rage, already heaving in her disturbed bosom, to break forth, and with her pointed finger jesticulating near his face, in rather a low, tremulous, squeaking voice, she said: "Now, ain't you a nice lookin' sight settin' there with that thing in your hand, makin' all this fuss. All the boys in town are here, 'round the yard, peepin' through the cracks, laughin' at us." To—o—o—o—t, toot, toot, to—o—o—o—o—o—t. "Hush that horrid noise; I can't hear myself talk." To—o—o—o—t, toot, toot, to—o—o—o—t. "You shall stop it, sir," as she, not very tenderly, seized his arm, and gave him a jerk. The old man, fully appreciating his perilous condition, as if with renewed youth, actively sprang from his seat, quickly moved across the floor, a time or two to keep out of her way, then backed up in the corner, never losing a note, but all the while sending forth the most terrible peals of toot, toot, to—o—o—o—t, to—o—o—o—t. Not being able to hear her own voice, nor endure any longer the hoarse, deafening music of the hideous bugle, she decided the best policy was to retreat, and, while indignantly leaving his presence, remarked: "You are the biggest old fool I ever saw." The husband, having patiently endured, for so many years, the most heartless scolding, seeing now that victory was his, gave a long sigh of relief, and breathed easy. Other similar scenes may have occurred, but, if so, the hero was firm, and within a few days had a quiet, amiable, lovely wife; none more happy and cheerful. I will tell your husband to get a horn. While relating the above, which consumed more time than expected, two beautiful little children, three and five years of age, came to the gate, and, with their innocent faces turned up, were gazing at me with the most intense interest. Madam, are these your children? "Yes, sir." They are beautiful and lovely. It is strange the good Lord permits such a wicked woman as you are to have them. It is a wonder he don't take them to heaven to live with the angels. You scold and curse, you chew tobacco, you don't belong to the church, have no Bible in the house, and don't want one. You can't read, and wont try to learn how. I mean no harm by this, Madam, but the time may come yet when you will weep tears of sorrow on account of your wickedness. The allusion to her children seemed to touch her deeply, and, as a tear came to her eye, she said: "I am sorry I can't read, and do want a Bible to put my children's ages in." I was almost sorry the bugle story had been told, and for everything else said. Well, Madam, you shall have a Bible, intending, if her husband did not buy one, to make her a present. At the mill I related the bugle story, at which her husband laughed immoderately, and asked the reason why he had no Bible. "Bibles cost so much; I have never been able to pay for one." How much do you suppose a Bible costs? "About six or eight dollars." How much could you give for a Bible to-day? "I couldn't give much, because thirty cents is all the money I have in the world." I have no Bible with me for less than forty cents, but you may have one for that amount. He was amazed, as well as delighted. You are a member of the church? "Yes, sir." Take this book home, and read it. Read it every day, more or less. Read it to your wife. Live the life of a Christian. When she gets mad and scolds don't you scold back at her. After a while you may influence her to become a Christian. While at Conference, in Mobile, eight months afterward, a minister of the gospel, from that part of the State, stopped me in the aisle of the church, and said: "The lady to whom you told the horn story has been converted, joined the church, and is a shouting Methodist."

Fraternity and Union.

MR. EDITOR: The first of these, when sincere, is desirable on account of its pleasure and profit, but when it originates from any other motive than friendship and good will, it is neither pleasant nor profitable. To come direct to the question: Are the ministers and members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, sincere in their profession of fraternal good will toward the Methodist Episcopal Church, South? I think not. I fear a desire for members, power and influence controls them, they having tried absorption and failed, then resorted to disintegration, and spent more than a million of dollars to separate and divide the Church South. In 1869, Bishops Janes and Simpson appeared at St. Louis, at the May meeting of our Bishops, proposing a union with the Church South. With the church, guilty of the great sin of slavery, and super-added to the sin of slavery the unpardonable sin of rebellion against the United States Government, these unrepenting slave owners, these rebels are good enough now to unite with them, without repentance! Ah! they learned from sad experience they had access to but one class in the South, and that class composed mainly of one race. Now if they can form a union with the Church South, that will give them a prestige in the South, they never could have without it. My conviction is, the desire for fraternity is for organic union finally. The desire for members, power, influence, and prestige in the South, are the motives for fraternity. To unite with the Church South, would be a cheap and easy victory. It would be tying the prey to the jaws of the wolf. They would have a majority of Bishops and a majority in the General Conference, they would pass whatever laws for our Government they might desire. We would be powerless, completely at their mercy. Deliver me from falling into the hands of those who disregard constitutional law. If fraternity in this instance means Christian affection and good will, I am in favor of it. If it means or leads to organic union, I am opposed to it. The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was never more prosperous than at the present. We need no organic union. We desire fraternity if it is sincere and only intended to convey our sympathy and good will to Christians of other communions and theirs to us. But in this case if fraternity means or leads to organic union I am opposed to it.

Distribution of the Conference Fund.

MR. EDITOR: There is considerable agitation on the subject of the distribution of the "Conference Fund," and it seems to me, that we have a better law now, than any change yet suggested. It is Christian charity; eminently a charity. It is not a "life insurance." The amounts contributed is the free will offering of the church, to her needy and disabled servants and their families. Doubtless these faithful men and their families, deserve this assistance, and have a claim to it; still, it is simply a debt of love. If we change our manner of appropriating these funds, so as to pay according to time of service we will often find, worthy, needy men the sufferers thereby. I especially object to one feature of Bro. M. S. Andrew's plan in the Nashville Advocate, viz.: That the widows of deceased preachers receive only half this amount allowed a superannuated preacher. If any change be made in this matter, let it be in favor of the widow. They are more dependent and helpless than their husbands and often have suffered more for the sake of the gospel. Let the law remain as it is. Try to get discreet men on your boards of finance, and let them in their godly judgment distribute according to the necessities of the claimants.

The important part of the matter is to get the money to distribute; and I believe that among the well informed of our church the Disciplinary plan, as we now have it, will succeed, if faithfully followed.

CAMDEN AND SOUTH CHAPEL, MISSISSIPPI CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: Our second quarterly meeting was held at Camden last Saturday and Sabbath. We had a refreshing time. The three sermons of the presiding elder were effectual. The sacramental service was precious. The love-feast was stimulating. The Spirit was present in the Quarterly Conference. Considering the great scarcity of money in the community, the financial report was very good. A new organ and lamps had been purchased for the church at Camden. The Sunday-school is flourishing. Prayer meetings and church Conferences, though not well attended, are interesting and profitable. Backsliders are returning to the Lord. Some hitherto idlers in the vineyard propose henceforth to be workers. We are laboring for and expecting the conversion of souls. May this be the year when the seed sown by faithful men during the past few years will spring up and bear fruit.

Death has not failed to claim victims from among us. About the first of March Mr. Steven Wilson, from near Way's Bluff, was taken. He was not a member of the church at the time of his death, but his trust was in Jesus. He was seventy-one years of age. On the nineteenth of the same month Mother Haston, aged eighty-three, widow of a deceased minister of the Protestant Methodist Church, was transferred to the church triumphant. She resided about six miles from this place. Mrs. Ellie Aden, wife of Mr. William Aden, of this place, died, in a woman's hospital, New York, March 26, and was buried at Camden, April 1. She was only twenty-one years old, and had been married about two years. Though a member of the church, she had forsaken the Lord, until he caused her to pass through affliction's furnace. Her sufferings were great for some months, and only ended in her refined spirit taking its flight to glory. She was a patient sufferer, and her death was triumphant.

Other saints are lingering. The Lord is preparing them for a home in heaven, and keeping them here to light up our pathway as we follow on. A visit to such is soul-cheering.

The general health of our community is remarkably good. Those who have fallen were taken by chronic diseases.

Owing to the continuous rains the crop prospect, except oats, is not very flattering. Our farmers are faithfully at work, however, and we trust they will be awarded by an abundant harvest. We are sure they will, if they pay their vows unto the Lord.

EVERGREEN AND BAYOU ROUTE CIRCUIT, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: My family reached here on March 21, so we are snugly domiciled for the year, with something in the pantry to eat. So far we have been very kindly treated by all denominations. "May brotherly love continue to abound," etc. We are all well pleased with our new home, and the outlook for the year. The congregations are increasing all the time. "O for a closer walk with God" is my prayer till we shall see this land of beauty and fertility consecrated to God. We have many good people here, who are doing all they can to promote the interest of the church, and then we have some who are in the indifferent class; the latter is in great danger—"neither hot nor cold." Big Cane and Lloyd's Bridge are the extreme appointments. Distance apart, thirty-five miles. The former is now under water. As the water is fast receding, we hope to resume our work there soon. The thermometer is eighty-four degrees this evening, and spring is fairly upon us, and work is being pushed forward with a vim. The fields are beginning to look verdant. With all the attractive features of this land of fertility and beauty, it does not fully wean us from the good people of old Caddo circuit. How they cluster around our memory while we write this!

PONCHATOULA MISSION, LA.

MR. EDITOR: The second Quarterly Conference of Ponchatoula mission embraced the twenty-second and twenty-third instant, at Springfield. Bro. Little was with us, and presided with his usual efficiency. His pulpit efforts were able, edifying and profitable. Bro. Little dedicated our church at Springfield, which is free from all incumbrance. We offered resolutions which were adopted, for the building two other churches. The attendance of official members was very small, but the congregations on Sunday and Sunday night filled the house.

A Religion of the Affections Only.

It is a very wrong criterion of the reality and degree of our religion, to judge of it only by the exercise of the affections. Some persons, of excitable natures, are easily moved to joy and sorrow, hope and fear. The power of poetry or eloquence, of sights of distress or rapture, over their feelings, as irresistable, while, at the same time, their judgments are not proportionately employed, their wills not in the same measure engaged, and their conscience but little moved. Take, for instance, the sentimental readers of novels: how they fits they are melted into tears, or excited to ecstacies; yet how idle and unemployed are all the other faculties of the soul. There is no virtue in all this, it is mere sympathetic emotion. Now look at the philanthropist; he may not be a man of tears, or of strong and vivid emotions of any kind, but he is a man of principle. His understanding comprehends the circumstances of some case of deep distress, and he judges it right to pity and relieve it. His heart, though not wrought up to extreme anguish so as to fill his eyes with tears and his mouth with loud lamentation, feels for the miserable object; his will resolutely determines to help the sufferer, and his conscience, which would condemn him if he did not, approves the determination. You will particularly notice what constituted the virtue of the good man: not wholly the emotional excitement, for there was very little but the dictates of the judgment, the determination of the will, and the action which was performed under these conjoint powers. So it is in religion, which consists partly of the exercise of all the faculties, but chiefly in the judgment, will, and conscience. The heart is, of course, engaged, for we must love God and hate sin; we must delight in Christ and fear the wrath to come; but the amount of vivid emotion is of little consequence compared with an enlightened judgment showing us clearly what is right and wrong; a determined will to avoid the evil and perform the good; and a tender conscience shrinking from the least sin. Emotion is, to a certain extent, instinctive, involuntary and irrepressible. Not so with judgment, will and conscience. It is not, therefore, the amount of feeling, but of willing and doing, and approving or condemning, that determines the state of religion. From all these, it will be seen that the emotional part of religion may be, and is, by many overestimated. The question is not merely what we can feel, but what we can do, for Christ—not how many tears we can shed, but how many sins we can mortify; not what raptures we can experience, but what self-denial we can practice; not what happy frames we can enjoy, but what holy duties we can perform; not simply how much we can luxuriate at a sermon or at a sacrament, but how much we can exhibit of the mind of Jesus in our intercourse with our fellow-men; not only how far above earth we can rise to the bliss of heaven, but how much of the love and purity of heaven we can bring down to earth; in short, not how much of rapt feeling we can indulge, but how much of religious principle we can bring to bear on our whole conduct.—Rev. John Angell James.

"IS LIFE WORTH LIVING?"

Is life worth living? Yea,
So doth the Christian say,
To whom the world is naught,
Beyond a passing thought,
As on his pilgrim way
He journeys day by day,
Doing the busy round
Of duties where he's found,
His heart meanwhile not here,
But in a nobler sphere.

Is life worth living? Yea,
Let God's redeemed say;
For though by man came death
And sin with tainted breath,
Its direful wage doth bring,
Christ has removed its sting,
And brought us in its place
A plenitude of grace.

Is life worth living? Yea.
Then let us live to-day
A deep and earnest life,
With holy motives rife,
Fraught with that pure desire
That truth and love inspire,
To serve our God with zeal,
And work for other's weal.

Is life worth living? Yea,
Through an eternal day
The life of faith begun
On God's beloved Son,
Will last with ceaseless flow,
And we shall fully know
The meaning of that love
That brought him from above.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

It is not easy to describe the feelings of a young preacher when late at night at the close of the Conference he hears his name read out to an unknown and distant field of labor, especially if, as in my case, it is out of the bounds of his Conference, and cuts him off from all his friends and associates and thrusts him among strangers in a new and rude backwoods country. It was only a short struggle, however, for before I had sought sleep I had renewed my vow of consecrating and giving myself afresh to the cause of my Master, and like a child as I was, soon fell into a calm and sweet repose on the bosom of my Father and my God. Early next morning, having stored in my saddle-bags what clothes and books could be carried, I bade a hasty farewell to old friends, and cheerfully started for my circuit—the nearest appointment being over 350 miles south. Stopping a few days at my father's, which lay directly upon my route, my wardrobe and purse were overhauled and replenished, and then my journey was resumed. Here Bro. Regan joined me, as he had been assigned to a circuit adjoining mine. We crossed the Tombigbee River at Butler's Landing where several years before the memorable old Ark had landed me and my deceased Uncle Robert and his fellow-soldiers returning from the war. What a train of thoughts and feelings came over me there! I was leaving home and all my early friends. The joyous group of soldiers who so kindly helped and cheered their loved Major, and his little nephew had disappeared; he whom we all so admired had gone to his grave in peace and hope, and his precious sister, my own dear mother, who had watched like a guardian angel over his last lingering hours had never recovered from the shock, and had followed him in sweet submission to the chastening rod held by the hand of Infinite Love; and that same love had made these afflictions the means of arousing and converting my father and his family. And here I stood on my mission of love and mercy to bear the message of gospel grace to others far away.

It is my duty to preach to sinners, why not do so about home? Plenty of them there. If it is a duty to go from home, why go so far? Why leave a civilized, intelligent, and appreciative section where libraries and scholastic facilities for improvement abound, for a rude and comparatively ignorant and unappreciative herd of men indifferent to little else than the selfish ends actuating all their hearts and energies? and finally, if removing to a new field is proper, why move so often? I move every year; would not a settled pastorate—at least one of several years—be far more pleasant to the pastor and profitable both to pastor and to flock.

To all those and similar inquiries I might reply, as a Methodist: the economy of Methodism has established the itinerant system of diffusing the gospel as a great fundamental element of church-extension. The further facts are, that our blessed Lord commanded it originally. He emphasized it. When in the act of leaving his disciples, and when he would condense into the fewest and strongest words possible, and thus summarize his sovereign will and their pre-eminent duty, he said: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." His ministers must do this. Every other interest must be subordinated to this. The ministry, which does not recognize this obligation, and the laity who do not encourage and sustain their preachers in performing the work, thereby fail in fealty to Christ and love to men. They localize their charity and fossilize their church. To speak out plainly, I doubt if a young preacher should remain longer than two consecutive years in the same station. It is better for him and for his charge that he should have the inspiration of new scenes and new hearers. In two years he is likely to have diminished and perhaps exhausted his store of pulpit provender. And the fact that if he would save his hearers he must lose none of his time, will likely stimulate his zeal. He must work soon and in earnest for quick and effective results. It gives him a chance to look over, revise, and perfect the notes and sketches of the sermons he has preached the two past years. "But it cuts him off from books and study." By no means. He can carry with him on his circuit most of the books he is likely to need, and can find others in the libraries of his people. Or if he should need some he can not find there he can order them as he needs them from the Publishing House, and when done with them sell them to his members. I know this can be done, even on poor and large circuits; and generally this is better than to collect a miscellaneous library. When a library is needed it can always be had. No danger of ceasing to make books; and the new are generally cheaper and better than the old editions. Some preachers read too many books. They ought to perfect themselves as far as possible in such studies as pertain to the great end of their vocation. The Bible first, and all the time. Its doctrines, history, evidences, its real literal import, its institutes, etc., and the original languages in which it was written; and yet I could not advise all to spend the time and means necessary to a critical knowledge of these languages, because of the facilities already afforded for this purpose by commentators and biblical critics. A knowledge of the dead languages is chiefly to be prized by preachers for the knowledge it gives of the origin and import of English words derived from them. I refer to young preachers as they usually present themselves for admission into the Annual Conference, knowing there are exceptional cases as to age, taste, and capacity as well as facilities, which justify a more extensive course of study. It is a great mistake, however, to neglect or underestimate the very language the preacher has need for and constantly and necessarily must use. No smattering knowledge of the dead languages or any other department of learning, will condone for gross blunders in spelling, writing, or speaking our own noble mother-tongue.

Thorough mastery of English literature is a rare attainment. To read distinctly and correctly as to pronunciation and emphasis, and to speak naturally, with proper taste and force, ranks in speaking like charity among the graces—the greatest.

I wish I could punctuate and emphasize that impression indelibly upon every young preacher's mind. Let him strive to obtain a clear and distinct idea of what he wishes to impart to his hearers, and then express it in simple, pure English words—not too many of them—or repeat the same idea in synonymous words. Be sure to understand, and do not misconceive it. I once heard a promising young minister, in preaching to a large and intelligent audience from "The Lord is my high tower" (Ps. cxliv. 2), apply to the term tower the import of tour, and sail off grandly above the regions of storms "like the little eaglets on the back of the old voyager in aerial ocean, until the raging elements far below had sunk into repose." Grave judges, lawyers, and wise-looking old Methodists neither blushed nor smiled. This train of thought was the staple and gist of the sermon, and it was pronounced an eloquent one. I took the liberty afterward to suggest his misconception of the text in private. I do not think he was grateful—it spoiled his best sermon. He did not see any difference. He sailed about awhile, and married an excellent girl—she and their eaglets were too heavy for him—indeed he had got low down, was weary in wings, and could scarcely sustain himself when he married, and soon collapsed and located. In the far off country his remains are laid, while his widow returned to the old home. He grew great too fast and married too soon.

What has been said as to time refers especially to beginners. Ministers of mature age and experience might be appointed for a longer period to the same work if acceptable and useful, but I doubt the propriety of lengthening the time beyond the present disciplinary arrangement. Indeed, I incline to diminish rather than increase it. I speak exclusively for myself. Yet I am contented with the rule as it is, and am the more willing it should stay because the Bishops are not obliged to continue any man four years, and it gives a longer period for the course of study.

When this long episode began I was standing on the banks of the beautiful Tennessee River, about to cross over on my way to my mission in South Alabama.

John Bunyan's Wicket Gate.

You must have heard Mr. John Bunyan's description of how the pilgrims came to the wicket gate. They were pointed, you remember, by Evangelist to a light and a gate, and they went that way according to his bidding. A young man in Edinburg was very anxious to speak to others about their souls; so he addressed himself one morning to an old Musselburg fishwife, and he began by saying to her, "Here you are with your burden." "Ay," said she. He asked her, "Did you ever feel a spiritual burden?" "Yes," she said resting a bit, "I felt the spiritual burden years ago, before you were born, and I got rid of it, too; but I did not go the same way to work that Bunyan's pilgrim did." Our young friend was greatly surprised to hear her say that, and thought she must be under grevious error, and therefore begged her to explain. "No," said she, "when I was under concern of soul, I heard a true gospel minister, who bade me look to the cross of Christ, and there I lost my load of sin; I did not hear one of those milk-and-water preachers like Bunyan's Evangelist." "How," said our young friend, "do you make that out?" "Why, that Evangelist, when he met the man with the burden on his back, said to him, 'Do you see that wicket gate?' 'No,' said he, 'I don't.' 'Do you see that light?' 'I think I do.' 'Why man,' said she, 'he should not have spoken about wicket gates, or lights, but he should have said, 'Do you see Jesus Christ hanging on the cross? Look to him and your burden will fall off your shoulder.' He sent that man round the wrong way, when he sent him to the wicket-gate, and much good he got by it, for he was likely to have been choked in the Slough of Despond before long. I tell you, I looked at once to the cross, and away went my burden." "What said the young man, "did you never go through the Slough of Despond?" "Ah," said she, "many a time more than I care to tell. But at the first I heard the preacher say, 'Look to Christ,' and I looked to him. I have been through the Slough of Despond since that. But let me tell you, sir, it is much easier to go through that slough with your burdens off than it is with your burden on."

And so it is. Blessed are they whose eyes are only and altogether on the Crucified. The older I grow the more sure I am of this, that we must have done with self in all forms and see Jesus only if we would be at peace. Was John Bunyan wrong? Certainly not; he was perfectly right; she was describing things as they ought to be, and as I wish they always were. Still, experience is not always as it ought to be, and much of the experience of Christians is not Christian experience. It is a fact which I lament, but, nevertheless, must admit, that a large number of persons ere they come to the cross and lose their burden, go round about no end of a way trying this plan and that plan, with but very slender success after all, instead of coming straightway to Christ just as they are, looking to him and finding light and life at once. How is it, then, that some are so long in getting to Christ?—C. H. Spurgeon.

MISSIONARY.

—The North India Conference, Methodist Episcopal Church, is taking a hearty interest in the promotion of self-support. Two prizes were offered by the Conference for the best essays on "Self-support in the Native Church." The proposition at once awakened the attention of able writers both in our own and in other missions of North India. The prizes were won, among 24 competitors, by two members of our own mission. The first was taken by Rev. Isaac Fieldbrave, a superior native preacher, and the second by Mr. William Earny of the Mission Press at Lucknow. The essays were in Hindustani. It has been said, and doubtless with truth, that our own mission is foremost among the missions of India in education on this subject. Our missionaries seem to be doing all they can to enlighten the native members, in freeing them from the prejudice against contribution for religious objects, which more or less affects them in a reaction from the exacting demands of heathenism, and to develope in them a spirit of self-reliance, according to the ability they possess in the midst of their poverty.

—A letter received by Bishop Wiley informs us, says the Central Christian Advocate, that during Bishop Bowman's visit at Foochow, the generous Chinese merchant, Mr. T. Ahok, formally made the gift which he had promised for the purchase of the bank building for use of the college. The act was done in a very interesting way. It seems that a little surprise party was arranged. The active elders were invited to tea with the Bishop at Bro. Ohlinger's. Mr. Ahok came dressed in his mandarin rank costume. But the substantial part of the affair was a sealed envelope which the Bishop found to contain Mr. Ahok's subscription to the Anglo Chinese College in the form of three checks payable at different dates—two for three thousand dollars each, and one for four thousand dollars. No wonder that the good missionary, our Bro. Sites, on seeing this, exclaims: "Oh what a glorious example of beneficence toward the cause of Christian education." This gift is all from Mr. Ahok's own hard-earnings, for he began life a poor boy, and that too, without education.

—The Canada Presbyterian missionaries in Indore, India, have been very much hindered by the authorities of the city, who are under the influence of the Brahmins. The police arrested the missionaries for preaching in the streets; but they were speedily discharged on the representation of the agent of the governor-general that the Maharajah would not be permitted to do such things. Next, the police forbade any one standing to listen to preaching, on the plea that it blocked the highway; but, on appeal, the magistrate put a stop to this. The police, however, continued to annoy the preacher and threaten the crowd gathered to hear him; but the missionary persevered, driving, on several occasions, the molesters out of the crowd and threatening them with the penalties of the law.

—The Rev. James Sadler of the London Missionary Society, gives a sickening account of how the Chinese of Amoy destroy their infant daughters. It is not regarded as a crime except among the native Christians, who labor to put their heathen neighbors in possession of a conscience on this subject. The Amoy Congregational Union has decided to raise money to receive and support infants abandoned to die or given over to destruction, and many have already been saved and baptized. There are in some places foundling houses, established by the authorities; but they are carried on in such a way as to make a European wish that the poor children had died in their first days.

—The Moravian missionaries in Cashmere have again been foiled in their attempt to enter Ladak. They have been working and waiting patiently on the Border of Thibet several years, hoping to get a footing in the country of the Lamas, but thus far without success. The Maharajah, in answer to their most recent petition, says Ladak is a border province and the Lamas object to the presence of the missionaries. In a visit to Ladak, Mr. Hyde and his wife were well received by the people. Mrs. Hyde awakened great interest among the women, with whom she conversed in their own language. These missionaries have for several months been residing in Srinagar, the capital of Cashmere. At Kyelang, Missionary Redslob is translating the Gospel of Luke into the Thibetan.—New York Independent.

—The great religious awakening which we spoke of some months ago, as having begun in the Moravian missions on the Moskito Coast, is, we learn by the March number of Periodical Accounts, spreading. It has spread over the whole Moskito Territory and reached some Indian villages on Spanish ground. The Indians have flocked into Ephrata and Karata in such numbers that houses could not be found to accommodate them. In Karata there are two hundred candidates for baptism. Services in Ephrata have been held daily and there are only two persons in that place who have not decided to be Christians. The missionaries say, if they had force enough, they might possess the whole territory.

—The ladies of the Woman's Home Mission Society, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, of Ogden city, Utah, are preparing a silk quilt to be presented to Mrs. Senator Edmunds as a token of their appreciation of the efforts of her husband in securing a better civilization for Utah, and announces that they will embroider upon the quilt the names of all who will send them fifty cents, the money to be used in enlarging a school building.

—A new missionary agency for the Central provinces of India has been suggested. It is recommended that a missionary community, including men and women, should buy a village and develop native industries. Native customs should be respected, and the appearance of a European colony should be avoided. The missionaries should identify themselves with the people and exercise a moral influence.

—The new hospital at Tientsin, North China, has already received two hundred in-patients, all of whom find their own food and clothing. Out-patients are still cared for at the Memorial Temple and number about five hundred. This Institution, although under the auspices of the London Missionary Society, received for its building fund from the Chinese £1,200.

—The Chautauqua Foreign Missionary Institute invites all friends of Home and Foreign, in every denomination and from every land, to its fourth annual gathering at Lake Chautauqua, July 29 to August 3. Suggestions and inquiries will be welcomed by the Executive Committee. Latest reports of all missionary work may be sent to Rev. C. P. Hard, Buffalo, N. Y.

—The Society for the Propagation of the Gospel—a society of missions primarily to colonists and to the heathen also—counts up the total of its receipts for the past year at $658,370. It employs 593 missionaries.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—On the evening of April 17, Rev. Thomas Harrison closed the remarkable series of revival meetings in St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, Cincinnati, Ohio, which have extended over thirteen weeks. A thanksgiving service was held in the afternoon, and in the evening a short parting service. A careful count shows that the total number of persons who have been at the altar as seekers is between 1,700 and 1,800. Of this number 1,100 have been converted. The revival influence has at the same time extended to other churches, and meetings have been more frequently held and better attended in all the Protestant Churches than for many years. Statistics of additions have been collected which show that the actual number taken into the Protestant Churches since Mr. Harrison began his work in Cincinnati is about 5,000. From the beginning the meetings which he has conducted were attended by as many as the church could accommodate, and it was the rule rather than the exception that enough to make a very creditable congregation were turned away. It is the common testimony that no such meetings have ever been held in Cincinnati before. The upholstery and carpets of St. Paul's Church have been worn threadbare by such constant use. The means to refit the church have come almost without the asking, as also means to support the services.—Central Christian Advocate.

—A census of church-going Boston was made on Sunday, April 16, by representatives of the Daily Advertiser. The grand total of church attendance for the day was 121,909, 77,465 people going to the morning services and 47,411 to the afternoon and evening. This was divided as follows: At the Baptist Churches, 15,775; Congregational, 805; Congregational Trinitarian, 15,003; Episcopal, 12,040; Lutheran, 591; Methodist Episcopal, 9,336; Methodist (colored) 2,058; Presbyterian, 3,300; Roman Catholic, 49,335; Swedenborgian, 591; Unitarian, 9,326; Universalist, 2,337; non-sectarian, 382; union, 776; miscellaneous, 2,356. The Advertiser says: "Making a large allowance for those who attended more than one session on Sunday, it is safe to estimate that upward of 100,000 separate persons, or more than one fourth of the whole population of Boston, were present at church on that day. This number presents only the average attendance. In many cases the absence of pastors, notably the Methodist preachers who were at Conference, reduced the attendance, but on the other hand, the weather was fine. Consequently, while the separate statements of each church may not show the facts which might be necessary for a fair comparison between them, the aggregate attendance at all the churches was quite up to the average."

—Letters from Paris say that the movement for separation of church and State is gaining strength in France. Upward of one hundred deputies have assured M. Boysset of their willingness to support his proposition for the repeal of the Concordat. If M. Boysset's motion should be adopted, the result would be the suppression of the budget of police worship after this year and the putting of all religions on a separate and independent footing, and Catholic Bishops and priests would be no more to the State than the Rabbis or even the ministers of the Free Churches. M. de Freycinet is strongly opposed to the abolition of the Concordant, and desires to have it maintained, as the best thing possible for France. In the debate which has taken place on the motion some contended that it was an international treaty and could not be abrogated by France without previous negotiations with the Vatican. The majority, however, seem to hold that it is only a French law and can be repealed whenever France is tired of it.—New York Independent.

—Burial scandals in Anglican parishes are quite as numerous now as before the bill was adopted giving rights of burial to dissenters. A rector recently refused to enter the name of a dissenter on the burial registry, because he had not been buried with the church services. The queen's bench, on appeal, ordered him to enter the name, but he left the matter to an assistant. The court has now issued a peremptory order to the rector to enter the name, as he alone is empowered to do so.

—A young Zulu in this country, aiding Rev. Mr. Pixley, missionary of the American Board, in carrying a translation of the Bible through the press, united with the Congregational Church in Auburndale, Mass., March 5. His grandmother was the first native convert of the mission.

—The church membership of the Broadway Tabernacle in New York city on January 1, 1882, was 1,052; added in 1881, 59; in the ten years of Dr. Taylor's pastorate, 948. The salary of Dr. Taylor has been raised by the church to $16,000. Not a pew, and rarely a seat, can be had in the church.

—Of the Ritualists of the Anglican Church it is said that they "will neither submit, nor secede, nor be quiet," and ecclesiastical law in England costs so much that generally the impracticable Ritualist stays where he is, and does as he likes, until he is pleased to transfer himself to Rome.

—The plan of lay delegation in the Canada Methodist Episcopal Church, which has been adopted and ratified, goes into effect this Spring. Quarterly Conferences are electing lay delegates to the Electorial Conferences, which choose delegates to the General Conference.

—Rev. Barton Randle, a superannuated member of the Illinois Conference, died in Staunton, Ill., on January 2, in great peace, in the eightieth year of his age. Father Randle was one of the pioneers of Methodism in the West, and preached the first Methodist sermon in the State of Iowa.

—The hospital Sunday collections in London amount this year to $150,735, to which all churches—Protestant, Catholic, Greek, Jewish—contributed. The Church of England gave $114,315; Congregationalists, $10,225; Baptists, $5,275; and other bodies smaller amounts.

—The Presbyterian Churches of Philadelphia added to their communion roll, last year, 1,212 members on confession, and 1,143 on certificate. They raised for congregational purposes $359,293, and for other benevolent causes $193,218.

—Rev. Miss Anna Oliver, pastor of the Willoughby Avenue Methodist Church, Brooklyn, N. Y., has received an earnest invitation to take the pastorate of a prominent church in Colorado, but declines, believing it her duty to remain where she is.

—The English Congregational Jubilee Fund, which was commenced at the meetings of the Congregational Union held last October in Manchester, now exceeds the sum of $500,000.

Our Young People.

"THAT LITTLE HAT."

I find it in the garden path,
Its little crown half full
Of wilted flowers, where's the rogue
Who dared my roses pull?
I find it on the roadside there,
The flowers tossed away,
And in the crown, packed carefully,
A loaf of stone and clay.

I find it in the dotsied field,
Or hidden in the clover,
Inspected by the wandering bees,
And crawled by insects over.
I find it on the old barn door,
Or in the manger resting,
Or swinging from the beams above,
Where cooing doves are nestling.

I find it 'neath my busy feet
Upon the kitchen floor,
Or lying midway up the stairs,
Or by my chamber door.
I find it in, I find it out,
'Neath table, lounge, or chair,
The little, shabby, brimless thing,
I find it everywhere.

But on the curly, golden pate,
For which alone 'twas meant,
That little restless, curly head,
On mischief always bent,
O baby boy, this problem solve,
And tell me, darling, whether
Your roguish pate and this old hat
Was ever age together.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: As I have not written any letter to the ADVOCATE this year, I thought I would write one. I wrote a letter to the ADVOCATE when I was eight, nine, ten, eleven and twelve years old. I do not go to day-school, as there is none close enough for me to walk. We had a Baptist Sunday-school, but they let it fall through; they have a good Methodist Sunday-school at Madison, I wish I could go there to Sunday-school. I have planted a good many flower seeds this spring, and they are coming up now, and I have two hens with twelve little chickens apiece, making twenty-four in all. I love to read the ADVOCATE, especially the letters from your little friends. I think it very kind in you to let the little folks have a corner in your good paper. Now, as I expect you are tired of me by this time, I will close: please excuse all mistakes, hoping to see my letter in your little friend,

I remain as ever, your little friend,

JENNIE E. COLEMAN.

Swallows.

The swallows, I believe, are favorites with every one, and it is not difficult to understand why they should be so. They are interesting to us not only as friendly, innocent little birds, but are endeared to us by the mention made of them in the Bible—for everything mentioned there must be of interest, just as those things referred to in all letters of very dear friends become objects of interest or affection. The swallows are mentioned several times in this precious book, and always favorably, as when they are referred to as being wise little birds, and knowing the time of going and coming, that they may escape the cold blasts of the north, or the intense heat of the south. Jeremiah says: "The turtle and the crane and the swallow observe the time of their coming, but my people know not the judgment of the Lord"—meaning to rebuke those who live in sin and neglect seeking pardon of God while they have time. It seems unreasonable, and very sad, that while tiny birds are careful of their own safety, we, who know the dangers awaiting the unforgiven soul, should, in so many cases, take no care for it at all, and forget that we may put off seeking safety until it is too late.

The swallows are never too late. They never perish by putting off. At a certain season, with one accord, they all rise in the air and turn toward a safer country, never, however, forgetting to return when a proper season invites them back to their old haunts, and even to their old nests. The passage in Proverbs referring to the migratory habits of the swallow would teach us that the judgments of God are just, and never come without a cause, so that, if we would escape his chastisement, we must live lovingly near him. The verse reads: "As the bird by wandering, as the swallow by flying, so the curse causeless shall not come." Let us obey him in love, that we may not grieve him and compel him to chastise us.

The Psalmist alludes to the swallow, when afar from the holy city, and envies the little bird, which, with greater privilege than his own, may live under the shadow of God's sanctuary: "Yea, the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young; even thine altars, O, Lord of Hosts, my King and my God." Hezekiah, when in deep grief, says: "As a crane, or a swallow, so did I chatter." These words may refer to the flutterings and moanings of the chimney swallow, with which we are all familiar, as we know of no other variety of these birds to which the words of the prophet would apply. We feel, then, attached to the swallow, because it is a bird mentioned in God's Letter, and also because they are such innocent, domestic little things, building under our roof, swinging up under our gables with food for the row of mouths open to receive it, darting through the air to feed the little ones, chattering so early and winging so late; always so busy, always harmless, always in time—doing the work God gives them to do with quick, cheerful wings, and setting us all lessons of innocence and obedience—as one of the nearest and dearest of the Bible birds.—Georgiana Klingle in New York Observer.

Our Candy-Pull.

We lived quite a distance from the city, and had not many neighbors, so our winters, instead of being gay, were generally very quiet. We had several fine hills for coasting and enjoyed that very much moonlight nights, but after the snow disappeared and the cold weather continued, we decided to have one grand "candy-pull," the last of the season, and invited all our young friends; so we sent out cunning little invitations on calling cards; and Thursday, at half-past seven, a beautiful, clear, cold evening, our guests began to arrive.

First, Hattie and John Hosmer, then the four Clifford girls, Jennie, Blanche, Annie and Mabel; then the Hamlin twins, as they were called, two boys aged fifteen, and looking so much alike that Charlie was constantly being taken for George, and vice versa, and, lastly Maggie Miller, a lovely, golden-haired little girl, and a general favorite among us all; and my two brothers, Theodore and Harold, and myself, made just one dozen to laugh and have a good time generally in our large kitchen making molasses candy. We had the "six little cooks" for our guide, a splendid book for beginners in the art of cooking.

The kettle had been on the stove for sometime, and the molasses was rapidly getting to that consistency where it may be tried, in a little cold water; and if we never tested our candy before, it was tested most effectually that time; finally, it was pronounced "done," and one of the boys poured it into tins already buttered for the purpose, and we put it out-doors to cool, then came in to wash our hands preparatory to pulling it. After that we were constantly running to the door to test it until it was pronounced cool enough to take into our hands. Each had a large piece, and such a time as we had pulling it, the twins never having pulled candy before; it stuck to their hands so, they were obliged to put it down, but all the rest went vigorously to work until we had long, creamy, elastic ropes of candy, and put it on the table to cut, where each, armed with a knife, soon cut it into nice little mouthfuls, and put them in rows on buttered plates to get crisp.

In the meantime we told stories, and ate apples and nuts, until ten o'clock, and then our party dispersed, each laden with a plate of candy, and though many went home with aprons minus their freshness, and faces besmeared with molasses—we felt repaid by the enjoyment we had had, and the success of our last candy-pull.—Christian at Work.

Milly's Hard Place.

"Mamma," said Milly, coming in from school, with a flushed face, and eyes which bore the traces of tears, "I wish you'd let me leave Miss Mathews' school. I've been kept in again; and my diary is disgraceful. Miss Susie Mathews says she's ashamed of me."

Mamma put down the work she was busy with, and gathered her little girl into her lap.

"What have you done that is naughty to-day?" she said, tenderly.

"O," said Milly, sobbing, "I whispered in my geography class, and I wrote Mary Haywood a note, and when I missed my grammar lesson I parried, and said I didn't care."

"So my little girl deserved the bad marks, and the keeping in, and the teacher's reproof," said the mother, very sorrowfully. "Milly, why are you so often troublesome at school; you are a good girl at home."

"I hate rules," said Milly, opening her blue eyes very wide.

"So do the convicts in the great, stone prison, where papa goes on Sundays to teach the Bible, Milly. One of them said last Sunday afternoon that if the law hadn't been so strict he wouldn't have broken it. It is hating rules which has brought most of those poor men to their gloomy cells."

Milly looked serious. She had never thought of comparing herself with the prisoners.

"Unless we keep rules, dear, and love to keep them, we are always unhappy. Only those people who learn to mind ever became fit to command. By-and-by, if you overcome this opposition to law, you will find that the law and you are so friendly that you will never think about it at all. In the meantime you have some hard places before you, and the best way is to try to overcome their difficulties."

"Will you help me, mamma?"

Surely I will, my child; but there is one stronger than I, and you must seek his aid."

Together the mother and child knelt in the twilight, praying to Jesus for pardon and peace. Milly rose from her knees, feeling that though she had done wrong, the Lord would help her to do better.—Christian Intelligencer.

THE WOODPECKER AS A PIANIST.—A close observer of birds and their habits is convinced that the peculiar sound made by a woodpecker with its bill is intended as a substitute for vocal music, the bird selecting one particular spot upon the trunk or bough of the tree, which spot is naturally sonorous by the wood being more or less hollowed by decay. The bird returns to this precise spot continually during the day, and produces the sound by striking on the tree with its bill, the stroke being repeated with a rapidity that is really incomprehensible, for it quite eludes the eye. It is effected by a vibratory motion of the head, but the vibrations are so quick they look like a single motion. After short pauses this stroke is again and again renewed, sometimes for several minutes together. During each interval the woodpecker looks round it and below it with evident delight and with an apparent challenge of admiration. The beautiful crimson crest is more or less erected. The whole performance evidently takes the place of song in other birds. The nest is not in the same tree as that struck by the bill of the male. Similar sonorous spots in the trees of the neighborhood are selected if available, so the observer concludes the hen bird, as she sits on the nest, is serenaded from different directions with as much variety in the sound as the change of tree may produce. This is the only case among the feathered tribes where instrumental music is practiced.

GRIEVED HIS DEAD MOTHER.—To every dying mother it would go far to take away the bitterness of parting from her children, to know they would remember her as sweetly and dutifully as the boy mentioned below. A writer in the Sunday-School Advocate says:

I read a very pretty story the other day about a little boy who was sailing a boat with a playmate a good deal larger than he was. The boat had sailed a good way out into the pond, and the big boy said: "Go in, Jim, and get her. It isn't over your ankles, and I've been in after her every time."

"I daren't," said Jim. "I'll carry her all the way home for you, but I can't go in there; she told me not to."

"Who is she?"

"My mother," said Jim, softly.

"Your mother? Why, I thought she was dead," said the big boy.

"That was before she died, Eddie and I used to come here and sail boats, and she never let us come unless we had strings enough to haul them in with. I am not afraid—you know I'm not—only she didn't want me to, and I can't do it."

Editorial Correspondence.

The trip up, by way of Mobile and Montgomery, was a pleasant one; the time from New Orleans to Nashville about twenty-four hours. Starting with such good company as Drs. C. G. Andrews, C. W. Carter, J. B. A. Ahrens, and W. H. Foster, Esq., we picked up other delegates on the route, and so had a good social time. Our old friend and fellow-citizen, now a resident of Nashville, S. J. Keith, Esq., met the writer at the depot, and we were soon at home with his excellent family, in a spacious house, surrounded with broad grounds, adorned with blue grass, branching trees and flowering shrubs. Bishop and Sister Keener are our fellow-guests in this hospitable mansion.

Our eye was perfectly fresh for Nashville, as we had never seen it before. It is much such a city as we had anticipated. A place of rocks, of solid-looking people and buildings, and considerable enterprise. There is much blasting of rock, keeping up a sort of cannonade all day, and new buildings are going up here and there. The hills are round about the city on every side, and the prospects pleasing and novel to one from Louisiana, and especially from New Orleans.

Of course we have taken a preliminary and somewhat outside view of Vanderbilt. A ride through the campus, with Bishop McTyeire to guide and explain, impressed us greatly with the beauty of the grounds, their tasteful adornment, and the architecture and size of the various structures. No picture, that we have seen, does justice to the work that has been wrought here in a very few years. And then the views from the University, and many nooks and vistas within the area, can not well appear at all in any engraving that gives an outline of the whole. We paused for a few minutes before the graves of Bishops McKendree and Soule. Their resting-place is a fitting one, and their names here recorded, in enduring stone, will be felt and honored always.

The new McKendree Church looks well. The spire may be rather high and somewhat too ornate, but, on the whole, its architecture is pleasing. The main auditorium is not yet ready, and we have not had a glimpse of it. It will be ready for dedication in a few days. The General Conference holds its sessions in the basement, and is comfortably accommodated. There is, however, but little room for other than delegates.

On Wednesday morning, May 3, the General Conference was called to order by the venerable Bishop Paine. He is looking very feeble, indeed, but he occupied the chair during the most of the morning, and conducted the business of organization with admirable promptness and success. Dr. T. O. Summers, the secretary of every session of our General Conference, was re-elected by a unanimous and rising vote. Apparently his race is nearly run. He is extremely feeble, and his face is pallid as death itself. He was in his place in the Conference-room the first two days, directing his assistants, and speaking a few words occasionally. He was absent, however, this Friday morning, and is reported to be quite prostrate. It is to be wished most earnestly that he may rally at least to witness the end of this session, but possibly even this may not be. Everybody loves and honors Dr. Summers, and his services to the church have been long and exceedingly valuable. It would seem almost impossible for us to do without him, but God knows best.

After organization, on Wednesday morning, the Bishops' address was read by Bishop McTyeire. It was a statesman-like document, touching upon the most vital interests of the church, and reviewing the condition and needs of the various institutions and enterprises of the denomination. After the reading of the Bishops' address, Bishop Paine arose, and read a brief paper, in which he asked to be relieved from future active service. Nothing more affecting, or more sublimely impressive, has ever occurred at a General Conference. Sixty-five years an itinerant Methodist preacher, and a Bishop for thirty-six years! American Methodism has produced no purer and no greater man than Bishop Paine. Evidently his sun is almost down, but it is setting in wonderful splendor. Full of years and of useful labors, and ripe in wisdom and in grace, he waits serenely for the final summons. The other Bishops are in working condition. Bishop Kavanaugh has not changed in twenty years. In his eighty-first year he enjoys perfect health, preaches constantly, and the duties of the chair do not seem to weary him. Bishop Pierce has gained in flesh, color and voice since we met him, four or five months ago, and presides without apparent difficulty. Bishop McTyeire has a hardy and robust look, and appears capable of any amount of work. Bishop Keener moves and labors vigorously, but looks rather overtaxed. The Bishops, in their address, recommend the election of three additional Bishops. Three or four will be the number, probably.

The Publishing House report was received and read on Thursday. Every member had a copy, and followed the secretary as he read—a long reading and a curious thing to see, every one apparently absorbed, and all quiet for once. Permission has been granted Dr. Redford to have a written statement from him read before the General Conference, and referred to the Committee on "Publishing Interests." It is hoped that the matter will quietly end with this, but there may be a breeze—not a storm, we hope. The report as to the condition of the Publishing House is regarded as satisfactory, and very gratifying. More than one hundred thousand dollars of the debt has been liquidated during the past four years, and the House is doing a brisk and prosperous business. The present bright outlook is in deep contrast with the state of affairs at Atlanta four years ago.

This General Conference is composed of the best material of the church. At no previous General Conference have we seen a finer body of men. Thus far the order has been exceptionally good, and an excellent spirit prevails. There is promise of an agreeable session, and of a tolerably short one. At this writing, Friday night, May 5, the committees are organized, and at work, and a great number of papers, memorials and resolutions have been referred. In a few days the reports of committees will be pouring in, and then the talking and the voting will be in full flow.

Nashville hospitality is generous. The committee on homes, of which Dr. R. A. Young is chief, manage things with system and with patience. The purpose is to accommodate and satisfy all, and there is no complaint. Dr. Fitzgerald, the busy and accomplished editor, is bringing out the Daily Christian Advocate in good style. Our columns will, of course, be largely filled with matter taken from it.

Since writing the above Dr. Summers has passed away. Dr. T. O. Summers, D. D., LL.D., died this Saturday morning, April 6, at six o'clock. At the meeting of the Conference this morning Bishop McTyeire, from the chair, announced the sad tidings, and paid a just tribute to the character of the deceased. Bishop Keener, on taking the chair for the day, dwelt in fitting terms upon the services which Dr. Summers had rendered to the church, and Dr. Kelley, who was with him in his last hours, spoke feelingly of his recent illness, and the circumstances attending his death. He had not been conscious for nearly fifteen hours, and his last words were: "The faith, the faith." A committee was appointed to arrange for the funeral, and out of respect to his memory the General Conference adjourned. At this writing it is understood that the funeral services will take place in the Vanderbilt Chapel to-morrow, Sunday afternoon, at four o'clock. The General Conference will doubtless attend in a body, and the burial will probably be in the Vanderbilt grounds. Bishop Keener will preach the funeral sermon. Thus, by the representatives of our entire church, Dr. Summers will be carried to his burial, and by them will he be honored. He could not have chosen a more fitting time to enter into rest. He has fallen at the post of duty; has ceased "at once to work and live." The Daily American contains the following outline of Dr. Summers' life, which we believe is correct:

Rev. Dr. Thomas Osmond Summers was born near Carfo Castle, Dorsetshire, England, Oct. 11, 1812. He emigrated to the United States in 1830, and became a preacher in the Methodist Episcopal Church, at first in Virginia. In 1840 he went to Texas as one of nine ministers to constitute the first Conference there. In 1841 he joined the Alabama Conference, and as Secretary of Convention, at Louisville, Ky., assisted in organizing the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. By appointment he assisted in editing of the Southern Christian Advocate and in compiling a new hymn-book. In 1850 the General Conference elected him editor of their books and tracts and of the Sunday-school Visitor, and, in 1858, also of the Quarterly Review. In 1866 he was elected editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate, which position he occupied until 1871 when he was elected Professor of Systematic Theology in the Vanderbilt University. His writings include Commentaries on the Gospels and on the Acts of the Apostles; commentary on the Ritual of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South; a Treatise on Baptism, a Treatise on Holiness Sunday-school Teacher or the Catechetical Office; Talks Pleasant and Profitable, The Golden Censer, Scripture Catechism, (two volumes' Old and New Testament), Refutation of Thomas Paine's Theological Writings, and the enlargment and revisions of Watson's Biblical and Theological Directory. The deceased also edited numerous volumes for Sunday-school libraries, and also 400 or 500 volumes of books published at the Publishing House. He was one of the leading contributors to Johnson's Encyclopedia, published in New York. He was the editor of the Quarterly Review, established in 1879, and published at the Publishing House, from its first issue down to his death. It has proven under his management to be one of the finest literary productions published in the South. At the time of his death he was about to send to the press a work on Systematic Theology.

Many of his most valuable manuscripts were destroyed by the burning of the old Publishing House, in 1872, as well as a large library, that department having been in that portion of the building were the fire burned fiercest. Since then he had had a large number of books given to him until he accumulated another large library.

The deceased was the Secretary of every General Conference held since 1844, and was again complimented with that distinction at the present Conference, in which he sat two days, determined if possible, to live through it.

The deceased was a man of broad, liberal views, was always congenial, kind-hearted and charitable, and a thorough Christian gentleman. He leaves an invalid wife and one son, Dr. Thomas O. Summers. His two and only daughters met with accidental deaths when young, one of them having been accidentally drowned in the reservoir by falling from a parapet into a basin, while the other was killed by falling off a horse.

Deborah.

It is a pleasing and profitable task to go through the biographies of the women of the Bible. The types of female character, delineated in the Scriptures, seem to be illustrative of the passions which burn in the female heart. There are women noticed whose characters illustrate the passion of piety; others illustrate the passion of love, and others illustrate the passion of patriotism. The character of Deborah is one of the finest illustrations of patriotism that can be found in any literature. She is said to have been "a prophetess, the wife of Lapidoth, and she judged Israel." By this is "probably meant that she was the organ of communication between God and his people, and, on account of the influence and authority of her character, was accounted, in some sort, the head of the nation, to whom questions of doubt and difficulty were referred for decision." Her country, in the expressive language of Scripture, had been "mightily oppressed by the Canaanites for twenty years." The people generally appear to have sunk into a state of total discouragement under the vigorous oppressions of their foreign rulers. It seems that not a man in all Israel dared to raise his hand against the oppressors. So universal was the discouragement and so thorough was the oppression that it is doubted if "a shield or a spear could be seen among forty thousand in Israel. This would seem to be a most unfortunate time for a woman to be at the head of the nation. At this dark hour of her country's history, Deborah conceived the heroic purpose of driving her country's enemies off her country's soil. She summoned Barak, the chief of the tribe of Naphtali, and made known to him the will of God, that he should undertake his country's deliverance. He had become so disheartened by the condition of things that he refused to do anything whatever unless she would accompany him. Seeing that the success of the movement depended upon her own presence, with unconquerable resolution she took her place at the head of the armies of Zebulon and Naphtali. When the love of country, always strong and deep in the Hebrew bosom, was burning feeble and low, and the strong men were hiding themselves in the "by-ways," and all hearts quailing with fear, undaunted before the footmen and horsemen and chariots of Israel's proud invaders, this wife and mother went out from her quiet home "under the palm tree between Ramah and Bethel," infused her own indomitable spirit into Barak and her countrymen, and turned not back until there was not a man of the enemy left. Israel triumphed gloriously, and so did the woman that was at the head of Israel's hosts. Sweeping down the sides of Mt. Tabor, at the head of her little ten thousand, with the banners of Zebulon and Naphtali floating in the breezes, that blew up from the valley of Esdraelon, and the trumpets of the son of Abinoam blowing defiance in the faces of the multitudinous hosts of Sisera, this woman looks the very impersonation of patriotic daring. As we see her, with flushed cheek and flashing eye and streaming hair, snatching the blazonry of Israel from the tardy standard-bearer, and rushing forward into the midst of carnage and death, to incite her soldiers to nobler deeds of courage and higher acts of prowess in the destruction of the foe, we have the finest illustration of female patriotism that is on record anywhere. The story of Joan of Arc, with all the charm and fascination with which the wonderful Shakespeare has draped it, does not give such an exhibition of pure patriotism as is exhibited here, for, as it has been most beautifully said, "Deborah did not sink the woman in the warrior." When the tired soldiers gathered around her, at the close of the hard-fought day, and leaned upon their spears to rest their weary limbs, she was, in their estimation, a sublimer woman than when, in the morning, she marched forth at their head.

Her life, before this battle, demonstrated that she possessed the administrative ability of the civil rules and the wisdom of the judge. This battle demonstrated that she possessed the courage and strategy requisite for a great military leader. Her song of triumph, after the battle, demonstrated that she possessed a poetic genius of the highest order. The whole history reveals one of the brightest examples of the ardor and purity of female patriotism. Just look at this song, remarkable for being "one of the earliest and one of the sublimest poems in the world," and showing that woman walked with ease and grace upon the high places of poetry in the earliest age of literature. Read that poem recorded in the fifth chapter of the Book of Judges, and see if it does not surpass any war-song you have ever read. Homer, with his gods and heroes encircling the ill-fated Troy, has nothing to equal this song. Byron's Waterloo, Campbell's Hohenlinden, Tennyson's Light Brigade or Heavy Brigade, all are mere trash beside this sublime war-song of Deborah. Every line of this poem glows with enthusiasm. Every word pulsates with patriotic ardor. It marches on with heavier tread than did the hosts of Sisera. It speeds away on nimbler feet than did the fleet-footed princes of Issachar. Its curses roll like thunder. Its descriptions gleam like lightning flashes. Its commendations of the brave sons of Israel thrill the soul like the notes of a clarion. Its benedictions upon the wife of Heber fall like the dew upon the mountains of Gilboa. Why, you can almost feel the earth trembling, and see the hills melting, as the "Lord marches out of the field of Edom." You can almost hear the bleatings of Reuben's flocks, which he was keeping while his brethren were on the battle-field. You can almost see Dan's ships riding in safety in the harbor, while Zebulon and Naphtali "were jeopardizing their lives unto death in the high places of the field." You can see the "waters of Megiddo" swallowing the kings of Canaan. You can see the stars flashing their blinding fires into the faces of Israel's foes. You can hear the crash of the chariots, and the snortings of the horses, and the death-cry of the captains, as "that ancient river, Kishon," sweeps them to destruction. You can see the angel of vengeance stretching his hand over the withered Meroz. You can hear the very thug of the hammer that drove the nail through the temples of the proud Sisera. This victory song of Deborah is unrivalled. There is nothing like it, or equal to it, in a world of literature. "If we had no other proof of the strength of female character, and the capacity of female intellect," we have enough in this poetess and prophetess, this ruler and warrior, this "wife and mother in Israel." She stands now, as she has stood in all the past, "a perpetual monument to the intellectual and spiritual glory of woman."

General Conference Proceedings.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 3—FIRST DAY.

At nine o'clock the Conference was called to order by the venerable Bishop Paine, who requested Bishop Kavanaugh to open the Conference. Bishop Kavanaugh announced the 259th hymn, which was sung standing:

Draw near, O Son of God, draw near!

Bishop Kavanaugh then offered a fervent prayer.

Bishop Pierce read the 62d chapter of Isaiah, and Bishop Kavanaugh read the 3d chapter of St. Paul's letter to the Ephesians.

Bishop McTyeire gave out the 887th hymn,

I love thy kingdom, Lord,
The house of thine abode,

which was sung.

Dr. James Evans, of Georgia, then led in prayer.

Dr. T. O. Summers, secretary of the last General Conference, read the roll.

Dr. D. R. McAnally, of the St. Louis Conference, nominated Dr. T. O. Summers for re-election as secretary of the General Conference, who was elected unanimously by a rising vote.

Dr. T. O. Summers said that he could not let the moment pass without acknowledging the compliment bestowed upon him. He thought he would be able to do all that could be wished. He had made arrangements to have the work done efficiently and promptly.

Bishop Paine: "The only fear I have is that you will do too much. Please protect yourself."

Dr. Summers: "I wish nobody will ever say to me that I have been doing too much work. It is an insult to me. I can talk, lecture and quarrel." (Laughter.)

At the suggestion of Dr. Summers, Dr. John D. Vincil and Dr. W. M. Leftwich were elected assistant secretaries.

Dr. R. A. Young, in delivering the welcoming address, said: "I do not desire to consume the time of this Conference in making a lengthy welcoming address. A majority of the members of the General Conference have been welcomed heartily at the table of the Committee on Entertainment. They have all been welcomed, sir, to the hospitable homes of our citizens. They have been welcomed by the trustees of McKendree Church to this entire house of worship. So, my dearly beloved, you have been thrice welcomed. I must say to you that you will find competent parties to wait upon the General Conference, and also that we have present live pages. Where are the boys? (In response to this interrogatory, the boys came forward.) I call them up so you will know them. Their names are: Porter Adams, Charles J. Sawrie, Alexander Green Hunter, Frank Lupton and Felix Brown. These are the pages of the General Conference, and I hope you will use them. You will find a postmaster and telegrapher immediately in the rear of the house. Now, then, I have said all that is necessary to be said for the committee."

The question of the time of holding the sessions of the Conference was taken up, and Dr. J. B. West, of the Tennessee Conference, suggested that in view of the fact that improvements were being made in the auditorium of the church, which was to be dedicated next Sunday, the meetings would somewhat interfere with the work, and asked that the meetings be held, during the present week, from nine A. M. to twelve M., and made a motion to that effect.

Dr. J. B. McFerrin moved to amend by making the adjournment hour half-past twelve P. M. The amendment was agreed to, and the original motion, as amended, adopted.

The following resolution was presented and adopted:

Resolved, That the standing committees of this Conference be composed of one delegate from each Annual Conference, to be nominated by the respective delegations; and that the following be the committees: 1. On Episcopacy; 2. On Itineracy; 3. On Revisal; 4. On Sunday-schools; 5. On Missions; 6. On Boundaries; 7. On Education; 8. On Publishing Interests.

Dr. J. B. McFerrin moved the appointment of a Committee on Public Worship, and suggested as such committee the presiding elder of the Nashville district and the pastors of the city. His suggestion was accepted, and his motion carried.

Bishop McTyeire then read the address of the Bishops.

Bishop Paine arose at the conclusion of the reading of the address, and said:

To the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South:—Dear Brethren:—While joining heartily with my colleagues in the address you have heard, I beg your indulgence to make a few remarks of a personal character.

During nearly sixty-five years I have had the honor of being an itinerant Methodist preacher, and for thirty-six years a Bishop. In the General Conference of 1824 I was a delegate, and, as Bishop or delegate, have attended every session since then. For the confidence in my reliability, indicated by those facts, I wish to now return my most earnest gratitude to my much respected colleagues in the Episcopacy, between whom and myself the utmost cordial feelings have been unvaryingly maintained. I tender my thanks. They have generously supplied my lack of service by doing double duty.

And now, beloved brethren, worn down with age and infirmities, I ask to be permitted to retire from future active service. Permit me, in conclusion, to congratulate you upon the auspicious circumstances under which you have met, and to remind you of your high responsibility to God and his church.

Should it be allowed me in making this probably my last communication to a General Conference, to express the results of my experience and observations as to the doctrines and policy of our beloved Methodism, I would say, after devoting a life-time to the study of its doctrines, my conviction as to their scripturalness has strengthened, and my estimation of the importance of maintaining the essential features of its polity has increased.

I do most devoutly thank God that in early life I became a Methodist itinerant preacher, and have continued such. But above all I rejoice in the religious experience which Methodism presents as the privilege of its members, "the joy unspeakable, and full of glory."

To enjoy this, is the crowning glory of the Christian life. I rejoice in a thorough conversion, consciously attested by the witnessing spirit, a pure and consecrated daily life, and its end—if it can be properly said ever to end—the crown of glory that fadeth not away. For this culmination I shall beg calmly and with humble confidence to wait until the pains and infirmities of this life shall pass away. There may we meet again.

Long before the venerable Bishop had ceased reading the above, nearly all the members of the Conference were in tears. When he had finished the following verses were sung with deep feeling:

Through many dangers, toils and snares,
I have already come;
'Tis grace has brought me safe thus far,
And grace will lead me home.

The Lord has promised good to me,
His word my hope secures;
He will my shield and portion be,
As long as life endures.

Yes, when this flesh and heart shall fail,
And mortal life shall cease,
I shall possess, within the veil,
A life of joy and peace.

Rev. Dr. J. B. McFerrin, in tones indicative of deep feeling, arose and said:

I am so much overcome to take into consideration the paper read by the Senior Bishop. There should be a proper response prepared, and offered to the Bishop in the presence of the Conference. Our esteemed and distinguished brother, I might say father, has been long with us, was once a member of the Tennessee Conference, and has belonged to no other Conference but the Tennessee Conference. He is one of the few men—two or three—that voted to receive me into the Conference many long years ago. It has been my privilege, in my humble way, to be associated with him for more than fifty years. He always won the esteem of every member of our Conference. We all loved him, and we always loved him, and since he has been elevated to the Episcopacy we have always claimed him as a Tennessee Bishop. He has been in all our hearts, and we want to live with him, and die with him. While I say nothing to disparage any other Conference, nor dispute the claims of any other, still I hope that when God calls the spirit away, his body may be brought to Nashville, and be buried here—at the city where he commenced his work. We love him greatly, and all the church loves him. I should like to say much more, but my feelings will not allow me.

Rev. Dr. J. S. Key offered the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Resolved, That the Quadrennial Episcopal Address be received, that the various matters treated of, be referred to the respective standing committees raised for their consideration.

Resolved, That the communication of Bishop Paine be referred to the Committee on Episcopacy.

Bishop Pierce said:

Beloved Brother:—Your colleagues and brethren rejoice to see you among them. We consider your presence a Benediction. It seems to me to be a beautiful providence that you should have commenced your itinerant career sixty-five years ago at this very point, and that after concluding that effective labors you are here in the presence of your brethren, asking of them retirement from active service. Bless God that he has given to us your services so long, that he has spared you to attend this Conference. But, while you do not go forth to the Master's work, we may profit by your counsel, and rejoice in Christian fellowship with you. We do bless God that now, in the sunset of your life, you are among us, and we ask him to help and sanctify you, and that when your ship shall go down you will pass into that heaven made glorious by the memories of the past and the joys of the future. God bless you.

Dr. J. E. Evans, of the North Georgia Conference, presented the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That a Committee on Introductions be appointed by the chair, to consist of three clerical and three lay delegates.

Dr. A. M. Shipp, of the South Carolina Conference, presented the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the following standing committees be ordered by the Conference, to consist of five delegates each, to be appointed by the College of Bishops: 1. On Bible cause; 2. On temperance; 3. On fraternal correspondence; 4. On centenary of American Methodism.

Dr. E. R. Hendrix, of the Missouri Conference, moved that so much of the Bishop's address as refers to the centenary of American Methodism be referred to the committee appointed for that purpose. Adopted.

The following was adopted:

Resolved, That a committee, consisting of one member from each Annual Conference, to be called the Committee on Church Extension, be appointed.

The Conference then adjourned to four P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The hour from three P. M. to four P. M. was consumed in the seating of delegations in their respective positions, to be maintained until the close of the session.

The Conference was called to order by Bishop Pierce, who suggested that the Conference sing a verse of the hymn:

Loving Jesus, gentle Lamb.

Prayer was then offered by the Rev. Dr. D. R. McAnally.

Bishop McTyeire then announced the special committees.

THURSDAY, MAY 4—SECOND DAY.

The second day's session of the Conference was called to order at nine A. M., by Bishop Pierce, and opened by the reading of a portion of the fourth chapter of the Epistle to the Ephesians, by the Rev. H. H. Parks, of the North Georgia Conference, followed by the singing of the hymn, "Up into thee, our living head," and prayer.

The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

R. B. Crawford, of the Alabama Conference, presented the appeal of A. J. Braid, which was entertained.

P. A. Peterson, of the Virginia Conference, moved the appointment of a Committee on Appeals. Carried, and the chairman instructed to appoint the committee.

S. B. Watts, of Mississippi Conference, presented the appeal of Lewis Kendall which was referred to the Committee on Appeals.

River Conference—on temperance. Referred.

The report of the agent of the Publishing House was then presented and read.

To the Bishops and Members of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South:

REV. AND DEAR BRETHREN: For a detailed statement of the condition and prospects of the Publishing House I refer you to the Exhibit prepared by the Business Manager, the Report of the Book Committee, and to our four Annual Reports to the yearly Conferences.

You will perceive that the liabilities of the House have been reduced, and put in such a shape as to be easily managed. The profits arising from the business of the establishment in future, and the rent of the three stores, it is believed, will not only pay the semi-annual interest, but will furnish a surplus for retiring the bonds gradually, and will afford means for the enlargment of the facilities of the House in furnishing the church with suitable publications.

Within the past four years the House has issued a number of valuable works. Special regard has been paid to the wants of the Sunday-school and the young people connected with the church. Our abridged hymn-book has met with favor, and has been widely circulated.

For any success that has attended our efforts I am thankful to God, and am indebted to the skill and energy of the Book Committee, who have given unwearied attention to the interests of the House; to the Rev. Dr. Young, for his efficient aid, who devoted one-half his time for two years in the employ of the committee; to the business manager, who has been an able co-worker; and to the whole church, ministry and membership, for their sympathy and co-operation.

The book editor, the editor of the Christian Advocate, and the editor of the Sunday-school Literature, have all proved themselves worthy of the high trust committed to them, and have had a large success.

The present employes of the House have shown themselves diligent and competent. In a word, all work together in harmony and good cheer.

And now, after four years of toil and anxiety, I hand you back the valuable interest committed to my care, asking God's blessing on its future career.

Respectfully,

J. B. M'FERRIN,
Book Agent Pub. House, M. E. Church, South.
NASHVILLE, TENN., May 3, 1882.

G. H. Hayes, of the Louisville Conference, said that Rev. A. H. Redford thought that the report of the Book Committee had done him injustice. As he was not a delegate, he would ask that Dr. Redford be permitted, in person, to answer it.

The secretary was requested to read the following dispatch:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 4, 1882, 9, A. M.—To Bishop McTyeire, General Conference M. E. Church, South, Nashville, Tenn.—The Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, General Conference in session here authorize me to bear official greetings to you.

SAMUEL K. COX.

O. P. Fitzgerald moved that the secretary be instructed to telegraph a suitable response. Carried.

The Conference then adjourned until nine A. M., Friday.

In response to the motion made by O. P. Fitzgerald, the following dispatch was sent by the secretaries:

NASHVILLE, TENN., May 4, 1882—To Rev. S. K. Cox, Washington, D. C.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, received, with much pleasure, the fraternal greeting of the Colored Methodist Episcopal General Conference, and we are authorized to send reciprocal expressions of greeting.

T. O. SUMMERS.
J. D. VINCIL.
W. M. LEFTWICH.

Whereas, There is some dissatisfaction among our pastors and people, especially in the rural parts of our territory, growing out of the inability of presiding elders to give to each Quarterly Conference a Sunday in consequence of the size of the districts; and whereas, this also cripples the usefulness of the presiding elder to some extent; therefore, be it

Whereas, The manufacturing, buying and selling, or the renting of houses for the sale of malt or distilled liquors are accessory and participes criminis to the dire evils, resulting in poverty, shame, disease, and death to the users of these liquids; therefore be it

Resolved, By the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, that the manufacturing, buying, selling, or using malt or distilled liquors as a beverage, be declared inconsistent with the profession of a Christian man; and any member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, so forgetting his high and holy position as a Christian as a Methodist, be deemed guilty of immoral conduct, and be disciplined as the law of the church and the Word of God provides.

Resolved, That it is the duty of our membership to do all in their power, in an honorable and legal manner, to suppress the traffic in and use of alcoholic and malt liquors.

THE REDFORD MATTERS.

G. H. Hayes, of the Louisville Conference, read the following request, and asked that it be granted:

In view of the fact that frequent reference is made to Dr. A. H. Redford in the report of the Book Committee, and that he feels that injustice is done him in said report, and though an alternate he is not a member of this Conference we, as the representatives of his Conference, ask respectfully that he be allowed the privilege of an explanation in writing, and that his explanation be read to this Conference, and referred with the report of the Book Committee.

T. W. Dye, of the North Mississippi Conference, said that he regretted exceedingly that the Report of the Book Committee was read at the Conference on yesterday. Some of the members were opposed to the reading of the document at the time. I fear, he said, in the discussion some man will speak indiscreetly, and bring disgrace on our church. "Let this matter go to the bones of old quietus."

S. H. Dent, of the Alabama Conference, moved that in order to bring the matter properly before the Conference, that the request of the members of the Louisville Conference be granted.

T. W. Dye moved to table the motion made by Mr. Dent, which motion failed for want of a second.

S. H. Dent, of the Alabama Conference—These are matters of record, and it is nothing but justice that the Rev. Dr. A. H. Redford should have an opportunity to reply. I hope this Conference will not gag anybody. Let them be heard in their own defense. I can not see why any discussion should occur out of it. The Report of the Book Committee has been read; now let Dr. Redford furnish in writing a reply, or explanation. Let that be heard without discussion.

James Whitworth, of the Tennessee Conference—I desire, as the representative of the Book Committee, in their name and on their behalf, to say to this Conference that, so far as they are concerned, they have no objection to the answer of Dr. Redford, but, on the contrary, I am here to invite any criticism or answer that may be desired, and I hope that this Conference will take such steps in regard to that report as will satisfy every member that right and justice has been done in the premises by the Book Committee, as it intended to do no injury to anybody. If it is the desire of this Conference to have the matter discussed, here or elsewhere, the Book Committee is ready to furnish all the information that is necessary to make out that which will sustain all that has been said.

W. A. Allen, of the North Texas Conference, presented a resolution, which he wished adopted, authorizing the appointment of a committee of nine to decide whether the Rev. Dr. A. H. Redford should submit his statement in writing, and appear before the Conference. The resolution for want of a second failed.

George Thornburgh, of the White River Conference—I am proud to say that I believe that the first claim of a layman had been made upon this floor. It has been said that lawyers had a reason for not talking here before; the first appeal that has been made for right and justice has been made by the lawyers. I think I can say for the laymen, and especially for the lawyers, that there is not one of them that would refuse a hearing in Dr. Redford's behalf. The charge has been made, and printed, and read to this Conference, that one of our brethren has committed this or that offense. Now will you go below and beyond every legislative body, and every court that has been established in the land, and say that this defendant shall not be heard. I hope a body of preachers will not refuse to this defendant that which no legislative body, or any one else, refuse to do—let him communicate to this Conference in writing, and let it be laid before this Conference. Do not close the mouth of a defendant.

W. W. Walker, of the Virginia Conference—I regretted to have the report read yesterday, but that having been done, I think it exceedingly proper that Dr. Redford should have some measure of opportunity to defend himself, at least to have presented a written statement. If by that you think he is vindicated, let the vindication be accorded to him—that is to say, if the statement of facts in reply shows that no blame attaches to him, let him have an opportunity to make it so appear. If you think the facts do not vindicate him, that is with you. I think that neither the church nor Dr. Redford can profit by a further agitation of the question.

J. H. H. Figgatt, of the Baltimore Conference—Can we decide anything by permitting Dr. Redford to send in a written statement?

A delegate—interrupting—Dr. Redford has been presented to this court.

J. H. H. Figgatt—continuing—The report has not been presented as charges against Dr. Redford. The committee made a report which was to be a final settlement, and have given to this body their reasons for so doing. It is a duality between Dr. Redford and that committee. If the charges were as to character, there is a forum in the church before which he can be tried, and from which he has an appeal to this body; but the committee only report what has been done, and until such proper charges have been made, should this Conference consider the matter? I see both parties ready for an affray, and desire to bring these matters up. I think it ought to be buried now.

A. D. Bright, of the Memphis Conference—I am opposed to any whitewashing. I don't want any demurrers or special pleas; let Dr. Redford put in his statement. There have been dark whispers about this matter, and I want all the light turned on. If guilty of anything, let him be punished; but if innocent, let him, in the name of heaven, show it. Let him bring his proof before this committee, and let the matter be settled by the committee and Conference, then the question as to who is wrong and who is right can be settled, and finally. I do not know which side has stated the matter correctly; it is for the church I care; and, for one, I want the church vindicated. While the reputation of all the preachers is dear to me, still more dear is the reputation of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

A. B. Stark, of the Louisville Conference—I have heard it whispered around that this question ought not to have been brought out. I think it should be, and Dr. Redford should be heard in writing. It is nothing but fairness and justice to him; it is not right that the matter should be shoved off.

P. A. Peterson, of the Virginia Conference—I have to say, without consultation with any one, that, as much as I love life, and enjoy it, I would rather die to-day than have that report go to the public without a response. If I were the accused party, and felt I could vindicate myself, I would at least desire to have the opportunity to show my innocence. For the sake of the argument, I am willing to admit that each and all the allegations contained in that report, involving, as they do, the moral character of Dr. Redford, have been placed beyond question of the fullest and strongest evidence. If I were convinced that he could not make it appear different from what it is I would take the position I now take, and would say that the Book Committee far exceeded the authority given by the General Conference, that they transcended their powers. I suppose there is not a member of this General Conference who believes any one of the Book Committee is capable of doing injustice to Dr. Redford. I have no doubt they think they did what they believed they ought to have done under the circumstances, yet I think the committee erred in its judgment. I simply propose to show why the Conference ought to grant the request of the Louisville delegation, and I was about to say that the General Conference at Atlanta, as I understood the question, empowered or authorized the Book Committee not to investigate Dr. Redford, but to settle with him.

My second position is that the matters introduced in that report should have properly come under a review in order to reach a decision. It was not proper to bring such matters before this General Conference. It can not investigate the moral character of Dr. Redford—that authority belongs to the Annual Conference, and if anything appeared in the investigation of the committee which involved any misconduct it was the duty of somebody to make complaint to his Annual Conference, and have the matter investigated. The report is a bill of indictment; it is an ex parte statement; it gives only one side of the question, and I insist that the other side should be heard as well.

J. W. Tucker, of the Florida Conference, took the position that Dr. Redford should be heard by the Conference, and urged this view earnestly and strongly.

R. H. Mahon, of the Memphis Conference—I understand that the report of the Book Committee referred to many matters of difference between Dr. Redford and the committee, as to the basis of settlement. I think it proper that the statement of Dr. Redford concerning the discrepancies which may have occurred during his management of the Publishing House should be laid before us, so that we could make up our minds whether the questions were settled according to equity. So far as the consideration of the moral character of Dr. Redford is concerned, this Conference has no voice in the matter.

R. Hiner, of the Kentucky Conference, during the discussion, insisted that the people should have all the light possible of what the Conference was doing.

The motion, as made by Mr. Dent, granting the request of the Louisville delegation, was then adopted.

NEWNAN, GA., May 3, 1882.

To the Bishops and Members of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, at Nashville, Tenn.—Dear Brethren:—I address you as Chairman of the Sabbath Committee of the Southern Presbyterian Church. At the last meeting of our General Assembly, our committee was instructed to correspond with the evangelical churches with a view of securing their co-operation in the matter of petitioning the civil authorities. The following is the action to which reference is had.

Resolved, That the committee be instructed to institute such correspondence with other evangelical churches as will secure their co-operation in bringing the "Sabbath question" to the attention of the civil authorities of all the States. The assembly would not recommend any overture, either as citizens or as ecclesiastics, to the Congress of the United States, until the co-operation of the great bulk of the evangelical churches of the whole country may be obtained.

In obedience, therefore, to the above instructions, I address you; and I need not remind you that the Sabbath is the great bulwark of our religion, which must be maintained at all hazards if we would hope to subjugate the world to our Lord and King—nor yet how that bulwark is seriously threatened, seriously threatened, especially in the northern portions of our country, by the constant influx of a foreign element, with views so entirely opposed to what we conceive to be the scripture teachings on the subject.

If it will suit your convenience to do so, we would be glad to have you consider the matter, and cordially give us your views as to the propriety of petitioning Congress upon the subject, especially with reference to the Sunday mail, and running of trains on the Lord's day, and also as to your willingness to unite in anything like a general effort to abate, if not entirely suspend, these public evils.

Yours in Christian bonds.

JAMES STACEY,
Ch'n Gen. Ass. Sab. Com.

The above report was referred to committee on Fraternal Correspondence.

The following names were announced as the chairmen of the various standing committees: Episcopacy, W. W. Bennett; Itinerancy, J. S. Martin; Publishing Interests, W. W. Walker; Boundaries, R. W. The Conference then adjourned until nine o'clock Saturday morning.

As will be seen in the above, the undersigned has taken the business management of the ADVOCATE. This will in no wise interfere with my commission business conducted at 60 Carondelet street, this city. I shall have ample time to give all needed assistance to the Publishing Committee. The late publisher, Mr. Lathrop, has so systematized the business department of the paper that no changes will be needed. Everything will go on as if no change in the management had been made. As stated above, all communications must be addressed to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price; so to speak; and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past six or seven years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

Southwestern Co-operative Association, No. 60 Carondelet Street. This commission house, has been in business for six years. Its patrons are constantly increasing, and the business has been conducted with general satisfaction. All consignments of cotton, and all products of the soil, will have faithful attention. All orders filled with judgment and care. Tho's J. Carver, Manager.

"There are two sides to everything," said the lecturer. "I repeat it, there are two sides—" At this juncture a tired-looking little man stood up in the front seat to say: "Well, if you've no objection, I will just step out and see if there are two sides to this hall. I know there is an inside, and if I find there is an outside you'll know it by my not coming back. You needn't be alarmed if I shouldn't return." And as he walked up the aisle he was followed by the admiring eyes of the whole audience.

The full term of three years had nearly expired, and they were discussing at the breakfast table the certainty that they must move and the uncertainty as to where, when the young miss of the parsonage drew a heavy sigh. Sympathizing father asked the cause, and she replied: "Oh, I was thinking what a mistake mother and I made when we married a Methodist minister."

We would call special attention to the card of W. W. Carre. Do not delay, until the last moment, but send in your orders early, so that everything will be completed before the meeting.

"And what are you looking for?" said Pat to the man with the lantern. "For my character," replied the man in jest. "Then," said Pat, "you may as well stop looking; you'll never find so small a thing with so dim a light."

"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873.

Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons, and several improvements have been added. It obviates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work within the same time, while economizing steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton, on this account, of a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint, added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every 100 bales ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

THE FARMER'S WIFE

The farmer came in from the field one day,
His languid step and his weary way,
His bended brow, and sinewy hand,
All showing his work for the good of the land.
For he sows,
And he hoes,
And he mows,
All for the good of the land.

By the kitchen fire stood his patient wife,
Light of his home and joy of his life,
With face all aglow and busy hands,
Preparing the meal for her husband's hand;
For she must bell,
And she must cook,
And she must tend
All for the sake of the home.

Sun shines bright when the farmer goes out,
Birds sing sweet songs, lambs frisk about,
The brook babbles soft 'n the glen,
While he works bravely for the good of men
For he sows,
And he mows,
And he hoes,
All for the good of the land.

How briskly the wife steps about within,
The dishes to wash and the milk to skim,
The fires go out, flies buzz about—
For dear ones at home her heart is kept stout.
There are pies to make,
There is bread to bake,
And steps to take,
All for the sake of the home.

When the day is o'er and the evening has come,
The creatures are fed, and the milking is done,
He takes his rest 'neath the old shady tree,
From the look of the land his thoughts he free;
Though he sows,
And he hoes,
And he mows,
He rests from the work of the land.

But the faithful wife, from sun to sun,
Takes her burden up that's never done,
There is no rest there's to pay,
For the household good she must work away
For to mend the frock,
And to knit the sock,
And the cradle to rock,
All for the good of the home.

When autumn is here, with chilling blast,
The farmer gathers his crops at last,
For the goodness the bountiful Lord hath care,
While it blows,
And it snows,
Till the winter goes,
He rests from the work of the land.

But the willing wife, till life's closing day,
Is the children's, the husband's stay,
From day to day she has done her best,
Until death alone can give her rest,
For after the test
Comes the rest,
With the blest,
In the farmer's heavenly home.

THE WILLOW AS A TIMBER TREE.—And there are some trees which are deserving of more attention than has yet been given them in this country. The willows, for instance, have seldom been cultivated in a large way; and yet there are few trees so easily grown, or which will pay better for cultivation. They adapt themselves to a wide range of soil and climate. They grow on high ground and gravelly soils not less than by the sides of streams, where we most commonly see them. They are of rapid growth and yield a large return. The osier-willow is specially useful, we know, for the manufacture of baskets, chairs, and other articles of furniture, and we import it to the extent of $5,000,000 annually, when we might produce it easily in almost any part of our country. We hardly think of the willow as a timber tree or for the production of lumber, but only as yielding a cheap, poor sort of fuel. But in England the wood is greatly prized for many purposes. While it is light it is also tough; it does not break into slivers. Hardly any wood is so good, therefore, for the linings of carts and wagons used in drawing stone or other rough and heavy articles. It makes excellent charcoal, especially for the manufacture of gunpowder. It bears exposure to the weather, and boards made of it are very serviceable for fences. Some species of it are admirable for use as a live fence or hedge. On account of its comparative incombustibility, the willow is eminently useful for the doors of buildings designed to be fire-proof. It grows to a large size and furnishes a great amount of lumber. There is a white willow growing in Stockbridge, Mass., which, at four feet from the ground, measures twenty-two feet in circumference and extends its branches fifty feet in every direction. Tradition says it was brought from Connecticut in 1807 by a traveler, who used it as a riding-switch. The Hon. Josse W. Fell, in giving an account of experiments in tree-planting, on an extensive scale, in Illinois, says, "Were I called upon to designate one tree which, more than all others, I would recommend for general planting, I would say, unhesitatingly it should be the white willow." Prof. Brewer says: "In England, where it is often sixty or seventy feet high in twenty years, there is no wood in greater demand than good willow. It is light, very tough, soft, takes a good finish, will bear more pounding and knocks than any other wood grown there, and hence its use for cricket-bats, for floats to paddle-wheels of steamers, and brake-blocks on cars. It is used extensively for turning, planking coasting-vessels, furniture, ox-yokes, wooden legs, shoe-lasts, etc." Fuller says, "It groweth incredibly fast—it being a by-word that the profit by willows will buy the owner a horse before that by other trees will pay for the saddle." The basket willow, well cultivated, will yield a net income of $150 a year to the acre. On the whole, therefore, it would seem that the various kinds of willow, the economic value of which has been hitherto entirely overlooked in our country, are eminently deserving of attention, and will amply reward those who cultivate them.—H. N. Egleston, in Popular Science Monthly.

SPRING PRUNING.—We see so many examples, through the country, of the bad effects of pruning trees and shrubs too late in spring or during summer, that we are induced to recur to the subject, as a reminder to those who understand the matter, but who are apt to overlook it at the proper time. Many young hedges are spoiled by early summer pruning. In some instances the growth of new shoots has been so retarded as not to amount to more than one-tenth the growth where the work is done in time. When hedges are young, it is important to secure a strong and rapid growth, and they should not be cut or sheared after the buds begin to swell. This remark will apply particularly to any of the more moderate-growing hedge plants, as the buck-thorn or the barberry, or to those like the honey locust, which do not naturally throw out a profusion of side shoots. It is less important for the Osage orange, which has more power to reproduce shoots, but even Osage hedges should not be checked at all while forming. On the other hand, after the hedge has attained full strength and height, summer pruning, by retarding the growth, may lessen the labor of keeping it within bounds.

The worst effect of late pruning is seen when the heads of newly transplanted young fruit trees are cut back after the leaves open, which nearly prevents all growth for the year, and often makes a feeble tree afterwards. The difference is at least ten to one; that is, where a young transplanted tree, shortened back in time, would send out shoots ten inches long, they would grow scarcely an inch if the pruning is done after the leaves have opened.

Dwarf pear trees, to bear evenly and give fine fruit, need occasional and moderate pruning in connection with mulching and cultivation. If the trees already are feeble and overbear, prune away a portion of the fruit spurs, and allow one-half or more of the length of the long, young shoots to grow. But if the growth is too vigorous and the bearing thin, reverse the operation. The hardy grape and the peach have more power to reproduce shoots than any other of our hardy fruit bearers, and some pruning or removal of expanded leaves may be resorted to, if necessary. The needlessly numerous shoots on the grape should however be rubbed off as early as practicable, and any supernumerary shoots on young peach trees may be removed to make a good, even head. Removing the suckers from raspberries is nothing more than pruning away the underground shoots, and it is obviously important to do this work the very moment their tips are seen above the surface. The few remaining left as canes will be abundantly benefited. The same principle applies to the strawberry, cultivated in hills or stools, by the prevention of abundant runners and side shoots, and not by hoeing up a matted bed and leaving a single plant in a place.

The same general rule applies to rose-bushes, some of which, and more particularly the hardy, moderate growers, require pruning as well as manuring to keep up their vigor, and to give large, fully developed flowers. With such plants it is especially important to do all the pruning before the buds swell. So likewise currant bushes, which have become a mass of stunted shoots, may be greatly improved in the size and quality of the fruit, by evenly cutting out the old and feeble branches, leaving the young and most vigorous ones, and applying manure and culture if the soil is not rich enough.

MANURE MADE UNDER COVER.—Of course all the advantages of making manure in covered yards may be secured by box feeding, with less outlay for roofing, since more space must be allowed for a given number of animals turned loose together, than when confined in stalls; it is the protection from rain and sun, the abundant use of litter, its thorough incorporation with the excrements and the exclusion of air by compact treading, which go to make the superior manure; all these features of the method work against the loss of valuable plant food. Nor does box feeding, and constant accumulation of the manure under the feet of the animals, necessarily imply offensive stalls. It is only essential that enough litter be used to absorb all liquids, and this absorption is more effectual if the straw is cut up.

One method or the other, box feeding or covered yards, should be adopted by every farmer who lives where manure is worth saving, and who finds himself compelled to supplement his stable manure with commercial fertilizers. Stable manure must not be lost sight of in this increasing interest in these concentrated fertilizers, for we can not produce our crops and have enough for ourselves and others without its aid; and there is nothing in all the list of commercial mixtures which gives so good an average return for the money invested in it, as well-made stable manure.—American Agriculturist.

Every garden, be it ever so small, should have its compost heap; a sort of depot in which may be collected refuse of every kind, so that nothing is wasted, but becomes instead valuable material for the replenishing of the soil. The heap should be made as far from the house as possible, that no ill effects may be produced by disagreeable odors. A deep layer of muck or dry earth should make the foundation of the heap, and upon it may be thrown all the animal and vegetable refuse from the house and garden. Add also leaves, house slops, soap suds, ditch cleanings, etc., and from time to time cover the whole with a layer of dry earth. The heap should be turned over occasionally, and thoroughly mixed. It is surprising how rapidly such a heap will increase in size if care is taken to add to it all waste matter that comes to hand, and it also helps to keep the garden clean and tidy by concentrating all the rubbish in one spot.

When harness has been on a horse's back for several hours in hot or rainy weather, it becomes wet, and if not properly cleaned, when taken off, irreparable damage will be done to it. To preserve harness properly it should be washed and oiled whenever it has been moistened by sweat or soiled by mud. If harness is thoroughly cleaned twice a year, and when mainly exposed treated as above, the leather will retain its softness and strength for many years.

SHADE.—In the matter of shade, sheep like it in summer. They eagerly strive to get out of the rays of the hot sun. Where there are trees in the pasture they will furnish the necessary shade, but when there is nothing, we believe it would pay to arrange some sort of a cheap shade. What these should be made of will depend on what the flockmaster has on hand. There is usually something on the farm that could be used for this purpose, and it would cost little either in time or money to construct an artificial shelter.

BREEDS OF HOGS.—The Berkshire and Poland China hogs are masters of the situation in hog improvement. The Berkshires are imported from England, the Poland Chinas are an American breed, and perhaps the most successful breed of improved stock ever originated in America. The Chester Whites, Essex, Suffolk, Durocks or Red Berkshires all have friends and advocates; all are quick growth and good size.—Western Agriculturist.

SPRING RYE.—A farmer writes for information in regard to spring rye. Strong clay or calcareous lands are unsuited to rye. The best soil is a rich sandy loam, which produces a strong growth of grain and straw. The land should be plowed in fall and the seed sown as early in the spring as the weather and ground will permit. Spring rye is very little grown at the present day, the winter variety being considered more satisfactory.

QUALITY OF EGGS.—I have recently seen inquiries and answers in your paper in regard to the cause and remedy for light yellow yolks of eggs. Evidently the kind of food has some effect upon the color of the yelk, as it does also upon the richness of the egg, which is not always indicated by the color of the yelk. But the different breeds of fowls give different tints of color to the yelks, as well as to the shells of their eggs, the shells varying, as is well known, from a snow white to chocolate, the darkest shells generally indicating the darkest yelks. The cause of the different tinting of the shells of eggs, either of hens or the different kinds of fowls and birds, has not been discovered, and that of the coloring of the yelks can hardly be said to have been fully ascertained.

The difference in flavor of the eggs of the different breeds of hens is a matter of fact which few people appreciate, although it is as distinct as the difference in flavor of the different kinds of potatoes, and may be varied to some extent by the kind of food—although the dark color of the shells almost invariably indicates the rank egg flavor, while the most delicate flavor is found with white or slightly tinted shells. The every-day layers seldom produce as rich eggs as those which lay every second day; and for hatching the latter are by far the best in point of strong shells, fertility and strength of chickens. These advantages can also be varied by feeding and other influences; the most natural conditions of feed, exercise, &c., producing the best results. It is the whites of the eggs that generally determine their richness, although the pastry cook tells us the "light-yellow yelks do not color cakes and custards sufficiently to make them look rich," and the kinds of food which stimulate hens to produce the greatest number of eggs are the most deficient in the albumen which constitutes their richness, not only making the yelks light-yellow, but the whites watery.

The food value of an egg can be easily tested by breaking it into water just before boiling heat. All the white draws up around the yelk, and covers it thickly, the egg is rich in albumen; but if the white spreads through the water in stringy lines, leaving the yelk uncovered, or slightly covered, the egg is proportionably poor, though the yelk be ever so dark in color. Feeding hens broken boiled-lobster shells, will make the yelks of their eggs dark color, at any season, and there is no kind of shell forming substance which they more crave or more eagerly eat.—B. H. K., in Country Gentleman.

CHICKEN ENCASSEE.—Put a nice plump chicken, trussed as for boiling, into a sauce-pan, with a quart of hot water; bring it to a simmer, and keep simmering for three-quarters of an hour if a large chicken, and half an hour if small; skim it well. When cooked take out the chicken on a dish and leave it to get cold. Strain half a pint of the liquor through a piece of muslin and put it in a sauce-pan. Boil a small piece of ham in it, or bacon bones, for half an hour. Take it off the fire, remove the ham, and stir into the liquor the beaten yolks of four eggs and a half a pint of cream. Mix the beaten yolks and cream together before adding them to the hot liquor. Season well with cayenne pepper, salt, nutmeg, the juice of half a lemon and a teaspoonful of powdered loaf sugar. Return the sauce-pan to the fire and stir the contents until it begins to thicken—it must not boil, else it will curdle. Take it off the fire instantly and pour it into a jug; stir it well for two or three minutes; cut up the cold chicken into joints and slices, pile high in the centre of a dish and gently pour the warm sauce over them. Let this become cold and firm, then garnish with bright green parsley, red beetroot, cut lemon or aspic jelly.

A BEEF PIE.—Cold roast beef, one onion, one tomato, pepper and salt, one dozen boiled potatoes. Cut the cold beef in thin slices, and put a layer on the bottom of your dish. Shake in a little flour, pepper and salt, cut up and add a tomato (if in season) or onion, finely chopped, then another layer of beef and seasoning till your dish is full; if you have any gravy put it in; have ready a dozen potatoes, boiled and mashed, with butter and salt, spread over the pie an inch thick; bake twenty-five minutes or a little more.

CREAM DRESSING FOR SALADS.—Take three eggs, six tablespoonfuls of cream, two tablespoonfuls of melted butter, one tablespoonful of salt, one of mustard, half a teaspoonful of white pepper and one small cupful of vinegar. Beat the eggs thoroughly, and add the cream and melted butter and seasoning, beating in the vinegar well. Put in a sauce-pan over the fire, and stir constantly till it thickens like custard, but do not let it boil, as it will curdle it. Cool on ice and turn over the salad, or serve in a sauce-boat.—Daisy Eyebright, in Country Gentleman.

CHESTNUT STUFFING.—Remove the outer skin from a quantity of chestnuts; set them to boil in salted water, with a handful of coriander seeds and a couple of bay leaves. When nearly done drain off the water and remove the inner skin of the chestnuts. Cut up one-half pound of butter into small pieces; mix it with the chestnuts when cold, together with an onion finely minced. Sprinkle the mixture with pepper and salt and a little powdered spice to taste, and stuff the turkey with it.

ROASTING MEAT.—Never roast meat, says Miss Parlor, without having a rack in the pan. If meat is put into the water in the pan it becomes soggy, and loses its flavor. A meat-rack costs but a trifle, and the improvement in the looks and flavor of a piece of meat is enough to pay for it in one roasting.

RHUBARB JAM.—One and a half pounds of rhubarb stalks to one pound of preserving sugar; the peel of one large lemon. Boil all well together, stirring constantly, and adding a teaspoonful of powdered ginger. Turn into pots and cover down. This is an excellent jam for children.

COLD SLAW.—Take two-thirds of a cup of vinegar, one egg, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one tablespoonful of salt, half teaspoon of mixed mustard, and butter size of an egg; stir until it boils. When cold, pour over the shaved cabbage.

TO COOK LIVER.—A good way to cook liver is to fry it in butter, with an onion cut in small pieces scattered over it. Cook slowly; when done add a lump of butter and a little flour; stir well, and turn over the liver. Serve with Saratoga potatoes.

COMETS AND THEIR TAILS.—Mr. W. Mattieu Williams, author of "The Fuel of the Sun," discusses in the Gentleman's Magazine the nature and origin of comets' tails. He believes the tails to be electrical. "A body," he says, "rushing round the sun in cometary proximity must be most intensely charged with electricity. A body in such condition will throw out luminous discharges, preferably in a direction opposite to that from which its excitation is received, provided it can find their particles or media in a condition favorable for their reception. Thus I think it very probable that the tail of a comet is such a discharge from the intensely excited and consequently disturbed nucleus." Why comets sometimes have tails and sometimes not depends, on Williams' theory, upon the abundance or scarcity of meteoric matter or cosmic dust surrounding the sun. "As our solar system," argues Mr. Williams, "is traveling bodily through space at the rate of about 400,000 miles per day, we encounter regions that vary as regards the meteoric matter they contain and the temperature they have acquired from the perennial radiations of the countless suns of the universe. Such regions afford variable supplies of solar fuel, and wherever the supply exceeds the average, conditions more favorable for the extensions of the tails of comets are presented. If this is the case, a comet otherwise telescopic or barely visible, like Halley's in 1835, may become a flaming visitor like Halley's was before, or resemble those that startled the world in 1811, 1843, 1859, and, in a less degree, this year. Thus the flaming long tailed comet, the hot weather, and the 'comet vintages' may occur together, not as cause and effects, but as coincident effects of one common cause."

TO MEASURE THE VELOCITY OF WIND.—An esteemed correspondent desires to know how to determine the velocity of the wind. This is accomplished by the aid of an instrument know as an anemometer. Its name is derived from the Greek words anemos (wind) and metron (measure). The one most used at the present time consists of nothing more than a small wind mill to which is attached an index to mark the number of revolutions per minute; the number, of course increasing with the speed of the wind. Now if the atmosphere is still and the anemometer is carried against it at the rate, for instance, of ten miles an hour, the number of its revolutions will be exactly the same as if the instrument were stationary and the vanes were made to revolve by a wind having the same velocity.

If then upon a calm day the anemometer is taken upon a railway car and fixed in such a position that the air can act freely upon it while the car is moving, for example, with a speed of twenty miles an hour, and the number of revolutions accurately noted for half an hour; by dividing this result by thirty, the number of revolutions per minute for a wind having a velocity of twenty miles an hour is shown. From this a table can be formed for winds of a greater or less velocity.—Northern Christian Advocate.

—The temperature of carbons giving the electric light has been carefully examined by M. Rossetti, by means of a thermopile, the face of which is placed at a suitable distance to receive rays from a radiating surface of determinate size—the thermal effect being measured by a sensitive reflecting galvanometer. It appears from these researches that the positive pole has higher temperature than the negative; the temperature vary according to the intensity of the current, being higher the smaller the radiating surface, providing it comprises the extreme point. In the negative pole, the minimum temperature was found to be 1,910 degrees Cent., with a large radiating surface of small brilliancy, and the maximum was 2,532, the radiating surface being half the preceding; for the positive, the minimum was 2,312 the carbon being large, and the maximum 3,200, with a thin carbon and small radiating surface.

—A valuable process for chemically blackening zinc, and thus rendering it particularly adapted for roof covering, is described in the transactions of the Frankfort "Physikches Verein." The method consists in first scouring the zinc to be operated on with fine sand and very dilute hydrochloric acid, and then plunging it into a solution of equal parts chlorate of potash and sulphate of copper in thirty-six parts of water. When withdrawn, after a short interval, it is found to have taken up a fine coating of velvety black, which, however, at this state, very readily comes off. To insure its permanency, the zinc thus coated is quickly washed with water, allowed to dry, and then plunged into a weak solution of asphalt in benzole. The excess of this fluid is allowed to drain off, and the color can then be definitely fixed by the very simple process of rubbing the sheet with a cotton plug.

—Lord Rayleigh has recently been publishing some important papers upon the spectroscope. He points out, among other things, that, with prisms made of a given material, the limit of the resolving power of the instrument depends upon the thickness of the material traversed by the rays, so that no increase of magnifying power of the dimensions of the collimator and telescope can compensate for the use of small prisms. Lord Rayleigh has just accepted the professorship of experimental physics at Cambridge, as the successor of Clerk Maxwell; the first instance, we believe, in England of a member of the nobility occupying such a position.

—According to Dr. Muller, of Geneva, there are about 130,000 species of plants on the globe that are recognized as such at the present time, and some calculations have been made on this basis as to how many there are on the globe, including the undiscovered ones. The tendency of modern botanists, however, is to take a much more enlarged view of the boundaries of a species than was formerly the case. Species are continually being united, as well as discovered; and it is more than likely that about 150,000 will be about the number of finally recognized species that this world will give us.

THE CHROMATROSCOPE.—This is an instrument for determining sensibility of the retina to colored luminous impressions. The observer looks steadily at the central point of a disk, which has apertures. Colored surfaces are placed at a little distance from the other end of the disk. It is found that gradually the sensation of color is lost, and that, if white surfaces are substituted for the colored ones, the complementary colors will come out with great brightness and purity.

Obituaries.

RIVERS—MRS. JOSEPHINE NICHOLSON RIVERS was born and reared at Suggsville, Clarke county, Ala. After a painful illness of three months she died December 5, 1881. She was the only child of a noble Christian widowed mother, who was guided by the Holy Spirit in the nurture and training of her tender plant. In early maidenhood Josephine Nicholson laid her offering upon God's altar—the loveliest, the fairest gift that could be given to Jesus, a pure heart, and her name was inscribed upon the register of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. In this relation she remained steadfast until the great Harvester of souls gathered her into the garner on high. At a suitable time in life she was united in marriage to Mr. Richard Rivers, Jr., who died early, leaving her a young mother with a trio of orphan babes to rear. None but a widow indeed knows the trials, the perplexities, the sorrows of one in her condition; yet, like a true woman, she cheerfully met all responsibilities, as far as possible, with promptness, precision, kindness, discretion, combined with a lady-like modesty, so lovely in a woman. In her spiritual development for the kingdom, God saw best to sanctify her much. She was a "child of sorrow." Not many years after the husband's decease the blight of death fell upon one of her little daughters, Lucy, a child of promise, and she passed away. Then her aged mother, Mrs. Nicholson, weary of pain and suffering, "fell asleep" in Jesus. Under much care and responsibility her own health failed. The only surviving daughter, Bessie, grew to womanhood. A tender, gentle, loving companion, her mother clung to her as a stay to her declining years. But lo! sickness prostrated the dear one, death came, and she was gone. Not quite two years had passed before she joined mother, husband, children and kindred in heaven. Mrs. Rivers was a devoted daughter, wife and mother, a kind neighbor, especially in sickness. Her final illness was brought on by exposure and fatigue in nursing a sick neighbor. She was devoted to her church and pastor, aiding willingly in the support of both. Thus, her duty to her own, her neighbor and her God, gives us in her life an example of noble Christian womanhood. Two weeks before the end she calmly talked of her departure, expressing complete submission to God's will. There was but one regret in leaving, and that was that her only son would feel desolate in the lonely home which she was leaving. Her dying charge to him was touching. O, holy words from the lips of dying mothers! Are they spoken in vain? No; like sparks from the anvil of Jehovah they will kindle the flame of godly love in the breasts of many noble sons.

A FRIEND.

FORD—Died at her home, in Lincoln parish, La., February 5, 1882, MRS. LAVINA FORD, in the fifty-fifth year of her age.

The subject of this notice was born in Clarke county, Ala., March 20, 1827, and on the fifth day of December, 1850, she was married to John S. Ford, who survives her. They moved to this state in 1851, and settled and commenced life on the same place where she ever after resided and where she died. For thirty-five years she had been a consistent and exemplary member of the Methodist Church. She was the mother of eight children—seven sons and one daughter—the youngest, Belle, being about fifteen years. All her children are living, and were gathered round her bedside when she died, and were among the large number of sorrowing relatives and friends who attended her funeral. Her funeral sermon was preached by Rev. Mr. Cornett, the presiding elder of the Homer district. Mrs. Ford had been a sufferer for two years, and was confined to her bed since August last. During her long and painful illness she maintained that firm, confiding trust in Jesus, and patient resignation to the will of God that had ever been a prominent characteristic of her life. She was not over emotional or demonstrative in her religious feelings; her acts resulted from a deep conviction of duty, and her feelings flowed from a regenerated and pure heart. About two weeks before her death, for a short time, all pain seemed to leave her, and her heart was so filled with the presence and love of God that she gave expression in her feelings by shouts of praise and adoration. She said she was free from all pain of body and mind, and that God had given her this respite from bodily suffering, and this outpouring of his grace in her heart as a foretaste of the blessedness awaiting her.

The domestic qualities of Mrs. Ford were of the highest order; her energy, perseverance and tact in the performance of her various domestic duties attracted the attention and won the admiration of all who knew her; and so carefully did she train her large family of sons in domestic economy that there is scarcely a household duty that they can not execute with a dispatch, neatness and facility common only to the experienced female hand. Her death has caused a vacancy in society, in the church and in the home circle that is painfully felt. Her memory is deeply enshrined in the hearts and affections of her husband, her children, her relatives and friends. Long will they remember this good woman as worthy their love, affection and emulation.

Just before death she asked her attending physician if she was dying. He frankly informed her that her dissolution was near. She then called her family to her bedside and bade them farewell, fondly and affectionately kissing each one. This tender act seems to have been her last duty on earth; for when she had thus bidden her loved ones farewell, she arranged her head comfortably upon her pillow, and, with a smile that lights the face of none but the dying Christian, she exclaimed, distinctly and fervently: "Now, Jesus, come with thy angels and take me away." This was the last sentence she uttered. Soon her spirit was borne to its happy home in the skies to join loved ones gone before, and to await the coming of loved ones left behind.

Thus has passed from time to eternity, from earth to heaven, a beloved woman, a pure, loving, gentle Christian. She is gone! But who that knew her and her suffering would have her back? Who that witnessed her triumphant death would call her back from the skies?

T. J. FORD.

HOFFPAUER—JAMES HOFFPAUR was born January 1, 1805, was married to Mary B. Faulk about the year 1827, and departed this life in Vermillion parish, La., only a few miles from the place of his birth, March 20, 1882, in the seventy-fifth year of his age.

He was what the world would call a good man, honest and upright in his dealings, and kind and charitable to his neighbors. It was said by one who knew him well that he never knew him to turn one away unrelieved who came to him for help. Religiously he was a peculiar man. Attended church in his younger days; but, from some cause, lost confidence in leading professors of religion, and had not been to any church service in perhaps more than thirty-five years. He said he sought religion, but in his own way, and wished to keep it to himself. He had been a severe sufferer the last two years of his life, and had lost most of his property by going security for others, all of which he thanked God for, as it had helped to bring him to a genuine repentance. The preacher had often felt a desire to visit him, but was discouraged by others. About six weeks previous to his death he felt impressed to visit "Uncle Jim," and shall never regret this first visit. His brother asked him if he did not want the preacher to pray for him. He said it was useless for any one to pray for him, unless he prayed for himself. We told him we had come to help him pray, and quoted some appropriate passages of Scripture to him, to which he made no reply. As he had not told us not to pray we kneeled around his bedside and offered an earnest prayer in his behalf. When we arose from our knees the old man was in tears.

About five weeks from our first visit the preacher was sent for to attend a protracted meeting at Uncle Jim's house. We immediately went. It was on Friday when we reached his home. He had been converted since Tuesday night, and had eaten or slept very little since that time. He had singing and praying kept up nearly all the time, day and night, for the last ten or twelve days of his life. He seemed to have a special message for backsliders, and warned them of their danger, and begged them to come back to their Saviour. He besought the young not to imitate his example, and would shudder at the thought that he was so near gone. He wished to join the church, and wanted his name on the record, that all might know that his mind was thoroughly changed on this subject. One of the last acts of his life was to endeavor to make peace between two church members who for some time had felt unkindly toward each other. The writer has never witnessed a more thorough change in so short a time. When he made the second visit the faithful wife, who had prayed for him for fifty years, and who was no doubt the instrument of his conversion, said: "Oh, brother, this is not the same place you visited before; everything now belongs to the Lord, and we want our home and everything used to his glory." We felt it was good to be there. The old man seemed to have bright visions of glory before he passed away. He praised God to the last, and when too weak to speak his praise with his lips he clapped his hands in token of victory. A great change has been brought about in the community; several backsliders have been reclaimed; and many friends and relatives have renewed their covenant with God, etc., that the change may be permanent. The writer feels encouraged to go forward in the work of the Master.

J. T. WYNN.

SULLIVAN—MRS. W. T. J. SULLIVAN has gone before. Soon the sands of life will be measured with us; then may her sorrowing friends realize the happy truth that she has only preceded us to the glory land.

She was a lady of the most estimable traits of character. None could be associated with her without being touched with her gentleness and deep piety. She spent her youthful years among us, and we knew her and loved her. She was very delicately constituted by nature, and tenderly did her loved ones watch over her health; but the work of the destroyer has at last made sure his victim. Just when her family and friends were in daily anticipation of a visit from her, comes the sad intelligence, she is no more! God help her stricken ones to bear the heavy stroke! She and her honored companion once, tendered, so gently, words of comfort to our bereaved hearts we can not forget, and now, feeling deeply for the sorrow of her dear children and husband, we say to them, as she did to us, "Trust the Lord; he will work all things right and for our good if we love him."

She died at Starkville, Miss., and was brought back to her youthful home, near Sharon, and buried in the churchyard beside her parents and loved ones. Most impressive was the burial service. On the twenty-sixth, after the duties of the day were ended and twilight had closed over the village, the solemn peals of the church bell announced the arrival of the funeral cortege. We repaired to the cemetery and found the casket at the gateway most bountifully decorated with love's sweetest tokens, and there stood her dear stricken children, husband, and sisters weeping. The service at the grave was conducted by Bro. Hunnicutt, assisted by Bro. Caldwell. The soothing tone in which the service was read, the stillness and beauty of the night, and the subdued grief of the afflicted ones, rendered it the most solemn and impressive ceremony ever witnessed in our community, and can never be effaced from the memory of the few friends who gathered there to pay the last tribute of love to our sweet friend. This sad intelligence will come to other of the loved ones who are far away, and to them we would gently say: "Follow her as she followed Christ." Thankful, that her beloved ones sorrow not as those who have no hope, for "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Farewell, dear Mrs. Sullivan! We shall see thee no more till the morn of the resurrection. Then may we all be ready! Sweetly rest till the last trump shall awake us all!

ONE WHO LOVED HER.

JOHNSON—BRO. ELIEZAH JOHNSON was born May 12, 1820, in Troup county, Ga.; was married to Miss Almira Thompson, 1839, and joined the Methodist Church during the same year.

He moved from Georgia to Alabama not long afterward, and then to Louisiana, during 1857, when he settled near Montgomery, Winn parish, La., and has lived in that neighborhood until death, which occurred January 12, 1882. At the organization of the Ebenezer Church, which occurred shortly after he came to the county, he joined by letter, and continued a consistent member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, until death; yet he was not demonstrative in profession of faith. Maybe he had the weakness of many other timid men of not asserting the power of God to save; but his example was good.

He leaves a wife and five sons; all of the sons grown, and most of them religious. We sympathize with them in their loss; yet their loss is his gain, and may his death be a means to conversion of those unconverted.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S MANUAL

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,
Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages—Over 200 Illustrations,
Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

visitations. Spring sessions are not without advantage for an Annual Conference, and we observe with pleasure a growing sentiment that will enable us to make a distribution of sessions through a longer time, without violent change. You see our lessened number, and how time has dealt with some that remain. Two of our beloved colleagues are not, for God has taken them. Bishop Doggett died in Richmond, October 29, 1880; Bishop Wightman died in Charleston, February 15, 1882. They were the sons of Methodism, born at her altars. As her servants they filled every office and post where labor is required or honor bestowed. Their characters illustrated the doctrines they preached. They rest from their labors and their works do follow them. You anticipate us in the recommendation of an addition to the College of Bishops; it can not longer be postponed. Our judgment is that with the addition of three men, such as you will elect, the episcopal work of the Church can be done for the next four years.

Now, the God of peace, that brought again from the dead our Lord Jesus, that great Shepherd of the sheep, through the blood of the everlasting covenant, make you perfect in every good work, to do his will, working in you that which is well-pleasing in his sight, through Jesus Christ; to whom be glory forever and ever. Amen.

Texas Notes.

MR. EDITOR: Our General Conference delegates are off for Nashville. Texas has never before sent so large a representation, and has never felt so deep an interest in the proceedings of any General Conference. This, however, may be true of the whole church. Our congregation, especially those on the borders and those in the localities where the "invasion" movement has been inaugurated, will await with breathless interest the reaching of any ultimatum in the grave issues that have been discussed with so much warmth during the past three months, and which involve the change of name and the continued autonomy of our beloved church. There is manifested everywhere a firm confidence in the wisdom and prudence of the men into whose hands these grave matters have been entrusted. Many of them are of "the fathers," and helped to launch the ship of Southern Methodism upon the calmer sea of self existence. They have witnessed her proud voyage and her exploits and under Divine guidance will know how to steer her fortunes to a safe haven.

Our delegation will ask for peculiar favors and considerations at the hands of the General Conference; but these have been so often presented and discussed in our official organ that it is unnecessary to restate them here. Our needs are anomalous and pressing. This will be recognized by the Conference, and, no doubt, every possible measure looking to our relief will be adopted.

Many of your readers will be deeply pained to learn of the death of Rev. Robert Alexander, D. D., of the Texas Conference. He died at his home, in Chapel Hill, on the twenty-sixth of April, after a most painful illness of many weeks. Dr. Alexander, for the past several years, was the oldest Methodist preacher in Texas. Forty years ago his voice woke the gospel echoes in the villages and struggling communities of the infant republic of Texas. He was a giant in his day, and no man connected with Texas Methodism has shared so richly its honors and confidence. He was the first pastor of St. James Church, of this city, and it was mainly due to his untiring energies and the munificence of his father-in-law, the beloved David Ayers, that that struggling society was placed upon its present substantial basis. In this connection I am rejoiced to report that we are in the third week of a glorious revival in St. James. The interest seems to deepen and the influence to widen. Many are being converted in their homes. Last night our house was well nigh filled, and we are constrained to continue. At least fifty accessions, and, I hope, as many conversions will be the results.

H. M. DU ROSE.

GALVESTON, TEXAS, April 25, 1882.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

VICKSBURG, May 2.—The annual meeting of the Vicksburg and Meridian railroad, was held on the first instant. A new board of managers was elected, with Titus Ploch, of New York, as president. The board take full charge and assume entire control on and from the first of May, with John Scott, of the Alabama, New Orleans, Texas and Pacific railroads, as general manager, the last named company having the control of the Cincinnati, New Orleans, and Texas Pacific railroad. Like the Cincinnati Southern railroad the Vicksburg and Meridian railroad will be worked in full accord with that road, and the system from Cincinnati to Vicksburg will be operated as a whole.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 2.—A dispatch received reports an engagement on the twenty-eighth between Capt. Tupper's command and the Indians, twenty-five miles south of Cleverdale. Fifteen Indians are reported killed. Tupper's loss, four killed. Fears are felt for the safety of Fort Huachuca. The families of Capt. Tupper, Dave Haskell and four others are there, and only a few men to guard the post. Volunteers are organizing.

JACKSON, May 3.—Bishop J. H. D. Wingfield, missionary Bishop of California, Protestant Episcopal Church, who was recently elected assistant Bishop of the diocese of Mississippi, telegraped Judge P. F. Bailey, secretary of the council, to-day declining to accept the office.

HELENA, Ark., May 3.—The cut worm is very destructive to the growing crops of corn and cotton, and the gardens are especially subject to the pests. The almost countless number of these worms have invaded nearly every field in this section, and in very many places the crop is being replanted. It is believed that if the weather becomes very warm the worms will die and there will yet be time to plant a crop which will mature and give a fair yield.

There will be no trouble about cotton seed for planting, as most of the commission houses have a supply on hand sufficient to supply all the farmers in need in their immediate neighborhoods. In the way of seed corn there will be some trouble, and it may be an up-hill business to replant the corn fields.

WASHINGTON, May 3.—The President to-day issued a proclamation commanding the dispersion of all persons who have been obstructing the proper enforcement of the laws in Arizona, warning them to return to peaceful pursuits on or before noon of May 15.

VICKSBURG, May 3.—Planters are sending their stock, hands and supplies to their plantations lately overflowed, and planting is going on in these districts as fast as the water recedes.

KNOXVILLE, Tenn., May 3.—Hon. Horace Maynard died suddenly at one o'clock this morning of heart disease. He got out of bed at that hour, telling his wife he felt ill, and dropped dead on the floor.

NASHVILLE, Tenn., May 3.—The general conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church met here to-day. The Bishop's address was read by Bishop Tyeire. It gave a review of the church for four years past, and a statement of its present condition and prospects. It shows an increase of 247 itinerant ministers, and an increase of membership to 860,687. Thirteen thousand were added to the communion last year. The mission fund in four years has increased $111,438. There are over 5,000 members in the Indian mission, 4,000 in the Mexican Border mission and the same number in the Central Mexican mission. There has been an increase in Sunday-schools to 207,000 pupils. The circulation of Sunday-school literature is now over 400,000. The address also shows a healthy financial condition in the publishing house at Nashville.

HOUSTON, Texas, May 4.—Reports from all sections of the State are to the effect that crops are being ruined for want of rain. In North Texas wheat is damaged fully fifty per cent. by rust, worms and dronth.

WASHINGTON, May 4.—The President sent to-day a communication to the House as to the troops in Arizona. It states that there are in the Territory 2,273 enlisted men and 140 officers in addition to the forces under Gen. Forsythe.

TOMBSTONE, Arizona, May 4.—The Indian excitement is completely quited. There are no hostiles in the Dragoon mountains or anywhere else within fifty miles of Tombstone.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 4.—A careful summary shows a total of 141 whites and Mexicans killed by the Indians in Arizona and New Mexico during the two weeks, 500 head of stock killed and captured, and the destruction of over $75,000 worth of property.

ATLANTA, May 5.—Small-pox took a fresh start in the city to-day, creating a universal scare. There are twenty cases in various parts of the city. More are reported late this afternoon and are being investigated to-night. This far no vaccinated person has been attacked. The nights and evenings continue cool.

WASHINGTON, May 5.—Secretary Chandler has just received the following from Irkutsk, signed by Melville, dated Lena Delta, March 24, 1882: "I have found Delong and party—dead. Found all their papers and books. Will continue the search for Chipp."

BROOKHAVEN, May 7.—The county jail at this place was discovered in flames to-night at nine o'clock. It was entirely consumed, and with it three negro prisoners. The fire originated in the cell in which they were confined, and there is no doubt but they set it on fire in the hope of making their escape. Mack Williams, burglary; Isham Smith, larceny; George Allen, larceny. They begged piteously to be released, but it was impossible, and they perished in the flames, the victims of their own folly.

NASHVILLE, May 8.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to-day elected Rev. John S. Martin, D. D., of Baltimore, secretary, to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Dr. T. O. Summers. The call for resolutions brought from the various delegates forty-two resolutions, which were referred to the proper committees. Among the number was one reprobating the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors. Dr. Edwards presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the committee on episcopacy be and they are hereby earnestly requested, if practicable, to report by Thursday, May 11, their recommendation in regard to the number of Bishops which this General Conference should elect.

WASHINGTON, May 8.—There is no doubt now about the Chinese immigration bill becoming a law. The Secretary of State, Mr. Frelinghuysen, to-day stated to a Pacific coast Senator that the President would sign the bill.

BATON ROUGE, May 8.—The opening of the Legislature drew large crowds to the capitol building. The attendance of members in both Houses was very good.

MORGAN CITY, May 8. The water fell two and a half inches the past twenty-four hours. The gauge stands one and a half inches below the 1874 mark. The relief commissioners' agents distributed about 30,000 rations for fifteen days to-day. No more will be needed after the present supply is exhausted. It is estimated that four fifths of the overflowed cane is lost.

The first passenger train came in from New Orleans to-day, and was welcomed by a large crowd of citizens at the depot.

NEW YORK, May 8.—There is a general expression from the Irish of the Land League organization throughout the United States repudiating the Dublin murders, and expressing the opinion that they were the work of enemies of Ireland. The New York organizations have cabled Mr. Parnell this sentiment, coupled with the wish that the criminals may be brought to justice.

FOREIGN.

HAVANA, May 3.—The government of the Island of Guadaloupe gives notice that a premium of 100,000 francs will be given to inventors of a process for extracting from cane thirteen per cent. of its weight of sugar as a minimum yield.

LEMBERG, May 3. — Yesterday an exodus of Jews from all parts of Russia commenced. As the foreign corn trade was almost entirely in Jewish hands, the utmost confusion now prevails in that industry.

LONDON, May 5.—In the House of Commons, this evening, Sir Michael Hicks Beach gave notice, amid loud cheers from the Conservative members, that in consequence of the critical state of Ireland he would move, on Monday, that it is of paramount importance that the government's entire Irish policy be submitted to the House for discussion. Mr. Gladstone replied that he would consent to the discussion taking place on Monday, and, if necessary, he would also devote Tuesday thereto.

LONDON, May 6.—A late telegram from Dublin says: It now appears that Lord Frederick Cavendish and Under Secretary Burke, were stabbed and not shot. They were both strolling in the park about half a mile from the city gate and a quarter of a mile from the chief secretary's lodge, when a car drove up containing four men, two of whom jumped down from the car and attacked Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke, stabbing them in the throat and breast. It is said that after the act the murderers immediately drove off. There seems to be no clue to the assassination at present, but the police are taking most extraordinary measures to discover the perpetrators. A large quantity of notes and gold coin, besides their gold watches, were found in the pockets of the victims, which showed that the object of the crime was not robbery. Great excitement prevails throughout Dublin, and widespread indignation is expressed over the event. The telegraph offices are beseiged for later news.

POTSDAM, May 7.—Princess Victoria, wife of Crown Prince Frederick William, has been safely delivered of a son. Both mother and child are progressing favorably.

ROME, May 8.—When the Pope heard of the assassination he sent instructions to the Irish Bishops to request the clergy to express from the pulpits execration of the crime, and exhort the faithful to respect the law of the land.

A TRUE BLESSING.

It would indeed be a blessing to poor weak, nervous, debilitated, suffering humanity, if druggists would stop selling the many mild purgative pills and cathartic compounds advertised for the cure of liver complaint. Although they afford temporary relief, at the same time they weaken the digestive organs, and compel a continued and increasing use of the same. Sufferers from dyspepsia and liver complaint do not need cathartic, but should use some true medicinal tonic that will strengthen the digestive organs, and heal the deceased tissues of the stomach, liver and bowels. Such a remedy is Brown's Iron Bitters, and it never fails to effect a permanent cure. If you continue to live in poor health, and are determined to die before your time, you have only yourself to blame.—Courier.

A Rome dispatch reports the death of Giovanni Dupre, the Viennese sculptor, at the age of 64. His great work was the Cavour Monument, at Turin, which was unveiled in 1872. It is 60 feet in height and the marble used in it weighs 300,000 pounds.

Mr. Amos Bradley, Rochester, N. Y. says: "As a sure cure for nervous debility and general decay of the system I can conscientiously recommend Brown's Iron Bitters as a medicine that will give prompt relief. I do this as a duty I owe my fellow men, being myself restored to perfect health."

Is a compound of the virtues of sarsaparilla, stillingia, mandrake, yellow dock, with the iodide of potash and iron, all powerful blood-making, blood-cleansing, and life-sustaining elements. It is the purest, safest, and in every way the most effectual alterative medicine known or available to the public. The sciences of medicine and chemistry have never produced so valuable a remedy, nor one so potent to cure all diseases resulting from impure blood. It cures Scrofula, and all scrofulous diseases, Erysipelas, Rose, or St. Anthony's Fire, Pimples and Face-grubs, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Humors, Salt Rheum, Scald-head, Ringworm, Ulcers, Sores, Rheumatism, Mercurial Disease, Neuralgia, Female Weaknesses and Irregularities, Jaundice, Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility.

By its searching and cleansing qualities it purges out the foul corruptions which contaminate the blood, and cause derangement and decay. It stimulates and enlivens the vital functions. It promotes energy and strength. It restores and preserves health. It infuses new life and vigor throughout the whole system. No sufferer from any disease which arises from impurity of the blood need despair, who will give AYER'S SARSAPARILLA a fair trial. Remember, the earlier the trial, the speedier the cure.

Its recipe has been furnished to physicians everywhere; and they, recognizing its superior qualities, administer it in their practice.

For nearly forty years AYER'S SARSAPARILLA has been widely used, and it now possesses the confidence of millions of people who have experienced benefits from its marvellous curative virtues.

A WONDER[illegible]

SCIENTIFIC

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition; as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.

2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.

3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.

4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

SUNSET WITH CLOUDS.

BY GERRARD LEWIS.

The earth grows dark about me,
But heaven shines clear above,
And daylight slowly melts away
With crimson light I love;
And clouds, like floating shadows,
Of every form and hue,
Hover around its dying couch,
And blush a bright adieu.

Like fiery forms of angels,
They throng around the sun—
Couriers that on their monarch wait,
Until his course is run;
From him they take their glory;
His honor they uphold;
And trail their flowing garments forth,
Of purple, green and gold.

Oh, bliss to gaze upon them;
From this commanding hill,
And drink the spirits of the hour,
While all around is still;
While distant skies are pleading,
And strife is fading far away;
A shadowy landscape dipp'd in gold,
Where happier spirits stray.

I feel myself immortal;
As to you robe of light
The glorious hills and vales of heaven,
Are dawning on the sight;
I seem to hear the murmur
Of some celestial stream;
And catch the glimmer of its course
Beneath the sacred beam.

And sooth, methinks with rapture,
Is my eternal home—
More lovely than this passing glimpse—
To which my footsteps roam;
There's something yet more glorious
Than earth's life of pain;
And, strengthened with a mightier hope,
I face the world again.

Letter from California.

MR. EDITOR: As I am getting letters from Mississippi and some from other States inquiring about California, allow me, through your paper, to answer them.

First, California is a fine State with a thrifty population, and more money than any State for the population. The State, as a whole, is very healthy; only a few localities with chills and fever, and some pneumonia in the mountains. The railroads have lands for sale from $2 50 to $20 per acre, according to quality and proximity to depots. Most of these lands are ready for the plow, being open plains, and having no brush nor timber to remove. In most parts of the State people farm without any fence—stock being kept up in pastures. Land can be fenced here with plank as cheap as you can make a rail fence in Mississippi or Louisiana.

One man can cultivate 160 acres of land with ease, if he has a team and farming utensils sufficient. Horses are worth from $110 to $500. Cheap horses will do to farm with after a fashion; but good, firm horses can be had for $75. One hundred and sixty acres of wheat in good hand will make $1,500 to $2 000.

Persons coming out here should have money enough to buy stock, plows, and harness, and also food for six months. Food here for man and beast is much cheaper than in Mississippi or Louisiana, and horses and mules will keep fat on hay. I have never seen so good a country as this for hogs, sheep, and all kinds of poultry.

The railroad company will give from two to five years to pay for land; a small part paid cash at the beginning, or they will lease land to settlers. The railroad company is rich and good for all their contracts. The title to land comes through the government, and they will see that the titles are perfect. I shall see Southern California in a short time, and then I can write more about that part of the State. If persons wish to know more about these lands, if they will send me their address to San Jose, Cal., I will see that a printed description, giving full particulars, is sent them. Since I have seen more of California I am more pleased.

F. M. FEATHERSTUN.

JUVENILE WIT AND HUMOR.—"A village schoolmaster, in examining a class, asked the boy at the head of it, 'What is artificial manure?' 'I don't know, sir,' said he, and the same reply was given by several others of the children. But a precocious youngster, not yet in his teens, was equal to the occasion, and when it came to his turn, shouted, 'Please, sir, it's the stuff they grow artificial flowers in.'"

Whereas, A rumor has reached us in our places as delegates of this General Conference that Samuel Cupples, a lay delegate from the St. Louis Annual Conference, since his election to this General Conference has openly and before the world violated the General Rules of the church by permitting dancing in his house; and, whereas, said violation of the law of the church by one occupying the honored and trusted position of a legislator in the church is a scandalous and fraught with much mischief to the good order and Discipline of the same; therefore,

Resolved, That a committee consisting of one from each Annual Conference represented in this General Conference be appointed, whose duty it shall be to examine into the truthfulness of said rumor and report such resolutions in reference to the said Samuel Cupples as they deem necessary.

O. R. Blue said that he thought the matter ought to be investigated; that there was nothing personal in it; but it was a matter whether the Discipline should be enforced or not.

C. W. Miller moved to table the resolution. Lost.

The resolution was then adopted, and the committee appointed.

A. H. Redford, formerly book agent of the Publishing House, then commenced reading his defense. The hour of adjournment having arrived before he had concluded, the Conference adjourned until eight P. M.

EVENING SESSION.

The Conference met according to adjournment, Bishop Pierce in the chair, and devotional exercises were held by the Rev. J. H. McLean.

Dr. A. H. Redford resumed the reading of his reply to the book agent, Book Committee, and business manager, at the conclusion of which the Conference adjourned with the benediction by Bishop Pierce.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 10—SEVENTH DAY.

The General Conference held its seventh session, Bishop Kavanaugh presiding, opening at nine o'clock with devotional exercises conducted by the Rev. Dr. D. R. McAnally, of St. Louis.

In accordance with instructions, the changes were made in the memorial to Bishop Wightman so as to read as follows:

Bishop William May Wightman, was born in Charleston, S. C., January 8, 1808, and died in the city of his birth, February 15, 1882. He was converted under a sermon preached by Rev. James O. Andrew (afterward Bishop), and made a public profession of Christ at the age of sixteen. He was graduated at the Charleston College in 1827, and in 1828 he was received on trial in the South Carolina Conference, and immediately sprang into position and popularity. He labored successfully on the Pee Dee, Orangeburg, Sumter, and Abbeville circuits, and in Charleston and Camden Stations, and on the Cokesbury District. In 1834 he was appointed agent of Randolph-Macon College, and after three years' service in the capacity, was called to the chair of English Literature, which he filled two years in that institution of learning. He was elected editor of the Southern Christian Advocate in 1840, and continued until 1854, when he was chosen President of Wofford College. In 1859 he changed to the Chancellorship of the Southern University, and in 1866 was elected to the office of Bishop.

In all these relations he performed his duties faithfully and well. He wrote much and with great facility. As an educator he was painstaking and successful. As a preacher he was a great acquisition. The pulpit was his throne of thunder, especially at camp-meetings and on great occasions. Traditions of his power in the early days of his ministry still linger in North Carolina, and many through his instrumentality were brought into saving contact with the truth. As a Bishop he was loved and welcomed by the Conferences and was abundant in labors—too much for his strength, which, indeed, was not small. He was capable of great service and he was a willing and cheerful worker. His witness is in heaven and his record is on high.

The following report of the Sunday-School Committee, appointed by the last General Conference to co-operate with the Sunday-school editor and the book agent in providing "for the publication of Sunday-school books and periodicals," and in "the general supervision of our Sunday-school interests, with power to appoint a Secretary if it is deemed necessary," is respectfully submitted.

The committee in the discharge of their duties have endeavored to aid the Sunday-school editor in every practicable way in advancing the important interests committed to their care, and they are happy to state that the past quadrennium has been one of decided progress—the best evidences of this are seen in the improved character of our publications, their greatly increased circulation, and almost universal introduction into our schools, as well as in the general favor with which they are received, not only by our own people, but by all who are interested in Sunday-school work. The number of Sunday schools has increased from 7,262 in 1878, to 9,310 in 1881; teachers in 1878, 54,867, to 62,442 in 1881; scholars in 1878, 301,293, to 462,321—making an aggregate increase in our Sunday-school population in four years 78,603.

While these figures indicate a healthy growth in this department, the number of children in our Sunday-schools does not equal, as we believe it should, our church-membership, the disparity is considerably less than it was four years ago, and we hope will be still less at the end of the next quadrennium.

The circulation of our Sunday-school periodicals has increased from an aggregate of 250,000 monthly issues in 1878 to a maximum circulation of over 400,000. This increased circulation has enabled the Publishing House to reduce the price of these publications, and thus increase their usefulness by bringing them within the reach of a constantly widening circle of readers. A few of our schools, we regret to say, use other literature than our own, but the number has greatly diminished within the last four years.

Your committee has not deemed it advisable to exercise the authority committed to them of appointing a secretary believing that the necessity has not been sufficiently imperative to demand such a step. At the suggestion of the committee, however, a small sum has been placed at the disposal of the Sunday-school editor by the Book Committee, to be used in securing such editorial assistance as he might deem necessary.

Your committee, impressed with the growing magnitude of the work devolving upon the Sunday-school editor the difficulty of any one man discharging all its varied duties, and the increasing danger to which this vital interest of the church is exposed; in view of the possibility of the editor becoming suddenly disabled through sickness or other cause, would respectfully suggest that the time has come for the appointment of at least one assistant, who shall be subordinate to the editor, and under his control. Should such assistance be deemed advisable by the General Conference, your committee would suggest that the appointment be made by the Sunday-School Committee, in connection with the Sunday-school editor and the book agent, leaving the Book Committee to fix the compensation.

While your committee, according to the action of the General Conference, was clothed with the power to appoint a secretary, if it is deemed necessary, they have no control of funds with which to compensate such an officer for his work. Sympathizing with the Book Committee in their efforts to redeem the Publishing House from the incubus of debt which pressed so heavily upon it, and rejoicing in their success, your committee have thus far refrained from asking for an appropriation of any portion of the profits on Sunday-school publications for the employment of a secretary. The time, however, we think, has come for an advance movement in this direction.

In May, 1881, a convention of Conference secretaries was called to meet in Nashville, in connection with the Sunday-school Committee, to discuss the general interests of our Sunday-school, and to devise such plans as in their judgment would promote this important department of church-work. Nineteen secretaries from various parts of the connection assembled, and held a profitable and harmonious session. A number of recommendations were made by this convention which the Sunday-school editor will submit to the General Conference for its consideration. The meeting of the Conference secretaries was productive of much good. The zeal of brethren was quickened by an interchange of views, harmony was promoted, and a general forward movement was inaugurated. The results have been highly satisfactory.

In conclusion, your committee would express their satisfaction at the decided improvement in every department of our Sunday-school work which characterize its history for the past four years. Our people have kept pace with the general advancement in the Sunday-school world, and we believe the children and young people of our church are more carefully instructed in the word of God to-day than at any period in our history. We thank God for the grace which has enabled his people to do so much for the children of this generation, and we look hopefully to the future when a glorious harvest will be garnered from this sowing. May he continue to bless our Sunday-school work.

The report was referred to the Committee on Sunday-schools.

The following reports were read and adopted:

Your Committee on Itinerancy have carefully examined the following Journals, and submit their report:

Kentucky Conference.—The Minutes of the four annual sessions are remarkably accurate; precise, and, in fact, almost faultless. Bishop's signatures duly attached, marginal index large and complete, the running head from page to page giving date and place of meeting regularly. Where a disciplinary question is asked the second time the question is not written out with the word "resumed."

South Carolina Conference.—The Journal is a model of accuracy and neatness. It is a singular fact of these Minutes that upon roll call at the opening of the Conference session the names of members present are in no instance given. The paragraph bearing on this point invariably reads, "the secretary of the last Conference called the roll and—clerical and—lay members answered to their names. It is impossible to find out by these Minutes who was present and who not present, in fact impossible to find out who is, and who is not, a member unless by referring to list of appointments.

Arkansas Conference.—The Journal of the Arkansas Conference has been neatly and tastefully kept, and the Minutes are full and accurate. [On page 539 a preacher was received into connection on the call of the seventh question, "Who remain on trial?" Pages 543, 563, 580, 610, 612 preachers were placed on the supernumerary and superannuated lists and located under the call of the seventeenth question, "Are all the preachers blameless in their life and official administration?" 3. Page 563 a preacher was elected deacon under the call of the second question, "Who remain on trial." 4. Page 565, a preacher was received and another continued on trial without the call of any question. 5. Page 589, the name of David C. Summers was called, and, pending the consideration, Conference adjourned, and the case was not again taken up during the session. 6. Page 611, a preacher was elected deacon and another continued on trial under the call of the fourth question, "Who are admitted into full connection?" 7. During the forty-second session the questions laid down in the Discipline are not all called. Evidently the secretary is not responsible for any of the errors or omissions, but the presiding Bishop.

Louisiana Conference.—The Journal of this Conference has been, for the most part, well kept, and is a faithful record of the work of the Conference. We note, however, the following errors and omissions. 1. The names of the members attending the thirty-third session are not recorded. 2. There are no marginal notes in the Minutes of the thirty-fifth and thirty-sixth sessions. 3. Page 95 the Minutes say a committee was appointed on the case of W. J. Picot, but do not say on what account; and on page 100 a similar record is made in the case of R. M. Crowsin. 4. In most cases the Minutes do not show who presided after the first day of the session. 5. On pages 7, 10, 11, 98, 99, 101, preachers were placed on the list of superannuates, supernumeraries, continued on trial, discontinued, admitted into full connection, and elected to deacon's and elder's orders under the call of the twentieth question, "Are all the preachers blameless in their life and official administration." 6. On page 96 a preacher was elected to elder's orders under the call of the seventh question, "Who are deacons of one year?" For some of these errors the secretary is responsible, and for others the presiding Bishop.

Texas Conference.—Local preachers are elected to elder's orders with no statement that they presented note certifying their belief in our doctrines and discipline. See page 148. On page 157 it is said that question 31 was called; but the question is not stated. With the above exceptions, the Journal is satisfactorily kept, and deserves high commendation.

Your Committee on Itinerancy have considered a resolution signed by P. A. Peterson, W. S. Black, and A. M. Shipp, asking that the second restrictive rule of the Discipline, referring to representation in the General Conference, be changed. We respectfully recommend non-concurrence.

Also a memorial signed by the following members of the Kentucky Conference, viz.: B. F. Bristow, W. B. Godbey, C. J. Nugent, John Jay Dickey, George T. Gould, J. C. C. Newton, D. B. Cooper, Alex. Redd, B. F. Sedwick, and G. C. Kelley, asking the appointment of evangelists. We recommend non-concurrence.

SAMUEL ROBERTS, Ch'n.

The following report was adopted:

G. W. Whitman, elder of the South Carolina Conference deposed from the ministry on charge of immorality. His case is remanded to the South Carolina Conference for a new trial, on the ground of inconsistency in the decision, in that it deposed him from the ministry on the charge of immorality and retained him in the church.

The following report was read, and laid over for future action:

The committee on Revisal would respectfully report, that they have duly considered the suggestions contained in the Bishops' Address in regard to the supervision of the records of the church, Quarterly and District Conferences, and recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

1. On page 67 of the Discipline add as item 7 in the order of the Church Conference business, the following: "It shall be the duty of the secretary of the Church Conference to present his Church Register and the records of Church Conferences, to the third Quarterly Conference for inspection."

2. On page 62 of the Discipline, in the order of Quarterly Conference business, change question 15 so that it shall read: "Is there a Church Register, and a record of Church Conferences, and have they been faithfully kept?" [The Conference shall cause these records to be examined.]

3. On page 118 of the Discipline add to the answer to question 5 these words, "and at the District Conference for examination," so that the answer shall read thus: "To present the records of the Quarterly Conference, and to report to the Joint Board of Finance of the Annual Conference, a full account of the acts of his Board of Stewards the preceding year, and to have the same at the Quarterly Conference and at the District Conference for examination."

4. On page 51 of the Discipline insert as answer 3, to question 8, in the order of business in the Annual Conferences the following: "Let every Annual Conference examine the records of District Conferences," the present answers 3, 4 and 5 to be numbered 4, 5 and 6.

5. On page 78 of the Discipline, at the close of answer 9, to question 1, concerning the duties of presiding elder, add these words, "and have the records of his District Conference at the Annual Conference for examination," so that the answer shall read: "To procure at the fourth Quarterly Conference full statistics from every charge, to be reported at the Annual Conference in case the preacher in charge fail to make his report; and have the records of his District Conference at the Annual Conference for examination."

6. We have considered a paper, signed by B. F. Alexander, P. P. Ellis, and C. W. Carter; and one by J. H. H. [illegible] proposing a change of Discipline [illegible] 59, section 4, chapter 2, [illegible] question 4, in the order of [illegible] Conference business, so as to make the recording Steward the recorder of the proceedings of the Quarterly Conference, and recommend that the said answer 8 be so amended as to read thus: "To see that all its proceedings are faithfully kept by the secretary of the Conference, and properly signed by the president and secretary, to be recorded by the Recording Steward in a book kept by him for that purpose."

7. We recommend concurrence in the paper of S. W. Turner, asking that paragraph 3, section 4, chapter 11, page 198 be stricken from the Discipline, it being in conflict with section 5 chapter 11, adopted by the General Conference of 1878.

8. We recommend the adoption by this Conference of the resolution of P. A. Peterson and W. W. Walker, as follows:

Resolved, That the Book Editor be requested to number the paragraphs, in future editions of the Discipline, consecutively through the entire book, regardless of the divisions into chapters and sections; and also to give in the index references the number of the paragraphs instead of the pages.

9. The Committee disapprove the resolution of J. S. Kennedy proposing an amendment of the Discipline requiring that a collection be taken in each pastoral charge to defray expenses of the delegates to the General Conference, deeming it best to leave this matter with the several Annual Conferences, and therefore recommend non-concurrence.

10. The Committee recommend non-concurrence in the resolution offered by J. S. Kennedy and T. P. Summers proposing to change answer 1 in question 2, section 2, chapter 2, page 42, of the Discipline by striking out the words "one of whom may be a local preacher."

11. The Committee also recommend non-concurrence in the resolution signed by the same proposing a change in answer 1, question 1, section 1, page 31 of the Discipline by striking out the clause "one-fourth of whom may be local preachers."

12. We recommend non-concurrence in the paper of William Allen and J. M. Binkley proposing a change of punctuation in the I. and XVII. Articles of religion as follows: "omitting the coma which follows the word things, in article I., add the coma which follows the word regeneration in article XVII."

13. John Adams and S. W. Turner ask that Church Conference be empowered to strike from the church rolls those who habitually neglect public worship and the social meetings of the church. We recommend no concurrence.

14. B. F. Alexander and C. W. Carter ask that in connection with the order of business in Quarterly Conferences a note be placed at the bottom of page 63 to read as follows: "The questions followed by figures are to be asked at the Quarterly Conferences, inclusive by the ministers at the discretion of the presiding." We recommend non-concurrence.

15. A resolution signed by the same ask that answer 3 to question 1, section 3, chapter 3 page 77 of the Discipline be amended by striking out the words "and the publication at our own press of tracts and Sunday-school books." We recommend non-concurrence.

16. A resolution (without a signature) was sent to the Committee asking that the General Conference legalize the appointment of women as Sunday-school superintendents. Believing that no legislation is called for on this subject, we recommend non-concurrence.

17. No action is deemed necessary on the papers of H. J. Adams and W. A. Turner in relation to superannuates and supernumeraries, as the subject has already been reported upon by your Committee.

18. The resolution of William Allen asking that reference or proof texts be added to our Articles of Religion is not approved, and we therefore recommend non-concurrence.

Your Committee on Missions have had under consideration the following papers referred to them:

1. Petition from the Rev. Wm. Barrett, a member of the Missouri Conference, and therewith he begs leave to return said petition, with the recommendation that it be referred to the Board of Missions.

2. The report of J. B. McFerrin, agent, on the request of Mr. Kent, and I beg leave to report that we have made due inquiry into the same, and find the amount to be safely and judiciously invested and managed. The will requires the funds to be held and invested by the agent of the Publishing House, who is to pay the interest accruing to the treasurer of the Board of Missions.

3. The memorial of the Southwest Missouri Conference, asking that the Board of Missions be so reconstructed as to make it consist of one member from each Annual Conference. We respectfully recommend non-concurrence.

When Dr. Kelley had concluded the reading of the report of the Committee on Missions, H. J. Adams moved that the report be so amended as to increase the Board of Missions to one member from each Conference.

Dr. McAnally opposed the amendment.

Bishop Kavanaugh—A motion of this character requires the laying over of the report, and any discussion on the subject is out of order.

A delegate arose and asked to lay the amendment upon the table.

B. F. Alexander, of the Louisiana Conference, thought that the process was regular—the amendment could be tabled, and the report properly come up for consideration.

Dr. Evans, of North Georgia Conference, raised the point of order, that the motion to lay on the table, temporarily, was not debatable, which was sustained by the chair.

EARTHLY JOY NOT FREE FROM SORROW.

BY MINNIE E. BERRY.

Few earthly joys are free from grief,
Few cloudless days rejoice the sight,
Life's sunny hours are few and brief,
Into most lives come tears and blight.

Our highest bliss has thoughts of pain,
Our sweetest dreams oft make us weep,
In joy we sing grief's sad refrain,
From happiness oft sorrows reap.

Oft when we smile a glistening tear
Bedims the luster of our eye;
Oft in the midst of mirth and cheer
We sadly heave an anxious sigh.

It matters not how blest we be,
Life's richest blessings may be ours,
No joy on earth from grief is free,
All blooms can not be thornless flowers.

E'en when religion is our stay,
When hope of glory fills our breast,
Life can not be forever May,
Nor we with joy be always blest.

God wills it so. His matchless love
Designs to crown us his at last,
With perfect, endless joy above,
When toilsome, tearful life is past.

And if on earth this joy was ours,
We would not turn to him for rest,
But, thoughtless, pluck life's fairest flowers,
And ne'er with heavenly joy be blest.

Dear Father, may we bear in mind,
The transient glow of mortal joy,
And feel in grief that thou art kind,
Our dreams of pleasure to destroy.

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN KEENER.

Second Quarter—Lesson IX.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"Whosoever will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me."—MARK viii. 34.

FOLLOWING CHRIST.

Many leaders, to gain adherents to their doctrine, place, as first inducements, all the attractive features of their faith, and the disagreeable they leave unmentioned, and thus by unfair, not to say false, presentations entrap their copverts. But not so with Jesus. When he began teaching his kingdom he mentions its blessings in one brief summary of beatitudes, and then addresses himself to make men clearly understand just what it would cost them to follow him, and also how much more it cost them not to follow him. True, he points out the glories and future triumph of his kingdom, but the burden of his teachings were of the difficulties and trials they must encounter in following him. There was but one transfiguration, while there were many temptations and persecutions in his own ministry. He gave his followers to understand that they might not expect to fare better than their Lord and Master.

His first proclamation when he assumed his prophetic office was, Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. But he immediately adds the condition upon which he will give rest unto their souls. Take my yoke upon you. Here we have the epitome of the nature of his service.

The golden text of this lesson embodies the identical principles of that gentle winning call which fell from the gracious lips of the lover of sinners, and yet how differently we hear it. At the sound of the one the weary sinner feels drawn to the Saviour, and, at hearing of the other, rebels. How many a soul, ladened with a heavy burden, when the invitation of the Burden-Bearer is heard, feels a wistful eagerness of soul to come after him, but, learning the hard condition, that whosoever will come after me must deny himself, and take up his cross, and follow me, turns away sorrowful, chosing to carry through every day his own burden rather than the yoke Jesus will give him to be carried to his life's end. He departs, though the Master pleadingly calls after him, My yoke is easy and my burden is light—in comparison to the one he carries, made up of sins, which grew heavier every day. Will men ever learn that the service of self is the worse tyranny that human soul ever endures. The self-denial which Christ's service demands is not our common idea of it; the mere refusing of ourselves some sensuous profit or pleasure falls far short of what he teaches. The man is to deny the whole self, natural mottves, impulses, thoughts, affections, so far as they come in conflict with the claims of Christ. Self-denial, for the sake of self, as if our pains were a sweet incense to God, and the more we groan the more he is pleased, is contrary to Christ's teachings and is the doctrine of devils; it belies God's goodness, and makes men self-righteous. It is making a substitute for the atonement; pennance, as practiced by the Romish Church, is this sort of self-denial. Self-denial which Christ requires is to make Christ first and self last. It is only virtue when done for Christ's sake. Following this self-denial is take up the cross; that is the symbol of doing our duty to the death; there are many crosses; ethical crosses are not the heaviest; there are crosses to be taken up in progress of faith, great, heavy mysteries, inexplicable, which we must carry; but, thank God, the saints, in all ages, have found rest in taking them up and bearing them.

The Master now shows why he gave his disciples this seemingly hard requirement. His reason is that all self-seeking is self-losing. The life of the two selves is here, and of two lives; the losing of life in living and the saving of life in dying. The lesson is plain; a setting over against each other the mere temporal existence with its claims and the eternal life with its greater claims. The paradox ceases when we remember the two lives, here and hereafter, time and eternity. To show the wisdom of his advice to them he states, in an awful interrogation, the cost to men if they do not follow him. Notice the impossibility of the condition hidden in the if. If he gain the whole world? The greatest treasures of this world the richest man must share and enjoy with the poorest—light, sound, books, sight, health—but suppose he could, and it would come as near satisfying his immortal soul as would an orange flung into the middle of the Pacific come near displacing its waters. Many a man makes this bad bargain; silently, unconsciously bargains away his soul; for a few fleeting pleasures they have been sold out at last, and spend their eternal age in prison for debt. To human nature the conditions imposed, the questions propounded are appalling. Christ seems to feel it himself, and he justifies himself by telling them of the more appalling destiny of those who would be ashamed of him and his word, and then, as in further justification and relief to his hard sayings, he alludes to the near pledge of his triumph, and the share that some would have in it. His transfiguration made Peter, at least for the while, forget the trials and conflicts of the way, and exclaim in ecstasy: "It is good for us to be here."

Time of Holding the Louisiana Conference.

MR. EDITOR: We have received the Minutes of our last Annual Conference, and are better pleased with the work than for several years. There are some minor errors, but there is one important omission, viz: Bro. J. D. Harper offered a substitute to a motion made with regard to the time of holding our next annual session. His substitute was that the Bishops be requested to hold our next session, beginning on the first Wednesday in February, 1883. This substitute was duly carried by a very decided vote of the Conference. The wisdom of holding our Conference at some time more nearly approaching the first of March (the close of the commercial year in this State) was demonstrated last winter in the very satisfactory financial reports as compared with other years, and that after an unprecedentedly short crop. Let the Bishops, in their meeting at Nashville, take especial cognizance of our request as a Conference.

LAFOURCHE MISSION, LOUISIANA CONFERENCE.

MR. EDITOR: The Lafourche mission extends over four parishes, Ascension, Assumption, Lafourche and Terrebonne, which are among the richest and most beautiful in the State. It derives its name from Bayou Lafourche, a bayou which runs out of the Mississippi at Donaldsonville, and empties into the Gulf, near the mouth of the Atchafalaya. On this bayou there are several towns of considerable size; in fact, it is one continuous village almost from one end to the other. The soil is very fertile, producing yearly a large quantity of sugar. The mission extends beyond this, and takes in the towns of Houma and Tigerville. There is not a more beautiful country than this on the globe. Here the oranges bloom and ripen into fruit, sugar cane waves in the breeze of perpetual spring. The climate is delightful, and we have many advantages. We have intercourse with New Orleans, and other places, both by railroads and steamboats. There are branch roads running in various directions, and connecting with Morgan's Louisiana & Texas railroad. Altogether, this side of the picture is most lovely and beautiful. But, alas! it has a dark side. Spiritually speaking, it is wrapt in a mantle of darkness and gloom, marring its beauty and detracting from its loveliness. The priests of Roman Catholicism have full sway, and the religion of Christ can not find its way to the hearts of the people, and, as a matter of course, ignorance and superstition predominate. The Sabbath is desecrated by priests and people, and every commandment in the decalogue broken day by day. Sunday is the favorite day with the priests for holding their fairs, beginning Saturday. At these fairs they sell liquors of all kinds, often getting bar-keepers to set up a regular bar-room on the ground, and sell to the people. At some places the priests have a bar-room open every Sunday, to make money of those who attend church, and complain when made to pay the license.

I have been among the people of Mexico, Central America, and various other places, but never have I seen a people that needed the gospel more than these do. On the mission we have four churches, one in each of the following towns: Donaldsonville, Thibodeaux, Houma and Tigerville. Though the population of each of the three first-mentioned towns is quite large, our congregations are comparatively small. The churches are very much dilapidated, and the people don't like to go into them. If the churches were repaired the congregations would grow more rapidly, but they are about to fall down, and will fall soon if there is not something done to them at once. But, alas! what can we do? We have few who are in sympathy with us, and they are too poor to render any assistance. Then what are we to do? Allow the buildings to fall for want of repair? No; before we do that we will appeal to those interested in the missionary work, and we sincerely hope that God will move upon the hearts of some to respond to the appeal.

The mission here, and in other parts of southern Louisiana, is of as much importance as the mission in Mexico or other places; then why neglect it? We have met men who did not believe in foreign missions, saying we have work enough to do at home. Here, then, brethren, is a mission at home that needs your help. Right here, in our own Louisiana, the fairest spot in all the nation, where came Evangeline in days of yore. We need money, not only to repair our churches, but also to procure Bibles, tracts, etc., to distribute among the people, the majority of whom have never seen the inside of a Bible. Some of you would be surprised if I were to tell you that I know men and women, "whose shoulders are bent by the weight of many years," who have never read a chapter in the Bible; but it is true. I had a conversation, a few days since, with a man in Klotzville, a man who had been raised there, and knew every man for miles around, and he told me that he knew of but one man who had ever read the Bible. Then these people need the gospel; they need to be taught that godliness and sin are incompatible; they need to be taught to pray to God, instead of Mary and the rest of the saints; they need to be taught that the priests are mortals, like the rest of us, and that they are not swallowing a little God in every consecrated wafer that they receive from the hands of the priests.

Any contributions will be gladly received by the writer. Address,

C. F. STIVERS,
Thibodeaux, La.

NATCHEZ, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: We have just closed a series of services, conducted by Bros. Woodward and D. P. Bradford. The preaching was spiritual, pointed and practical, and was greatly enjoyed by our people. The sacramental service on Sunday was an occasion of special interest. The number of communicants was large, the sermon was rich in spiritual truth, and there was much of genuine religious emotion. The attendance at the afternoon love-feast was, by far the largest I have ever known in Natchez on such an occasion. Our presiding elder expressed special gratification at the reports made to the Quarterly Conference. The following epitome of the several reports may be of general interest: Number of accessions during the quarter, 40; monies raised for all purposes, $1,101 70. In order that other churches may have the stimulus of example, and may also see the wisdom of organizing societies, each with a special end in view, I will give the amounts raised by our several societies during the quarter: Ladies' Aid Society, $151; Parsonage Society, $181 10; Benevolent Society, $136 80; Young Folks' Aid Society, $18 65. To our churches everywhere I would say: "Organize, organize; there is nothing like organizing."

The results of the labors of our illustrious founder, John Wesley, form one of the brightest examples, in all history, of the value of proper organization. Had Wesley valued organization no more than did Whitefield, then where would have been Methodism, with her glorious history and her sublimely gigantic achievements? We may all take a lesson from Wesley. If we wish to accomplish anything, in any direction, the best thing in the world to do is to organize for that special purpose. "What is everybody's business is nobody's;" but those who band themselves together for the accomplishment of a certain purpose usually feel a pride in accomplishing what they have undertaken.

Our Sunday-school is growing at a rapid rate in several directions. For several Sabbaths past new names have been added to the roll every Sabbath. Twelve new names were added last Sabbath. New teachers are in demand, but I rejoice to say that there is no lack in this respect. We have an abundant supply of teachers, who are prompt, faithful and efficient.

MAY 1, 1882.

TRYUS, MISS.

MR. EDITOR: At our last Conference I was appointed to the Providence circuit, Brookhaven district, Mississippi Conference. I had five churches, in a straight line, up and down Pearl river, from Monticello to Georgetown, a distance of about thirty miles.

Our population is dense, thrifty, industrious and pious; in fact, I know of no part of our country where the people were getting along better in temporal and religious matters, but recently we have met with reverses. We have had two of the most destructive cyclones to pass through our work that have ever visited this part of the country in the last forty or fifty years, if ever there has been such at any time. On the eighteenth of April one passed through the southeastern part of Copiah county, and crossed Pearl river near Rockport. It was nearly a mile wide, and literally demolished everything before it, at least in places, and, strange to say, no one was killed; at the same time it blew houses away with everything; for instance, one family, father, mother, a large number of children in the house, not one thing left but the family; corn, meat, clothing, bedding, even the clothes they had on were blown away from them; none were hurt. Many persons were injured, more or less. None have died as yet. Some persons have abandoned these places.

On Saturday, the twenty-second, one of the most awful and destructive cyclones struck the town of Monticello that any one in this country has ever known. Monticello was once a most beautiful town, located on a very high bluff on Pearl river. It was once the seat of the government of the State, but in late years was much reduced in population. The Methodists had a large brick church, and is now being occupied by us and the Baptists. The population of the town was about three hundred, white and black. There were ten persons killed during the storm. Only three houses are left standing; two of them were in rather the edge of the cyclone. Such a sight was hardly ever witnessed. It can not be told; no language can express it; a person will have to see it. It was certainly the hand of Providence that every man, woman and child was not killed. It further shows that nothing can resist a cyclone. It picked up a large grindstone and an iron wedge, and carried them several hundred yards; and many remarkable and almost incredible things did occur; wonderful, indeed. A Baptist minister, Mr. Dale, a good and useful man, was killed. He lived long enough to leave a good testimony of the power of Christ to save in death. Our church there is now only a ruined mass, razed to the ground. My congregation at that place is scattered; no place to hold services. The three houses left are now crowded with the wounded, and likely the dying. So, altogether, my pastoral charge is passing under a very dark cloud at this time. What the end will be the Lord only knows. Many, very many, families are left absolutely destitute, and many afflicted.

A. B. NICHOLSON.

MR. EDITOR: It is my pleasure to report, through your columns, a profitable and pleasant protracted service of more than three weeks. These services closed last night, May 2.

Rev. J. A. Godfrey, presiding elder of this district (Meridian), and Rev. J. W. Harmon, pastor of Marion circuit, did most of the pulpit work. The preaching was gospel, earnest, faithful, effectual. Sinners were awakened, mourners comforted, and Christians strengthened and built up. About ten conversions and sixteen accessions are some of the evidences of the genuineness of the work. And, of the sixteen received on profession of faith, ten had been baptized in infancy. We are improving in this direction; the children are being brought into the church. Our Sunday-school shared largely in the blessings of the revival, because the Sunday-school had labored with and for and instructed the children and young persons received. Our Sunday-school does not boast of being the best, but humbly claims to be growing in interest and numbers. The number present last Sunday was one hundred and ninety-five. Our church is growing. From two hundred and forty-nine, January 1, 1881, we now number about two hundred and eighty. Many of these have been added to the church by certificate. I would add that we have an interesting Woman's Missionary Society and Ladies' Aid Society; the latter society has spent about two hundred dollars on repairs for parsonage this year. We have also a flourishing and profitable teachers' meeting, conducted every Sunday, at five o'clock, by L. P. Brown, Sunday-school superintendent. Take it all in all, we have a pleasant pastorate. I forgot to say sin abounds, and that there is an abundance of work for the pastor.

R. D. NORSWORTHY, Pastor.

General Conference.

SATURDAY, MAY 6—FOURTH DAY.

The fourth day's session of the General Conference was opened with religious services, conducted by R. Hiner, D. D., of the Kentucky Conference. Bishop McTyeire presided. The minutes of Friday's session were read, and, after some slight corrections, were approved.

Before proceeding with the business of the Conference, Bishop McTyeire arose, and said:

Before the Conference enters upon any business, I think it proper to discharge a sad and painful duty of announcing to you the death of the secretary of the Conference—Dr. Thomas O. Summers. He died this morning at exactly six o'clock at his home on the University grounds. There were present with him his wife and son, Dr. Fitzgerald, Dr. Kelley (who had passed the night with him) the wife and daughter of the Chancellor, Chancellor Garland, Judge Wood, Dr. Eve, and myself. The death of our honored and beloved brother was very quiet and, as it seemed to me, painless—he had been in a stupor pretty much ever since four o'clock yesterday afternoon. I asked the physician how he would characterize his sickness. "I should call it," said he, "a general marasmus—the nerve centers are all broken down." The Lord orders not only the event, but the circumstances of the death of his people; so that it is precious in his sight. It would seem that the death of Dr. Summers had been ordered most mercifully and lovingly, and as he had always desired that it might be—he ceased at once to work and live. Only day before yesterday he was in his place among us. I suppose no man has risen up in our church; no man has blessed it with life and labor long-protracted, who is more universally known, honored, and loved. He comes to his end at a time when representatives of the whole church may bury him and mourn for him. Present is a member who accompanied him on his first circuit; members are here from the old Baltimore Conference to which he first belonged; members from the Texas Conference, which as a missionary he helped to organize; and here is a full delegation of his own Alabama Conference, from which he was a delegate in this body. Here are representatives of the Publishing House, which he has served from the first day until now; and here are colleagues of the University in which he was Dean of the Theological Faculty and Professor of Systematic Theology; and so, by the good providence of God, there are with us representative men in all departments of the church which this eminent servant of God has served. Dr. Summers had a claim to true greatness according to the sacred standard: "He is the greatest of all who is the servant of all." It will be for you, my brethren, to take such measures as to you may seem suitable in the order of his burial, and in such memorial as you may see proper to make.

The Conference then sung: "Servant of God, well done!"

Bishop Keener, arising from his seat, said:

I hope I shall be pardoned for making a personal allusion to the death of our brother. He was present at the altar when I was converted, and has been a warm personal friend, aside from other relations as brother in Christ, for forty years. As an officer of the church, it was a remarkable providence of God that gave us a man so truly imbued with the Wesleyan doctrine as was Dr. Summers to preside over the publications of our church; a man who guarded with great fidelity the publications of our establishment, lest they should be affected with the slightest taint of heresy. I know of no man who had more on his lips the beautiful words of the Wesleys, and with them the words of Dr. Watts—in fact, the last word he ever uttered in this house was the name of Dr. Watts. You will recollect that when the secretary was reporting the remarks of Bishop Pierce, especially the concluding remarks, when in response to the remarks made by the senior Bishop, he spoke of his life, ascending into a clear and heavenly atmosphere, Dr. Summers said, "Yes, in the beautiful words of Dr. Watts"—but just at that moment he failed to say anything more, throwing his hands up spasmodically, thus showing how far his physical weakness extended—it was in singular keeping with the character of his mind. No man has done more faithful service, I presume, than Dr. Summers. He died just as he wanted to do—in the midst of his brethren, in the midst of his work, and in the midst of those men whom he revered. He was fully prepared to be translated into the presence of his blessed Lord successfully, triumphantly, peacefully, and tranquility.

O. R. Blue, D. D., of the Alabama Conference, moved that a committee of four—one from the Alabama Conference, one from the Publishing House, one from the Vanderbilt University, and another from the Board of Missions—be appointed to make suitable arrangements for the funeral of Dr. Summers.

This motion was subsequently adopted, and O. R. Blue, D. D., D. C. Kelley, D. D., J. B. McFerrin, D. D., and J. S. Martin, D. D., were appointed as such committee.

D. C. Kelley, D. D., from the Tennessee Conference, in speaking to the resolution, said:

I was with Dr. Summers from noon yesterday until this morning, and perhaps the brethren would like to hear a few words about his last hours. It was his desire to have passed from this General Conference to heaven—at least, he would have preferred to go that way. On the first day of the Conference, I found him about to faint, and assisted him from the house to his carriage. He was unable to sit up, and I got into the carriage and took him home. It was not until he got near his home that he began to revive. The first thing he said was that he "longed to go home." From nine o'clock yesterday morning there were few intervals in which there was consciousness. Several times questions were asked him relative to his spiritual condition, and his response in every instance was "of course." Last night, perhaps about eight o'clock, when we had supposed consciousness had gone not to return, there came wafted through an open window a song from his boys at Wesley Hall. Like a dying war-horse, that raised its head at the bugle-call, there came a light from him that we had not seen before. I bent down and said, "Doctor, do you hear your boys?" Later, about eleven o'clock, he spake the words, "faith," "faith," "faith." The last several hours were almost totally unconscious, and just at six o'clock this morning, when a group gathered around him, the light was on him, just as he would have had it; he wanted to die in the morning—as the light came upon him he went to paradise. It was Ascension Day.

The Conference then sang: "Nearer, my God, to Thee."

R. B. Crawford, of the Alabama Conference, said that T. F. Mangum, who had been stopping at the residence of Dr. Summers, had been taken very ill on Friday, and was now considered in a dangerous condition. He asked permission to leave the Conference and attend him, which was granted.

Out of respect to the memory of Dr. Summers, the Conference then adjourned until three o'clock P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Conference re-assembled at three P. M., to hear the report of the Committee of Arrangements for the funeral of Dr. Thomas O. Summers. Religious services were conducted by the Rev. Guilford Jones, D. D., of the Memphis Conference.

The report was read and adopted:

The Joint Committee appointed by the General Conference and the Faculty of Vanderbilt University have made arrangements for the funeral services of the late T. O. Summers, D. D.

The Conference then adjourned, to meet at nine o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, MAY 8—FIFTH DAY.

The fifth day's session of the General Conference was called to order at nine o'clock by Bishop Keener, and opened with devotional exercises, conducted by Rev. Linus Parker, D. D., editor of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. The minutes of Saturday's session were read and approved.

The arrival of new delegates was announced.

Upon motion of the Rev. H. J. Adams, of the North Georgia Conference, the question of the election of secretary to fill the vacancy occasioned by the death of Dr. Thomas O. Summers was taken up and the Rev. John S. Martin, of the Ba[illegible] Conference, was elected secretary. By a vote of the Conference, the acting assistant secretaries were requested to continue in that capacity. The vote was taken in view of the statement of Dr. W. M. Leftwich, acting secretary, appointed by Dr. Summers, that his duties came to an end upon the death of Dr. Summers.

The report of the book agent, J. B. McFerrin, upon the Colvin bequest, presented last Friday, but subsequently withdrawn, was presented and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The report was unanimously adopted by a rising vote.

The Conference then adjourned until nine A. M. Tuesday.

TUESDAY, MAY 9—SIXTH DAY.

The sixth day's session of the General Conference was called to order by Bishop Pierce at nine o'clock, and opened with devotional exercises conducted by the Rev. Dr. Samuel Rodgers, of the Baltimore Conference. The minutes of yesterday were read and approved.

Your committee having carefully considered the recommendations and suggestions contained in the episcopal address, touching the formation of Annual Conferences in the interests of our missionary work in China and Mexico, beg leave to report the following resolution:

Resolved, That the College of Bishops be authorized—the Board of Missions concurring—to organize Annual Conferences in China and Central Mexico during the next quadrennium—that it is advisable to organize the Conference in China as soon as it may be practicable.

The report was adopted.

The following report from the Committee on Episcopacy was read, adopted, and ordered spread upon the minutes of the Conference:

The Committee on Episcopacy having considered that portion of the address of the general superintendents which refers to the great loss the church has met in the death of two of their colleagues since the meeting of the last General Conference, beg leave to present the following to be entered if the Conference shall see proper, upon the journal:

The part on the report of Bishop Wightman was amended in committee, and will appear as amended after action by the Conference."

Bishop David Seth Doggett was born Jan. 23, 1813, in Lancaster county, Virginia, of Methodist parents. His father was a local preacher whose house was the home and often the preaching-place of the fathers of the church in Virginia. He was favored with valuable academic training in his growth, for a while taught school, and after his entrance upon the ministry, while chaplain at the University of Virginia, pursued his studies with ardor and success.

He was converted in his seventeenth year, and soon after felt the divine call to the work of the Christian ministry. At the Virginia Conference of 1829 he was received on trial and sent as helper to the Roanoke circuit in North Carolina. The following year he was sent to the Mattamuskeet circuit, in the extreme lowlands of the same State. Here he had success in winning souls to Christ. His next appointment was to Petersburg, Va., and from this time on his work was done in the most laborious and responsible fields. In all the large cities of the Virginia Conference he worked with marked, and in some of them with wonderful success. He was for four years professor in Randolph Macon College, and eight years editor of the Southern Methodist Quarterly Review, and for nearly the whole of this latter period was the pastor of large churches. In 1850, at the General Conference at New Orleans, he was elected a general superintendent of the church, and filled the office with great efficiency and success.

The character of Bishop Doggett, his devotion to the doctrines and usages of Methodism, and his pre-eminent ability as a preacher, are well known throughout the church. The pulpit was his throne of power. Few men have reached a higher degree of perfection in effective and pure Christian preaching. He filled with honor to himself and with blessings to the church every position in which he was placed, and after long and severe suffering ended his earthly life on the twenty-seventh of October, 1880, in peace, and entered into heavenly rest.

Subsequent to the adoption of the report, Prof. A. B. Stark moved that so much of the report as referred to Bishop Wightman be reconsidered and re-referred to the committee with instructions to strike out certain words. The motion prevailed.

The Committee on Episcopacy, to whom was referred the communication of the senior Bishop Robert Paine, D. D., "asking to be permitted to retire from future active service," have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to recommend that his request be granted.

This necessary step, occasioned of age and bodily infirmities, is more painful to his brethren than it is to our revered and beloved brother and father in the gospel himself. For him the whole church cherishes the most profound respect and unabated Christian affection. For nearly sixty-five years he has been actively engaged in the work of the ministry. Whether on the circuit, or frontier missionary fields, in the city, on the presiding elder's district, at the head of an important literary institution, or in the delicate and responsible position of Bishop, he has ever maintained purity of character and a spotless reputation, and has always displayed apostolic zeal in the cause of the Master. His duties have been performed with fidelity and marked ability. Brought up in the times of McKendree, Roberts, and Soule, he received the impress of those distinguished fathers, and has maintained, without variation, the doctrines and polity of the church of his early choice.

In retiring from the active duties of his office, as one of our general superintendents, he carries with him the love and high Christian regard of the whole church, ministers and laymen. He has cause to rejoice that, by grace, he has the consolation of knowing that his life and labors have been blessed in building up the cause of Christ, and in enlarging the borders of his beloved Methodism, and that he is going down to the grave with the esteem and confidence of his colleagues and his brethren everywhere. He was one of the first two Bishops elected by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and has borne our flag for thirty-six years, and has never faltered in any conflict. And now that he retires from the front of the battle, it is the prayer of the whole church that he may have peace and joy in the Holy Ghost, and that his sun may finally go down in a cloudless sky.

The committee recommend for adoption by the General Conference the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the request of Bishop Paine to "retire from the active service" of the church be granted, and that his wishes be heartily approved, and that in future he be released from all official duty, except such as it may suit his convenience to perform.

2. That the church of which he has been so long one of its chief and honored ministers, highly appreciates his valuable services, and gives thanks to God for the grace vouchsafed to him in his long and useful life.

3. That we will earnestly pray that our beloved Bishop may be sustained in all afflictions and bodily infirmities, and that his last days may be full of comfort in Christ Jesus our Lord.

The Committee on Revisals report as follows:

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report that they have considered that portion of the Bishop's address in which attention is called to the "undue facility with which supernumeraries and superannuates are made," and the evils flowing therefrom, and would respectfully recommend that the discipline be amended as follows: 1. As answer 2, to the question, "What is a supernumerary preacher?" section 9, chapter 3, page 96, insert the following: "No application for a supernumerary relation shall be granted by an Annual Conference except on the recommendation of a committee on Conference relations to be appointed by the Conference, consisting of not less than seven members, to whom such applications shall have been referred. Nor shall said committee in making up their decision take into consideration anything else than personal disability of the applicant; provided, however, that in case said committee report adversely, the Conference may by a vote of not less than three-fourths of the members present grant said application." The present question 2 in the foregoing section to be numbered 3. 2. As answer 2 to question "What is a superannuated preacher?" section 10, chapter 3, page 97, insert the following: "No application for a superannuated relation shall be granted by an Annual Conference except on the recommendation of a committee on Conference relations to be appointed by the Conference consisting of not less than seven members, to whom such application shall have been referred. Nor shall said committee in making up their decision take into consideration any thing else than his question, viz.: Is the applicant really worn out in the itinerant service? Provided, however, that in case said committee report adversely, the Conference may by a vote of not less than three-fourths of the members present, grant said application." The present question in the foregoing section to be numbered 3.

The committee have also considered a resolution offered by E. E. Hoss and E. E. Wiley, asking that the Discipline be amended so that "none shall be entitled to the supernumerary or superannuated relation who have not completed the full course of study prescribed for undergraduates," and recommend that this Conference do not concur.

The report was laid over for future consideration.

Report on Sunday-schools by the committee:

In accordance with the suggestion in the Bishops' quadrennial address "that the General Conference would do a timely service for catechetical instruction in the family, the Sunday-school, and the church at large, by creating a commission to revise the catechism in use among us, and to prepare a graded system suited to all from the infant to the Bible-class, to be published under suitable regulations."—

Resolved, That the College of Bishops appoint a commission of such numbers as they see proper, to prepare a graded system of standard catechisms suited to all, from the infant-class to the Bible-class, to be published under the supervision of the Sunday-school editor.

The above report was laid over for future consideration.

The following report was read and adopted:

In accordance with the action of the General Conference at Atlanta, in May, 1878, that the second Wednesday of the session of the General Conference, to be held in May, 1882, is suggested as the day for the reception of fraternal delegations, and the evening of that day, and such other evenings as the Conference may order, shall be set apart for listening to addresses from the delegations, your committee beg leave to report for adoption the following:

Resolved, That on Wednesday next, May 10, 8 o'clock P. M., be the time and the audience-room of McKendree church the Committee on Public Worship concurring,) be the place for the reception and hearing of our brethren beloved bringing to us fraternal messages.

The following report was read and laid over for future action:

Your committee have had under consideration that part of the Bishop's address which relates to the claims of the negro population in the South and Southwest so far as their educational wants are concerned, and beg leave to submit the following report:

1. We note with pleasure the statement coming from so competent a source, that his people upon whom our church has, in times passed, bestowed much labor, but who more recently in their changed relations have, for the most part, been turned away from us are again becoming accessible to our ministry, and we heartily concur in the recommendation that the opportunity thus afforded to preach to their congregations be diligently improved.

2. To the claims of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America which sustain a peculiar and providential relation to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, the address invites especial attention; chiefly for the purpose of determining what may be done by us to assist them in obtaining facilities for providing themselves with suitable pastors and teachers of their own race. They have no institution under their management for the education of those who are to occupy their pulpits and preside in their schools. Their preachers and teachers, if educated at all, must, for the most part, be educated by those who are not in sympathy with their organization. If they are to make any progress, or even to maintain their existence, they must provide for the education of those who are to take charge of their schools and religious congregations. Of themselves they are not able to do this—they have neither the money to establish schools, nor the men competent to conduct them; and they look to us for aid. As what we have done for them in setting them up for themselves creates the necessity of doing more for them; so this fact justifies the expectation of their part that we will do more than we have already done or are now doing. Our people in the South have cheerfully borne their share in providing, by general and special legislation, for the educational wants of the colored race. We have endeavored to encourage in every way the promotion of common-school education among them. But in secular schools their preachers and missionaries can not get the training essential to their work. The Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, which looks especially to us for encouragement and aid, is in pressing need at this point; therefore,

Resolved, That our Bishops be authorized and requested to appoint, in consultation with the Bishops of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, a preacher or layman of our church, properly qualified for the work, who shall be a commissioner of education in aid of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, whose duty it shall be to solicit subscriptions, contributions, donations and bequests from whatever source he may find accessible, for the purpose of creating an educational fund for the benefit of said Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America.

2. That our Bishops be also authorized and requested to appoint three members of our church, who, together with the commissioner of education and three members of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, to be appointed by their Bishops, shall constitute a Board of Trustees for the custody and control of this educational fund when it shall have been raised.

3. That the commissioner of education herein provided for be appointed a committee of one to see that the said Board of Trustees be completed in legal form by securing proper acts of incorporation.

In speaking of the report, J. B. McFerrin, of the Tennessee Conference, said that the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, ought to help the colored people. As one of the preachers of that church he claimed to know that in times past it had greatly benefited that race. It had spent tens and hundreds of thousands of dollars on the education of the colored people in slavery and after the war. He believed in offering every possible encouragement to the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America. That church had acted wisely and discreetly, and it had met the approbation of God. There is great destitution, a want of properly-educated and properly-trained men to preach the gospel. They now came before the committee, and asked the General Conference to give them a little help, and they ought to be helped in their noble work. When the Ecumenical Council was sitting in City Road Chapel, the members were not aware of what had been accomplished among the colored people of the South. A colored delegate told of the many things which had been done by the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in behalf of his race. Bishop Wood and the Rev. Mr. Price bore testimony of the activity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in promoting their religious interests. When the speaker came home he determined to do still more for the colored Methodists—to exert an effort to build them up. He was an old man—had been digging stumps for forty-two years. If he was a little younger, and had a little more time and a little more opportunity, it would afford him the greatest pleasure of his life to go before the Southern Methodist Church and collect a fund to establish educational institutions in which they might learn to do the more effectual work that they are called upon to perform. He heartily indorsed the suggestions in the report. He not only approved of it, but would give money to carry out its suggestions.

W. W. Bennett, of the Virginia Conference, indorsed the report, but moved to lay it on the table for the present.

G. R. Browder, chairman of the Committee on Boundaries, made the following report, which was adopted:

Your committee have considered the following papers, viz.:

Memorial from Girard Church, Columbus District, South Georgia Conference, asking that the State line between Alabama and Georgia at that point be made the boundary line between the South Georgia and Alabama Conferences.

2. Memorial from Missouri Conference, asking permission to divide itself into two Conferences, if deemed desirable.

3. Petition from North Alabama Conference, asking the transfer of certain territory to them belonging to the North Mississippi Conference, embracing the city of Columbus, Miss.

4. Petition from Prairie circuit, East Texas Conference, asking to be transferred to North Texas Conference.

We recommend concurrence in the first and second, and non-concurrence in the third and fourth.

M. S. Andrews, alternate from the Alabama Conference, took the seat made vacant by the death of the late Rev. Dr. T. O. Summers, LL. D., and was appointed on the Committee on Finance in place of T. F. Mangum.

E. E. Wiley, of the Holston Conference, from the Committee on Introduction, reported, recommending that eight o'clock, Wednesday evening, be fixed as the time for the reception of fraternal delegates, and that the reception take place in the auditorium of the McKendree Church.

The Rev. Dr. J. B. West, the pastor, said that the Conference was welcome to use the auditorium.

The report was adopted.

T. W. Dye, of the North Mississippi Conference, moved to appoint a committee on credentials.

H. J. Adams, of the North Georgia Conference, moved to table the motion. Carried.

The following paper was read:

To the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South—Dear Brethren:—Sixteen of the delegates of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the Ecumenical Methodist Conference in London, united, as you are aware, with many representatives of other bodies, in signing a paper favoring the holding of "a commemorative centennial meeting in 1884, to be composed of representatives (clerical and lay) from all Methodist bodies in America." This paper was published by the American Methodist press, and it awakened a general desire that such a conference should be held. On the part of the Methodist Episcopal Church an official committee was constituted in New York, which held its third meeting May 3, 1882, having in session with it duly appointed representatives of many of the Annual Conferences, and preachers' meetings of our church. We thus assembled have adopted an address to our Board of Bishops requesting them to appoint a committee of twenty-five, empowered to correspond with similar committees of other bodies, and co-operate with them in making arrangements for the proposed conference of 1884. Our Board of Bishops meets in Detroit on the ninth of May, and we have strong hopes that if your reverend body, following in the line of the commendatory resolutions adopted by your General Conference of 1878, will provide for the appointment of a committee to represent your church, there will be a similar committee to confer with it. It seems to us very desirable that such committees should be constituted in June, if possible.

We believe that the proposed Conference would be of great service in drawing the members of our Methodist family closer together, in making each better acquainted with the history, struggles, and aims of the others; in promoting a true and healthful fraternal feeling, and in advancing the common interests of our Methodism and of evangelical Christianity. Yours in the bonds of the Gospel.

J. E. Edwards, of the Virginia Conference, moved that the above paper be referred to the Committee on the Centennial Celebration of American Methodism.

A. W. Wilson, of the Baltimore Conference, submitted papers from the Woman's Missionary Society. They consisted of a constitution and by-laws to govern the society.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

Our route was southwest, through a country lately obtained by treaties from the Chickasaw, Choctaw, and Cherokee, tribes, whose northern boundary had been the Tennessee river. The Bigbee and Alabama rivers had now become the western line of the first two. South and east of these tribes had been the Creeks and Seminoles, lately conquered by General Jackson. Our way, led through the swamp and low lands bordering on the Tennessee river, and then over the mountain-range, through which the river cuts its way at Chattanooga. At "Lookout," one arm of this lofty ridge, deflecting to the West, runs parallel to the Mississippi state line, gradually becoming lower, and finally lost in East Mississippi. This ridge and high table land divides the tributary streams that enter the Gulf of Mexico through the Mississippi river from those that enter by the Mobile Bay. This ridge and high land country is from 75 to 100 miles wide from its northern to its southern limits, and includes the immense rich bed of coal and iron just now being so eagerly sought for by railroad capitalists and other speculators. May not the writer just drop the chronological thread of his narrative to say that, while at La Grange College, Alabama over forty years ago, he found that coal and iron were in that formation where the new red sandstone superimposes the pentrimite or encrepetal limestone, while English geologists say that there the relative position of these strata is reversed? At the same time he confesses that he had then no just conception of the extent and amount of these beds. His observations were made on the northern side, while the richest beds are on the outcrop of the mineral-bearing strata in the middle, and especially the southern declivity. At Tuscaloosa the Black Warrior river makes a last plunge over a shoal whose bed is an immense stratum of coal. The University of Alabama is in the immediate vicinity of these falls. Is it not surprising that until lately this vast field has been so little appreciated? Experienced miners report that cannel-coal is found in the southeastern part of this field, and the best bituminous coal abounds throughout the southern side. The iron is said to be not only abundant, but in places equal to the best Swede. The whole constitutes a source of wealth for coming ages. And before leaving the topic may I be allowed to say that my fondness for natural science has been a source of much gratification during many years of my life, especially of geology, and its kindred subjects. Having studied it theoretically, and taught it by practical observation to the senior class in college for years, wherever my official duties have called me to travel, I have felt much to interest and recreate me in long and weary travels. I was perhaps about the first to foretell the finding of coal in certain prarie portions of Indiana and Illinois about 1846-7; and especially in Missouri, and along my route of travel from Boonville by Kansas City to Fort Scott and the Gulf of Mexico. The missionaries who were with me, if any of them are alive—and I think L. B. Statzler was one of them—will remember their surprise at my finding it, and thus verifying my saying that, in compensation for the scarcity of fuel above ground in those vast prarie-plains, Providence has stored it under ground.

Begging pardon for this digression, we resume our trip over the great mineral-fields of Alabama. Our road lay over a high, broken country. The evening of our second day's trip closed upon us near the only cabin we had seen for many miles. There was but one room, and other travellers had preceded us. There was no food for man or horse. Our host and fellow-travellers looked like horse-thieves. We had, however, but the alternative of sleeping in the woods or lying on the dirt floor in the crowded cabin. We thought the latter the safer, so we fastened our horses to a tree near the door, spread our blankets on the floor, made pillows of our saddle-bags, and got a little sleep. Next morning we paid $1 25 for our fare and left early. Before we had fallen asleep, however, some one spoke of a camp meeting going on twenty miles distant, and in the direction we were going, and we resolved to find our way there as soon as possible. How invigorating did the prospect seem to us! Could it be possible that so late in the fall of the year, and in such a sparsely-populated country, there could be a camp meeting? Our surprise was diminished when, descending into a level country, we suddenly came upon a little company of people collected near the road, a few cloth-tents, one or two small board huts, and half-a dozen covered wagons, were women and children slept; a rough stand for the pulpit, and split-logs for seating the congregation, a dozen chairs, and a diminutive bush-arbor, completed the equipment. The location was distant from any farm or habitation; trees scarce; the wild grass high, wet with dew, and the air was quite chilly. I confess my disappointment. I had associated with camp meeting the idea of a hundred tents, a huge covering for the audience, and thousands of people, with a full complement of preachers. Such had been those I had attended recently. Alas! I had carried the vision of Rome to Mantua, and awoke to the contrast. By the time I had dismounted and lugged my baggage to the outskirts of the little congregation, where I took my seat, the signal for preaching had been given the preacher had begun, and the singing of the first hymn was nearly finished. The preacher was Matthew D. Thomason, a stranger to me then, but for many years afterward well known. His text was Jer. xii, 5: "If thou hast ran," etc. He had a sunny face, a clear sweet, and musical voice, and a manner which invited confidence. The singing was—well, it was indescribable; at least it was inartistic. The people were generally elderly, recent emigrants from different States, strangers to each other, and dissimilar in manners and dress. The preacher urged all to join in singing, and they seemed to try their best—but no two sang alike. Some high key, some middle, some low. A few who began pretty well, finding themselves not supported, but likely to be overborne by a party who had strayed into another tune, hesitated, started again on a forlorn hope of taking the lead from the stragglers, but finding this impossible, presently looked round, smiled, and quit. It looked as if some had not tried to raise their "tuneful voices" since they left the sand-hills of the Carolinas. They had sadly neglected "our incomparable Hymnology." In vain was the hymn lined—they could not remember two lines! They left their old hymn books in Georgia and Tennessee. The sisters did better than their lords, except a few of the oldest, who piped away behind everybody, out of time and tune, but sure to come up limp and lame, like the last echo from a far-off shore. Now, is it strange to say, that one who has had to strive all his life against ludicrous and humorous emotions, should find himself truly edified and comforted on the occasion? What if, looking over the audience, not a face was a familiar one to me? They were my brethren and sisters in the Lord. What if they were few? There was more than "two or three," and the Master was surely there. What if they were not good singers? They have tried to make melody in their hearts unto the Lord. Their meeting, held under the discomforts referred to, evinced their zeal and moral courage. Then the sermon was assuring, and while it discouraged presumption, it abounded with promises of divine grace for eventual victory. Yes, thought I, you are a brave little band of Methodists—glad we have come to help you. The sermon over, we introduced ourselves to our strange friends. Dinner did not come on too soon, as neither we nor our horses had tasted food for thirty hours. To his surprise my brother-traveler found that this was the upper or northern part of his circuit, and felt at once at home. I was told that my work lay some distance south, and being anxious to enter upon my duties as assigned to me, after helping a few days I started alone to it.

The first point on my circuit which I struck was Hargreve's. Dudley Hargrove then lived about twenty miles northeast of Tuscaloosa, a recent emigrant from Georgia, the head of a large and excellent family, the grandfather of Dr. R. K. Hargrove, and a relation of Bishop M'Kendree. He was noted for his hospitality and piety—had been the main instrument of the erection of a church in his vicinity. It was his custom to have all his servants assemble with the white members of his family at regular morning and evening prayers, and was singularly kind and attentive to the wants of his slaves. Yet he was one who, at the last Tennessee Conference, had been denied ordination as deacon on account of owning slaves. As this was done with closed doors, and he never spoke of it I was not aware of it until it came out in the "Protest" of the minority to the General Conference in 1820, as seen in the Minutes. He was a man of fine sense and mature piety. He advised and encouraged me, his wife took the oversight of my clothing, his house the depository of my surplus books, and, in a word, my home. His children grew up to honor and usefulness, bearing the impress of his character. The great law of heredity has evinced itself in this case.

CHEERFULNESS—The duty of being cheerful is one which is at all times binding upon us. We have no right to be morose or sullen, or accustom ourselves to look on the dark side of things. No sense of the solemnity and importance of life can excuse us for giving way to a sour and unhappy temper. Though sadness must at times fall across our path, and our hearts and souls be often impressed with the weight and seriousness of imposed duty or of surrounding circumstances, yet sadness and seriousness ought by no means to be considered synonymous with gloom and despondency. From the exercise of trustfulness and cheerfulness, in a high and true sense, we are never absolved, whatever discouragements or temptations beset us.

Our Young People.

WORK.

Work, for it is a noble thing,
With worthy ends in view,
To tread the path that God ordains
With steadfast hearts and true
That will not quail whate'er betide
But bravely bear us through.

It reck's not what the place may be
That we are called to fill,
How much there is of seeming good,
How much of seeming ill,
'Tis ours to bend the energies,
And consecrate the will.

Work with the head and heart and hands,
And ever bear in mind
That there are sorrows here to soothe,
And spirits bruised to bind
And cords of love to closer bend
Round human hearts to wind.

The Charm of Manner.

A man died a violent death in New York a few years ago, who was known to all the country as a thief, a libertine, a speculative gambler in the most exaggerated degree, and who prided himself on being known as such; yet when he was dead, there was a sudden hush of regret.

One person told how fond a son he had been to his old father. Another how generous was his care of the poor. This man had a story to tell of his jumping from his carriage to help a fallen horse in the road; that, of the pet birds who followed the gambler from room to room of his house, perching on his shoulder, eating from his lips.

Even good men were so dazzled by the sunny generosity, the warm sympathy, and genial good comradeship of the man, that they were almost blind, or at least were silent, as to his crimes, until the secular press boldly denounced this false charity, showed its probable effect upon the boys who were just entering life, and labeled the dead man as only a successful, open-handed swindler.

Now the point is, if geniality and generosity are such good qualities as to lend a gloss to a debased and vicious character, why do not good people use them oftener to adorn their real virtues?

Nothing is so rare in the world as that unselfish, cordial good fellowship; that quick throwing of ourselves into the interests and feelings of others, which gave to this unprincipled man his magnetism and influence. Nothing is so attractive or powerful with every rank or class. Not beauty, or money, or intellect, has its irresistible charm. Simply because the most interesting thing to every man is his own self, and the more concern you show in that, the greater will be your influence with him.

Besides this, it is the right feeling to, cultivate towards others, and the right manner to show. Many high-principled people do their duty all through life, but with as hard and callous a temper and face as if they were paying a debt of which they begrudged every penny.

They render their full dues perhaps to God and to Cæsar, but in rusty black metal, instead of shining, jingling coin. They march along the pathway of life wrapped in their own thoughts and purposes, when they ought to be singing in good company.

Many girls who lack beauty of face, many dull boys will read this, who are tempted to envy the beauty of cleverness of their companions, but who do not realize that they have within their own reach a real Aladdin's lamp—a sincere, cordial manner, an unselfish interest in others—which will not only command friends for them, but will brighten their own inner lives as no other gift can brighten them.—Youth's Companion.

HOW TO KEEP YOUR TEMPER.—One art of letter writing, that we have never seen touched upon in the books of instruction, is that of writing a letter when you are angry. If you find that your friend, neighbor, correspondent, or whomsoever it may be, has insulted you, or otherwise made you unbearably angry, sit right down and write him or her the most cutting and bitter letter you can frame—putting in such hard invectives and expletives as will convince yourself that he or she must wince under the mental castigation; and after you have got all your spleen fully vented in this way, seal the letter, and—

Keep it till next day.

Then read it over carefully, consider the provocation in all its bearings, get as angry as you can, but strike out all the words that seem too harshly severe for the original cause that called them forth. Then keep the letter another day, and go through it in the same manner as before. And so continue for a week, if you can manage to refrain that long from tearing the whole thing up, and then send what you will find left at the end of seven days. In this way you will become a very mild and just correspondent, your friends will all like you, and you will not have to spend one-half of your time in apologizing for the errors of the other half. —The Oriental Casket.

A BRAVE LITTLE DAUGHTER. There is a very pretty story by Miss Strickland, in her "Queens of England," of a little girl who saved her father's life.

"It was in the time of Queen Mary, and Lord Preston, the father of the child, was condemned to death for conspiring to bring back the exiled King James to the throne. Her name was Lady Catherine Graham, and she was only nine years of age. The poor child was, during the trial of her father, left in the Queen's apartments in Windsor Castle. The day after the condemnation of Lord Preston, the queen found the little lady Catherine in St. George's gallery, gazing earnestly on the whole-length picture of James II., which still remains there. Struck with the mournful expression of the young girl's face, Mary asked her hastily what she saw in that picture which made her look on it so particularly. 'I was thinking,' said the innocent child, 'how hard it is that my father must die for loving yours.' The story goes that the queen, pricked in conscience by this artless reply, immediately signed the pardon of Lord Preston, and gave the father back to the child."

GOOD USE OF THE BIBLE.—A poor boy going to a Sabbath school was met by a companion, who invited him to play truant; but he resolutely refused, and went to school. When this came to be known, the boy was asked what it was that kept him from complying with the temptation. He answered, "Because I read in my Bible, 'My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not.'"

THURSDAY, MAY 18, 1882.

Editorial Correspondence.

On Sunday, the seventh instant, there was preaching in most of the churches in Nashville, and in neighboring places, by members of the General Conference. The new McKendree was opened and dedicated, the venerable Bishop Paine officiating in the dedication service, Dr. Messic, of Louisville, preaching the sermon. The writer was assigned to a Christian Church over the river in the morning, the preaching in Methodist style, but the balance of the service somewhat novel, although entirely agreeable and interesting. At night we attended a missionary meeting at Elm Street, devoted to the Mexican mission. There was a full house, and Dr. Patterson gave an entertaining and instructive address on Mexico, its people and our mission work in that country.

The chief event of the day was the funeral of Dr. Summers at the Vanderbilt. The spacious grounds were filled with carriages and people, and the large chapel in which the services were conducted was crowded exceedingly. The members of the General Conference were there in a body, the students and faculty, and as many of the citizens as could find place. Bishop Keener preached the sermon on a theme appropriate, with much unction and power. The burial was in the plot of ground in which rest the bodies of Bishops McKendree and Soule, and close to the monument erected to their memory. No crowned head was ever more honored than was Dr. Summers in his burial.

On Monday morning John S. Martin, D. D., of the Baltimore Conference, was elected secretary in the place of Dr. Summers, and business proceeded as usual. The stream of memorials, petitions and resolutions is still pouring in. The committees are also [illegible] and the real work of the [illegible]ening. The reception of fraternal delegates took place in the main audience-room of McKendree, on Wednesday night, at eight o'clock. The auditorium is spacious, and very handsomely and richly finished and brilliantly lighted. The organ is immediately behind the pulpit—one of the largest and finest in any Southern church. The house was packed, Bishop McTyeire in the chair. The fraternal messengers were Rev. Henderson Sprague, of the Methodist Church of Canada, and Rev. Dr. H. B. Ridgaway, of the Methodist Episcopal Church. Mr. Sprague spoke first, and in a very entertaining way. Dr. Ridgaway read his address. It was nearly one hour and a half in delivery, ably conceived, and filled with taking points. In his concluding remarks he came out plainly, and without reservation, for the organic union of the two churches. This part was, we think, in bad taste, under the circumstances, and not in harmony with the occasion. Bishop McTyeire responded briefly, and remarked: "We will unite in singing an old Methodist song," and the choir and congregation sang the "Old ship of Zion" with spirit, the services closing with the benediction by Bishop Kavanaugh.

Dr. McFerrin and Judge Whitworth occupied much of the morning session of Wednesday in replying to a paper read by Dr. Redford, on Monday, concerning the report of the Publishing House. We hope this may be the end of the matter, but the Committee on Publishing Interests have the subject under consideration, and may touch upon the controversy in their report to the General Conference. On Thursday the Committee on Episcopacy brought in a report recommending the election of six Bishops. This was twice the number which the Bishops had recommended in their address, and the debate opened at once on a motion to amend by substituting three in the place of six. We have seldom heard a more animated discussion, or one that excited deeper interest. It is the subject that seems to stir our Methodist people and preachers more profoundly than almost any other. At this writing, Saturday morning, May 13, the question is still under discussion. The most of Friday was consumed in the same way. A vote may possibly be reached to-day under the operation of the previous question.

The anniversary of the Missionary Board was held at McKendree Church on Thursday night. The secretary, Dr. Wilson, made a verbal statement of the work of our foreign missions—not much in detail, and not particularly instructive. We have not yet learned what the receipts have been for the year, nor the amount of debt. The speakers were Dr. Carlisle, president of Wofford College, and Rev. Dr. Haygood, of Georgia. Dr. Carlisle dealt with principles, and was brief and clear. Dr. Haygood spoke at length, in the ad hominem style, making a very effective address, and one that might have been followed by a collection to advantage. The people, however, had been assured beforehand that no collection would be taken. This sort of assurance was given in regard to the meeting held last week for the benefit of the Mexican mission. We infer that it is usual here to quiet the fears of the people, and to swell the attendance in this way. To-night there is to be a Sunday-school mass meeting, and meetings in the interest of other important church enterprises and institutions will be held from time to time. Dr. Patterson, of our Central Mexican mission, and also Bro. Ransom, of our Brazil mission, are here.

As yet no very important reports have been acted on. A plan for a church extension society is on the table, also one to aid the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America in its educational interests. The report of the Committee on Revisals, from day to day, is in most cases for non concurrence. The spirit of the General Conference is thus far decidedly conservative, and a good deal of the old Discipline will be left at the final adjournment. As soon as the election of Bishops is over business will go forward rapidly. There is a manifest disposition to have a short session. The five Bishops preside in turn, and appear to stand it well. Even Bishop Paine occupies the chair on his day, and with little assistance from his younger colleagues. He looks better than on the first day of the session. The General Conference seems to have done him good.

Martha.

The evangelists do not give much of the personal history of those whom they mention. By a few well-chosen and deep-meaning words they reveal all of character that is worth knowing. This is evidently the case in what they say about "the sisters of Bethany." These sisters are always introduced together, and yet two sisters could hardly be less like each other. Some writer has said that they are the types of two distinct religious tendencies, "Martha being the type of a life busily devoted to externals, Mary the type of quiet devotion to religion, as the one thing needful." The contrast in the characters of these sisters is very sharply drawn in the description of the Saviour's visit to their home. For the present we will look at Martha. It is said that when Jesus entered the village of Bethany "Martha received him into her house." There is a tradition, which has floated down to us, which says that Martha was the elder sister, and a widow, and perhaps the owner of the house in which they lived. It is not probable that this was the first visit of Jesus to them. He was frequently in Jerusalem, and was perhaps as well known to them as to any family in the vicinity of the great city. Indeed, the impression left by the narrative is that Jesus was their friend—that he loved the family, and the family knew it. "Martha received him," met him at the threshold, gave him the cordial welcome of a warm heart, and, no doubt, felt great joy in her soul in being the hostess of such a guest. It is a fact that most women take a special pride in being hospitable and in trying to make their friends pleasant and comfortable while visiting. Martha was no exception to this rule. This was evidently the first thought of her mind, the first desire of her heart, and she soon busied herself to provide the best possible entertainment for her guest. The evangelist says: "She was cumbered about much serving." Her house-keeping pride suggested that all domestic services must be immediately attended to, that the whole house must be put to rights, and a special, sumptuous meal prepared for their guest. You can see the busy, domestic woman passing from one apartment to another setting things in order, her mind flying from one duty to another, trying to discover as many things as possible with which to serve her guest, until her over-carefulness brings on perplexity, and her soul is troubled by the thought-scattering process through which she is passing, and she breaks down in the midst of the many things which she is preparing for the entertainment of her guest. Her object was to make the visit of the Saviour to her house an agreeable one to himself. The intention was good, for no one needed a quiet, peaceful, agreeable day more than Jesus did at that very time. It was not often that he was alone with chosen friends. More frequently he was thronged by the noisy multitudes. More frequently he was harrassed by secret foes in the guise of professed friends. And, doubtless, he turned aside at this time to visit this family that he might have a day of repose. Here is shown the good woman's mistake. She started in her house the very noise and bustle which had caused Jesus to withdraw from the outside world, and the object of his visit was likely to be frustrated by her "much serving."

This "much serving," and the cares it brought, and the perplexities to which it led, produced a spirit of consciousness in regard to her sister. While she was busy preparing for a proper entertainment of the Lord, Mary was sitting at his feet, listening to his blessed words. In her perplexed state of mind, Martha can not see the justness of Mary's course of conduct. She felt that she needed the help which Mary alone could give, and the thought that Mary was slighting her, and putting all the burden on her, increased her fretfulness to a point beyond her usual prudence. I imagine that I can see this exemplary house-wife leave her dinner preparations and come sweeping into the room, where the Master and Mary and the disciples were; her cheeks glowing from the effects of over-carefulness, and her lustrous eyes flashing with envy, and almost indignantly demand of Jesus: "Lord, dost thou not care that my sister hath left me to serve alone?" This sounds very much like a reproach to Jesus, and looks very much like she would draw him into her own trouble and restlessness. This looks very much like she had lost all control of her words and actions, and borders very closely upon disrespect to her guest. The answer of our Lord to this impatient demand of the busy woman contains a severe rebuke, couched in most tender words: "Martha, Martha, thou art careful and troubled about many things; but one thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part, which shall not be taken away from her." What the Lord here blames is not the "much serving," but the over-carefulness and self-imposed trouble in the "much serving." It was the spirit manifested which the Lord condemned—a spirit of peevishness, a spirit of uncharitable complaining. Her mistake was in manifesting so much impatience at the conduct of her sister, which was, after all, better in the eye of Jesus than her own conduct. She imagined that she could not please the Lord better than to prepare a sumptuous meal for him and his disciples. His reply shows her that the dinner was not the chief thing, and that he would rather see her, like Mary, sitting at his feet, learning the way of true wisdom. The rebuke of the Lord was not directed against Martha's character, for she possessed a wonderful amount of energy and earnestness and sound sense, but against the fretful spirit manifested on this particular occasion. She was generous and hospitable, and, like most women, there was in her a vein of pride in regard to the reception of her favorite guests, and to the appearance and supplies of her table. It was her over-carefulness on this occasion which blinded her usually keen insight, and perverted her usually correct judgment. And this is what the Lord condemned. This incident in the life of Martha goes far to show that even in domestic affairs, even in the preparation of meals for honored guests, "the ornament which is of great price in the sight of the Son of God is the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit."

Reception of Fraternal Delegates.

The reception of fraternal delegates took place at McKendree Church last evening. The spacious church was packed, the standing room was all taken, and many went away unable to gain admittance. Bishops Pierce, Kavanaugh, McTyeire and Keener were on the platform. Bishop McTyeire presided. The coronation hymn, "All hail the power of Jesus' name," was sung with great spirit, a fervent prayer was made by the Rev. J. S. Gardner, of the Baltimore Conference, followed by a voluntary by the choir rendered admirably.

The Rev. Howard Sprague, M. A., of the Methodist Church of Canada, and the Rev. H. B. Ridgaway, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, were introduced to the Conference by Bishop McTyeire, and received standing.

The Rev. Howard Sprague, M. A., then delivered an address that charmed everybody by its excellent spirit, flashes of refined wit, and bursts of earnest eloquence.

After singing the hymn, "O for a thousand tongues to sing," Dr. Ridgaway was introduced. His speech—which will be given in full to our readers to-morrow—was equal to the grand occasion. It was a masterly effort, full of thought, rhetorically brilliant, and breathing a spirit of warm fraternity and broad catholicity. If all the Conference and the vast audience did not indorse all Dr. Ridgaway said on the subject of organic union, the Christian spirit that breathed in his words was fully appreciated. He touched this point with great delicacy and tact. If it were well to mention it at all it could not have been more gracefully done.

Both of the distinguished fraternal visitors were greeted with frequent and hearty responses in true Methodist style.

The "Old Ship of Zion" was then sung with a will, and the benediction pronounced by Bishop Kavanaugh.—Nashville Daily Christian Advocate, of May 11.

and the report will lie over till called up.

The following Finance Committee's report was received and adopted:

Your committee, to whom was referred the paper from Dr. J. B. McFerrin, Book Agent, asking disposition of the $226.17, now in his hands, paid him by the Methodist Episcopal Church, from the suspended assets in the division of church property in 1844, would respectfully offer the following resolution for your adoption, viz:

Resolved, That the $226.17, arising from the suspended assets in the division of the church property in 1844, and now in the hands of Dr. J. B. McFerrin, book agent, be paid over to the Publishing House of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to become a part of the capital in the business of said institution.

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence beg leave to report the following letter to the chairman of the Sabbath Committee of the Southern Presbyterian Church:

To the Rev. James Stacey, Chairman Sabbath Committee, General Assembly, Presbyterian Church—Dear Brother:—The undersigned, Committee on Fraternal Correspondence, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, by direction of said Conference beg leave to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 15th of May in relation to the co-operation of several Evangelical Churches in a common and united effort to protect by proper legal measures the sanctity of the Christian Sabbath. We cordially approve the great object in view, and we shall most gladly aid as we best can in securing the proper recognition by government—State and national—of the sacredness of the Lord's day. We are prepared to join in a respectful and earnest appeal to Congress to discontinue and prohibit the making up, delivery, and transportation of mail matter on Sunday.

This point gained—a great step in advance—we can turn our attention to the police regulations of State and municipal corporations, to correct such abuses as may be reached by proper authority. With high Christian regard, etc.

At the conclusion of the reading of the report of the Committee on Fraternal Correspondence, Dr. Prettyman, of Baltimore Conference, said that the Southern Methodist Church had always refused to take action in civil affairs—leaving that matter alone to the members as citizens to do what good they could without the church action. The church had never taken any action which would bring a conflict between the church and the civil authorities. The adoption of the report of the committee would be a departure from the time honored custom in this regard, and he therefore moved that the report be laid temporarily upon the table.

Dr. McAnally, of St. Louis Conference, seconded the motion of Dr. Prettyman, and in doing so started to speak upon it, when he was called to order by Dr. Peterson, of Virginia Conference, who raised the point of order that a question to table was not debatable.

Judge Tucker, of Florida Conference, could see no politics in the question at all. He could see no impropriety in joining other religious bodies in petitioning Congress to stop the making up and delivering of mail and running of trains on Sunday. After a short parliamentary parley it was agreed to lay the report upon the table, to be called up at some future time; and, upon motion of Dr. Duncan, of South Carolina Conference, the Conference ordered the report printed.

Rev. W. W. Duncan presented a petition from the Woman's Christian Temperance Association, asking the approval and assistance of the church in their work, and the introduction of quarterly temperance lectures in the church. Referred to the Committee on Temperance.

Mr. Peterson, of the Virginia Conference, said that Judge Whitworth had alluded to some one in his remarks as having intimated that the committee had gone too far in the investigation. It might have reference to a remark he had made. In his remarks he did not say that the committee had gone too far in the investigation, but that he had insisted that not only one side of the controversy should be heard, but both sides.

Judge Whitworth said that the explanation was a very satisfactory one.

The Conference then adjourned.

NIGHT SESSION.

Fully one thousand persons were present at McKendree Church in response to the appointment made by the Conference Committee on Fraternal Correspondence, to receive the fraternal delegates from other religious denominations to the General Conference. The meeting, too, was the most interesting yet held since the meeting of the Conference. It was a genuine love-feast.

To the Bishops and other Members of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South—Dear Fathers and Brethren:—This letter will be presented to you by the Reverend Howard Sprague, Master of Arts, who was duly appointed at the last session of the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, held at Montreal, to convey to you their fraternal greetings, and to give expression to their warm Christian love, and admiration of your earnest and successful labors for the common Master. He is a brother held in high esteem among us, and is cordially commended to your confidence and sympathy. He will be able to give you some account of our work and prospects, and we trust that his communications will tend to strengthen the bonds of Christian affection already happily existing between us and you. By order and on behalf of the General Conference.

A. SUTHERLAND, Sec.

Dated at Toronto, March 27, 1882.

To the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South—Dear Brethren: The Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, acting under authority given them by the General Conference, have appointed the Rev. Henry Bascom Ridgaway, D. D., a fraternal delegate to your body. He is one of the foremost ministers of our denomination, and he bears to you the most sincere and cordial Christian salutations of the church he represents.

By order and in behalf of the Board of Bishops.

WILLIAM L. HARRIS, Sec.

NEW YORK, Nov. 8, 1882.

Rev. Mr. Sprague, the representative of the Methodist Church of Canada, was the first to appear before the assemblage. He commenced his speech by thanking the audience for himself, and those who sent him, for the cordial welcome he had received in Nashville. The speaker considered the Southern people, from his intercourse with the persons he had met here, more like the Canadian people than any people on the globe, in manners, habits, in their homes, in their dialect, and in disposition.

Mr. Sprague had been frequently asked since his arrival here about the last representative to the General Conference, in Atlanta, in 1878—the Rev. Dr. Douglass. Dr. Douglass, the speaker said, was now President (corresponding office to a Bishop in the Southern Methodist Church) of the Canadian Central Conference, as well as president of the Divinity School at Montreal. Mr. Sprague had met Bishop Marvin and the Rev. Dr. Hendrix at the Wesleyan Methodist Conference, at London, and Dr. Sargent, of Baltimore, at the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada; and although Bishop Marvin had died, he recognized the faces of the other two delegates at the session of the present Conference.

Referring to the work of the church in Canada, he said he would commence by saying that the British Provinces included the territory from the Atlantic to the Pacific oceans, and from the forty-ninth degree of latitude to the North Pole. The chief crop of Canada was ice and snow. From Lake Superior west to the Pacific ocean, immediately north of this country, and in Canada, was the finest wheat market in the world. So much confidence did the English people have in the country that they had already subscribed $20,000,000, together with $20,000,000 which the government had subscribed; which would be used in the building of the Canada Pacific railway. The [illegible] England had purchased [illegible] million acres of land which they proposed to sell in small wheat farms.

The population of Canada was about 4,250,000, and of this population 1,790,000 were Catholics, and 583,000 Methodists. The Methodists of Canada, during the last decade, had increased thirty-six per cent. There are now in Canada and the British provinces 388 mission stations.

Mr. Sprague concluded by saying that the next General Conference of Canada would be held at Kingston, Canada, in September next, and he heartily invited the Conference to send one or more delegates to that body.

THURSDAY, MAY 11—EIGHTH DAY.

The eighth day's session of the General Conference was opened by devotional exercises conducted by Rev. A. R. Winfield, D. D., of the Little Rock Conference. Bishop McTyeire presided. The minutes of Wednesday's session were read and approved.

J. B. McGee read the following report which was adopted. In presenting the report, Mr. McGee said that the report was unanimous, and although every Conference was represented on the committee, not one objected to the report submitted.

The committee to whom was referred a paper, signed by O. R. Blue and others, relative to a rumor that Samuel Cupples, a lay delegate from the St. Louis Annual Conference, since his election to this General Conference, had openly and before the world violated the General Rules of the church by permitting dancing in his house, have duly considered the matter, and submit the following report:

After a free, fair and full investigation of all the facts we are of the opinion that the law of the church against dancing has been fully vindicated by his pastor and church, and that no further action is necessary. Respectfully submitted.

The Committee on Episcopacy made the following report upon the question of the election of Bishops:

The Committee on Episcopacy, having carefully and patiently considered that portion of the episcopal address which refers to the strengthening of our general superintendency, and also a resolution and sundry papers referred by the Conference, bearing on the same question, beg leave to present the following for the consideration and action of the General Conference:

Whereas, Under the blessings of God, the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, is growing rapidly in numbers, extent of territory, in the scope and promise of her missionary operations at home and abroad, and in awakened zeal in behalf of the great work of religious education; and whereas this growth of the church imperatively demands a large amount of episcopal supervision in the Pacific Conferences, in Texas, New Mexico, Mexico, and the border States and Territories, in China and Brazil, as well as episcopal encouragement to our great educational institutions for both sexes in the older Conferences; therefore,

Resolved, That the General Conference elect six traveling elders to the office of Bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Dr. Blue, of Alabama, moved that the report be amended by striking out "six," and inserting "three," as the number of Bishops to be elected. He thought that the work required of the Bishops in attending forty Annual Conferences could easily be done by five Bishops, besides he did not believe he could find six men in the church whom he considered competent to fill the high office of Bishop.

J. H. McLean, of the North Texas Conference, favored the election of six Bishops, saying that at present the Bishops were greatly overworked, and the election of six new and vigorous Bishops would result in great good for the church. With the cutting down of the number of Bishops, and adding work to each, the office was being brought in ill repute.

Dr. Edwards moved that the consideration of the question be laid upon the table, and made the special order for 11:15 o'clock Friday.

Dr. Andrews moved to amend by making the hour 12:15. The motion of Dr. Edwards was agreed to.

Three reports were received from the Committee on Itinerancy. One a unanimous report upon the condition of the journals of the Mississippi, Western, South Georgia, North Alabama, and North Georgia Conferences, which was adopted.

Your committee have had referred to them several papers, principally from members of the Holston Conference, asking modification in the appointment of presiding elders, so that no man can be appointed to the office more than four years successively. We respectfully recommend non-concurrence.

Report 3 is a minority report, signed by John E. Edwards, of Virginia; John W. Hanner, of Tennessee, C. C. Woods, of Southwest Missouri; F. Richardson, of Holston; F. H. Welsch, of North Texas; E. H. Moore, of North Mississippi; John D. Vincil, of Missouri, and H. C. Morrison, of Louisville, in which is recommended a concurrence in the papers presented by the members of the Holston Conference, upon the question of a limitation of the term of presiding elders.

Resolved, That this General Conference has heard, with great satisfaction, the Christian salutation of the Methodist Church of Canada through their fraternal messenger, the Rev. Howard Sprague, A. M., and of the Methodist Episcopal Church, through the Rev. Henry Bascom Ridgaway, D. D., and heartily reciprocate their expression of Christian love to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, praying that the Divine Spirit may render effective their joint labors with ours in spreading scriptural holiness through the earth.

Your committee, to whom was referred that part of the Bishop's address respecting the centenary of American Methodism, and also a paper from leading ministers and laymen of the Methodist Episcopal Church on the joint celebration of that event in the city of Baltimore in December, 1884, after carefully considering the same, submit the following report:

The religious movement called Methodism, which by the middle of the eighteenth century had spread over England, soon followed English-speaking people to the remote colonies, and by 1766 was introduced into America by the zeal of Barbara Heck and the faithful preaching of Philip Embury and Capt. Webb. Three years later the movement had taken so kindly to American soil that in response to Mr. Wesley's call at the British Conference, "Who will go to the help of our brethren in America?" Richard Boardman and Joseph Pilmoor offered their services, and were promptly aided in coming by the liberality of their brethren in the Conference. A few years later Mr. Wesley himself was urged to come, but, unable to do so, he sent Francis Asbury, a man like most like Wesley in executive power, untiring labors, and consuming zeal, ever given to the church. Appointed superintendent in 1772, he soon introduced the plans of work which had been successfully tested in England, and put the impress of his organizing mind on the infant societies. In the absence of ordained preachers the people were dependent on the English clergy for the sacraments. The Revolutionary war causing the return of most of these, it was necessary to organize "few sheep in the wilderness" into a church of their own, where not only the word of God might be preached, but the sacraments be duly administered. Of the 83 traveling preachers in the New World, who were assembled at the memorable Christmas Conference in the city of Baltimore, in December, 1784, to welcome Thomas Coke, LL. D., recently set apart and ordained by Mr. Wesley to the office of superintendent or Bishop of the Methodist Societies in America. He and Francis Asbury were chosen to this high office by the voice of the Conference, and twelve faithful men were elected and ordained elders. At this time, with the adoption of our Articles of Religion, and the general system of Discipline which has since governed us, the scattered societies became a fully organized church. We thus ante-dated, by some five years, the organization of the constitutional government of the country, and in 1789 the Methodist Episcopal Church, through their Bishops, presented a congratulatory address to President Washington, on his assuming the duties of his office.

Thus, in the providence of God, Methodism took an organic shape in a land peculiarly favorable to its growth, until within less than a hundred years our 83 traveling preachers have become more than 27,000, and her few hundred members over 4,000,000. This numerical showing is in keeping with her moral and religious influence in the New World. What with the extent and character of her periodical literature, her institutions crowded by the youth of the land, the thousands annually converted at her altars, and the countless multitudes who attend upon her service, Methodism is an incalculable power in the land of her adoption. Her responsibility to God and man is augmented in like proportion. At the General Conference of 1878 motion was first taken looking to "a Conference of Methodists in the United States and Canada, and other parts of the Continent of America, to be held in the city of Baltimore, at Christmas, in 1884," and the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, were "requested, in behalf of the Conference, to open a correspondence on this subject with the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the presidents of the several Canadian Conferences, and of all other Methodist bodies on this continent." In view of the action already taken, we submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That in grateful acknowledgment of God's signal mercies, and of our increased prosperity and responsibility, we will endeavor, during the year 1884, to raise the sum of two millions of dollars to be applied equally to the cause of education, church extension and foreign missions, save

2. That a committee consisting of twelve ministers and twelve laymen to be appointed by the Bishops, shall, together with the Bishops, be charged with the duty of collecting and administering all funds collected for connectional objects, and that such committee make its report to the General Conference in 1886.

3. That such committee be authorized to organize sub-committees in every Annual Conference, who, jointly with these, may aid in collecting funds for both local and connectional objects, and who shall report to the central committee as above constituted all amounts raised for the payment of church debts; the erection of churches and parsonages, and all other local objects or needs as for connectional objects.

4. That the committee above provided for shall represent us in all correspondence respecting the Conference to be held in Baltimore in December, 1884, and that our Bishops be and are hereby authorized to appoint all necessary representatives from our church to such Conferences.

Reports on boundaries (majority and minority) were read and laid over under the rule for future consideration.

Dr. Kelley presented a report on missions, recommending that it shall be the duty of each Bishop, presiding in an Annual Conference, to see to it that one day shall be set apart as "Missionary Day," in which earnest inquiry be instituted as to the best method of raising funds for missions, and of infusing and diffusing in the mind of the church an honest, healthful and scriptural interest in that great work.

The report was laid over for future consideration.

Dr. Walker presented a report on publishing interests, stating that the Quarterly Review had been ably and properly conducted, and that the business had been successfully managed. The committee recommend it as worthy the patronage of the members of the church, and that it should be continued, as heretofore, under the control of the following committee: E. R. Hendrix, J. W. Hinton, C. W. Miller, F. A. Mood, N. T. Lupton, A. B. Stark, A. W. Wilson, C. G. Andrews, R. A. Young and B. Craven. The report was adopted.

A second report from the committee was also presented, recommending a revision and improvement of the abridged hymn-book which lies over under the rule.

The Rev. P. A. Peterson presented a report recommending various changes in the Discipline, which report lies over, under the rules, for future consideration.

The hour having arrived for the discussion as to how many Bishops should be elected, Dr. M. S. Andrews, of Alabama, seconded the motion of Dr. Blue to elect three Bishops, in a short and pointed speech.

Dr. Hinton, of South Georgia, urged the election of five or six Bishops.

Dr. J. W. Hinton, of South Georgia, said:

MR. PRESIDENT:—The committee have reported with singular unanimity in favor of electing six Bishops at this time. I desire to speak in favor of that report. It is based on reasons contained in the preamble and supported by many cogent arguments.

From every section of the church petitions have come urging a large increase to our Episcopal force, insisting on the necessity of more Bishops in order to a more effectual supervision of our greatly extended work. These expressions of the voice of the church came from Baltimore to our extreme west. There is no discord, but a choral symphony—a song sung with the zest of fervid Methodists. It is a strong demand which ought not to be disregarded. Sir, it is true that the Episcopal message advises only the election of three Bishops. But, Mr. President, knowing the reluctance of men to admit infirmity, and this is especially true it would seem of Bishops; if the Bishops think we need three additional Bishops, a fortiori the General Conference will very properly conclude we need five or six new men in that office.

Sir, I do not wish to say that you are not responding to the demands of the office; you go up to your ability. And Mr. President, I do not propose to elect more Bishops that you may have an easier time. We have no other use for you than to give you work—we want you to have full work. But some of you are old, and with pain we behold the steps of age "halt feebly to the tomb." The sun is setting—it is a brilliant setting, and may we have a brilliant dawn.

Is it true we cannot find enough men (six) to supply loss and lack? The distinguished gentleman from Alabama (Dr. Blue) seems to think so. Mr. President, I believe that whenever God calls an Elijah away, there is an Elisha ready to take his mantle. There are men enough in this body to furnish the requisite number. Here are young men, vigorous, and here are men in the meridian of their lives, full of strength, and here are men of more age with the accumulated wisdom of years. The only difficulty is, if any exists, to find men full of fire and zeal, ready, willing, and able to do the work. They can be found. Can they be supported? I do not think the financial argument worthy of serious reply. The amount of money needed may be large, but a big dividend and a large divisor yields a small quotient. We have nearly a million of people. What is the difficulty, or burden, in such a number raising any sum necessary to meet the financial demand? If the Bishops could circulate more extensively, the money to maintain them could be raised more readily than it is—the money can be had, no doubt of that.

Mr. President, I base my argument chiefly on our fundamental, constitutional law. Among the "Restrictive Articles" of our constitution is one which says: the General Conference shall not do away with our itinerant general superintendency." No man proposes directly to abrogate this feature of our economy; but we may accomplish the same indirectly by having a force wholly inadequate to the demands of this article; and on the other. Merely holding an Annual Conference is not general superintendency. It is indeed one element of it, and an interchange of Conference presidency is another feature. The general superintendency comprises extended travel and supervision throughout the whole field of Methodism. The time was when Bishop Asbury knew personally every preacher in the ranks. The work is so vastly enlarged now as to make this impossible; still, we must approximate as far as we can the labors of Asbury and McKendree in going through the field if we are to maintain intact our system. Without a large increase of Bishops the "general superintendency" is virtually abolished—a thing we are forbidden to do by constitutional law. This is my final platform. The demand of the church is in exact accord with the traditions of Methodism and primary, organic structure. The pressure is very decided in favor of what we propose in this report, and its passage is demanded by an unmistakable demand from all sections and by all classes of our people.

P. A. Peterson, of Virginia, said that he desired to see the Methodist itinerant episcopacy perpetuated, let it cost what it might in men and money. He believed that when they scupped the foundation of the episcopacy the church, as a distinctive ecclesiastical organization, was at an end. In order to have an effective episcopacy they should have a strong and effective College of Bishops. He did not exactly comprehend that the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was tending to high-churchism. If it were in the preachers and in the people, it would be in the Bishops. If it were in the Bishops, then more Bishops should be elected to take the conceit out of those occupying so exalted a position. (Laughter.) There could be no more high churchism in one Bishop than in forty. There were fifty men who would make efficient Bishops. No Bishops had labored more zealously and efficiently than those of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, but they needed more help. It was a long stretch to have a man travel across the entire continent, and more especially one who had attained the venerable age of seventy years. There were districts in Virginia where the eyes of the people never had rested upon a Bishop since the days of Asbury. They ought to elect a sufficient number of Bishops to travel in the out-of-the-way places. If a Bishop could preach a sermon to these people they would consider it the grandest sermon they ever heard since they were born. (Laughter.) He thought there ought to be a sufficient number of Bishops elected to do the work required.

The Rev. Dr. J. B. McFerrin said that a man would have to have a great deal of courage to attempt to follow the speech of Mr. Peterson. He was glad to know that fifty persons were ready and willing to receive Elijah's mantle. (Laughter and applause.) No man had more respect for the Bishops than John B. McFerrin. He had eaten with them, slept with them, and traveled with them. The hardest work to do was to eat a Bishop's dinner. (Laughter) He did not want to multiply the Bishops so as to make them a nuisance in the church. The Tennessee delegation had recommended the election of four Bishops. He [illegible] ed three, but he was [illegible] four. The Bishops [illegible] to work very hard. (Laughter.) All of them had lived to a good old age. One of the present Bishops had attained the age of eighty-two, and another of eighty-years. One of them had gone to Oregon and had returned as fat as an Oregon bear. (Laughter.) He did not think that there was any danger of killing them at all, but if they elected too many he was afraid that the good Lord would thin them out. (Laughter.) He had come there with the impression that four were enough.

Rev. J. D. Barbee said that the Tennessee delegation had instructed Dr. McFerrin to recommend four as the minimum and six as the maximum.

Dr. McFerrin said that there was no minimum nor maximum about it.

Mr. Barbee asked him to let some of the brethren of the Tennessee delegation speak on it.

Dr. McFerrin: I was there; I was the chairman; I made the motion, and I took the vote, and it was unanimous. (Laughter and applause.)

Dr. W. H. Potter, of North Georgia, made an earnest speech, in which he urged that not less than six Bishops should be elected, and that there was plenty of work for all of them to do. The church needed their services, and ought to have them.

The Conference then adjourned until nine A. M. Friday.

BISHOPS ELECTED.—The following telegram to the ADVOCATE was received just before going to press:

"A. H. Wilson, Linus Parker, A. G. Haygood, J. C. Granberry and R. K. Hargrove were elected Bishops by the General Conference to-day."

Thanks from the Overflowed.

THE GREAT REVIVAL OF THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY. By the Rev. Edwin Paxton Hood; with a supplemental chapter on the revival in America. Appendix and index. 12mo, cloth, with numerous illustrations. $1.25. The American Sunday-School Union, Philadelphia, Chicago, New York.

This is a history of the great religious movement of the eighteenth century, whose influence is still felt in the churches. Although the volume does not profess to give a complete history of the great revival, the perusal of it will give the reader a graphic and succinct view of the marvelous awakening of religious thought of which Whitefield and the Wesleys were the great leaders. The narrative is enlivened by many anecdotes, and the story of the lives and the works of these great men, as recited by the author, is a tale of heroism and endurance which is not excelled by the biography of any soldier or sailor. The book has been revised so as to make its phrases and descriptions familiar to American readers, and a chapter has been added descriptive of the great revival in America, in which Edwards, Whitefield, John Wesley, Tennent, and others, participated. The appendix contains extracts from the works of other writers who are regarded as authorities and who are referred to by the author. The index is full, and will add to the utility of the book as a work of reference. It is for sale by all booksellers.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sherar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. The King Press is worked by hand one man only is necessary to work this press. Single Gear—which will reduce a 500 pound bale of cotton to less dimensions and in less time than any horse-power press in use. With the Double Gear press and the labor of two men will reduce a 500 or 600 pound bale equal to any plantation steam power screw press and do it in less time, with very little labor to the operators. The capacity of this Press is fully equal to that of any other Single Box Press driven by any power. The King Press occupies but little space compared to others. It is made a roving and durable; requires no skill to set up and operate it. It is perfect in itself. Needs no props, braces or splintering around it; stands independent of every thing indoor or out. Every Press is guaranteed perfect and capable of doing all that is claimed for it.

The cut shows the simplicity of the press and the combination of the two great powers—the pulley and the lever. Full directions for setting up will accompany each press, no mistakes can be made.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano forte, as illustrated to the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for over sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. General Conference.

REPORT ON THE DEATH OF DR. SUMMERS.

The committe appointed to make arrangements in view of the death and funeral of Rev. Dr. Thomas O. Summers, secretary of this General Conference, respectfully present the following minute for insertion in the journal:

A great bereavment has come upon the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, while in session in this city, in the death of the venerable secretary, Rev. Thomas O. Summers, D. D., LL. D. He "died in the Lord" in great peace, May 6, at six o'clock, A. M.

Dr. Summers was born in Swanage, near Corfe Castle, Dorsetshire, England. He early experienced the power of regenerating grace—the witness of the Spirit—and identified himself with Wesleyan Methodism, whose principles, thus early imbibed, ever afterward controlled his life. In March, 1835, he was admitted on trial by the Baltimore Annual Conference at its session in Winchester, Virginia. In 1837 he was ordained deacon by Bishop Hedding in the Monument Street Church, Baltimore. In 1839 he was ordained elder by Bishop Andrew in the Light Street Church, Baltimore. The first circuit to which he was appointed was Augusta, in the Rockingham district, of which Norval Wilson was presiding elder. To this circuit he was returned the second year. In 1837 he was appointed "junior preacher" to the Baltimore City Station, then embracing five churches, each requiring three sermons on the Sabbath, besides a still greater number of week-night services. This station was then served by four traveling preachers, aided by a number of local preachers, whose names were regularly printed on the "plan of appointments" for the year. This young Summers found in this station much the same plan as recognized among the Wesleyans, and with which he had been familiar before leaving England. The work was congenial to him, and years afterward he often referred to his experience in the "Old City Station," especially its class meetings, the preachers' quarterly visitation of the classes as led by the leaders, the pastoral visitation from house to house by the preachers in their respective districts in that station, and the systematic weekly collections from each member, through the class-leaders.

The next appointment to which he was assigned was West River. It was while at this circuit he was transferred to the Texas Conference, 1837, where he aided heartily the noble men of that young Conference in planting Methodism in the vast and opening country. From Texas he was subsequently transferred to the Alabama Conference, in which his labors were freely given as pastor until called to occupy other positions, especially in relation to the literary department of the church. He continued in the Alabama Conference, and from that body he was sent to each succeeding General Conference since the organization of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

At every session of this body, Dr. Summers has been elected secretary, except the first, when he was assistant. How invaluable have been his services in this office, so important in its relation to the quadrennial Conferences of the Church, members of this and other sessions of the General Conference have borne witness to the fidelity and rare zeal he exhibited in the execution of his secretarial work.

The rigid attention he gave the duties of the office, his patient toil, his refusal at any time during Conference sessions to lighten his burden by needful recreation, his exactness in minuting the proceedings, his precision in the order of business, his fidelity in directing the records, all entitled him as "the faithful secretary of the church."

In this respect the General Conference and the whole church will ever acknowledge their indebtedness to Dr. Summers—and he, in characteristic tone of the true Methodist preacher—of all work—prized the approval of his brethren, in this office as a far greater consideration than any emolument which could have been awarded, as is sometimes done for these in similar relation in other bodies.

Thus worked, yet rejoiced in labor, our noble secretary, till literally was fulfilled the favorite words he often sang:

O that without a lingering groan,
I may the welcome word receive,
My body with my charge lay down,
And cease at once to work and live.

As editor of books, an office to which he had lately been assigned by the last General Conference, he still continued until the close of his career to display the same ripe scholarship, rich experience, and fidelity to all the duties required in the exposition of the great principles of Methodism, and in which he also was jealous of the maintenance of the honor and polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

J. S. MARTIN,
O. R. BLUE,
Committee.

Funeral of Dr. Summers.

The funeral of the late Rev. Thomas O. Summers, D. D., LL. D., took place on Sunday, May 7, at half-past three o'clock P. M. There was a full attendance of the delegates to the General Conference, and a vast audience composed of distinguished visiters, ministers of all denominations, and all Nashville was represented in the vast concourse that assembled to do honor to the lamented dead. We take the daily American's account of the solemn ceremonies:

The attendance on the part of the General Conference was very large, nearly every member of that body being present. A number of Senators and Representatives, prominent citizens of Nashville and their families, the Bishops of the Methodist Church, South, ministers of other denominations, the faculty and students of Vanderbilt composed the audience which had assembled to honor the memory of the veteran soldier of Christ, who had devoted his life to the service of the church which had honored him. Everywhere could be seen the evidences of the estimation in which the deceased was held by his fellow-laborers in the church. The sorrowful faces, and tear-stained eyes visible here and there in the audience, showed the feelings of those present.

Long before the hour announced for the services, the chapel was filled to repletion and a large number were standing in the aisles, in the space back of the seats, and even outside the door. The gallery was also filled, and outside the gallery-door were a large number who failed to obtain admission.

The chapel, in which the funeral ceremonies were held, was heavily draped in mourning. The entire front wall of the chapel was hung in folds festooned from the window in the center, through which the sun poured a flood of light upon the solemn scene. The chandeliers, were also covered with black, while the rear of the chapel, and the gas fixtures extending from the side and rear walls, bore their contribution of mourning for the deceased.

The floral tributes were of an elaborate but tasteful character. On either side of the altar were harps about eighteen inches in length, composed of a ground-work of evergreens and immortelles, and smilax, honeysuckles, and roses tastefully imbedded therein. To the right of the altar was a column of white, three feet high, composed of honeysuckles, and roses, and rare exotics, while a border of calla lilies and immortelles formed the appropriate base. On the coffin were four wreaths of rare white flowers. These were the gifts of loving friends, in mute eloquence attesting friendship's last tribute to the worth of the departed.

At half past three o'clock the corpse was slowly borne into the chapel, and was received at the altar by Bishop McTyeire, the audience standing as the deceased was borne into the building.

Rev. Dr. A. M. Shipp, D. D., then read the nineteenth Psalm, commencing "Lord thou has been our dwelling-place in all generations."

The Rev. O. R. Blue, D. D., then read the epistle contained in the burial service, and found in the fifteenth chapter of First Corinthians, in which, by Christ's ascension, the resurrection of the body is proven.

Prayer was then offered by Bishop Kavanaugh. He prayed for the family of the deceased, and asked that his work might be blessed in the conversion of many souls. The prayer was earnest and feeling, and at its close there was a hearty Amen pronounced all over the house.

The memorial discourse delivered by Bishop Keener was eloquent and impressive. He gave a brief account of the life and religious work of the deceased, and classed him as no ordinary man. His life was above reproach. He had lived as he would have chosen, and he died as he had often desired to die—with the harness on.

The 778th hymn was announced by Bishop Pierce, and was sung by the congregation standing.

The congregation then repaired to the grave which had been prepared for the body, north of Wesley Hall, and a little to the southeast of Science Hall. The pall-bearers were Dr. L. C. Garland, of Vanderbilt University; Dr. H. A. C. Walker, of South Carolina Conference; Rev. J. E. Evans, D. D. of North Georgia Conference; Rev. J. G. John, D. D., of Texas Conference; Hon. S. H. Dent, of Alabama Conference; Hon. W. B. Wood, of North Alabama Conference; Rev. J. E. Edwards, D. D., of Virginia Conference; Rev. A. W. Wilson, D. D., of Baltimore Conference; Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald, D. D., of Pacific Conference; Rev. D. R. McAnally, D. D., of St. Louis Conference; twelve theological students of Vanderbilt University—T. E. Harrison, C. F. Moore, A. F. Watkins, A. O. Evans, W. H. Townsend, N. B. Harrison, C. F. Comer, G. Andrews, R. M. Shelton, W. E. Hardaway, H. M. McKnight, W. E. Towser.

The order of the procession was as follows:

1. Bishops.
2. Alabama, Texas and Baltimore delegates to the General Conference.
3. The corpse.
4. Family of the deceased.
5. Faculty and students of Vanderbilt University.
6. Board of Missions, Book Committee, and members of the General Conference.
7. Friends of the deceased.

The procession moved to the grave shortly after five o'clock, and while passing through the shady paths which the deceased had so often trod the chapel-bell tolled at intervals, until the last clod had been thrown in the grave. The service at the grave was the usual burial service of the Methodist Church, and was conducted by the Rev. Drs. J. B. McFerrin and D. C. Kelly. The service was concluded by the singing of the hymn, "Servant of God, well done!" and that beginning, "Come let us join our friends above." The benediction was then pronounced, and the audience slowly dispersed.

ADOPTION.—Some professors of religion consider every affection short of ecstasy as nothing worth. Hence many, it is to be feared, substitute mere animal excitement for joy in the Holy Ghost, and thus deceive themselves. A person may bring forth the fruits of the Spirit, have much of the meekness and gentleness of Christ, and yet not be able from some mental cause, to exercise that filial confidence toward God in which the Spirit of adoption in a great measure consists, although none can possess this Spirit without bringing forth the fruits of righteousness. Others, from some peculiar temperament of body, may be prevented from feeling great transports of joy, while at the same time they can taste the sweets of inward serenity and composedness of mind. Others, again, from a deep view of their own corruption, can not or dare not recognize in themselves a holy conformity to God, though they hate sin and truly love the Saviour.

Now shall we say that such characters have not the Spirit's witness, because they can not feel this ecstasy of delight? Must the work of the Spirit be overlooked in the absence of rapturous feeling? Shall we make those sad whom the Lord hath not made sad? O how needful it is, for the enjoyment of true comfort, to place our experience on the right foundation!

Now, if joy, which is the Christian's delightful privilege, be the effect of the Spirit's witness rather than the witness itself, then the humble follower of Jesus, who has the testimony of his conscience that he has chosen God for his portion, and cleaves wholly to his Saviour for righteousness and strength, ought not to despond because he can not rise to those heights of joy which some favored believers are permitted to attain. He may, however, and he ought to take courage from this inward witness of the Spirit to his conscience, to aspire after so happy a state of mind which conduces so much to the glory of God, and to the spiritual growth of his own soul; for "the joy of the Lord is our strength."—From "Christian Retirement."

Mr. Spurgeon's church has now 5,310 members.

THE GOOD OLD PLOW.

Let them sing who may of the battle fray,
And the deeds that have long since past;
Let them chant in praise of the far whose days
Are spent on the ocean vast;
I would render to these all the worship you please,
I would honor them even now;
But I'd give far more from my heart's full store
To the cause of the Good Old Plow.

Let them hand the notes that in music float
Through the bright and glittering hall,
While the amorous twirl of the lady's bright curl
Recruit the shoulder of vanity fall.
But dearer to me is the song from the tree,
And the rich and blossoming bough;
Oh, these are the sweets which the rustic greets
As he follows the Good Old Plow.

Full many there be that daily we see
With a selfish and hollow pride,
Who the plowman's lot in his humble cot
With a scornful look deride.
But I'd rather take aye a hearty shake
From his hand than to wealth to bow;
For the honest grasp of his hand's rough clasp
Has stood by the Good Old Plow.

All honor be, then, to these gray old men
When at last they are bowed with toil;
Their warfare then o'er, they battle no more,
For they've conquered the stubborn soil;
And the chaplet each wears is his silver hairs,
And ne'er shall the victor's brow
With a laurel crown, to the grave go down
Like the sons of the Good Old Plow.

THE SYMPTOMS OF DISEASE.—There is, perhaps, no period during the course of the whole year wherein fowls are more delicate, suffer more, and require more attention and care than during February and March, and even into April. With the careful poulterer, at this season, the fowls are on full rations, and in full egg-production, or preparing for it. The weather is variable, and subject to frequent and sudden changes. These changes try them severely. One day may be warm and pleasant, which the fowls really enjoy, to be followed by a week of tempestuous weather, which confines them to their close quarters. The small outings that they get during these mild spells are of immense advantage, recruiting and bringing the layers rapidly forward. Fowls when first turned out on the bare earth will refuse their regular food for the sake of eating grass. For this reason they should never be sent abroad with empty crops. In the eager endeavor to gather the few green blades they frequently gorge themselves with dead grass, which clogs the crop and brings on indigestion. The only remedy is to avoid it. If taken in hand as soon as discovered, simple remedies may be administered that remove the difficulty; but usually it is not discovered until too late, and the fowl is past all aid. They do not begin to droop, and hence are not observed until too far gone for the application of the proper remedies.

The comb is the fowl's pulse. Another never-failing indication is the carriage of the tail. If the comb has a wilted, limp appearance and droops heavily from the base, with languid movement, it is certain that the bird is sick and requires immediate attention. The appetite is no guide. Fowls will run to the others when with the flock; even though the crop be full almost to distension. Another symptom, although this does not occur until far gone, is the constant desire to drink. The fever at this stage is great and the contents of the crop hard. The fluid taken into the crop distends it enormously, yet at that stage it is all the relief the poor creature can find from the burning fever. At this stage there can be no help. The first symptoms are to be watched for and then relief may be available. The spreading of the tail when the fowl is in repose is a bad symptom, as well as the sudden rising and falling of the feathers on the back, as though the fowl were in the act of shaking itself but does not. These false movements of these feathers may also be observed when the fowl is infested with vermin. The best time to observe the fowls is when they are quiet, standing, as it were, inactive, or reposing in the sun. This they will do without restraint when accustomed to the presence of the keeper. The one that does not trim the feathers, but raises them until they fairly bristle all over the body, and then allows them to fall with an indolent movement, with neck and head drawn in, resting on the crop, never once picking among the mass of feathers, but standing rigid and fixed, is out of order in some manner; that fowl needs examining. If the tail feathers be folded closely until they represent but one or two feathers, and carried erect, the bird is strong and vigorous. This is a pretty sure index. It sometimes may be spread to three or four feathers.

Another disorder, and one greatly to be dreaded, and one for which there is seldom any remedy, is that of being egg-bound. This also arises from weakness, and makes itself manifest at this season when the fowls are fed on high-seasoned rations, and are weak from confinement. Or it may be the result of sudden colds, which disarrange the internal organs to that extent that they do not perform their appointed offices. Laying hens require more attention and care during these two months (February and March,) for they are the most trying in the whole year. They are nervous and sensitive, and easily contract colds, but once safely over this period, they are secure for the season. Exposure or bad food should be avoided during this period. Never turn the fowls out early in the morning on empty crops until the weather is mild, and the hens have been gradually accustomed to the change. All changes should be made gradually and with forethought.—C. B., in Country Gentleman.

THE TEA-PLANT.—The vegetation on the southern slopes of the eastern Himalayas, three or four thousand feet above the sea, though by no means luxuriant, is said to be very agreeable and of much interest to the botanist. Among the plants native to these slopes, planted in the course of nature during the preparation of the earth for man, and left wild with the elephant and the leopard, is a shrub growing from twenty to thirty feet high, and well worthy to be selected for pleasant foliage and fine flowers. The lanceolate leaves are from two to six inches long, and the flowers are large and white, very fragrant, in clusters of two or three in the axils of the leaves. This is the tea-plant, of the genus Thea, very nearly allied to the genus Camellia, of which the Japonica and other species from China and Japan are favorite cultivations of the green-house in Europe and this country. Nowhere in the world but on the borders of the Himalayas and in the wild regions of Assam is the tea-plant found growing uncultivated, but it was not discovered in this its natural habitation until the present century. As a cultivated plant, the Chinese have certainly had it since the fourth century, and they claim it to be indigenous to their own soil—just as confidently as they claim the parentage of numerous valuable articles. China has given tea to the world, and has furnished a favorable home to the plant, which is nevertheless quite as well suited in its native land, farther east. When it became known in England that the tea-plant grew native in the highlands of the Himalayas, English companies engaged extensively in the cultivation of tea in that region, and finally, after the correction of notable failures in methods of culture and of cure, it appears that the finest teas of Asia are those of these mountain-plains and the choicest plants are of variety Assamica, lately propagated from the wild shrub of the mountains.—Prof. Albert B. Prescott, in Popular Science Monthly.

MUSHROOMS.—The mushroom is a very accommodating plant. We have seen them growing in old tubs, in out-of-the-way corners of sheds, in abandoned green-houses, on shelves in stables, and in every case giving apparently a good and healthful crop.

All that is needed for success is a temperature from 50° to 60°, some fresh horse manure and a little spawn. Having procured what fresh horse manure that is needed, mix it well with about one-third of its bulk of good loam, and you are prepared to make your beds in whatever place you prefer. If you determine to form beds make them narrow—certainly not more than five feet in breadth and about fifteen inches in height. The material must be made compact by beating down as evenly as possible. If under cover, the beds may be made flat on the top, but if in the open air they should be rounded to shed the rain. After the beds have been made a week, there will be considerable heat produced by the fermentation of the manure.

Bricks of spawn should have been secured previously, and they can be sent everywhere, postage or expressage free, at about thirty cents a pound. Break them into pieces as large as walnuts, and insert in the beds just below the surface, about ten inches apart. One pound of spawn is sufficient for a space two by six feet. If there seems to be much heat, do nothing for a week or ten days, until it somewhat subsides. Then cover the bed with an inch or more of good earth, pressing it down with the back of a spade. It is not likely in a large bed that water will be needed at all; but if the material should appear very dry, water lightly with warm water. In small beds, or pails, or anything of the kind, it is probable water will be needed once or twice.

Mushrooms will begin to appear in about six weeks after planting the spawn and can be gathered for three or four weeks. In gathering, take up the mushroom entire, leaving no stem in the bed, and placing a little earth in the hole made by its removal. When the crop is gathered, cover the bed with a little more earth, beat it down gently and give a pretty good moistening with tepid water, and in about a month more another crop will be produced.—Vick's Illustrated.

A FINE GARDEN.—Mr. C. B. Hadwen gives an account of a visit to the garden of a retired merchant, where he saw such crops of vegetables of all kinds as he had never seen before. The method of culture was simple; the land was of a sandy nature, and he trenched three feet deep to get moisture, and incorporated manure at the rate of one hundred cords per acre. In his melon bed the fruit was so thick there was hardly room to set feet, and of exquisite flavor. Some strawberry plants set on the first of August were, many of them, as large on the twentieth of September that a peck measure would not cover a plant, and the foliage was three times the size of ordinary. Mr. Hadwen thought it extravagant to apply so much manure, but the results convinced him of the profit. A hundred strawberry plants set out in the spring of 1881 produced seventy-nine quarts, many of which weighed from an ounce to an ounce and a half each. Many of his strawberries were seedlings of his own raising. When he first went to farming his neighbors laughed at the city man, but they have not laughed much lately. He had found that by planting the seed end of the Early Rose potato separately from the other end, the former, in a few years, produced potatoes two weeks earlier, and that by planting round and oval potatoes of any variety separately in a few years he got two varieties.

BLACK OR WHITE HOGS.—Judging by the advertisements of breeders, it would seem that black is to be the prevailing color of the coming hog. A writer in the National Live Stock Journal claims that of all the advertisers of breeding hogs not over seven per cent. sell anything but black colors, and that at the several State exhibitions held last fall, in Kansas and Missouri, not over seven per cent. of the hogs were white, nor was the proportion of white greater at the great stock yards where hogs are shipped for sale. He claims that white hogs are more subject to skin disease, particularly mange, and that the skin blisters much worse under the influence of the hot sun. The difference is quite marked where hogs are spotted, the dark spot remaining smooth, clean and glossy, while the white portions are rough and sore; yet the black hog has as thin a hide as the white.—New England Farmer.

DUST BATHS FOR POULTRY.—Cleanliness is most important in fowl-houses, for experience shows that poultry are unfavorably affected by the emanations from filthy quarters; and besides, working in places were roosts and floors are covered with the droppings is decidedly unpleasant. Dry earth, in the form of powder, scattered every where, will absorb the bad oders, giving a wholesome atmosphere to the hen-house, and at the same time preserve the manure in the least offensive condition. Besides these purposes, a box of dry earth should be in a convenient corner of every fowl-house for the fowls to roll in. Dust from the highway is most convenient. Replace the same by an equal quantity of good gravel, and the public will be the gainer.—Live Stock Journal.

PLANT POTATOES DEEP.—Trouble is found with potatoes drying when planted. This is the case especially with cut seed, and particularly when small. It is caused by shallow planting, dry weather succeeding. The remedy is very simple—plant deeper. A few inches more will put the seed where it is moist, say at a depth of five or six inches, or in light soil an inch deeper. The crop will also be better as the potato loves coolness and moisture. The seed I planted last spring when the weather was unusually dry, was cut to the size of a walnut, a single eye to a piece, one piece to a hill and not a miss in all. I planted deep.—Correspondent Country Gentleman.

Obituaries.

GOODMAN.—Our venerable and esteemed sister, HARRIET GOODMAN, the daughter of Hon. James and Sarah Tilley, was born in Charleston, S. C., ——, 1804.

In early life she remembered her Creator, and realized in her own happy experience that those who seek early shall find a pardoning God. In 1826 she was united in marriage to Rev. Luke Goodman, and lived in the happy enjoyment of the facilities of domestic life for eighteen years, until the providence of God severed the visible tie that bound them. For many years she has been a widow, but, in the midst of cares, bereavements, and personal afflictions, realized that the God of all comfort was the husband of the widow. Afflictions sometimes seem insurmountable if there is complaining and bitterness of spirit; but it was not so in the experience of our sainted sister. Her constant conviction was, the Lord hath given, the Lord hath taken; blessed be the name of the Lord. In the lapse of a quarter of a century I was often in her company, under various conditions of joy and sorrow, but always found her walking by the "same rule, minding the same thing." I never met her under any circumstances, but what she spoke well of the Lord, and of his doings toward her. She was always in her place in the "house of the Lord" when health and opportunity allowed. She was hospitable and generous. Her home was always a house of prayer, in the days of affliction; but days also of holy peace and blessed hope. When the time of her departure came she was more than ready. She had a desire to depart and be with the Lord. Her sun did go down in a cloudless sky, and left the radiance of a blessed memory behind, to gild with glory the night approach to immortality. Her gentle and gentle ministries will be cherished in the memories, not only of her children and grandchildren, but in the hearts of many Christian friends.

She died on April 9, 1882, on Easter Sunday, the glad day on which the Lord arose. In her seventy-seventh year. Thus, full of days, full of peace, and full of immortal hope, she passed from the home of the good, and waits to bid us welcome to the company of the blessed.

J. B. WALKER.

IRWIN—MRS. SALLIE E. IRWIN, nee Kelly, wife of Bro. H. F. Irwin, was born on the fourteenth day of February, 1858, and died, in great peace, in Yazoo City, Miss., on the seventeenth day of March, 1882, aged about twenty-four years.

Sister Irwin was the child of affliction, and suffered intensely several years prior to her death with consumption; although her sufferings were, at times, of the most excruciating character, not a whisper or murmur was ever heard to escape her lips. In her sufferings she learned in patience to possess her soul, and felt "that all things worked together for good to them that love God."

From her infancy she was consecrated to God in holy baptism, and scarcely had she crossed the line of accountability when she ratified her baptismal covenant by identifying herself with the people of God, and ever afterward maintained her Christian life as a member of the church and the friend of Jesus. Sister Irwin's life was a beautiful commentary upon the religion of the Bible, showing in her daily walk and conversation the fruits of an exemplary, godly life. The courts of the Lord's house were her delight, and, in her intercourse with the world, her Christian triumph and purity of character were felt and acknowledged by all who knew her. Sister Irwin was a faithful wife and an affectionate mother, and, though the ties which bound her to earth were sacred and dear, yet, when the ghastly messenger came, she bade adieu to husband and children, feeling that the ties, which were being sundered only for a time, would surely be united in that beautiful "far-away home of the soul." We miss her, but sorrow not as those who have no hope. Husband, dry up your tears and weep not! Bring up your little ones in the nurture of the Lord, that an unbroken household may meet her in the Jerusalem of our Father. "So mote it be."

W. W. HURST.

MAGEE—DAVID MAGEE was born Washington parish, La., November 1, 1808, and was married to Miss Eliza Peak, and died of consumption the nineteenth of December, 1881. She blessed the union by giving four lovely children—three boys and one girl—who all preceded him to heaven. He left to his care and culture three sons and one granddaughter, who, with their grandmother, are endeavoring to follow their loved one, as he followed Christ.

Bro. Magee was an acceptable member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for thirty years. We do not claim perfection for him; but he filled efficiently the office of steward and class-leader; was a constant attendant on the ordinances of God's house. The weary itinerant ever found a hearty welcome and home at his domicile, and was liberal in the support of the church. He was always delighted with the songs of Zion; and a few days before his death, at his request, his pastor preached at his house. He joined in the services with the preacher and congregation, and requested that his funeral sermon be preached before his body was buried, if practicable. Thus died a man who was reputed by all who knew him, and who mourn their loss and strive to follow his teaching and example. May the bereaved realize the blessed truth that God is the God of the fatherless and Father of the fatherless. He knew him in other years to love him, and have partaken of his generous liberality. May we meet him in that better land, by-and-by. So mote it be.

J. NICHOLSON.

CLARK—SISTER MYRA CLARK was born in Tallahatchie county, Miss., April 6, 1841, married to Isaac A. Clark, March 27, 1865, and died, near Winona, Miss., June 11, 1881.

Sister Clark was naturally kind and amiable in her disposition; but she early impressed with the necessity of making additional preparation for holiness in life, and to triumph in death. Her heart was given to God while she was quite young. She made no compromise with sin. She sought to know the will of her Heavenly Father, and to make it in all things her rule of action. Sister Clark loved to worship at the house of God, and was seldom absent unless circumstances positively forbade. She loved the study of God's word, and was a model Sunday-school teacher, always having some religious conversation with her class in addition to the usual recitation. The writer was her pastor the last three years of her life, and can truly say that, as a church member, he never knew one who was more exemplary. In her Christian life she had no doubts about her conversion and acceptance with God, nor any in regard to the higher life of consecration to the service of God. She exhibited in her daily walk and conversation a life of faith in the Son of God and a heartfelt piety. As a wife and mother she was devoted to her family, and few children are blessed with such religious instruction as she gave hers. Her husband will miss her in the training of his children. They miss her kind and good precepts and examples. Her death was unexpected and sudden; but she was ready. She had lived for that hour. May God bless the husband and six motherless children!

A. W. L.

GRAVES—MR. S. B. GRAVES was born in Bienville parish, La., and died in his native parish, April 18, 1882. Mr. Graves belonged to no church; but was of a very pious nature, never participating in worldly pleasures, and seemed to realize that such was only vanity and vexation of spirit.

He was only eighteen years of age; just entering upon that stage of life where the anticipations of the future are brighter and brighter at every turn of the imagination.

Alas! 'tis sad for us to lose our friends and relatives; yet, how we should rejoice when one dies as he did in the assurance of an abundant entrance into the celestial city. He suffered eight days, and bore it all with patience, and, at the trying hour of death, called his mother, brother and family to his side and requested them to meet him in heaven, and then sung, I am going home to the new Jerusalem. After leaving word for two of his brothers, who were away, to meet him in heaven, his spirit took its eternal flight unto God who gave it. Parents, wonder not at the mighty and mysterious works of God; and remember that your son is only a little in advance of yourselves and of the mighty caravan which is moving on at steady pace. But be ye even also ready, for the messenger cometh when no man knoweth.

R. LAWSON.

MONZENGO—MR. JAMES J. MONZENGO died at his residence, near Minden, La., March 22, 1882. He was born in Houston county, Ga., September 1, 1815. He joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in early life in the full assurance of faith.

During the war he yielded to temptation and departed from the faith, but sometime ago he expressed himself to his wife and mother as being willing and ready to go at the Master's call."

The writer had no personal acquaintance with the deceased, but has obtained the foregoing facts from a member of the family. In this community Mr. Monzengo was held in high esteem as a man, citizen and neighbor. In all the relations of life he seems to have endeared himself to those with whom he associated. He suffered long and greatly from chronic rheumatism, and, therefore, could not, during the later part of his life, take part in business pursuits. May God comfort the bereaved in this hour of trial.

J. M. B.

HOLLOWAY—MRS. NANNIE HOLLOWAY was born in Overton, Rusk county, Texas, 1859, and died of consumption, near Evergreen, La., April 17, 1882.

She was not a member of any church. Believing in immersion, and, being in feeble health, she could not be received into the visible kingdom. Though barred by external ordinances, yet God had mercy, and, through faith in Christ, received her into the spiritual kingdom by renewing her fallen nature and giving her that "peace that passeth all understanding." She passed into the invisible kingdom in the full triumphs of a blissful hope of immortality. May her death be sanctified to the good of her sorrowing companion and motherless boy.

G. M. L.

At the regular meeting of the Woman's Missionary Society, Shreveport, La., held May 5, 1882, the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted:

Whereas, it has pleased Almighty God to remove from our midst our beloved friend and sister, Mrs. Jane M. Jordan; therefore be it

Resolved, That though we feel the chastening rod most severely, that we bow in humble submission to the will of him who doeth all things well; for he hath but claimed his own; called the servant, who hath labored so faithfully in his vineyard here, home to her crown and rest "in the sweet fields of Eden."

Resolved, That though she was our bright and shining light, that the Master she so lovingly served has promised that she, and such as she, "Shall be mine in the day when I come to make up my jewels."

Resolved, That we, the younger and less worthy members of this society, calm our quivering heart-strings, dry our tears, and look upward for the glowing mantle she has let fall to us in her heavenly flight.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be sent to her sorrowing family, and that we all pray to God, who hath bereaved them, to show them the "balm in Gilead."

MRS. BETTIE YONREE,
For Committee.

The following preamble and resolutions were unanimously adopted by the first Quarterly Conference of North Wilkinson circuit, Mississippi Conference, held at Mt. Carmel, April 9, 1882.

Whereas, Bro. Moses Cavin, for many years an active steward of this circuit, has been called home to his reward; and

Whereas, We, the members of the first Quarterly Conference, of North Wilkinson circuit, for 1882, desire to render honor to whom honor is due; therefore, be it

Resolved, That in the death of Bro. Moses Cavin the church has lost an efficient steward, who was the friend of the preacher, of the poor, and of God.

Resolved, That we do hereby extend our warmest sympathy to his wife and children, and commend them to the comforting care of that God "who is too wise to err, and too good to be unkind."

Resolved, That these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of the Quarterly Conference, a copy furnished the family, and that they be published in the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Respectfully submitted,
JOHN DAVIDSON, Rec. Sec'y.

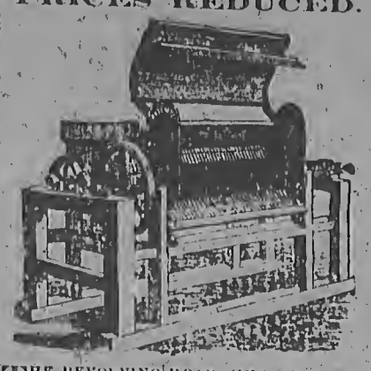
DANIEL PRATT IMPROVED
Revolving Head Cotton Gin,
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873.
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.



THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons, and several improvements have been added. It obviates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work with the same time, while economizing steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton, on this account, of a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint, added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every 100 bales ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

Ayer's
Hair Vigor,
FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS NATURAL VITALITY AND COLOR.

It is a most agreeable dressing, which is at once harmless and effectual for preserving the hair. It restores, with the gloss and freshness of youth, faded or gray hair, to a rich brown, or deep black, as may be desired. By its use thin hair is thickened, and baldness often, though not always, secured. It checks falling of the hair immediately, and causes a new growth in all cases where the glands are not decayed; while to brashy, weak, or otherwise diseased hair, it imparts vitality and strength, and renders it pliable.

The Vigor cleanses the scalp, cures and prevents the formation of dandruff; and, by its cooling, stimulating, and soothing properties, it heals most if not all of the humors and diseases peculiar to the scalp, keeping it cool, clean, and healthy, under which conditions diseases of the scalp and hair are impossible.

A Dressing for Ladies' Hair.

The Vigor is incomparable. It is colorless, contains neither oil nor dye, and will not soil white cambric. It imparts an agreeable and lasting perfume, and as an article for the toilet it is economical and unsurpassed in its excellence.

FARMER'S AND MECHANIC'S
—MANUAL—

Edited by GEO. E. WARING, Jr.,
Author of "Elements of Agriculture," "Draining for Profit and for Health," and formerly Agricultural Engineer of Central Park, New York.

500 Octavo Pages--Over 300 Illustrations.
Worth to any Thinking, Working Farmer $25 per Year.

This book is for the most part a work of facts and figures—assured analysis and demonstrations, about which there can be no dispute. The design was to produce a work of substantial and enduring value, and of universal application and use. This work is offered as containing more that has been proven by long use to be of value, more that is most necessary for every farmer and mechanic to know, and more of promising novelty, than any other that has ever been presented to the farmers and mechanics of America. It is complete in every particular in which it is possible for such a book to be complete; and, in addition to this, it is sufficiently suggestive in many other respects to induce its readers to read more, to think more, to experiment more, and to become more intelligent and more successful in the management of their business as well as really happier and wiser men.

Rev. Dr. J. H. Nall, commissioner of the Presbyterian Church from the Presbytery of New Orleans, received the following telegram from Rev. Dr. Wm. E. Boggs, pastor of the Central Presbyterian Church of Atlanta, Ga.:

ATLANTA, Ga., May 15, 1882.

It—the General Assembly—meets in Atlanta.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

ARCADIA, La., May 9.—A fearful cyclone, about four miles wide and ten miles in length, passed six miles east of Vienna on Sunday, the seventh, destroying houses, fences and everything in its way.

Another cyclone passed within a quarter of a mile west of this town yesterday, from one half to two miles wide, completely demolishing everything in its way. No lives were lost.

WARRENTON, Mo., May 9.—A cyclone last night tore out the east wall and parts of the roof of the Central Wesleyan College and caused other damage amounting to $15,000. No lives lost.

LITTLE ROCK, Ark., May 9.—Beginning with Friday, rain has continued falling in this locality up to the present time. Last night the storm was very severe in the city and suburbs and much damage was done.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas, May 9.—On Sunday morning about one o'clock a cyclone broke forth in the vicinity of Leon creek, which was of an unusually violent character. Trees were uprooted, fences blown down and much damage done.

ATLANTA, Ga., May 9.—The City Council last night passed an ordinance making vaccination in this city compulsory.

WASHINGTON, May 10.—The House resumed consideration of the bill creating an Executive Department of Agriculture. The pending question being on the substitute submitted by Mr. Hubbell, of Michigan, on behalf of the committee on civil service reform, which was rejected, the original bill was then passed. The bill provides that the Department of Agriculture shall be an executive department under the supervision and control of the Secretary of Agriculture, who shall be a experienced and practical agriculturist, and establishes the following bureaus of the department: Of agricultural products, of the animal industry, of lands, and of statistics.

COLUMBUS, Ga., May 10.—A dispatch received from Rev. R. P. Parrish, D. D., moderator of the general assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, states that on account of small-pox in Atlanta, the session to convene May 18, 1882, will be held in Columbus, Ga.

JACKSON, Miss., May 10.—At a public meeting, attended by the leading men of the city, the right of way was guaranteed through Hinds county for the Mississippi Valley and Yazoo railroad, connecting Jackson and Yazoo City.

CHICAGO, May 10.—A Parsons, Kansas, special says: A terrible cyclone passed over McAllister, a mining settlement in the Indian Territory, Monday night. Seven people were killed outright, four fatally and eleven dangerously, and thirty-nine more or less hurt.

Mound City, Mo., was also struck by a cyclone Monday evening, and property was terribly wrecked.

GREENVILLE, S. C., May 10.—The Southern Baptist Convention met in the Baptist Church in this city at ten o'clock this morning, in its twenty-seventh annual session.

BATON ROUGE, La., May 10.—In the Senate Mr. Marston submitted the following joint resolution proposing an amendment to the constitution of the State to annul article 167, relative to lottery charters and privileges: That at the General Assembly, which shall take place on the Tuesday next following the third Monday in April, 1884, or as otherwise provided by law, an amendment to the constitution of the State shall be submitted to the qualified electors of the State, for their ratification or rejection, in the following words: Article 167 of the constitution granting to the General Assembly authority to grant lottery charters or privileges, and recognizing the Louisiana State Lottery Company's charter as a contract binding on State, is hereby amended, and no lottery privilege shall be allowed in the State of Louisiana after the ratification of this amendment.

MEMPHIS, May 12.—The river rose twelve inches during the past twenty-four hours and now marks twenty-nine feet eight inches on the gauge and within six feet four inches of the extreme higher water mark of March 9.

VICKSBURG, May 12.—Quite a wind and hail storm passed over this city Wednesday night, fortunately doing no serious injury here.

At Edwards, Miss., the result was more damaging.

BOSTON, May 12.—Colored circles are agitated over the alleged refusal of the Revere House to entertain Robert Small, of South Carolina, on account of his color. The excuse was made that the house was full and he went elsewhere.

CHATTANOOGA, May 12.—The East Tennessee Sunday-School Convention, after a two days' session, adjourned today. The most important business was the appointment of a committe to investigate the feasibility of organizing a Southern Sunday-School Assembly.

NASHVILLE, May 13.—The Methodist Conference was engaged most of the day in the discussion of the question of the number of Bishops to be elected. No conclusion was reached. Dr. Kelley, of Nashville, urged the need of Bishops in the Western country and Mexico. In the first direction, there was a crisis coming upon Methodism; that field belonged to Methodism, and the question for them to consider was whether they would take their own or relinquish the field to others. The committee on temperance submitted rules to be placed in the Book of Discipline: "Let preachers and members observe the general rules which forbid drunkenness or the drinking of spirituous liquors, unless in cases of necessity. In cases of drunkenness, let Discipline be administered as in cases of immorality. Let our preachers and members abstain from the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors to be used as a beverage, and if any shall engage in such manufacture or sale, in such cases, let Discipline be administered as in case of imprudent or improper conduct."

GREENVILLE, S. C., May 14.—At a meeting of the Baptist Convention last night a number of committe reports were read and adopted. The report of the committee as to the petition of the Presbyterians to memorialize Congress on the subject of a Sunday law was recommitted, and was afterward amended so as to recommend efforts for a general legislative enactment by Christians in their capacity as citizens. Waco, Texas, was chosen as the place of the next meeting of the convention, in May, 1883.

CAMDEN, Ark., May 14.—We are witnessing one of the greatest overflows known to the oldest settlers. The river is forty-five feet above low water markings, and is rising at the rate of two inches an hour.

NASHVILLE, May 15.—At the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to-day a letter from Bishop Wood, of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, extending fraternal greeting, was read: also one from the General Conference of the Colored Methodist Church, recently held in Washington City. A minority report was submitted from the Committee on Temperance, declaring that further legislation on the subject would be unwise and unnecessary. The question of the election of Bishops was considered and the Conference agreed, to elect five new Bishops, and their election was made the special order for ten o'clock to-morrow. A memorial was presented, asking definite action as to an annual collection for the American Bible Society.

General Conference.

TUESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

To-day's proceedings of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, were the most important of the session so far. The committee on revisal recommended that the Conference direct that in the case of neglect of duties of any kind, imprudent conduct, engaging in promiscuous dancing, whether in its private or public exhibition, or visiting the theatre, the opera or the circus, indulging in sinful tempers or words or disobedience to the order and discipline of the church, first, let the private reproof be given by the preacher or leader and if there be an acknowledgement of the fault and promise of amendment, the person may be borne with, otherwise the preacher must take with him two or three faithful friends who shall labor to bring the offender to proper repentance; but, if he will not hear them and there be no sign of amendment, the offender must be dealt with as in the case of immorality.

The time having arrived for holding the election of Bishops, Bishop McTyeire appointed Drs. Pasco and Galloway and Messrs. Thornburg and Fulton as tellers, and in view of the importance of the work before them and the danger of illegal ballots being cast, he suggested this plan for taking the vote, viz: That the roll of the Conferences be made and the chairmen collect the votes of their respective delegations and deposit them in the hat passed around by the tellers.

Dr. Prettyman offered a substitute, which provided for the call of the roll of members, and that each member stand and vote as his name was called. The substitute was lost.

Bishop McTyeire gave out a hymn, which was sung by the congregation. Prayer was offered by Rev. Dr. Boswell, of the Memphis Conference.

The first ballot was taken, consuming an hour and a half. Two hundred and forty-one votes were cast, requiring 121 to elect. The following is the result of the first ballot: A. W. Wilson, Baltimore 122; A. G. Haygood, Georgia, 119; Linus Parker, 96; J. C. Granberry, Virginia, 94; R. H. Hargrove, Tennessee, 68; N. H. D. Wilson, North Carolina, 19; R. A. Young, Tennessee, 42; E. R. Hendrix, Missouri, 38; O. P. Fitzgerald, Pacific, 35; W. M. Rush, Memphis, 34; P. A. Peterson, Virginia, 32; Young J. Allen, China mission, 32; B. M. Messick, Louisville 28; J. S. Key, Georgia, 26; W. T. Harris, Memphis, 25; G. G. Andrews, Mississippi, 25; Joseph Anderson, White river, 22; E. E. Wilie, Holston, 20; W. B. Tudor, St. Louis, 18; John B. McFerrin, Tennessee, 15; J. D. Shaw, North Texas, 14; J. W. Henton, Georgia, 14; C. W. Miller Kentucky, 13; W. W. Bennett, Virginia, 11; B. Carver, North Carolina, 11; W. W. Duncan, South Carolina, 11; S. F. Bounds, 10; Dr. Wilson, was declared elected Bishop, and the Conference adjourned until four o'clock P. M.

Upon the reassembling of the Conference, Rev. Linus Parker, Rev. A. G. Haygood, and Rev. J. C. Granberry, were elected Bishops on the second ballot, Parker receiving 146 votes, Haygood 146, and Granberry 140. On the third ballot R. K. Hargrove was elected Bishop, receiving 173 votes Rev. R. A. Young, 15 Rev. W. H. Wilson, and 12 R. Hendrix 9.

THE NEW BISHOPS.

Rev. A. W. Wilson, D. D., of the Baltimore Conference, is secretary of the Board of Missions. His scholastic training was conducted at Columbian College, Washington, D. C. Having left the college walls his purpose was to engage in the study and practice of medicine, but very soon the conviction that he should devote himself to the work of the ministry led him to a change of purpose, and his consecration to that line of purpose in which he has shown conspicuous ability. Dr. Wilson was born in Baltimore, was consecrated in early life, and in 1853 was admitted to probation in the Baltimore General Conference, of which he continues a member to this day. Dr. Wilson is a man of great vigor of mind, of wide training and of eminent ability as a preacher. Dr. Wilson read law and devoted several years to its practice in Baltimore and other courts of the State of Maryland.

Rev. Atticus G. Haygood, D. D., is a clerical delegate from North Georgia Conference, a minister of high character and president of the Emery College, of Oxford, Ga.

Dr. Haygood is about forty-two years old. He is an eloquent speaker, a bold thinker and a fine writer. He has, for four years past, in addition to his duties as president of the college, edited the Wesleyan Christian Advocate. He is author of a book that had an immense sale—"Our Children." He has more recently published another book, which has created as much interest over the whole country as any book ever issued—"Our Brother in Black; His Freedom and His Future." He is a native of Georgia, and graduated at nineteen at the college over which he now presides. He was for several years a traveling preacher in the [illegible].

Rev. J. C. Granberry, D. [illegible]

Rev. Linus Parker, of New Orleans, was born in Rome, Ky., in 1829. He was self-educated. When yet a boy he went to New Orleans to take a position as clerk in his brother's dry goods store. He was doubtless truly converted at the early age of nine years, but neglected the church, maintaining no profession of religion until 1846, when he was reclaimed and joined the church, making a public profession of religion. He was licensed to preach in 1847, and was appointed to fill the station at Algiers, opposite New Orleans. In 1847 he joined the Louisiana Conference, and was stationed at Lake Providence, which position he filled two years. He was stationed at Shreveport for two years, when he was transferred to New Orleans, and put in charge of Felicity Street Church, in which city he has continued to labor ever since in the position of pastor of several of the largest churches there. He has filled the position of presiding elder of the New Orleans district, and for several years was editor of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Robert Kennan Hargrove was born in Pickens county, Ala., September 17, 1829. He was educated in the University of Alabama, receiving the degree of A. B. and A. M. The degree of D. D. was conferred by Emery College, Ga. He was converted in September, 1840, and entered the university in September, 1857, being licensed by the Quarterly Conference in Tuscaloosa, Ala. He entered the Alabama Conference on trial in December, 1857. After graduation he was a tutor, and then associate professor of mathematics; president of Centenary Institute and of the Tennessee Female College, at Franklin. He was ordained deacon by Bishop Kavanaugh, and elder by Bishop Early. He served on the Book Committee and Board of Missions on the peace commission at Cape May.—Times-Democrat special.

Mr. F. E Cary, Columbus, O., writes: "I tried Brown's Iron Bitters with my little girl, whose blood seemed poisoned, her skin being constantly covered with pimples and sores. It cured completely, and all trace of impure blood in her system has entirely disappeared."

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE to possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few persons really know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer to spend their money where their friends trade, &c. Many purchase from dear friends, who sell pianos on the instalment plan, &c. Many people think that all pianos are made alike, and even Beethoven himself is supposed to have said that all pianos were made by the Chickering factory, as he could not tell the difference between them. While it is true that the Chickering Piano is one of the Acknowledged Standards in New York City, and has been for many years, it is also true that there are other pianos in New York City which are fully equal to the Chickering in every respect, and which can be purchased at a much lower price. The Chickering is a very fine piano, but it is not the only piano made in New York City which is entitled to the highest praise. There are pianos made in New York City which are fully equal to the Chickering in every respect. Such pianos are the HAINES BROTHERS pianos, which are now being introduced into this city by Mr. Philip Werlein, 135 Canal street. The Haines Brothers pianos are very elegant instruments

General Conference.

Resolved, That it is of the utmost importance to the success of the missionary work that some one of the College of Bishops should visit each year the various fields of said work, and that in the opinion of this Conference the College of Bishops should and they are hereby requested to assign one of their number for each year for the duty above indicated.

Referred to Committee on Episcopacy.

Resolved, That the Committee on Education be instructed to inquire into the practicability of establishing a department or chair of missions in one or more of our collegiate institutions, and, if practicable, the best methods of securing such department.

Referred to Committee on Education.

Dr. H. F. Johnson presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That when the vote is taken on the proposed increase of Bishops a vote be taken on the numbers 6, 5, 4 and 3 successively until a number shall be agreed upon.

The resolution, after a short discussion, was agreed to, and the consideration of the question of how many Bishops to elect coming up, Prof. N. T. Lupton moved that the speeches upon the question be limited to five minutes.

Dr. Boring, of Georgia, and Mr. Peterson, of Virginia, insisted upon fair play; that other speakers had been given fifteen minutes each, and longer time when their speeches had not been concluded, and they were opposed to the motion.

Mr. Adams, of Georgia, moved to lay Prof. Lupton's motion on the table, which failed.

Dr. McFerrin and Dr. McAnally insisted upon longer time than five minutes.

Dr. Anson West, of North Alabama, did not wish to give more than the morning session to the consideration of the question, and desired to limit the speakers.

Dr. Hinton, of South Georgia, was opposed to anything which might prevent a fair and full discussion of the question.

Prof. Lupton withdrew his motion to limit the speeches to five minutes before it came to a vote.

Mr. Adams, of North Georgia, moved to continue the morning session until the discussion upon the question was completed, and that a session be held at 3 P. M., for the election of Bishops.

Dr. Boring, of North Georgia, was the first to secure the floor after the question came fairly up for discussion. He favored the election of four Bishops, and said that the majority of the Georgia delegation were opposed to any more than that number.

H. J. Adams, of Georgia, interrupted him by saying that he hoped the speaker would not make such a statement until a vote of the North Georgia delegation had been taken.

Dr. Boring, continuing, said he knew the majority of the delegation were not in favor of six. He had traveled over the Atlanta district, the large district in the North Georgia Conference, and had sought to get the sentiment of the Methodists of his district, and the prevailing sentiment was in favor of three or four. The members of the Conference, in the discussion, had but few times alluded to the recommendation made in the address of the Bishops for three new ones. The opinion of such men of experience should certainly be taken into consideration in preference to the members of the committee recommending six.

The time allowed—fifteen minutes—having expired before his speech was concluded, Dr. Boring closed up by saying that if the Conference saw proper to refuse a man of his age the right which was accorded others—that of continuing their argument—he would yield.

Dr. H. V. Philpott, of Texas, thought that the Bishops were the best judges of the number of additional men they wanted in the College of Bishops, and they recommended three. As soon as one more Bishop was elected than was necessary just so soon would the efficiency of the episcopacy be weakened. Even with the smallness of the number at present, their salaries have not been paid in full. He favored the elevation of the office and powers of a presiding elder so as to relieve the Bishops.

Dr. Kelley next took the floor.

The Conference then adjourned until nine o'clock Monday morning.

MONDAY, MAY 15—ELEVENTH DAY.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, met at nine o'clock, Bishop Pierce presiding. Devotional exercises were conducted by Dr. W. S. Black, of the North Carolina Conference. The minutes of Saturday's session were read and approved.

Bishop McTyeire said that, before the regular business of the session was commenced, he desired to have read to the Conference a communication, which, although addressed to him, was intended for the Conference, from the African Zion Church, and signed by their Bishop Hood.

Assistant Secretary Vinell then read the communication as follows:

FAYETTEVILLE, N. C., May 8, 1882.

To the Bishops and Members of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.—Dear Fathers and Brethren:—Having been appointed to bear the fraternal greetings of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church to your venerable body, I exceedingly regret my inability to be present in person. I therefore take this method to fulfill in part what is expected of me by those I represent. There are special reasons why there should be a friendly feeling between your church and ours. Prominent among those is the fact that we occupy a relation toward your church that we occupy toward no other church under the sun. We occupy the same field with you without rivalry. There exists no grounds for antagonism, for God himself seems to have appointed our bounds and fixed the limits of our operations. The great body (at least nine-tenths) of our church is in the South. Circumstances, over which we have no control, have drawn a line between the two races, in all their social relations, as marked and distinct as the nose on a man's face. It is not a line of hate or dread of contact, but a line sanctioned by custom, till it has all the force of law. This social line has made the African Church a necessity.

Possibly we have more branches of that church than we need, but until we can see our way clear to unite in one, we shall have to continue to unite our white brethren, each branch using her best efforts to spread the Redeemer's kingdom.

On motion of Rev. P. A. Peterson, of Virginia, the communication was referred to the Committee on Fraternal Correspondence.

Bishop McTyeire said that he also had a communication from the Conference of the Colored Methodist Church, recently held in Washington City, and it was read as follows:

To the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, now at Nashville, Tenn., in session assembled.—Dear Bishops and Brethren: Whereas, we feel that relation to which we should feel toward you, who have set us apart, a separate and distinct organized body of Methodists, being to you only as a child to its parent, we make bold to come to you with this our petition, hoping sincerely that our cry will not be in vain, and that you so consider this our petition, not only because we are of you, but because of the great necessity that impels us to this request. For, be you assured, that did we not feel deeply the great need we ask, and did we not believe that you would grant us a kindly hearing, we should decline sending you this petition.

While we have no cause to complain of the success we have met with, considering the disadvantages under which we labor, yet we have many impediments to greater success the accomplishment of more good—which cannot be removed by us without some pecuniary aid in our educational and missionary fields.

And whereas, we feel the great need of educational advantages in our church, seeing the great majority of our membership are devoting their attention and means to the education of their children in schools of other denominations;

And whereas, Romanism in her hideous form is opening to our young people an avenue into her assemblies by this means;

And whereas, we can do but little of ourselves to save our young people from those things without institutions of learning, therefore it was resolved by the General Conference of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, now in session in Washington, D. C., to place before your Christian body this petition, asking you as dear fathers to aid us in the erection of school buildings for the purpose of furnishing our membership with a suitable place to acquire an education under our supervision.

We have done something the past year to establish a school in Jackson, Tenn., and also at Byhalia, Miss., having purchased the grounds preparatory to building thereon.

We find our people willing and ready to aid us, but owing to failures in crops the two years passed, and the late overflow of our districts along the Mississippi river, they will be unable to do much for us the present year. We therefore come to you who know the value of an educated ministry, and who know our wants as well, if not better, and we respectfully ask that your ecclesiastical body do consider some plan whereby we may receive some aid in this direction.

Whereas we find a growing tendency in all parts of the Southern States among our people to become identified with us and of us;

And whereas, we wish to enter the cities which are crying for us to come thither, but having no means for either erecting places of worship or of sustaining ministers while engaged in missionary work;

And whereas, we feel that our interests are suffering for want of mission money;

And whereas, our people are comparatively unable—to do anything, though they have given as liberally as possible of their scanty means, and we have accomplished much good with the small amount contributed;

And whereas, we feel the need of mission money to be one among our greatest needs, therefore we would respectfully request you to do anything which in your godly judgment would aid us in the spread of our work, and building up churches in places where we at present have only small but active missions, as at New Orleans, La., Atlanta, Ga., Corinth, Miss., and many other places. Respectfully submitted,

BISHOP ISAAC LANE,
A. J. STINSON,
W. T. THOMAS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1882.

Dr. A. W. Wilson, of Baltimore, moved that that portion of the communication which refers to education be referred to the Committee on Education, and that portion referring to missions be referred to the Committee on Missions.

Bishop McTyeire also presented the following in reference to the death of Dr. Summers, which was read, and referred, upon motion of Rev. B. Craven, D. D., of North Carolina, to the Committee on Fraternal Correspondence:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 10, 1882.

To the Bishops and Members of the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South, in session in Nashville, Tenn.—Whereas, The sad intelligence announcing the death of Dr. T. O. Summers has just been received; And whereas, The General Conference of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, now in session at this place, wishes, in some suitable manner, to express its sympathy with you in the loss of this great and good man, it was unanimously resolved that a committee of three be appointed to transmit to your honorable and Christian body the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the General Conference of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America do hereby express their regrets at the loss to the church of which he was a leader, to Methodism everywhere, and to Christian literature generally.

2. That we feel that in his death we have lost a father and friend, in the truest sense of the word.

3. That we present to the bereaved family which he leaves our deepest sympathy in this their sad bereavement; and for comforts can do no more than to recommend them to the great Comforter of those who mourn; and to an emulation of the example set by him for whom they mourn, and whom we believe has passed from labor to reward, and may the mantle which he has so long and honorably worn as an officer of his church and great literati fall upon worthy shoulders.

All of which we respectfully submit,

BISHOP J. A. BEEBE, Ch'n,
BISHOP ISAAC LANE,
M. E. JAMISON,
W. T. THOMAS, Sec.,
Committee.

Received and copy ordered sent to the family of the deceased, also to be spread upon the pages of the General Conference Journal.

H. P. HOLCOMBSWORTH, Rec. Sec.

Dr. O. P. Fitzgerald invited the members of the Conference, on behalf of the Young Men's Christian Association, to the free use of the library rooms at Old Olympic Theater, corner of Summer and Union streets.

DISCUSSION ON THE BISHOP QUESTION.

Dr. McAnally—I move that when the vote is taken that the votes of the Conference be called, and each member shall deposit his name and vote in a basket that shall be passed around. Motion declared out of order.

Mr. Jewell—I was prepared to submit the motion, and did not desire discussion myself; but if it must be discussed I have a few things I want to say to this General Conference. I am for four additional Bishops. I do not want any body to misunderstand how I stand on this question. It is proper that I should state what I expect the Bishops to do. I want Bishops not only to attend the sessions of the Annual Conferences and make appointments, but I want them to attend the District Conferences. I want them to attend the District Conferences because I think it important to their work. I want them that they may preside over them during the year, that they may gather up the information which they can acquire by personal contact with the preachers.

Dr. James E. Evans, of the North Georgia Conference—Now, sir, I want to say that men, to have this position and power, should be the best men of the whole church. In proposing four I do not intend to weaken our episcopacy. I count these four, making all allowance for the infirmities of the present Board of Bishops. I will call the entire number seven. We have forty-two Conferences, and seven into forty-two will go six times. Now, that is six Conferences to each Bishop; twelve weeks for these six Conferences. Now, sir, I do not think that any Bishop can do justice to the work in that time. It is too great a tax upon the brain and nerve of any Bishop. I will give you two weeks to each Conference; that takes twelve weeks, and now I assume there is an average of six districts to each Conference. I think that will cover the ground. Six times six is thirty-six Conferences, or six to each Bishop. Divide that in half, and you have eighteen weeks; add to that twelve, and you have thirty. Thus he can attend his Conferences in good time, and attend every one of these District Conferences. He has thirty weeks still, leaving twenty-two of the fifty-two for him to write, read, and recuperate at home with his family. These seven men can easily do the work. Now, I think the missionary work can be so divided among these eight Bishops without any serious drawback on the general arrangement. I am for four, and I think the work can be done by the eight.

Hon. H. W. Foote, of Mississippi—Our minds are made up on this subject, and I rise to suggest that when the Conference determines to vote that Dr. Bennett will be entitled to the floor. I now move that the vote be taken.

R. Pollard, of Virginia—I think before that is done that some of the laymen ought to be heard on this subject. (Cries of No! No! No!

Judge Foote was asked if he intended to close the discussion without giving the chairman of the committee the usual privilege of closing.

Judge Foote answered that he wanted the chairman to have the floor.

The Chair—You have decided that Dr. Bennett shall be heard, and then you move that nobody shall be heard. (Laughter.)

Judge Foote—I yielded the floor to Dr. Bennett that he might now make his speech; otherwise I insist on my motion.

A voice—I am not in favor of any motion that will cut off the chairman of the committee. I hope Dr. Bennett will be heard.

The chair—You should hear the chairman of the committee. Otherwise you act discourteously and unjustly.

Dr. Walker, of Kentucky—My understanding of parliamentary rules is, that the chairman of a committee has the right to be heard.

The chair—I insist that the question be put. The vote was taken: Ayes, 90; nays, 134.

Dr. Bennett—Personally I have no desire to speak on this question, but, as chairman of the Committee on Episcopacy, made so without my wish or expectation, I must speak for the committee. I will speak as briefly as possible. I shall first state how the committee considered this question. They did not consider it, sir, under the dissipating influence of wit and humor. There was no reference made, sir, to episcopal dinners or to roast turkey, except by one brother who has had, perhaps, the largest experience in that line. (Laughter.) They did not consider this question under the influence of glowing exhortation or impassioned appeals. They considered it calmly, dispassionately, in view of the facts presented before the representative men that composed that committee. The committee did not consider, sir, that it was essential that any brother or sister should look upon the face of a Methodist Bishop. The committee did not triangle our territory and proceed to ascertain by any mathematical process whether or not the Bishop had been within a given territory for the last fifty or one hundred years. The committee proceeded to consider this question on the following grounds:

First. They took into consideration the present condition of the general superintendency of the church. With the most profound respect for the venerable men that have filled that high position with so much honor to themselves, and with so much usefulness to the church, they reached the conclusion, deliberately, prayerfully, and I say, sir, almost unanimously, that the general superintendency needed strengthening to a very great extent. They felt that the men who occupy that high place are willing to give their utmost strength to this great work. But, sir, they feel that in order that we may give them what they need in shaping the destinies of the church that this General Conference should associate with them men able to learn in the great school of our general superintendency. They knew that the general superintendency had been reduced in strength. They did not, Mr. President, look upon the general superintendency as in itself positively and absolutely essential to the existence of the Methodist Church, for they knew that there are great Methodist bodies in the world who are accomplishing great results upon the Presbyterian system; and, sir, if you will pardon the poetic allusion, the committee felt that with three

> Imperial Cæsars dead and turned to clay,
> And stopping holes to keep the winds away,

that the Methodist Church would still flourish. We all felt that the Methodist Church had in it an inherent power which would cause it to live and flourish, even if the time should come when this great and useful element shall be eliminated. They felt that this had been the marked feature of the Methodist Church from the beginning. They believe it to be a great and admirable feature of our church, and that it is our duty to keep it pure and strong, and to make it an element of supreme power in spreading spiritual holiness over these lands.

In the second place, we have calmly considered it according to the growing demands of the church. The men that were there, sir, had to go round every part of our church [illegible] were the brain-powers from the great and widening fields of the West. There were the men who had faced the snows of the Rocky mountains, who had roamed over the plains of Oregon, and had carried the blessed gospel into the cabins of the pioneers. There were men who had come from the part of the church once represented by Andrew and others, long departed and resting in heaven. There were the men from the East, from the old and crowded sections of our work. And, strange to say, sir, if it be strange to say it, I have never in my experience in a General Conference experience of twenty-four years, witnessed such remarkable unanimity in reaching any conclusion, as there was in reaching the conclusion expressed in that paper. I was surprised. I did look for serious objections in that committee, but when it came to a vote I found they were standing upon common ground—men from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and from Texas to the banks of the Potomac. How is that, Mr. President? Should not that have some weight with this General Conference, acting solemnly and in the fear of God?

The committee felt the need of more and well-qualified leaders. We had lost, sir, a grand trio, who had borne the flag of our faith high all over this fair land. The committee felt it to be their duty to call upon the General Conference to supply the vacancies created by death, and to place our flag in the hands of others who shall bear it forward to yet greater triumphs throughout this whole land. The committee felt that these vacant places must be filled, and they think the men chosen to fill these places must be as like these grand typical men lost as possible. They felt that there were men of learning, and of clear and solid mind, and of full acquaintance with Methodist customs and doctrines, who have warm and generous hearts, men who had experimentally known the itinerancy in all its hardships from the helpers up. They felt that the church needs such men, and that the men of the church here assembled, as ministers and laymen, under the guidance of the Spirit of God, would select the proper men to fill the places of such men as Marvin, and Doggett, and Wightman, and others gone before, as great leaders of our church. They felt, sir, that the church could and would select men able to hold their own with other churches. They felt deeply that this should be so, for when entering into the discussion it came out clearly that the grandest movements were being made by other churches in the very fields to which we are committed. The committee felt, sir, that this Conference would not do less than to put before the church men for whom the church would have no occasion to blush; men who might be called upon to do any work that is to be done. They felt, sir, that the General Conference would select men of pulpit power who, when they spoke, would command the attention and awaken the deepest interest amongst all our people. The committee believed that the church would be able to find men of that sort, and to select men suitable to man the batteries of the church.

The question of the support of the Bishops was duly considered by the committee. In other days we were weaker, and the church carried the general superintendency well with eight effective men and one superannuated man. Since that time the church has greatly increased. The committee thought that at this time the support would be surer. They felt certain that the support would not be so sure if the Bishop should rush the Annual Conferences through in three or four days. They thought that under such circumstances the leaven of dissatisfaction would begin to work throughout the church.

The committee thought that if the General Conference would strengthen the general superintendency so as to enable it to oversee our educational work that it would be a great move in promoting the prosperity of our church.

The committee felt that the general superintendency is an essential and constitutional feature of Methodism; that wherever the Bishop appears, he ranks all other officers in the church. Every man who is acquainted with church history knows that Joshua Soule declined to be ordained Bishop because the General Conference then resolved to make the office of presiding elder elective. Under the influence of Soule's resignation and McKendree's address, the General Conference moved to repeal that law—first to suspend, and, after four years, to finally repeal it.

Now, sir, the report of the committee is before you. It passed the committee by a vote of twenty-two to five, and it was distinctly stated by some who voted in the negative that they did so because they considered themselves instructed to vote for a smaller number than the committee agreed to recommend. So you have before you the expression of one of your largest standing committees. You have now before you the report of the committee for rejection or adoption.

Dr. McFerrin—Dr. Bennett has submitted the majority report, and I think the minority ought to have an opportunity to explain.

The doctor spoke while great confusion was astir, and when he took his seat a point of order was raised, viz.: That he had spoken once, and had no right to speak again on the same subject until others had been heard.

Rev. T. A. S. Adams—As Dr. McFerrin and I think the same way, I will occupy the floor fifteen minutes.

Dr. McFerrin—I did not know you had the floor. (Laughter.)

T. A. S. Adams said there was no use in hurrying over the matter. Some things had not been said that he wanted the Conference to hear. This General Conference is making an advance all along the line. The Missionary Committee is proposing to give you several paid officers which will cost the church $10,000.

Dr. A. W. Wilson—That is a mistake.

Mr. Adams went into further discussion of the pecuniary feature, but was interrupted by Dr. Kelley, who asked if he spoke from a personal knowledge. Mr. Adams said he did not speak from his "inward consciousness;" he was informed by others, and would not insist on what came to him through his ears.

A gentleman moved to give the speaker time, and hoped he would not have his time consumed in points of order.

The chair—If you do not interrupt us we will do that. (Laughter.)

Mr. Adams proceeded with his financial speech. He said that the exportation of goods from our country and the operations of Jay Gould indicated that we were going to have a crash this fall. (Laughter.) He rejoiced that the church was gathering up its strength and was going forth to conquer.

A motion was made to allow Dr. McFerrin ten minutes to speak, as he represented the other side. No! no! no!

Hon. E. A. Powell, of North Alabama, rose to an inquiry—I understand this Conference has decided that the main question is now put. Now, sir, what is that main question? Is it not the report of the Committee on Episcopacy? No! no! no!

Dr. Evans—The question has been decided that when we come to a vote we shall vote for 6, 5, 4, 3, successively.

Mr. Powell—I have the floor, sir, but I can not understand the meaning of the resolution as adopted to-day.

The chair—We cannot hear the argument after the order is passed.

I am not proposing to make an argument; I simply state what I consider to be the true state of the question.

It was suggested that Dr. Johnson's motion was introduced as a substitute, but, after considerable examination by the secretary, it was found to be an original motion.

Dr. J. E. Evans, of North Georgia, said that in view of the action of the Conference on Saturday, in dispensing with the regular call of Conference for memorials, petitions, appeals, etc., he would move that the Conference take up for consideration the question left over on Saturday—the election of Bishops, or the question how many to elect. He, however, withdrew the motion to allow the reading of the minority report of the Committee on Revival.

Dr. J. B. McFerrin announced the illness of Gen. L. G. Dribbrell, lay delegate from the Tennessee Conference, and in his absence asked that J. L. Parkes, alternate, be allowed to take his place.

By unanimous consent the following memorial was presented by Dr. Hayes, of Louisville, and referred to the Committee on Bible Cause:

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, now in session in Nashville, is respectfully asked for more definite action as to an annual collection for the American Bible Society.

Bishop McTyeire interrupted the proceedings of the Conference at this moment, and said he had a telegram from China which he desired the Conference to hear read. He then read:

SHANGHAI, May 9, 1882.

Bishop McTyeire, Nashville, Tenn: Harmony—Progress—Psalm xlvii.

ALDEN.

By request, Bishop Kavanaugh read the forty-seventh Psalm.

The Conference, rising, sang the long meter doxology, "Praise God, from whom all blessings flow."

Dr. Evans, of Georgia, renewed his motion to take up the consideration of the question of the election of Bishops, which motion prevailed.

Upon a call of the ayes and noes the Conference refused to elect six new Bishops, by a vote of 88 ayes and 153 noes. Recurring upon the question of "five," it was carried by a vote of 130 ayes and 106 noes; and upon motion of half a dozen delegates, who arose at the same time, the election of the additional Bishops was made the special order for ten o'clock on Tuesday morning.

Mr. Samuel Cupples, of the St. Louis Conference, moved that when the Conference meet for the election of Bishops that it meet in the auditorium of the church.

Cries of "No," "no," "no," came, and a motion was made to table the motion, when the mover said that he did not wish to force the question and would withdraw it.

The Conference then adjourned until nine A. M. Tuesday, with the benediction of Bishop Keener.

MY SHEPHERD.

"He leadeth me!"
And so I need not seek my own wild way
Across the desert wild;
He knoweth where the soft, green pastures lie,
Where the still waters glide,
And how to reach the coolness of their rest
Beneath the calm hillside.

"He leadeth me!"
And though it be by rugged, weary ways
Where thorns spring sharp and sore,
No pathway can seem strange or desolate
Where Jesus "goes before."
His gentle shepherding my solace is,
And gladness yet in store.

"He leadeth me!"
I shall not take one needless step through all,
In wind, or heat, or cold;
And all day long he sees the peaceful end
Through trials manifold.
Up the fair hillside, like some sweet surprise,
Watieth the quiet fold.

Sunday-School Lesson.

PREPARED BY REV. CHRISTIAN KEENER.

Second Quarter—Lesson X.

SUNDAY, JUNE 4, 1882.—MARK IX. 2-13.

GOLDEN TEXT. "And, lo, a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." MATTHEW III. 17.

THE TRANSFIGURATION.

In the last lesson Christ gave his disciples a glimpse of what it would cost them to follow him, and what it would cost not to follow him, and the statement of the cost and loss was appalling. It was Christ's own description of the cross which every one who would be his disciple must bear. It was too much for flesh and blood to endure without shrinking. For their encouragement, and to keep them from despair after showing the cross they must bear, and speaking of the cross he himself, as the Author and Finisher of their faith, was in a few days to assume at Jerusalem, he promised, before their death, to show them the glory which should follow, and connected vividly in their minds this promise and that talk on the costs and difficulties of following him. After waiting long enough for his words to sink in their hearts, and take root—six days—he made good his promise by taking Peter, James and John, three competent witnesses, up into a high mountain, apart by themselves, and he was transfigured before them. This was his fulfillment of his promise to them. It was the antidote to the fears and heart-failings which filled their souls at the recital of the sufferings they must endure as his disciples, and strengthened and comforted them against the scenes they were yet to witness in Gethsemane, and in that still more awful place, where he died in agony and blood. Illustrious and favored witnesses, you have seen his power over death when he raised Jairus' daughter, and now you witness his glory. Will this prevent your hearts from being cast down over much when you see him in Gethsemane and on the cross? It ought to have, but it did not. They were slow of heart to believe that Christ ought to have suffered these things, and to enter his glory, though the only theme of conversation between the glorified Lord and those heavenly visitants was the death he should accomplish at Jerusalem. The rejection and shameful death of their Master was very terrible; but had they not had a glimpse given them of his glory? It was terrible to see him die with transgressors, nailed between two thieves; but had they not seen him transfigured between two saints? Might not this have stayed their sinking souls, and given them hope? Could they not see how suffering and glory were joined together, and understand, at least in part, how their Lord might be "for the suffering of death, crowned with glory and honor?" What fools, and how slow of heart, they found themselves to be; for when they came to themselves, years after, the full force of this vision of the power and coming of our Lord Jesus broke upon them, and they exclaimed: We were witnesses of his majesty when we were with him in the holy mount. Transfigured; that is, changed in appearance. Suddenly he assumed the appearance of the form which, when the victory is won, he shall assume forever in glory—the glorified form of redeemed humanity, the form we shall have when we see him as he is, and be like him. He appears to the three apostles as he did afterward to one of them in the Island of Patmos. "His eyes a flame of fire, his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace, his voice as the sound of many waters, his countenance as the sun shineth in his strength, his head and hairs white like wool, as white as snow."

His whole sacred person appeared full and overflowing with light, streaming from him in marvelous splendor; not with borrowed or reflected brightness, like that which lighted up the face of Moses when he came down from Sinai. It was his own proper glory for this brief moment let through the vail of his flesh. When John wrote his gospel his mind was full of this scene, and he wrote: We beheld his glory, the glory as of the only begotten of the Father. Is this to be our image? Is this to be our crown of glory? Then, can any cross be heavy to us? The disciples ought not to have taken his death so hardly; they ought not to have given up hope when he died. No; the thought and memory of this scene kept them repenting and rejoicing to the day of their death. So with the Christian in the sorrows and trials of the way; he must ever recur to the moment when his soul was first introduced to Jesus as the Lamb of God and the Son of God. Paul's success in the Christian race was owing to his determination made early after his introduction to the Lord in glory, that he would henceforth know him no more in the flesh.

This transfiguration of Christ was not for himself, as some would have us think—an illuminated passage in a sad page of his earthly life. He needed no such comfort to strengthen him in his purpose. But it was for his disciples. To them it was of great practical benefit. The memory of this, experienced, dazed and confused as they were, was the bulwark behind which they hid in times of sorest trial of their faith in after years. We have seen his glory, and are eye witnesses of his majesty, was an experience from which they could not be driven. It takes something more than Christ revealed as a dying Redeemer to steady the soul fully in the unequal contest, we must see his glory and hear the voice—this is my well-beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased; hear ye him. Then the soul's hope has its anchor cast within the vail, and can weather any storm that may rise.

The effect of this experience on Peter describes many. Let us make three tabernacles, one for Jesus, and one for each of his two glorified visitors. Peter, James and John could take a servant's place in the tents, and stay here always in this good company.

This is the expression of a very common feeling in moments of great spiritual blessing and joy. Oh! that it were possible never to lose the bliss and glory of this hour, never to cease to dwell in the presence of my glorified Lord, in company with the spirits of these just men made perfect. I once saw a man shouting happy at camp meeting who was calling on his friends to kill him, and let his death fix this joy he then experienced as the permanent state of his eternal existence. But he was like Peter, out of his head with spiritual excitement and joy. He had lost his wits. Like Peter, he wist not what to say. He said what could not be. Religion is a work, not a rapture. He must descend the mount to toils and labors, daily duties and temptations.

The voice ended the vision, they looked around to see who spoke. Moses and Elias were gone; only Jesus was with them with his familiar look and garb; the glory had departed. The Master saw their look of astonished inquiry, and he strictly charged them to keep this experience to themselves until after he had arisen from the dead. They obeyed him in this; they could not well do otherwise; they were too much confused to give an intelligent account of it. What he meant by the dead they did not comprehend. When he met them after his resurrection, and after he ascended, and they saw him assume his flesh and go up in the cloud, they began to fully realize the meaning of his words and his transfiguration, and good use they made of it to strengthen their own faith as well as the faith of their hearers.

From Franklinton, La.

MR. EDITOR: We have had our second Quarterly Conference for the Franklinton circuit, at Magee's Church, on April 29-30, and have just reorganized the circuit, the boundaries of which have, for several years, been annually changed, until the churches which have been taken in, or those thrown off from time to time, had become restive, and uncertain of where they did belong; and, because of the sickness of their pastor, the charge remained in its disorganized state; but now, as the boundaries are established, we trust we shall have a very compact circuit, and hope to be able to work regularly and systematically for at least one year.

We have a good, pleasant parsonage, and all needed outbuildings, garden and truck-patch, fine well and springs of free-stone water, a quiet, orderly people, and those who go to church seem to pay good attention to the preached word.

There is no spirituous liquor allowed to be sold in the parish, and, although we have had two quarterly meetings, we had no eucharist for want of the emblem of the blood. All else was ready, and the administrator also; this was a great privation, for it unites the churches as does nothing else. We shall see personally to it hereafter. So far as we knew no person has been converted this year, nor has there been any baptized, and none have joined the church, but still we are praying, hoping and expecting a better state of things throughout the parish.

The Bishop's fund has been paid, and the educational fund partly paid. The presiding elder and pastor have received about one-third of their salary, and we hope to raise all the claims assessed by Conference. The voters having driven intoxicating liquor out of the parish, the jail is rotting down for want of an occupant; not a pauper in the parish. Crops are promising. There are a few cases of mild fever. The most that is to be said in this country now is Christian zeal and a spirit of prayer that the Holy Ghost may be poured upon us and all God's people.

Yours, J. WOLFSON.

General Conference.

FRIDAY, MAY 12—NINTH DAY.

The ninth day's session of the General Conference was called to order by Bishop McTyeire, and the devotional exercises were conducted by Dr. E. A. Yates, of the North Carolina Conference. The minutes of Thursday's session were read and approved. Bishop Keener presided over the deliberation of the body during the session.

F. Law, of the Alabama Conference, moved that the regular order of business—the reports of standing committees—be suspended in order to take up for consideration the business left unfinished on Thursday, the report of the Committee on Episcopacy, recommending the election of six additional Bishops.

Dr. Boring, of the North Georgia Conference, opposed the motion. The report of the committee did not show how many effective Bishops the church now had, and he thought it best to lay aside the consideration of the question of the election, and the number of Bishops to be elected, until the committee had reported the number of effective Bishops, and the Conference had adopted such report.

Dr. McAnally, of the St. Louis Conference, opposed the motion, saying that there were quite a number of important reports from the standing committees which should come before the Conference before the question of election of Bishops should be taken up.

Mr. Law, seeing the opposition to his motion, withdrew it.

The report on episcopacy was read:

The committee having considered various papers referred by the Conference bearing on the general superintendents and their work, beg leave to present the following results:

1. A paper, signed J. B. McFerrin, proposing a change in the Discipline, making the presiding elder president of the District Conference. The committee is of opinion that the proposed change should not be made.

2. A paper, signed by John E. Edwards and P. A. Peterson, asking that a "definite mode be pursued by the Bishops in the examination of the character of the elders in an Annual Conference, so as to secure uniformity of admonition under question 20." In reference to this matter the committee judge that no legislation is advisable.

3. A paper, signed C. E. Dowman and E. Pasco, requesting that the Bishops revise the course of study for traveling preachers, and also that they be requested to prepare a post-graduate course of study for such of our preachers as desire further direction in their reading. The committee is of opinion that the Bishops should be so requested and so recommend to the Conference.

4. After full discussion of the question of Episcopal residences, the committee recommend that "the Bishops should be distributed by the College of Bishops in such manner, if practicable that every great section of our work may have a Bishop residing in some one of the Conferences embraced in said section."

Under the rules the report was laid over for future action.

The report on boundaries was as follows:

Your committee have duly considered the memorial as to change of boundary line between Tennessee and Holston Conferences, and recommend the following:

The boundary line between the Tennessee and Holston Conferences shall be as follows: Beginning on the Alabama State line where Marion and Franklin counties, Tennessee, join, thence northward with the western boundary line of the counties of Marion, Sequatchie, Bledsoe, Cumberland and Fentress, to the top of Cumberland mountain; thence with the top of Cumberland mountain to the Kentucky line. All east of said line shall be in Holston Conference (except Mt. Eagle in Marion county, and Bethel, in Sequatchie county, which shall be in Tennessee Conference,) and all west of said line shall be in Tennessee Conference.

The report, under the rule, was laid over.

The following was the report on revisal:

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to present the following report:

1. Having considered a paper by H. Jewell, E. N. Watson, and W. H. Browning; one by T. L. Boswell and Guilford Jones; and by W. W. Duncan and a memorial from Shelbyville District Conference, Kentucky Conference asking that the business of licensing local preachers, and of recommending them to the Annual Conference for admission on trial into the traveling connection and for orders, be transferred to the District Conference, recommend non-concurrence.

2. H. H. Parks, P. Gallagher, B. M. Messick, and H. J. Adams, ask that certain paragraphs relating to the rise of the united societies in Europe and America, printed as the introduction in editions of the Discipline published prior to the General Conference of 1866 be restored. We recommend non-concurrence.

3. J. B. McGehee and W. T. Greene ask that the election of delegates to the District and Annual Conferences be made quadrennial instead of annual. We recommend non-concurrence.

4. S. W. Turner asks that candidates for orders in the local relation, and for admission on trial into the traveling connection pass an examination before the presiding elder and the preacher in charge, instead of being examined by the Quarterly Conference. We recommend non-concurrence.

5. J. E. Edwards and J. D. Blackwell ask that the law requiring the General Rules to be read at least once a year in each congregation be repealed, and that the question relating to the General Rules, contained in the order of business in Quarterly Conferences be stricken out. We recommend non-concurrence.

6. T. C. Weir and others ask that the president elected to preside over an Annual Conference be empowered to perform all the duties of a Bishop for the time being. We recommend non-concurrence.

7. T. W. Dye, R. W. Jones, and others, ask that preachers received on trial into the traveling connection may be thereby rendered eligible to deacon's orders. We recommend non-concurrence.

8. J. S. Kennedy and T. P. Summers ask that the clerical and lay members of District and Annual Conferences may be permitted to vote together in the election of delegates to the Annual and General Conferences. We recommend non-concurrence.

9. D. C. Kelley, Thomas B. Holt, G. G. Dibbrell, and R. H. Pickering, ask that the lay members of the Joint Board of Finance may be made ex officio members of the Annual Conference. We recommend non-concurrence.

10. B. F. Alexander and P. P. Ellis ask that local preachers may not be required to pass an examination of character before, and to obtain the approbation of the Annual Conference, to secure deacon's orders. We recommend non-concurrence.

11. A resolution without signature, asks for a change in the law relating to general class-meetings, so as to require the preacher in charge to hold them monthly. We recommend non-concurrence.

12. A memorial from the North Georgia Conference asks that the word Approved, in the third line of Ans. 2 Ques. 1, Chap. 3, Sec. 5, of the Discipline, be stricken out, so as not to make it necessary that the examination of a candidate for admission into the traveling connection, on trial, shall be approved by the committee before the vote be taken on his admission. We recommend non-concurrence.

13. The committee approve the resolution of C. E. Dowman and F. Pasco, asking for certain changes in the law relating to the ordination of local deacons and elders, and recommend the adoption of the following amendments, viz:

In the answer to Ques. 2, Chap. 3, Sec. 11, Page 99 of the Discipline, strike out the clause, "on a proper examination on a course of study prescribed by the Bishops as a preparation for deacon's orders;" and after the word secretary insert the following: "After he has passed an approved examination on the course of study prescribed by the Bishops as a preparation for deacon's orders, before a committee of the Annual Conference, appointed for that purpose." So that the answer to question 2, page 99, as amended, shall read thus: "A local preacher shall be eligible to the office of a deacon, after he has preached four years from the time he received a regular license and has obtained a recommendation from the Quarterly Conference signed by the president and the secretary, after he has passed an approved examination on the course of study prescribed by the Bishops as a preparation for deacon's orders before a committee of the Annual Conference appointed for that purpose; and after his character has passed in examination before, and he has obtained the approbation of the Annual Conference; provided that if he has been a local preacher three years successively and on trial in the traveling ministry for one year next following, he shall be eligible to the office of a deacon on obtaining the approbation of the Annual Conference."

14. In the answer to Ques. 3, Chap. 3, Sec. 11, Page 100, strike out the clause, "On a proper examination on a course of study to be prescribed by the Bishops as a preparation for elder's orders; and the fact of passing an approved examination on this course shall be stated in the recommendation."

After the word Conference in the third line from the top of page 101 insert the following: "And after he has passed an approved examination on the course of study prescribed by the Bishops as a preperation for elder's orders, before a committee of the Annual Conference appointed for that purpose;" so that the answer to question 3, pages 100 and 101 as amended shall read thus: "A local deacon shall be eligible to the office of an elder after he has preached four years from the time he was ordained a deacon, and has obtained a recommendation from the Quarterly Conference, which shall be signed by the president and secretary of the Conference; and after he has passed an approved examination on the course of study prescribed by the Bishops as a preparation for elders orders, before a committee of the Annual Conference appointed for that purpose. He shall present to the Annual Conference such recommendation, with a note certifying his belief in the doctrine and discipline of our church—the whole being examined by the Annual Conference; and if approved, he may be ordained; provided that if he has been a local deacon for three years successively, and on trial in the traveling ministry one year next following, he shall be eligible to the office of an elder on obtaining the approbation of the Annual Conference."

15. In response to the resolution of T. A. S. Adams, R. W. Jones and G. G. Shand, in regard to the celebrating of marriages for divorced persons, the committee would recommend that the following be placed as a foot note, in connection with the close of the "Form of Solemnization of Matrimony," on page 248, namely:

"The New Testament allows of divorce for one cause only; and our ministers shall not celebrate marriage when either of the parties, though divorced by the civil law, is, by the law of God, still bound by the former marriage."

16. A resolution of H. C. Morrison, John A. Carter, and H. C. Seale, asks that Par. 2, Sec. 1, Chap. 8, Page 169, of the Discipline, relating to the estimating of salary and traveling expenses of preachers, be amended; and the committee recommend the following change: Add after the word steward in said paragraph 2, this clause: "After consideration with the preacher in charge," so that the paragraph as amended shall read thus: "The salary and traveling expenses of preachers on circuits and stations shall be estimated by their respective boards of stewards, after consultation with the preacher in charge."

A minority of the Committee on Revision, who have had under consideration sundry petitions praying for a change in the Discipline, Chap. II., Sec. 4, on Quarterly Conferences, relegating Questions 15, 16, 17, 18, 19 to the District Conference, beg leave to report:

That in view of the fact that many of our Quarterly Conferences are composed of but five or six persons, or in many instances even less; and the hurried manner which the business of the Quarterly Conferences is necessarily transacted prevent, in many instances the proper care in the examination of candidates, licensing of preachers, recommending to the Annual Conference for admission on trial into the traveling connection, and for ordination, we recommend that Sec. 3, relating to the District Conference, be amended so as to read as follows:

SEC. III. OF THE DISTRICT CONFERENCE.

Ans. 1. There shall be held annually in each presiding elder's district a District Conference. The time shall be fixed by the presiding elder, and the place by the Conference; but should it change the place after it has been fixed by the Conference the presiding elder shall have the power to make the change.

2. The District Conference shall be composed of all the preachers in the district, traveling and local, including superannuated preachers, (whether resident without or within the limits of the Annual Conference to which they belong,) and of —— laymen from each circuit, station, or mission in the district, to be selected by the Quarterly Conferences.

3. A Bishop, or in his absence the presiding elder, shall preside; and if both be absent, the Conference may elect a president.

4. The Conference shall elect a secretary, who shall keep a record of all its proceedings.

5. The regular business of the District Conference shall be:

(1) To inquire into the spiritual state, and the attendance upon the ordinances and social meetings of the church.

(2) As to missions within the district, where new ones should be established, or what missions should be raised to circuits or stations.

(3) As to Sunday-schools, and the manner of conducting them, and to education generally.

(4) As to their financial systems, their contributions to church purposes, and the condition of houses of worship and parsonages.

(5) As to the manner in which the records of the Quarterly Conference have been kept.

(6) To license proper persons to preach, and to renew their license annually, when, in its judgment, their gifts, grace, and usefulness will warrant the renewal.

(7) To take cognizance of all the local preachers in the district, and to inquire into the gifts, labors, and usefulness of each by name.

(8) To try, suspend, expel, or acquit any local preacher in the district, against whom charges may be brought.

(9) To recommend suitable candidates to the Annual Conference for deacon's or elder's orders in the local connection and for admission on trial or readmission into the traveling connection. provided, that no person shall be recommended to the Annual Conference for admission on trial or for ordination without first passing in the District Conference an approved examination in the course of study prescribed by the Bishops for such candidates. Votes to license to preach, or to recommend preachers for admission on trial, or readmission into the traveling connection or for deacon's or elders order's shall be taken by ballot. No recommendation from a District Conference to an Annual Conference shall be of any force after the session of the Annual Conference next following the grant of such recommendation.

(10) The District Conference shall elect annually by ballot, from the district, four delegates to the ensuing Annual Conference: provided, no member of the Annual Conference shall vote in said election.

(11) At these Conferences prominence shall be given to religious exercises—such as preaching, prayer-meetings, love-feasts, and the administration of sacraments.

Also that section 4 be made to conform to the above.

The report was laid over under the rules.

The finance report was presented:

Your committee to whom was referred the paper of W. S. Black, being the resolutions passed by the Quarterly Conference of Washington Station, North Carolina Conference, asking that the following words, "But in no case shall they allow any preacher to have a claim on the church he has served as of debt, after his pastoral connection has ceased" (chapter 9, section 5, page 178 Discipline), be stricken out, have carefully considered the same, and recommend non-concurrence.

The report was laid over under the rule.

The following were the reports on temperance:

Your committee to whom was referred a paper touching the use of tobacco, respectfully report that while we recognize the fact that much evil grows out of the intemperate use of tobacco, yet we would recommend no special legislation on the subject.

The following report was read and adopted:

Your committee to whom was referred a paper asking that this General Conference take such action as will prevent the use of fermented wines in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, have carefully considered the same, and would report non-concurrence, but would at the same time recommend to our people everywhere that they be careful to procure the purest wines for this holy sacrament.

The report on appeals:

A. J. Briggs, elder of the Alabama Conference suspended. Decision of the Alabama Conference reversed.

Upon the reading of the report on appeals, Dr. Blue, of the Alabama Conference, gave notice that he would enter a protest against the decision of the Conference.

W. W. Duncan, of the South Carolina Conference, raised the point of order that the Conference was not the place for the protest to be entered; that a protest might be lodged with the Committee on Appeals.

Dr. Blue insisted that he had a right, upon a privileged question, to bring the protest before the Conference.

Bishop Keener decided the protest out of order, and the Conference received the report of the committee.

Dr. A. W. Wilson presented a memorial from the Board of Missions, which was, on motion, referred to the Committee on Missions.

Dr. D. R. McAnally presented the following report on church extension, which was read, and now lies over under the rules:

The Committee on Church Extension to whom was referred sundry papers to wit: 1. A plan for the organization of a Church Extension Society signed by Wm. C. Doub, E. A. Yates, W. S. Black, N. H. D. Wilson, and five others. 2. A plan and resolutions with a memorial from the District Conference of Denver district, Denver Conference, signed by S. W. Busk and D. L. Rader. 3. Memorials from the Lexington and Lebanon District Conferences, South west Missouri Conference, praying for the organization of General Church Extension Society, with headquarters at Kansas City, signed by the presidents and secretaries of those Conferences. 4. A memorial from the West Texas Conference praying for a Church Extension Society, with headquarters at Nashville, certified to by the secretary of said Conference. 5. A memorial from the North Mississippi Conference, signed by T. C. Weir, and R. W. Jones, asking for the organization of a Church Extension Society. 6. A memorial asking the same from Mexico district, Missouri Conference—ask leave to report that they have had the same under careful and prayerful consideration, and after examining the whole subject in their opportunities and abilities, allow respectfully submit the following as the result of their deliberation:

The work of church extension hereafter be conducted under the following provisions and regulations:

Art. I. There shall be a board of Church Extension duly incorporated with authority and powers to do whatever is necessary to the successful prosecution of its work.

Art. II. Said board shall consist of president, vice-president, corresponding secretary, treasurer, and three managers, to be elected quadrennially by the General Conference and to continue in office until their successors are appointed.

The Bishops shall be ex officio members of the board.

The board shall fill all the vacancies that may occur during the intervals of the General Conference.

Art. III. The corresponding secretary shall conduct the correspondence of the board under its direction, and shall be subject to the authority and control of the board, by whom his salary shall be fixed and paid.

He may be a member of any Annual Conference, but shall reside where the board is located.

Art. IV. The board shall be located in the city of —— and shall meet regularly annually in the month of ——, and such other times as the president and corresponding secretary may think necessary in order to determine what amount each Annual Conference shall be required to raise by collections for the use of the board during the ensuing year, and such other business as may be legitimately brought before them.

Nine shall constitute a quorum at any annual meeting of the board and five at a called meeting.

Art. V. The revenues of the board shall be derived from annual collections in every congregation, from special collections by the corresponding secretary and the Bishops, and from donations and legacies.

Art. VI. The board shall have authority to regulate its own proceedings, to appropriate money to pay incidental expenses; to determine what property may be donated or loaned to each applicant: Provided, however, that no money shall be appropriated from the general work of the society for other purposes than the purchase of suitable lots, and the erection or completion of church buildings; and provided further, that the board shall not appropriate money not already in hand.

Art. VII. The board shall have authority to raise and administer a trust fund, which shall be held separate and apart from funds raised for general distribution, and which shall be used only as an adequate security other than on the church property; to receive and hold in trust for the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, any real or personal property, and to dispose of the same for the use and benefit of the church.

Art. VIII. All applications for aid shall set forth—

1. A description of the church for which aid is asked.

2. The estimated and probable cost when completed.

3. The amount of cash and subscriptions on hand.

4. The validity of the title to the property, and whether held in trust for the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

5. The names of the Board of Trustees.

6. The number of church members, Sunday-school children, and the population of the place.

7. Any additional facts that will enable the board to a proper decision.

Art. IX. Each Annual Conference shall organize a Conference board of church extension, which shall be auxiliary to the parent board, and which under its direction have charge of the interests and work of church extension within the Conference.

The appointment to a Conference, the general work shall be left with the Conference board among the districts, and the preachers shall take up a collection in every congregation to meet the same.

Art. X. It shall be the duty of the presiding elders to bring the subject of church extension prominently before their Districts and Quarterly Conferences, and see to it that the sufficient plans are adopted for raising the amounts apportioned to the several charges, and the Bishops shall call the attention of the Annual Conference to the same in the regular order of Conference proceedings, and direct attention to the same.

Dr. John D. Vlucil, assistant secretary, called attention to the fact that more room for the accommodation of the members and their friends, and moved that the Committee on Entertainment be requested to procure other room for the sessions of the General Conference.

Dr. Johnson, of Mississippi, stated that permission had been granted to use the auditorium, and he hoped that if the Conference desired the auditorium it could be secured.

Dr. Yates said that the Conference had nearly always held its sessions in the basements of churches, and that the one now in use was large, commodious and agreeable.

Dr. Edwards, of Virginia, said that serious damage might occur, as the church was but recently completed, and it would work great injury to such a fine church to have it disfigured so soon afterward. He stated that at the meeting last night one man was seen to spit tobacco juice on the floor, while another was trying to place his large brogan boots on the back of the pews.

Dr. McAnally, of St. Louis, stated that if he was accepting any hospitality, he would accept it in the attic, and like a gentleman conduct himself and accept with thanks what was given him.

Dr. Bennett, of Virginia, spoke as to the great convenience of the church. He thought that the basement was the best church basement that he had ever met in.

Judge Whitworth said that the Conference was welcome to whatever they wanted, either auditorium or basement.

H. J. Yates favored going into the auditorium of the church to accommodate the friends who took an interest in the proceedings.

Dr. Adams, of North Georgia, moved to table the motion of Dr. Vlucil, which prevailed.

The following was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance:

The Arkansas Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church do most respectfully memorialize the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South

nsert in the book of Discipline a chaptor on temperance, and also thorize the appointment of one or members of an Annual Conference throughout its bounds in the ral of the temperance cause, wher- it is deemed important, and such ons are so recommended by the nal Conference.

. B. M. Messick, of Louisville, and said that he did not desire lse a question with any one, but he would ask, in behalf of Dr. . Redford, permission to present rding an answer to the speeches Dr. J. B. McFerrin and Judge tworth. Dr. Redford asked that e allowed to present the answer riting and read it.

Walker, of Virginia—Does Dr. ford ask this as a privilege?

Messick—Yes.

Walker—Well, then, I hope Conference will not grant his est. We have heard him at some th in his answer to Book Con- ee and book agent, and if he had the proper defense then, he t not to ask to come back again, refore move that the request be ranted.

North Carolina Conference—Resolved, That the Committee on Revisal be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the following changes in the Discipline:

1. Chapter VI, section 4, question 2, page 147, insert after the word "is" the words under report, or, so that the question will read: What shall be done when a local preacher is under report, or accused of immorality?

2. Substitute the following for what is now answer one on same page and the next down to and including the word "Conference." The answer would then read: exclusive of the proviso with which it closes, as follows: When a local preacher is under report, or accused of immorality, the preacher in charge shall appoint a committee of three local preachers to investigate the report or accusation; and if they judge a trial necessary, they shall see that a bill of charges and specifications be drawn in proper form, and shall select a preacher or member of the church to prosecute the case before the ensuing Quarterly Conference.

North Carolina Conference—Resolved, That the Committee on Revisals be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making the following changes in the Discipline: chapter 6, section 5, question 1, answer 1, paragraph 2, substitute for the first four lines of the paragraph the following: When a member of the church is, under report, accused of immorality. The paragraph would then read as follows: When a member of the church is, under report, accused of immorality, the preacher in charge shall appoint a committee of three discreet members who shall investigate the report or accusation, and if they judge a trial necessary they shall prepare a bill of charges and specifications, and appoint a member of the church to prosecute the case.

Referred to the Committee on Revisals.

The following was adopted:

Resolved, That after to-morrow, May 12, the call by Conferences for resolutions be discontinued.

2. That after Tuesday next, May 16, no memorial, petition, or resolution, proposing a change of Discipline shall be received, except by a two-thirds vote of the General Conference.

John A. Thompson, of the North Alabama Conference, was elected assistant secretary upon the nomination of Secretary Martin.

On motion of Dr. J. E. Evans, of North Georgia, the consideration of the report of the Committee on Episcopacy was resumed—recommending the election of six additional Bishops—and the amendment of Dr. Hine, of Alabama, to make the number three instead of six.

R. H. Mahon, of Memphis, was first to get the floor. He favored the election of five additional Bishops. He had come to Nashville thinking that four or five would be needed, and although the Bishops in their address recommended but three, he believed five could be used to advantage by the church. One, he said, could be stationed on the Atlantic coast, another at Richmond or Baltimore, a third at St. Louis, a fourth in Texas; and a fifth on the Pacific coast. Two or three might serve the church in presiding over the Annual Conferences; but they had other duties besides those of appointing traveling preachers and presiding at Annual Conferences. He thought five would be necessary to the work which the Bishops ought to do.

Before Mr. Mahon had concluded his remarks, H. J. Adams, of Georgia, called the attention of the presiding Bishop to the rule limiting the time of speakers to fifteen minutes each. Mr. Mahon yielded two minutes of his time to the next speaker.

Dr. B. Craven, of North Carolina, believed that the Annual Conferences were not held as they ought to be for the want of time, and the slight visitation of the Bishops in the District Conferences is noticeable. Besides, the Bishops ought to give some time to the cause of education. An increase of three Bishops would not supply the deficiency, and he favored the election of either four or five additional Bishops.

F. Law, of Alabama, moved the previous question, but subsequently withdrew his motion.

Dr. J. B. McFerrin then moved to amend the report by naming four additional Bishops instead of six.

Dr. T. C. Wier, of Mississippi, was heartily in favor of five or six Bishops, and as his reasons urged four points: First, the episcopal office was the great tie holding the organization together, and unless it was strengthened there would be danger of disintegration. Second, a larger number of Bishops was needed for personal presence and supervision. Third, a smaller number than six could not meet the demands of the office. Fourth, the church was able to support even more than six.

J. D. Shaw, of Northwest Texas, favored the election of six, holding the danger of high-churchism was greater with a smaller number of Bishops than a larger number; the cost of the additional Bishops should not be taken into account, and the assertion that six good men could not be found in the Methodist Church was without foundation. Other points were made in Mr. Shaw's speech.

Mr. Samuel Cupples, of St. Louis, favored the election of five additional Bishops, but, before he had finished, the hour for the morning session expired. After making the usual announcements for Sunday next, the Conference adjourned until nine o'clock Saturday.

SATURDAY, MAY 13—TENTH DAY.

The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, met at nine o'clock, Bishop Pierce presiding. The religious services were conducted by Dr. N. H. D. Wilson, of North Carolina. The Minutes of Friday were read and approved.

E. A. Powell, of North Alabama, moved the suspension of the regular order of business for the further consideration of the report of the Committee on Episcopacy, designating the number of Bishops to be elected as six, and the amendments offered thereto by Dr. Blue for three and that of Dr. McFerrin for four.

The question was put, and the chair decided it to have been lost, whereupon several delegates called for a division.

Dr. Bennett, of Virginia, said that there were several important reports to come from the committees which ought to be heard before the further consideration of the reports.

Dr. Edwards, of Virginia, desired to have the regular order, and hoped the day would not be consumed in the discussion.

Mr. Powell asked permission to withdraw his motion, which the Bishop ruled could be done if it had been voted upon.

In order to bring the report properly before the body, H. J. Adams, of North Georgia, moved to reconsider the vote, which was agreed to, and upon motion of Dr. Bennett, of Virginia, the motion of Mr. Powell was laid on the table.

An effort was made to establish a bar of the house, so as to prevent others than delegates from mingling with them, and causing confusion in the voting. The effort failed.

The following report on episcopacy was read:

The committee having considered some of the papers referred by the Conference, present results:

1. A paper, signed J. B. McGehee, P. A. Peterson and W. S. Black, asking legislation as to the special location in which the Bishops shall live, so as to distribute them equally, as far as practicable, through the work. The committee is of opinion that no action beyond what was suggested in the report No. 1 presented yesterday is necessary.

2. A paper, signed H. F. Johnson and C. B. Galloway, asking for an amendment to the Discipline, section 2, chapter 3, in reference to episcopal districts, and a suitable division of our whole territory into more compact districts, etc. The committee is of opinion that no change or amendment of said section is necessary.

The above report was adopted.

When the Committee on Publishing Interests was called, Dr. Walker, of Virginia, chairman, presented a paper on the Colvin bequest, which had been presented to the Conference several days previous, and said that it had been stated by Dr. McFerrin that the paper was improperly before his committee, but should be before the Committee on Finance. He asked the secretary to refer to the matter on his records, and find out to whom the paper had been referred. The committee of which he was chairman had considered the subject, and would be ready to report on it Monday. If, however, it was desired to have it referred to the Finance Committee, let it go there, but he would say that it involves the subject of the money left by Mr. Colvin, of Iowa, and his only object was to see that the money was invested securely, and the interest upon it devoted to the objects for which it was intended.

Dr. McFerrin said that the report had first been referred to the Committee on Itinerancy, but came back with the indorsement that it should properly go before the Committee on Finance; but that committee at the time not having been appointed, it somehow or other got into the hands of the Committee on Publishing Interests.

Dr. Walker interrupted Dr. McFerrin, and asked if he intended to insinuate that his committee did not come by it honestly.

Dr. McFerrin replied that he intended no such insinuation; on the contrary, he was willing to say that he knew the committee came by it honestly.

Dr. Black, of North Carolina, moved that the paper be referred to the Committee on Publishing Interests.

The question was not taken up; but the secretary, upon investigation of his minute, stated that the report had been referred to the Committee on Finance.

Dr. Wilson moved that the action be reconsidered and referred to the Committee on Publishing Interests, which motion was carried.

P. A. Peterson asked permission to withdraw the Report No. 4 of the committee presented on Friday to correct one of the recommendations therein.

No objection was made, and the report was withdrawn.

Under the call of Conferences for memorials, petitions and appeals, the following were presented:

East Texas Conference—Resolved, That the following question be added to the Order of Business of the Quarterly Conference: "Is there a written report from the preacher in charge on the pastoral instruction of children?" Referred to Committee on Revisal.

Louisville Conference—Chapter 3, section 2, question 3, page 72 of Discipline, add the following: "And also when requested by two-thirds of such Conference to appoint a preacher to aid in revival and church work in the bounds of said Conference when desired by the pastors." So that the latter clause of the section will read: "He shall have authority, when requested by an Annual Conference, to appoint an agent, whose duty it shall be to travel throughout the bounds of said Conference for the purpose of establishing and aiding Sabbath-schools and distributing agents; to appoint an agent or agents for the benefit of our literary institutions; and also, when requested by two-thirds of such Conference, to appoint a preacher to aid in revival and other church work in the bounds of said Conference when desired by the pastors." Referred to Committee on Itinerancy.

Under the call of Conferences for resolutions, the following were presented:

Whereas, It is believed that the clause "and relations" in chapter 1, section 2, question 1, answer 3, was left out of the Discipline without securing a constitutional majority of the General and Annual Conferences; therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Revisal inquire into the expediency of restoring such clause.

Whereas, Doubts have existed as to the construction and administration of Discipline of the second clause from the top of the 30th page of the Discipline, edition of 1882—the second section of the 25th article. Now, to avoid differences in the future, be it

Resolved, That the following amendment to such clause shall be made, to-wit: "Especially dancing and attending theaters," so that it shall read as follows: "The taking such diversions as can not be used in the name of the Lord Jesus; especially dancing and attending theaters."

To chapter 3, section 2, answer 10, page 85, add these words: "And to preside in the District Conferences as far as practicable."

Resolved, That the law of the Discipline with regard to stewards' meeting (chapter 3, section 4, answer 1, item 6,) be changed by adding to last line the following words: "And he shall be ex-officio chairman of the Board of Stewards," so that the whole item shall read:

"6. To hold a meeting of the leaders and stewards of his charge once a week, if practicable, to hear reports; and he shall be ex-officio chairman of the Board of Stewards."

Referred to Committee on Revisal.

Whereas, The blank form of statistical report for statistics to be reported to the Annual Conferences, prepared by order of the last General Conference, is incomplete and unsatisfactory, so much so that most of the Annual Conferences have adopted a form of their own, thus preventing uniformity in the statistics reported; therefore

Resolved, That the inclosed form of report be presented to the Committee on Itinerancy for their consideration, to be adopted in the place of the one now in use.

Referred to Committee on Itinerancy.

Resolved, That the Committee on Revisal be requested to consider the propriety of striking out answer 1 under question 2, section 1, chapter 5, page 127 of the Discipline, it being practically obsolete.

Resolved, That the Discipline of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, be so amended as to explicitly prohibit the modern dance and all such illicit pleasures.

In ritual for baptism of infants the address to parents in chapter 13, section 2, page 225, shall be changed so as to read thus:

"In causing this child to be brought by baptism into the church of Christ, it is your duty to teach him the nature and end of this holy sacrament, and to give reverent attendance upon the ministry of the word and the public and private worship of God; and, further, ye shall provide that he shall read the holy Scriptures, and be taught to believe all the articles of the Christian faith, and to obediently keep God's holy will and commandments all the days of his life.

"Do you solemnly promise to fulfill these duties so far as ye may be able?

"Ans. We do, God being our helper."

Amend paragraph 2, question 4, section 4, chapter 2, page 57 of Discipline by striking out the words, "on nomination of the preacher in charge," at the close of said paragraph.

Referred to Committee on Revisal.

Resolved, That the Committee on Episcopacy be and they are hereby required to examine into and report to this Conference:

1. What amount of money has been assessed during the last quadrennial for the support of the Bishops?

2. What amount has been paid on assessments by the Annual Conferences respectively?

3. How much, in the aggregate amount, has been received from all sources, and placed to the credit of the fund for the support of the Bishops?

4. How have the funds received been appropriated, and what is the present condition of the Bishops' fund.

Resolved, That the pastoral address of the Bishops, issued in 1874, and inserted in the appendix of the present edition of the book of Discipline, be inserted in the next revised edition of the Discipline, with such alterations or additions as the College of Bishops may deem proper.

Referred to Committee on Episcopacy.

Whereas, We hold, as a church, the doctrine that there are only two orders in the Christian ministry, and, by consequence, the validity of presbyterial ordination; And whereas, Under our present legislation candidates for orders must fall of ordination if a Bishop be not present to administer the rite; therefore

Resolved, That the Committee on Revisal be instructed to inquire into the expediency of introducing into the Discipline a statute providing for the ordination of deacons and elders at our Annual Conferences when from any cause a Bishop may not be able to attend.

A motion to refer the above resolution to the committee was rejected, as was also a motion to table it.

Whereas, We have in our church polity a Bishops' Council de facto, and as the same can not be found in our book of Discipline, and as there is a growing dissatisfaction among some of the constituents of said council with regard to the manner of fixing the appointments of pastors, and as some of the council complain of appointments being made without their knowledge; And whereas, Some believe that they are disregarded in some respects as representatives, and that some of the Bishops are governed by the advice of one, two or three of his counselors, to the exclusion of others; And whereas, All claim equality in office, they hold that they are entitled to equal rights and privileges; And whereas, All the duties, rights and privileges of all the members of our respective bodies are in the Discipline (except the Bishops' Council,) and as this council is one of the most important in the great body of Methodism; And whereas, Nothing can be found in the Discipline to insure unity of action on the part of our Bishops, and nothing with respect to the duties and rights of those who compose a council; therefore be it

Resolved, That a committee of five presiding elders be appointed to prepare a chapter to be inserted in our Discipline, the title of which shall be: "The Bishops' Council."

Resolved, That we request said committee to define the duties of a Bishop in presiding over his council.

Resolved, That we further request the committee to define explicitly the duties, rights and privileges of those who compose said council.

Resolved, That the committee shall prepare the proposed chapter at their earliest convenience, and submit the same to this body for adoption or rejection.

The following is suggested:

BISHOPS' COUNCIL.

Question 1. Who shall compose a Bishops' Council?

Answer. The presiding elders of an Annual Conference.

Ques. 2. Who shall fix the time and call the council together?

Ans. The Bishop.

Ques. 3. In the absence of a Bishop who shall preside?

Ans. The president of an Annual Conference.

Ques. 4. What are the duties of a Bishop in the transaction of business with his council?

Ans. He shall proceed to arrange the districts, circuits and stations in the bounds of the Conference, provided no change shall be made without the consent of a majority of the council.

Ques. 5. What are the duties of a Bishop toward the members of his council?

Ans. 1. He shall treat each member with Christian courtesy on principles of equality, in consequence of their representative character.

2. He shall grant to each member the right of nomination in making the appointments of the preachers in the bounds of their respective districts.

3. He shall make known to his council all that he has heard or received by letter deleterious to the moral or official character of any member.

Ques. 6. What are the duties of a Bishop with respect to his council in fixing the appointments of the preachers?

Ans. 1. He shall make his appointments in the presence of his council.

2. He shall not request any member to retire, except in a case when something is to be said in his favor.

3. In the absence of any member, if anything should come to light calculated to reflect on his character in any sense, he should be called back immediately, that he may be heard in his own defense."

Ques. 7. What are the duties of a Bishops' Council?

Ans. 1. The members shall aid the Bishop by all honorable means in the performance of his duties.

2. They shall indorse the acts of the Bishop, and in case of dissatisfaction from any source or kind they shall use all necessary means to bring about reconciliation.

3. Every member of said council shall keep in his own bosom the acts of the Bishop and work of the council until the appointments are publicly announced.

Resolved, That this chapter, as proposed, shall be referred to the committee for their prayerful consideration.

Dr. West, of North Alabama, moved that the resolution be tabled, which motion failed by a vote of 94 ayes and 113 noes.

The resolution was then referred to the Committee on Episcopacy.

SCHOOL-BOY TROUBLES.

The witches get in my books, I know,
Or else it's fairy elves;
For when I study, they plague me so
I feel like one of themselves.

Often they whisper, "Come and play,
The sun is shining bright!"
And when I fling the book away
They flutter with delight.

They dance among the stupid words,
And twist the "rules" awry;
And fly across the page like birds,
Though I can't see them fly.

They twitch my feet, they blur my eyes,
They make me drowsy, too;
In fact, the more a fellow tries
To study, the worse they do.

They can't be heard, they can't be seen
I know not how they look—
And yet they always lurk between
The leaves of a lesson-book.

Whatever they are I can not tell,
But this is plain as day;
I never'll be able to study well,
As long as the book-elves stay.

DEAR LITTLE COUSIN: Here I am again, but let me first thank the good editor for his kindness in publishing my letter. I had looked and looked for it in the paper, until I almost gave up all hopes of ever seeing it again, but at last an ADVOCATE was handed me containing my letter. Then I watched for an answer. Dr. Patterson first noticed it, and then came that sweet letter from Miss. Emma. No dew-drop was more welcome to a withering flower than was her letter to me. I had begun to think that my long cherished "idea" was disregarded by the children of our native South, and all hopes of help in the missionary cause had almost left me; but that precious letter came just in time to encourage me. Then followed "Loula's" letter and also Mrs. Mary Parker's. Thanks to you all for those good encouraging letters, and I hope hundreds and thousands may join the "Magnolia Society," as Dr. Patterson proposed naming it. Isn't that a nice name? I did so want to help build a church in Mexico, but it is thought best at present to help build Miss Hallaran a school-house, and so I submit to the decision without a murmur.

The ladies of our church are organizing a Woman's Missionary Society, and I hope it will meet with success. I wish you all could get acquainted with our good pastor, Rev. J. A. Paterson. This is his last year, and I can't bear to think of his leaving us. Before closing my letter I will tell you how much sister and I received for our chickens last year—we could have raised more, but the hawks caught a good many. I call my hen Hork, and sister being only five years old has no better name for hers than "blue hen." I don't remember exactly how many chickens they raised, but we got in all $6.30 which we paid to our pastor as we received it, and we sold none for more than twelve and a half cents a piece. Well my letter is getting too long, so I will bring it to a close by asking all the little cousins to join our society, and let us see how much we can make by the end of the year. Remember me as your loving cousin,

ANNIE LOU SECREST.

P. S.—My hen has fifteen chickens and sister has eleven now.

Why He Did It.

At the age of seventy-two years, Mr. P. T. Barnum is as active as a young man, and carries on a peculiarly difficult business, involving an expenditure of a million dollars per annum.

Thirty-five years ago he was in danger of dying prematurely and shamefully. He was a hard drinker. Not that he became intoxicated. He merely drank, as other men then drank, a great deal of strong liquor every day.

He told an interviewer lately that he had probably used as a beverage more intoxicating liquor in his life-time than any other man now living in Bridgeport, although for the past twenty years he has been a strict teetotaler.

About the year 1847, when his show business had become large, and he had opportunity to observe a good deal of human nature, he began first to notice the curious effect of alcoholic drink upon the judgment of persons who used it. He saw business men commit ruinous mistakes when only slightly under its influence.

He noticed that one glass of liquor often made men say yes, when they could only escape failure by saying no. Alcohol in the brain can make a prudent man sanguine, and a confident man timid. No brain can be trusted when it is under its influence.

The acute Yankee saw this, and he was well aware that in the show business a single mistake might bring ruin upon the best enterprise. He began to check his propensity, and after some time stopped drinking strong liquors altogether, and took merely a little wine at dinner.

In 1853 he invited the late Dr. Chapin to lecture upon temperance at Bridgeport, when the orator made so convincing an argument for total abstinence that Mr. Barnum could not get away from it.

He tossed all night upon his pillow thinking of the subject. The next day he threw away all the wine he had in his house, and signed the pledge, which he has kept ever since.

"And now," said he, "there is not in the country a healthier youth than I."

A DISCIPLINARIAN CAT.—A new cat story is something very rare, and is always considered a prize by a sympathetic editor. A correspondent of the London Spectator tells the following: "Picture to yourself a little girl about two years of age sitting on a low stool before a drawing-room fire. Coiled up on a rug is a favorite domestic cat. The child is in a fretful mood, and has been crying for sometime. The cat endures the annoyance sometime, though evidently displeased. But even feline patience has its limits. So pussy uncoiled herself, walked up to the child, and gave her a box on the ear with her closed paw, and then lay down again before the fire. The child, taken completely aback, cried louder than ever. Again, pussy tried to endure it. Again, her patience became exhausted, and she delivered a second box upon the ear, which nearly knocked the child off her stool. It was now the little girl's turn to be enraged. She rushed at the cat, and dragged it round the room by the tail. The story rests on the authority of the child's mother, who was witness of the scene."

A boy is advertised for, and a boy is sent down to take the place, not because he has a fitness or fancy for that particular business, but because his services will bring so many dollars a month. He gets a place in the paint and oil line, or fish, or hardware, or whatever it may be and grows up in the business. If he had gone into anything else under favorable circumstances, his chances of success would have been the same. Men are for the most part led to adopt the professions by a natural tendency. A man with an evenly balanced head—that is with all the faculties harmoniously developed—can do one thing about as well as another. There are very few however. There are thousands of men struggling in fields they never should have entered and in which they can never succeed.

SEEING THE GOSPEL.—"Have you ever heard the gospel before?" asked a missionary at Ningpo of a respectable Chinaman, whom he had not seen in the mission-room before.

"No," he replied, "but I have seen it." I know a man who used to be the terror of his neighborhood. If you gave him a hard word, he would shout at you and curse you for two days and two nights, without ceasing. He was as dangerous as a wild beast, and a bad opium smoker. But when the religion of Jesus took hold of him, he became wholly changed. He is gentle, moral, not soon angry, and has left off opium."

Editorial Correspondence.

This, Friday morning, May 19, the General Conference met a half hour earlier than usual; an afternoon and night sessions will soon be adopted probably. The last two or three days some progress has been made in business. The reports of committees are being taken from the table and acted on.

A very important one, embracing a plan for the organization of a "Church Extension Society," is under discussion, and will be adopted. Its purpose is to raise and disburse money to aid in building churches in localities where they are most needed, and where the people are unable to meet the entire expense themselves. By this plan the strong will help the weak, and the entire connection will contribute to extend the work. The old and wealthy centers will thus be able, in a systematic way, and by regular annual collections, to promote the advance of our church in the West, on the border, and in our home mission fields.

The balloting for five Bishops took place on Tuesday last. They were all elected during the day in the following order: Alpheus W. Wilson, Linus Parker, A. G. Haygood, J. C. Granberry, R. K. Hargrove. Wednesday morning the General Conference and the public were surprised by a communication from Dr. Haygood declining the office. His work as president of Emory College is the ground of his action in the premises. This we gather from Dr. Haygood's communication, and from remarks made in the General Conference by Bishop Pierce. The General Conference, receiving Dr. Haygood's declination, refused, by a decided majority, to go into an election for another Bishop. The result is about right. Five were not much in excess of the needs of the church, but four will do. Of the four Dr Wilson is the youngest, having been born in 1834. It is a rather singular coincidence that the three others were all born in 1829, and we may add, by the way, that our accomplished connectional editor, Dr. O. P. Fitzgerald, was also born in 1829. The ordination of Bishops took place at McKendree yesterday, Thursday afternoon, at four o'clock, Bishop Kavanaugh preaching the sermon, and all the Bishops taking part in the impressive service. Bishop Paine, though extremely feeble, took part in the service, and pronounced the words of consecration in the laying on of hands. The succession through him from John Wesley has not many links: Wesley, Coke, Asbury, McKendree, Soule, Paine. Two different elders presented each of the Bishops elect, and joined with the Bishops in the imposition of hands, his loved comrades of the Louisiana Conference, Dr. C. W. Carter and B. F. Alexander, performing this office for the writer. One of the sad reflections of the hour was the severance of Conference relations which had so long existed.

The Daily Advocate will furnish outlines of the lives of the new Bishops. Of the editor of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, our readers know enough already. He could wish that things are as they were, but there is no retreat now. The voice of the church is to him the voice of God. Dr. Wilson is known to the church quite well, and especially as our late missionary secretary. As a preacher he has scarcely any superior, and he is also a man skilled in affairs. Dr. Granberry, professor in the Vanderbilt University, is a ripe scholar, an eloquent preacher, and a man whom everybody loves. Dr. Hargrove is one of Tennessee's best preachers, a successful presiding elder and pastor, and an accomplished Christian gentleman. In the selection of these three men for Bishops the General Conference has, we think, acted wisely. Large responsibilities now rest upon them, and labors abundant are before them. May the Master go with them, and may his hands of consecration rest upon them perpetually.

Now that the election and ordination of Bishops are over, the members of the General Conference show signs of restlessness, and applications for leave of absence are frequent. It is thought by some that an adjournment will be reached by the twenty-fourth or twenty-fifth, but at this writing it is far from assured. Yesterday the Committee on Revisals brought in a report recommending that the name of the church be changed from Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to "Episcopal Methodist Church." To secure this change there must be a two-thirds vote in favor of it in the General Conference, and it must receive a three-fourths vote in the Annual Conferences. With these conditions thrown around the question, the proposed change is exceedingly doubtful. When taken from the table it will be likely to spring a rousing debate. And this, we believe, is the most exciting question that remains before the body. In the main, the reports on disciplinary changes are for non-concurrence. Thus far at least this has been a very conservative General Conference, and the temper of the body has been admirable. The courtesies of debate have in no instance been violated, and a spirit of devotion to the church and a genuine religious feeling prevail.

The anniversary of the Woman's Missionary Society was held at McKendree last night. We learn that the house was crowded, and that there was much interest manifested. Mrs. Hayes, Mrs. Dowdell, Mrs. Wightman, Mrs. Bishop Keener, and other elect ladies from different sections of the church, are here. The wives of many of the clerical and lay delegates are in attendance, adding grace and interest to the occasion. The editorial fraternity is also well represented in the persons of Lafferty, of the Richmond Christian Advocate, Black, of the Raleigh, John, of the Texas, Richardson, of the Holston, Christian, of the Alabama, and the veteran McAnally, of the St. Louis, and others whose names we do not at the moment recall. Our Sunday-school editor is a delegate from the Holston, and Dr. Fitzgerald from the Pacific. The election of connectional officers will be attended to in a few days. We can not now indicate the result, only we believe it is generally conceded that Drs. McFerrin, Fitzgerald and Cunnyngham will be re-elected to the places they now fill.

During the past week we have had in Nashville a Louisiana winter, but the weather is now bright and almost comfortably warm. We hope that the General Conference may have sunshine henceforth.

An Agitating Question Concerning the Four Episcopal Mansions.

Now that the great and all-engaging question of who shall be our new Bishops has been so satisfactorily answered by the election of five, and declination of one, each of whom are distinguished representatives of Southern Methodism, we should imagine the church would have a resting spell; but not so, for hardly has the news of their election reached the itching ears of the curious and expectant multitudes of Methodists ere another question, more agitating, if anything, springs up, which I do not think the General Conference itself can answer. Where will the new Bishops reside? Echo answers, Where! This impertinent question is sounded in the ears of these new Bishops' quiet kin, to their consternation. Of course you will move; we are so sorry to give you up; where will you go?' Do you think you will like Texas better than California? Will you take your furniture with you, or have an auction, and refurnish the episcopal mansion which will be donated by the place which most feels the need of a live Bishop's presence?

We deprecate such an impertinent question coming from a people calling themselves Methodists; they forget that such a question is disloyal and out of order when coming from a church whose polity is to keep forever moving—a wheel within a wheel—itinerant forever.

To find the center of the circle, whose radius is ever varying, would be easy in comparison to finding the best episcopal location for these new and homeless men. And yet, singular to tell, this indeterminate point has been, they tell me, a potent factor in the late election. Episcopal location is a little touch of diocesan folly which has crept in to later Methodism, and ill becomes the genius of our itinerancy. A prophet without honor, save in his own country, is not true of a Methodist Bishop. There is no place he so honored as in the bosom of his own family, because there is no place where he is seen less than at his own home.

Neighborhoods who count on the residing presence of a Bishop to spring their dead church into new life will find out that the most effective presence of a Bishop is his extreme absence from the place where he lives. Let me warn those innocent parties who are clamoring for a Bishop in their midst that if it is the Bishop's influence and personal presence and voice they want, let them find the antipode of their country on the globe, and put a mansion there to house his widow and children. Having lived a neighbor to a resident Bishop, we have found that upon his return to the sanctuary of his own home he is, as a rule, unapproachable, being very much like an engine after a long haul, with fires gone out and drivers unlimbered in the round-house undergoing repairs.

We would suggest that this question of residence be relegated to the new Bishop's wives, and that they, each acting for herself, choose a place which is easy to get away from, with good postal arrangements, to which remittances from a distance may be made with dispatch and without discount. Let each one be fully persuaded in her own mind which community offers the most eligible place with the most conveniently furnished residence, and, until her decision is reached, let her rest in peace for the present just where she may be. Who shall be our next missionary secretary? who our church extension secretary? who the editor of the ADVOCATE are troubling us some; but nothing to compare with the momentous selection of these four mansions.

Our Mexican Letter.

MR. EDITOR: If you were to pay us a visit almost the first thing said, with reference to sight-seeing, would be: "Let us take him to see Chapultepec."

When Bishop Keener and Dr. Wilson made us that delightful visit last year we had the pleasure of showing the latter the beauties of this famous hill and castle. I must confess, however, that the doctor appeared to take a much greater interest in the numerous donkeys that met our view than in Chapultepec itself, notwithstanding all the romantic associations of the place. Indeed, so deep was the interest he manifested in these donkeys, and so sympathetic his remarks concerning them, that we rarely see one of the long-eared animals without speaking or thinking of him. But to return to my subject.

Since you can not go with us in the flesh, you may be present in the spirit, and I for one am glad to have even a ghostly pretext for taking the trip.

The first thing we take is a coach. You might say that the coach takes us, but if you were to see some of these public coaches, and the animals that draw them, you would be dubious on the subject. One night Dr. Patterson wished to reach the postoffice within a certain time, and he got into a coach, which proved such a slow one that, without a word of warning, he got out of the door, and left the driver to pursue the even tenor of his way, unconscious that the bird had flown. Now, was that not taking in the coach, and the driver too?

Well, we take a coach. The evening is very pleasant, for the clouds that hung heavy overhead a few hours ago have, after sending down a shower to lay the dust well, piled themselves in great banks along the western horizon, making a downy pathway ready for the sun, who is slowly nearing them. It behooves one to be poetic, Mr. Editor, for we do not wish your mind to run after burras when we reach romantic Chapultepec. It is too early yet for the evening paseo of the fashionables in their elegant carriages, therefore there is no need to blush on account of our turnout.

At the beginning of the paseo is a very fine bronze equestrian statue of one of the kings of Spain, erected in Mexico by one of his viceroys. During the revolution it received rough usage, having been torn from its pedestal and thrown aside as rubbish. It is fortunate that it was not destroyed, for, as a work of art, it would be an ornament to any city. Riding past it this evening, we can see the birds perched on the horse's ears, or flitting in and out from the folds of the great Spanish cloak, where they have built their nests. The horse's head points to the old paseo, built hundreds of years ago, and now but little used as a place for driving. Along its sides the old stone pillars with hideous faces carved upon them; they grin at you with a most annoying leer, as though they were conscious that they held within them the secrets of that life of long, long ago, which has such a fascination for us all. But we can not stop to see closely their flat-nosed faces now. We drive on the new paseo, begun by direction of Maximilian, and not finished yet, though it is continually going on to perfection. It is a wide road, paved with rock broken very small. On each side there is a wide banquet, with pretty stone pillars placed at intervals along the edge, and nice stone benches for resting. About the distance of two or three squares from the statue of King Carlos the paseo makes a wide sweep, forming a circle, in the center of which is a statue of Columbus. The pedestal is of marble, large and handsome, ornamented with scenes in bronze, bass-relief, from the life of Columbus. The statue itself is beautifully designed, though the face is that of a boy instead of a man of sixty years. He stands lifting a heavy veil from a globe placed at his side, and at his feet are life-size figures of four monks, with various symbols in their hands. It is a worthy tribute to the great hero. But neither here can we wait to inspect closely and admire, for the sun is drawing closer to the mountains in the west.

Now, on one side of the paseo we see the baths, nice, clean-looking edifices, where by paying a real, twelve cents, one can take a most refreshing bath, and which are always well patronized by all classes. Now, there are no houses of any kind on either side, but a wide field, bright with sun-flowers, that "nod and bend in the breezes," and in the distance, on all sides, the mountains, a wonderful circle shutting us in. Look now straight ahead! There the castle stands, gleaming white on the high, green hill. Now; I knew what would happen when the sun touched that prison of clouds over there, and have been waiting for this moment, for, see! the white castle walls glow and flush with the loveliest rose color, and, turning our eyes, we see, off to one side, the two volcanoes, bathed in the same rosy light—Iztaccihuatl—"the great white lady") was lying still and pale in her winding sheet of snow, but now the rose-bloom creeps up over her shrouds, across her pulseless breast, up into her face, till it seems such a kiss and touch must wake her from that long sleep, and she can not but rise to her majestic height and come toward us through the space that seems so short between her and us. "A daughter of the gods, divinely tall and most divinely fair," to tell us: What unearthly noise is that? An Indian with a drove of donkeys. Well, I suppose we may drive on now.

We leave the coach at the great iron gate, and are at last in the "bosque" of Chapultepec. A broad pathway leads us down toward the little lake, and as we go down you can see the steep side of the hill where, so we have been told, our American boys climbed up to conquest and glory. Here we are at the edge of the lake, and we will rest a little before beginning the ascent of the hill. Looking about us now, we can see the long, beautiful avenues of cypress trees; immense trees, hung with graceful gray moss, such as grows on our trees in Louisiana. In the little lake before us the ducks and water-hens float, or dive in and out among the islets of flags and weeds that dot here and there the silver surface of the water.

Chapultepec is the most romantic spot in Mexico. Apart from the beauty and quietness of its physical features, it is haunted by so many varied associations that the mind is drawn away from the actual present to the past, that speaks to it from hill and tree and stone. It was here, according to Mexican history, that the Aztecs had settled on first entering Mexico. It was here, long after, when the fair City of Mexico shone in the midst of a lake not far distant, that the Mexican kings had their most gorgeous palaces; and, under these same trees that look down upon us creatures of a day, once walked the fated Montezuma and his thousand wives.

Here the earth has been stained with the blood of our own countrymen, and over the castle our flag has waved in victory.

It was here the unfortunate Carlota spent her leisure days, beautifying the castle and grounds, and where, no doubt, she passed many an anxious hour fraught with bitter regret over the consequences of ambition and love of power. It is said she was far superior to her husband in intellect and force of character, and it was her imperious will that led him to accept that crown for which at last she had to pay such a terrible price. 'Poor Carlota! Of all the actors in the varied scenes that have taken place here, whose memories come forth to greet us from every nook and corner of the place, hers is that which calls forth most pity. The castle seems alive with her presence yet.

But it is time to go up to the castle, and so we leave the lake and pass along a path that winds around the foot of the hill till we reach a large spring of clear, fresh water, that helps to supply the whole City of Mexico, and which, in the days of Montezuma, performed the same office, being transferred to the city by means of aqueducts so well constructed as to call forth the admiration of those who came to be civilized.

Here are the stone steps that will carry us to the top, and up we go, pausing every now and then to take breath, for the ascent is much steeper and higher than it appeared from below. But the view we get from the terraces repays the ascent, for the whole valley lies below us in varied beauty of field and wood and village, while in the distance rise the domes and spires of the city, and around all the mountains standing out clearly-cut against the gray sky in the clear evening light.

We can go from room to room of the castle, which is not as elegant or as imposing within as without. The marble terraces are beautiful, and the marble stairways. They are constantly at work adding to or taking from the original building, whether for the improvement or detriment of the place none can say yet. We take a peep into what was Carlota's dining-room; it is now in a very dilapidated condition. The wall was once ornamented with gilded carving, in which alternated the crown of France, and the Mexican symbol, the eagle and serpent on the cactus. During the revolution against Maximilian the soldiers, in their fury, tore down the crown wherever they found it. They also destroyed many costly statues with which the Emperers had embellished the gardens of the castle. Part of the castle is used as an observatory, but the other portions, though well taken care of, are not put to any use.

But the time has come to turn homeward, and so from hall to terrace, from terrace to terrace again, and from these to the stone steps, then down the wide pathway through the cypress grove, to the great iron gate, into the cars and home.

CHARLETTE HALLARAN.

CITY OF MEXICO, April 23, 1882.

General Conference.

TUESDAY, MAY 16—TWELFTH DAY.

The Conference met at nine o'clock, and was presided over by Bishop McTyeire. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. Dr. Hayes, of Louisville.

The report on episcopacy was read by Dr. W. W. Bennett and laid over under the rule.

The Committee on Itinerancy submitted reports 6 and 7, which were adopted, and 8 was laid over under the rules for future consideration.

Dr. Blue, of Alabama, arose and said that the members of the General Conference appreciated the interest taken in the proceedings by the people of Nashville, but the delegates were unable to secure seats, they being filled with good, clever people, and he would insist on getting out of the trouble in some way.

The Committe on Boundaries submitted Report No. 4, which was adopted:

Your committee have carefully considered a memorial to change the boundary between Little Rock and Louisiana Conferences, asking the transfer of certain territory in Little Rock to Louisiana Conference, and we recommend the following change in said boundary—viz.: Leave the Mississippi river about Lakeport on the township line between township sixteen and seventeen in Chicot county, Ark., run thence due west on said line to Bœuf river, thence South to the Louisiana State Line, this to be the boundary line between said Conferences in said territory.

Dr. D. C. Kelley read Reports 5 and 6 on missions, which were laid over under the rule.

We recommend that in such Conferences as are held by the Bishops, they shall draw the drafts on the treasurer of the Board of Missions for money appropriated to such Conference, delivering the drafts falling due within the first quarter to the party or parties in whose favor they are drawn, and remit the remaining drafts to the secretary of the Board of Missions whose duty it shall be to forward them in their order to the parties in whose favor they are drawn, only after receipt of the report that the work for which the previous drafts were drawn has been performed, thereby securing to the missionary support while he is in the discharge of his work and at the same time procure to the Board of Missions knowledge of the work being done, and prevent the use of the drafts before the time at which they are wanted to be negotiated.

We beg leave to report that we have had under patient consideration the memorial of the West Texas delegation to this General Conference, asking the organization of an Annual Conference to embrace the Mexican work within the bounds of the West Texas Conference, and the border Mexican States, and to be known as the Mexican Border Mission Conference; and after full and free discussion would respectfully and unanimously make, in regard to the organization of this Conference, the same general recommendation as was contained in our report with reference to China and Central Mexico. We recommend the adoption of the resolution of L. M. Wilson and W. A. McCarty, asking that a column be added to our statistical reports for the Annual Conferences, by which the amounts contributed by the women of the church may be properly credited to the several churches with which Woman's Missionary Societies are connected.

With the petition "to adopt plan for colored missions," signed W. J. Joyce, your committee beg leave to recommend non-concurrence as with the plans proposed, not with the purposes indicated.

The following reports on revisal, Nos. 6 and 7, were read and laid over under the rule:

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report:

1. That they have duly considered a paper signed by J. D. Barbee, and one signed by Jno. W. Portis, asking that the Discipline be so amended as to specify dancing, attending theaters, etc., as coming under the head of diversions that can not be taken in the name of the Lord Jesus, and recommend the following for the adoption of the Conference:

In answer 2 to question 1, chapter 6, section 5, page 151, after the word conduct in the second line of said answer 2, insert the following clause, viz.: "engaging in promiscuous dancing, either in its private or public exhibition, or visiting the theater, the opera, or circus," so that answer 2 to question 1 aforesaid shall read: "But in case of neglect of duties of any kind, imprudent conduct, engaging in promiscuous dancing, whether in its private or public exhibitions, or visiting the theater, the opera, or the circus, undue zeal in sinful tempers, or words, or disobedience to the order and Discipline of the church: First, let private reproof be given by a preacher, or leader; and if there be an acknowledgment of the fault, and promise of amendment, the person may be borne with; otherwise the preacher must take with him two or three faithful friends, who shall labor to bring the offender to proper repentance; but if he will not hear them, and there be no sign of amendment, the offender must be dealt with as in case of immorality."

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report:

1. A memorial from the Quarterly Conference of Gainesville station, Gainesville district, North Georgia Conference, asks that the Discipline be so amended as to provide that no certificate of church membership shall be granted except in case of removal from one pastoral charge to another; and that a member taking a certificate shall be held responsible to the society receiving or granting said certificate for his conduct from date of the certificate. We recommend non-concurrence.

2. N. H. D. Wilson and R. T. Gray ask that the Bishops be empowered to appoint editors for religious papers that advocate the doctrines and polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, when requested to do so by an Annual Conference. Believing that such cases are fully provided for by existing laws, the committee recommend non-concurrence.

3. M. M. Pugh and T. M. Cobb ask for a change of the law relating to the composition of District Conferences so that recording stewards and Sunday-school superintendents shall be ex-officio members thereof, and that the number of lay delegates shall be limited to two from each pastoral charge. We recommend non-concurrence.

4. E. A. Yates and L. S. Burkhead ask that the preacher in charge shall be ex-officio chairman of the Board of Stewards. We recommend non-concurrence.

5. H. J. Adams and H. H. Parks ask that it be made the duty of the Bishops to preside in the District Conferences as far as practicable. Your committee, believing that no legislation on the subject is needed, recommend non-concurrence.

6. S. B. Watts and Irvin Miller ask that others than the preacher in charge be allowed to nominate to the Quarterly Conference Sunday-school superintendents. We recommend non-concurrence.

7. M. H. Neeley and W. H. Hughes ask that answer 4, to question 2, section 1, chapter 5, page 127 of the Discipline, which is as follows: "By often stopping short when the words are given out and asking the people, 'Now, do you know what you said last?' 'Did you speak no more than you felt?'" be stricken out. We recommend non-concurrence.

8. W. L. C. Hunnicutt, C. B. Galloway, and S. B. Watts, ask that a prescribed form for steward reports to Quarterly Conferences be printed in the Appendix to the Discipline. We recommend non-concurrence.

9. W. L. C. Hunnicutt, C. B. Galloway, Irwin Miller, and S. B. Watts ask that a prescribed form for steward reports to Quarterly Conferences be printed in the Appendix to the Discipline. We recommend non-concurrence.

10. H. P. Walker asks that ministers received from other denominations be required to pass an approved examination on the course of study prescribed for candidates for admission into full connection. We recommend non-concurrence.

11. H. C. Morrison, George R. Browder, W. S. Johnson, John A. Carter, B. M. Messick, S. W. Brents, and H. C. Settle, ask that the Committee on Revisal be requested to indicate in a report to this Conference what change, if any, should be made in the General Rules. We recommend non-concurrence.

ELECTION OF BISHOPS.

Bishop McTyeire stated that he had a paper, numerously signed, asking that the Conference change its place of sitting to the auditorium above, but as the sense of the body had already been taken on the question, it was certain that the Conference would remain where it was. There were difficulties in proceeding with the elections with so crowded an assembly. To seek to clear the bar of the Conference at this hour, said the Bishop, would be unkind and unjust to our many friends who have been invited to seats and are seated. They ought not to be disturbed.

Rev. F. Pasco, of Florida, the Rev. C. B. Galloway, of Mississippi, clerical delegates, and George Thornburgh, of White River, and J. W. Fulton, of North Texas, were appointed tellers.

Bishop McTyeire admonished the Conference of the importance of carefullness in the balloting, reminding the brethren that Bishop Marvin was elected by a single vote, and that Bishop Wightman, thirty years ago, had failed of an election by a single vote. Several other illustrations of this point were given, and then the Bishop added: It falls to me, as your chairman, to conduct the election, and, unless in your wisdom you overrule me, I propose the following plan: When the tellers are appointed and in place, we shall request the chairman of each delegation to collect the vote of that delegation. He knows his men; they are right by him. And then we shall call the Conferences in order, beginning at the first, and when each Conference is called, the secretary will declare how many votes they are entitled to. The chairman of the delegation will report how many ballots they have cast. Some may be absent, some may be sick, not voting. He will report how many ballots the delegation has cast, and he will deliver them to the teller, who will deposit them with the other ballots cast. This will be a sure way, and I think will not cause delay. Does this please the Conference? (Yes! yes! yes!)

Dr Miller, of Kentucky: That will be impracticable under the present arrangement. Our delegation is all over the house.

The chair: Your delegation can find you.

Dr. Miller: Their seats are occupied.

The chair: Have you not a place for the Kentucky delegation?

Dr. Miller: Yes, sir. But we have

Kentucky politeness also. Our seats are occupied.

The chair: I submit the plan to the Conference.

On motion to adopt the plan, Mr. Prettyman, of Baltimore, arose and offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the roll of Conference be called, and as each separate name is called, each member shall stand up and deposit his ballot in the box in the hands of the teller.

The chair: The plan offered by the chair was seconded. We regard Bro. Prettyman's plan as a substitute. Let us have a vote and settle the question.

A vote was taken, and the plan proposed by the chair adopted.

The chair: Let the report of the Committee on Episcopacy, No. 3, be read, for we must act upon that before we can go on.

This was the report recommending the election of six Bishops.

The amendment of the Conference, making the number five, was adopted.

Bishop McTyeire said that it was the custom to precede the election with a song and prayer, and announced the hymn, "Teach me, my God and King," which was sung by the Conference, standing.

Dr. Boswell, of Memphis, offered a fervent prayer.

Rev. S. W. Turner, of East Texas, arose to a question of privilege. He said that the report had gone abroad that the different Texas delegations had met in caucus yesterday for the consideration of the question of the election of Bishops. Such was not the case. The delegates from the Texas Conference had held a meeting yesterday afternoon, but at the meeting the election of Bishops was not talked of; they had met to consider the question of the establishment of a Border Mission Conference.

Upon a call of the roll, the Conferences were found entitled to 258 votes; there being 17 absent reduced the total to 241. Necessary to an election, 121 votes.

The voting was then proceeded with without nomination, and resulted as follows on the first ballot:

A. G. Haygood, North Georgia Conference, 119; E. R. Hendrix, Missouri, 3; J. B. McFerrin, Tennessee, 15; E. E. Wiley, Holston, 20; Linus Parker, Louisiana, 96; T. S. Wade, Western Virginia, 2; O. P. Fitzgerald, Pacific, 34; J. C. Granberry, Virginia, 91; A. W. Wilson, Baltimore, 122; R. K. Hargrove, Tennessee, 68; H. C. Morrison, Louisville, 8; B. M. Messick, Louisville, 27; W. M. Rush, Memphis, 31; P. A. Peterson, Virginia, 32; Young J. Allen, China, 32. The remainder of the votes were scattering.

Bishop McTyeire announced the election of Alpheus W. Wilson as one of the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, amid much applause. Dr. McAnally, of the St. Louis Conference, moved to adjourn until four P. M., which was carried, and the Conference adjourned with the benediction of Bishop Pierce.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Conference reassembled at four o'clock. Religious services were conducted by the Rev. J. M. Binkley, of North Texas.

Bishop McTyeire presented the following paper which he wished read and referred:

COLONIZATION ROOMS, Washington, D. C., May 5, 1882.

REVEREND AND DEAR SIR:—I have the honor and pleasure of addressing you, and through you the Bishops, and also the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, now in session, in behalf of the American Colonization Society, constrained by openings in Western Africa, and the movements of the colored race in America to increase its activity. Non-denominational, non-sectional, and non-political, it has planted in the person and family of our people of color, aided to settle in Africa, at once the germ of American civilization and religion in that vast continent.

Leading men and churches are giving the society their hearty co-operation. Knowing your personal good feeling, and the Christian sympathy of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for the colored population, I earnestly invite your personal and official co-operation in the great work of African colonization.

What is especially sought is such legislation by the General Conference now in session as will invest the Bishops with discretionary authority to appoint itinerant ministers of your church to agencies for the American Colonization Society, and other missions of usefulness to the colored race.

That the chief pastors of Southern Methodism may be remembered in their godly judgment and official acts, and free to supply your proportion of gifted workers in our labor of love, so nearly allied to the glory of the Redeemer and the good of the African race. Your kindness in bringing this matter to the early and favorable attention of the General Conference will be gratefully appreciated by the American Colonization Society.

By order of the Executive Committee.

Yours very truly and respectfully,
WM. COPPINGER,
Secretary and Treasurer.

On motion of Dr. Edwards, of Virginia, it was referred to the Committee on Revisal.

The election of Bishops was resumed, and the second ballot stood:

Linus Parker, Louisiana Conference, 146; A. G. Haygood, North Georgia, 144; J. C. Granberry, Virginia, and professor in Vanderbilt University, 140; R. K. Hargrove, Tennessee, 118; N. H. D. Wilson, North Carolina, 48; R. A. Young, Tennessee, 46; O. P. Fitzgerald, Pacific, 30; E. R. Hendrix, Missouri, 33; W. M. Rush, Memphis, 29; Young J. Allen, China, 29; J. S. Key, South Georgia, 21; C. C. Andrews, Mississippi, 21; W. T. Harris, Memphis, 21; B. M. Messick, Louisville, 20; P. A. Peterson, Virginia, 15; J. D. Shaw, Northwest Texas, 10. Remainder scattering. Total vote cast, 230; necessary to a choice, 120.

Bishop McTyeire announced the election of Messrs. Parker, Haygood, and Granberry, and on motion of Dr. McAnally, of the St. Louis Conference, the Conference proceeded to take the third ballot, with the following result:

R. K. Hargrove, Tennessee Conference, 173; R. A. Young, Tennessee Conference, 18; N. H. D. Wilson, North Carolina Conference, 17; E. R. Hendrix, Missouri Conference, 9—remainder, scattering. Total vote cast, 237—necessary to a choice, 119.

Bishop McTyeire announced the election of Dr. Hargrove, and stated that as that completed the election of the Bishops, the time of their consecration would be decided upon and announced to-morrow.

The Conference then adjourned with the benediction of Bishop Kavanaugh.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 17—THIRTEENTH DAY.

The Conference met at nine o'clock, Bishop McTyeire presiding. Devotional exercises were conducted by the Rev. J. B. A. Ahrens, of the German Mission, stationed in New Orleans. The Minutes of Tuesday's session were read and approved.

The following minority report on revisal, No. 5, was read and laid over under the rule for future consideration:

We a minority of the Committee on Revisal, agreeing in the main with Report No. 5 on Revisal on "ministration of baptism," recommend the following slight change of phraseology in the Ritual, and differing from that recommended in said report to-wit:

1. On page 227, Sec. 3, Chap. 13, beginning on the last line of the page, that the following words—"that they be baptized with water and the Holy Ghost"—be so amended as to read "that they, being baptized with water, may also be baptized with the Holy Ghost."

2. On page 228 of the same section and chapter, the "Rubric" be amended by adding the words, "Let us pray," which will read, as amended, "then shall the minister say, Let us pray."

The following report was read, ordered printed, and laid over under the rule:

The committee have had referred to them the following papers:

1. A paper signed by G. Thornburgh and H. B. Warren, referring to the use of the New Testament in our lesson papers. Before the introduction of this paper the editor had expressed his intention to discontinue the publication of the Revised Text. The number of the magazine now in press contains this announcement. We therefore respectfully suggest that no further action is necessary.

2. A paper signed by E. A. Yates and ——, recommending that lessons be given on the special doctrines and usages of our church. Our Bishops have been requested to appoint suitable persons to prepare a series of "standard catechisms" for our schools. In the meantime we have been glad to learn that in many schools the catechetical exercises appended to the Scripture lessons by the Editor are used with great advantage to the pupils. We earnestly call attention to this feature, which we hope will soon be introduced in all our schools. We are assured that these portions of our current lessons will receive the special care of the editor. They are intended to furnish to our schools the specific instruction which will make them intelligent and contented members of the church in which they are trained.

3. We give the substance of a paper signed by T. J. Magruder and R. W. Jones, containing suggestion on the classification of pupils. It is difficult to give any plan which is applicable to all schools. But the plan here given is worthy of close study by all superintendants, and it may be literally copied in many schools:

There are three classes of pupils in one Sunday-school. 1. The Primary Class. 2. The Intermediate Class. 3. The Biblo Class. For these three classes suitable forms of of instruction must be provided. We may, for the general purpose of classification, denominate them as follows: 1. The Primary Class may be called the Catechetical Department. 2. The Intermediate Class may be called the lesson Department. 3. The Biblo Class may be called the Biblical Department.

COURSE OF STUDY

1. Catechetical Department. This department includes two grades. (1) The Infant Class. (2) The Primary Class. For these classes graded catechetical exercises should be prepared on the current lessons.

2. The Lesson Department. This department may include the classes known as the intermediate and advanced classes. For these classes current Bible-lessons may be used as at present furnished in the intermediate and Sunday-school Quarterlies.

3. The Biblical Department may include two grades: (1) A Bible-class using the most advanced helps on the current lessons. (2) A normal class, studying sacred history and geography the doctrines, Discipline, and polity of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South with the best methods of organizing, governing, and teaching a Sunday-school. We need also a graded system of Sunday-school libraries, embracing the text-books and books of reference necessary for advanced classes and a well-selected miscellaneous catalogue for general reading.

Our periodical literature should be adjusted to these three departments of instruction; (1.) Sunday-school magazines for teachers and pupils in Bible-classes. (2.) Sunday-school quarterlies for intermediate and advanced classes. (3) A monthly paper for superintendants, teachers, and pastors.

A paper signed by A. G. Hankins called the attention of the committee to the want of cheap graded reading for the different classes of Sunday-school scholars. This matter we learn, is under consideration by the editor. He is also purposing, at an early date, to issue a catalogue of safe and suitable library books, selected from our own publications, as well as from the publications of other good houses. All these important points, we feel assured, will have the most careful attention of those who may be placed in charge of our Sunday-school interests during the four important years upon which we now enter. The very essential question as to the possibility of cheapening all our Sunday-school literature at an early day, is fully appreciated by those in charge of our publishing interests.

We would, with all possible emphasis, urge upon pastors, teachers, and parents, the great benefits which will follow from earnest and full conferences and consultations on these great and common interests. We have elsewhere proposed Conference and district conventions. The convention of secretaries held in this city one year ago was profitable. Perhaps similar assemblies may be called in the future with like advantage to our Sunday-school interests.

We beg leave to call the attention of every pastor, superintendent, and teacher to the great benefits, direct and indirect, which may flow from weekly teacher's meetings. We have met with striking instances to prove that there may be held even in connection with country schools. Any energy and perseverance which even two or three active teachers may display in using this efficient help, will receive a proportionate reward. Let us use all possible means to increase the interest of all our people on all the aggressive agencies which the great work before us demands. When General Conferences and all the public men of our church have done their utmost there remains much very much, for the men and women of our growing communion to do in the way of personal service. Let us all thank God and take courage.

Your committee feel it to be at once a duty and a privilege to bear their official testimony to the untiring fidelity of the Sunday-school editor. They heartily commend him and his growing work to the confidence, active sympathy, and prayers of the church he has served so faithfully.

The report of the Committee on Sunday-schools, No. 4, was adopted:

The Committee on Sunday-schools appointed by the General Conference of 1878, and composed of N. T. Lupton, James H. Carlisle, T. J. Magruder, Wm. McCarthy, and John B. McFerrin submitted a report to this General Conference which was referred to your committee, who, having considered it and heartily endorsing it, respectfully recommend its publication by our Sunday-school department and distribution among our people.

The report on the Calvin bequest was submitted by the Committee on Publishing Interests, and adopted.

The report No. 5 of Finance Committee was adopted:

Your committee, to whom was referred the paper signed by L. M. Wilson, H. J. Adams, and J. B. Stephenson asking that this body take into consideration the propriety of so amending the "assessment plan" of collecting the salary of preachers as to make the same mandatory upon the stewards, would respectfully report that the paper has had due consideration, and your committee are of opinion that a due enforcement of the present law by those in authority will accomplish the object desired, and therefore recommend that no further action be taken by the Conference.

The following fraternal correspondence, Report No. 3, was read and adopted:

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence present for adoption by the Conference the following resolution—viz:

Resolved, That the College of Bishops be authorized and requested to appoint a delegation, consisting of one minister and one layman, to bear the fraternal greetings of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the General Conference of the Methodist Church, to convene at Philadelphia, in May, 1884; that they select out of their own number to perform the like office at the session of the General Conference of the Methodist Church of Canada, in September next at Kingston, and that they convey by letter or representative, at discretion, to all other churches in fraternal relations with us assurances of our Christian sympathy and love.

The following memorial was presented and referred to the Committee on Missions:

To the General Conference of the M. E. Church, South:—We, the ladies of the Eufaula Woman's Missionary Society would respectfully memorialize your body to take into consideration the present status of the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and perfect such measures as will bring our Society into closer relations to the church.

It is our desire to be placed under the supervision and control of the Parent Board, and also to be placed under the supervision of our own pastors, who shall report our contributions annually among the statistics of the Annual Conferences.

We trust that your wisdom will enable you to perfect such a constitution as will reach the end so much desired thus giving greater efficiency to our operations in the missionary cause.

Done by the order of the Eufaula Woman's Missionary Society.

Presented by R. B. Crawford and S. H. Dent, of Alabama.

Resolved, That section 11, chapter 3, of the Discipline be amended by the addition of the following paragraph, to be numbered six:

"Whenever a local preacher shall have a pastoral charge, he shall hold his church relation in said charge."

Dr. McAnally moved that the Conference consider the subject of church-extension, but subsequently withdrew his motion for the consideration of the regular order of business.

The following report was presented, ordered printed, and laid over for future consideration:

Your committee to whom was referred a communication from the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of the South, to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, having considered the same, would report: That we rejoice to recognize woman as a co-laborer in the great field of Temperance Reform. The enormous evils of intemperance have fallen chiefly upon woman. Poverty and distress, disease and death, as the dire evils of intemperance, have come to her. Her home desolated, her hopes blighted, her whole life darkened, her heart crushed, she cries for help and deliverance. She ought to be heard, she must be heard, she will be heard. Who that has a mother, or a wife, or a sister or a daughter will turn a deaf ear to this cry of woman for help? Hereafter woman and her wrongs, must, and will become an important factor in the great struggle to deliver humanity from the curse of intemperance. We submit the following resolutions for adoption by the General Conference:

1. That we sympathize with the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, of the South, in the great temperance reformation, and that we will render to them such sympathy and aid as we may be able in this great work.

2. That the secretary of this General Conference is hereby instructed to furnish the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of the South with a copy of action. All of which is respectfully submitted.

The following letter was presented by Bishop McTyeire, and read to the Conference:

CHURCH OF THE STRANGERS, 4 WINTHROP PLACE, New York May 11, 1882.

REV. BISHOP MCTYEIRE—My dear friend:—If you think it proper do me the favor to convey to the General Conference the expression of my sincere sympathy with the keen sense of bereavement felt by the Conference and the whole church at the departure of Rev. Dr. Summers. For him I should have nothing but congratulations. In all history I know no Christian who in his dying had his ideal so realized as Thomas O. Summers.

And if this communication be made to the Conference, they may also know that I pray that humility, concord and wisdom may shape all the actions of the session; then the Lord keep you and bless you, that the Lord make his face to shine upon you and be gracious to you; that the Lord lift his countenance upon you, and give you peace.

Affectionately yours,
CHARLES F. DEEMS.

A Model Sunday-School Pic-Nic.

On the eighteenth instant I had the pleasure of attending the pic-nic at State Line, Miss., given by the Sunday-schools of that place. All being invited, by eleven o'clock quite a large crowd were seated in the church-house enjoying themselves, looking at the beautiful flowers and evergreens with which the whole house was decorated. Bro. Seabrook called the house to order by introducing the following programme: 1. Singing. 2. Prayer. 3. Singing. 4. An address to the Sunday-school scholars, by Bro. Phillips. 5. Singing. 6. An address, by Bro. Merchant. 7. Singing. All of which was adopted by a vote of the members of the Sunday-schools. When this was all gone through with, dinner was announced, and all marched out to the beautiful oak grove, where a bountiful table of all that was nice was spread, and all invited to partake of such as they chose. After refreshment all gathered into the church-house, sung a few songs, when all scattered away to their several homes rejoicing.

RUFUS A. IRELAND.

Rev. W. B. Lewis, writing from Crystal Springs, Miss., May 19, says: "A very pleasant affair called us to Hazlehurst last Wednesday, the seventeenth instant, the marriage of Rev. B. E. Jones and Miss Katie K. Linfield. Mr. Jones is a young minister of the Mississippi Conference, and Miss Linfield a daughter of the late Dr. Linfield. The marriage ceremony was performed by the writer, at the residence of the bride's mother, in the presence of a number of friends. The happy couple left the next morning for their future home at Caseyville, where is situated the parsonage of the Scotland circuit, of which the groom is pastor. They carry with them the hearty congratulations of a large circle of friends."

Note from Publishing Committee.

Mr. Lathrop, in retiring from the business management of the ADVOCATE, carries with him the best wishes of the Publishing Committee, and, we may safely say, of the agents and subscribers also. During his connection with the paper the accounts have been kept with accuracy, and the paper has been issued promptly and in good style. The Publishing Committee, from the time of Mr. Lathrop's retirement, April 25, assume the business control and all financial responsibility. The Publishing Committee have employed Mr. T. J. Carver as their business manager. All communications on business should be addressed to no individual name, but "To the New Orleans Christian Advocate, 112 Camp street, New Orleans."

Things one would rather have left unsaid.—Vicar who, until last Sunday, has always preached himself: "Well, and how did you like my young curate's sermon?" Mrs. Robinson, "Oh quite the best we have heard for years. We all said so!"

A high mandarin of China, in his letter of thanks to Dr. Ayer for having introduced Ayer's Pills into the Celestial Empire, called them, "Sweet Curing Seeds"—a very appropriate name! They are sweet, they cure, therefore the most profitable "seeds" a sick man can invest in.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

THE BEST COTTON GINS.

We are making the ECLIPSE EAGLE COTTON GINS, which proved such a complete success the past season, and which took the first prize at the Atlanta Exposition for ginning fully cotton which had been gathered with the locks. We also continue to manufacture our celebrated STANDARD EAGLE GINS, which have for the past twenty-six years been known as the leading Cotton Gins, receiving the indorsement of the largest and best planters. We also make a Gin having saws of ten inch diameter. Our FEEDERS and CONDENSERS are the best invented, and our Feeder was awarded the first prize at Atlanta. Edward Atkinson, Col. Barrow the President of Williamantic Cotton Company, and other Northern manufacturers of cotton goods, indorse the Eagle Gins as producing the best sample of cotton. Planters in purchasing the Eagle Cotton Gins do so with the certainty of getting the best Gin ever made. Circulars sent on application, giving prices and terms. Agricultural.

BROOM CORN CULTURE.—The ground is carefully plowed, harrowed and rolled, and between the first of May and the middle of June, planted in rows by a horse power seed planter. When the plant is about two inches high it is thoroughly weeded; when about six inches up the earth is removed from the sides of the rows with a scarifier, and the space between the rows made friable; and when the plant is about two feet high, the earth is thrown to the rows with a double mold-board plow, and it is then left for the brush to develop. In sixty days from planting the brush is fully out, and it is then broken about two feet from the lowest branches, and after one day it is cut with a stem of six or eight inches, and taken to the cumber or thresher (two revolving spiked cylinders,) driven by power, and the seed removed; thence it is carried to the dry house and placed on slats or poles, in tiers with one foot space. After being dried it is sized and packed into bundles ready for manufacturing into brooms.

Broom corn farmers prefer cutting when the brush is green, as the green brush is more salable than the red ripe brush. Experiment have shown that they are equally durable. Red or ripe brush exhausts the soil more than when harvested early. The first scrapings of seed are only fit for manure; the second is half as good as oats, and the third makes an excellent feed for horses and cattle, and is found to be superior feed for milch cows in the winter months. The haulm, when properly cured and housed, makes a good fodder. One bushel of good seed will plant ten acres of bottom land.

I never break any brush down that does not lop all the wisps one way. I think it is best to break the stalks of the crooked brush between the second or third joint from the top, as short as it can be without breaking it off. The rest I leave standing till a few days before it is fit to cut. Then I break the stalks toward the rising sun, so that the dew will dry off in the morning. When cutting the brush, take the stalk in one hand close to the brush, and cut it off with a butcher-knife that is not very sharp. A knife with a keen edge will cut the leaf off, which bothers. I take all the leaves off the stalk, holding the brush in my hand until I have a handful, laying the brush of three or four rows between the two rows in gavels, ready to put on a wagon to go to the drying shed.

Brush will not grow in length after it is broken down; yet it will become coarser, and continue to ripen if it is not broken entirely off. Every time the brush is handled, keep it straight as you can conveniently, as it is a slow job to straighten when it is tangled like hay. The stalks of each brush should be not less than four nor more than six inches long, as six inches is the convenient length when making brooms. If the stalks are much longer, they only increase the bulk of the broom corn, and often require extra labor to cut them of convenient length before they are worked up.

To thrash it with a flail, lay the brush in a row on the barn floor, two or three stalks deep, and place a plank on the stalks, with one edge even with the lower end of the brush. Stand on the plank while using the flail. The object of the plank is to protect the stalks from being crushed, as smashing spoils them for brooms.

Another way of removing the seed is with a broom corn hatchel, or comb, the teeth of which are made of iron three-eighths by one-half square, and about eight inches long; six inches of one end should be drawn to a point about two inches of the lower end should be left full size. The points should be beveled on both sides, leaving the back side the widest. The points of the teeth should be about one-half an inch apart. The teeth are fastened on the back side of the end of a plank two feet three inches high and one foot wide, with two bolts and a cross-piece (or they may be set firmly in holes at the end of a plank.) This upright plank is then spiked to another plank resting flatly on the floor. The broom corn brush is drawn through these teeth, which strips of the seeds.

Another way is to thrash the corn with a cylinder driven by horse or other power. A cylinder for such a purpose should be about two feet long, ten inches in diamotor, driven by a pulley six and a half inches in diameter. The spikes should be three inches long, and one-fourth inch in diameter, driven one inch into the wood. Make marks around the cylinder three-eighths of an inch apart, and set the spikes in seven different rows, lengthwise of the cylinder, so that a whisp may pass between two teeth. The teeth should be bearded, so that they will not fly out. The cylinder is overshot with a concave. Two men hold the handfuls, and two others prepare them for thrashing.—A. Stokes, of New York.

CELERY AND ITS CULTURE.—The later portion of the crop, should be banked only once in the field, so as to make the stems somewhat compact, and this banking is best done only about two weeks before the ground freezes up. A cellar is likely to be too dry to keep celery well, and the care required to keep it moist or to pack it in moss in a cellar would probably in about as much labor as to store it in a pit made for the purpose. The number of roots of celery that subscriber could store in his cellar would depend very much upon the size and quality of the roots and would range from four to eight roots to the square foot. I see no use in packing the roots into crates or boxes in the cellar, the boxes would speedily decay in the moist earth, and it is a trifling matter to place them in boxes when wanted for market.

In packing celery in the pit I usually trim off some of the coarsest outside leaves, and lay it on its side in bulk upon a tip cart or wagon and cart it to the pit, where it is heeled in as thickly as it will stand without crowding. In taking it out of the pit we usually pack two or three dozens into a "barrel box," such as Boston market men use, which are made eighteen by thirty-six inches inside measure, and about ten inches deep. When the celery is trimmed and washed for market these boxes hold just three dozen good roots. Celery is a bulky crop, and at usual prices, say seventy-five cents to one dollar per dozen, will not pay to transport very long distances to market. The crop last season was very short, in consequence of the drouth, and it is selling at $2 50 to $3 per dozen, and is shipped to New York market from distant points.

Subscriber can grow celery with early potatoes by planting each alternate row with celery. The celery row should receive an additional manuring in spring, of fine compost in the drill, and the manure covered with plow and raked smooth and flat before setting the plants in May. The practice of setting celery plants after the potatoes have been cleared away from the whole field in July will only be successful upon very rich land, and even then the celery plants will need a good deal of care and watering, if the weather should be dry and hot at the time of setting, and plants set so late usually do not grow large enough for early sale, but will answer for late winter sale.

An acre of celery will require about 8,000 plants, if set as the Boston gardeners set it, or about 20,000 as they do it near New York. A seed bed six feet square will produce plenty of plants. Sow the seed about April 1 and let the seed bed be covered with a piece of bag to serve as a mulch till the seed germinates. Water the plants well if dry weather occurs, and if they begin to get drawn in the bed before planting time the tops may be sheared off with advantage. Set out in a rainy day if possible, and water, if the weather is dry and hot, for a few days afterwards. Celery may be made to grow very large and good by liquid manuring, even on rather poor land.—W. D. Philbrick, in Country Gentleman.

DAIRY STATISTICS.—A recently issued circular by Messrs. Burrell & Whitman of Little Falls, N. Y., furnishes some important statistics which may be interesting to those who have not examined the subject. From this circular we learn that before the factory system was introduced the average price of good cheese through the entire season was four and a half to five and a half cents per pound, and these low prices caused two thirds to be exported. Now, with a product of 400,000,000 pounds annually, and with much higher prices, only one-third is exported, the remaining two-thirds being consumed at home. A similar change has taken place with butter. Cheap oleomargarine, which was better than bad and rancid butter, drove this bad butter out of the market, and a better quality generally was the result, and a large amount is now made in the creameries. Its price has become three times as high as formerly, and three times as much is now consumed in this country. When the total production of butter in the United States was only 100,000,000 pounds, the average price was ten to twelve cents per pound. Now, with a total production of 1,200,000,000 pounds—an increase to twelve times as much—the best has sold for forty to forty-five cents per pound, and all has been consumed at home. None has been exported, for the simple and obvious reason that the price of European butter is lower than that of American. This large home consumption of cheese and butter shows that our people like good things, and will have them, even at some cost.

Milk used in the manufacture of full cream cheese alone (that is, with none skimmed) has been worth one cent per pound, or two cents a quart, on an average for the season, and when manufactured into both cheese and butter it has netted more. Skim-milk cheese, hard, dry and indigestible, has been an injury to the trade. If good, and palatable and wholesome cheese alone, of the best quality, were made and supplied to customers, we should produce in this country 1,000,000,000 instead of only 400,0

A HOME [illegible] R.—The Boston Journal of Chemistry recommends as a cheap and reliable substitute for commercial fertilizers, such as superphosphates, etc., the following combination, namely: Take one barrel of pure, raw, finely ground bones, and one barrel of the best wood-ashes; mix them on a floor, and add gradually three pailfuls of water, mixing thoroughly with the hoe. Use in small quantities in about the same manner as the superphosphate. If the ashes can not be procured, dissolve twelve pounds of pot-ash in ten gallons of hot water, and with this solution saturate the bone-flour thoroughly; a barrel of dry peat or good loam, without stones, may be added. The mixture should not be sticky, neither too moist nor too dry. In applying it avoid direct contact with the seed; for instance, when applied in the hill, scatter a little earth over it before dropping the seed. A very early visible effect should not be anticipated, but the good results will manifest themselves as the season advances.

COLIC IN HORSES.—Colic in horses is often brought on by feeding hay passed through the cornstalk cutters mixed with meal, middlings or bran, and then wet up. The horse eats this food, thus prepared, so rapidly that it is not properly masticated, and consequently becomes so clod in the stomach as to cause indigestion followed by colic; more especially if directly after eating he is allowed to drink heartily of water; and the colder this is, so much the more is it liable to bring on colic. The best way, when a horse is brought into the stable, is to let him stand a short time, particularly if sweating, then give him three or four quarts of water not over cold; then some uncut hay; after this a feed of grain or meal; and half an hour or so after that is eaten, all the water he pleases to drink. Some horses will eat cut hay with impunity, others can not, or at least not till after they have first eaten some uncut. Live Stock Journal.

IRON SCALES.—The scales which drop off from iron when being worked at forges, iron trimmings, filings, or other ferruginous material, if worked into the soil about fruit trees, or the more minute particles spread thinly on the lawn, mixed with the earth of flower beds or in pots, are extremely valuable. They are especially valuable to the peach tree, and in fact supply necessary ingredients to the soil. For colored flowers they heighten the bloom; they are also found to be beneficial to the pear trees when worked in around their roots.

FATTENING SWINE.—The Waverly Republican says: "In fattening swine they often reach a point where corn fails to satisfy, but little corn is consumed and the hogs do not increase in weight. The trouble is that the corn is too hard for fattening. Then try soaking it for twenty-four hours before feeding. This is cheaper than grinding and cooking, and it is claimed to be better for fattening swine. In soaking corn it develops a sweetness similar to that found in green corn and called glucose. Corn in this state is much relished, and is very fattening. In a dry state this sweetness remains undeveloped."

COLTS.—Colts should be broken to harness at three years old, and used in light work for two years, when they will become matured and fit for full work. If they are used for hard service before their joints become settled, or surrounded by a full-grown texture of muscle and sinews to support them, they are liable to become strained, causing spavins, or bony enlargements, that will destroy their future usefulness.

Household.

THE HOME MUSEUM.—Many years ago I was asked to give a lecture in a country town; the house at which I was invited to stay, was that of a very intelligent and well-to-do farmer. I found that he had one room in his large house fitted up as a museum, and very interesting it was. There were stuffed birds from Africa and Australia, brought home by relatives who went to sea. There were minerals from California and elsewhere, and insects and other objects from afar off; but nothing from near home. At that time I also had collections, and among the most interesting things in it were some minerals from within a few miles of that very house! This gathering of things from far away and overlooking of those close at hand, I have often thought of since. Far more interesting than the birds from Africa, would have been the birds of that farm; and no minerals from California, even if they contained gold, were half so beautiful as the varied forms that might have been collected near home. That visit to this farmer's collection gave me the idea of home or farm museums. I think I said something of the matter several years ago, but have not mentioned it of late. Every farm has some room or loft in some building, where the youngsters—for it is a work for both boys and girls—can make a farm museum. "What shall we put in it," you will ask. In the first place, as the foundation of the farm, I would include specimens of every kind of rock found upon it. In some localities, there will be no rocks, but never mind that; take as the next thing, whatever grows naturally upon the soil. Specimens of the various wild plants and the wood of all the different kinds of trees. You may leave the birds until you get older; but the insects, injurious or otherwise, found upon the farm will make a most interesting collection. Suppose you, if living upon a wheat farm, could see at once, samples of all the different kinds of wheat that had been grown on it for the past twenty years, with the yield per acre given for each, would that not be more interesting than all the birds in all Africa? Begin now, and make a museum of all wild and cultivated products of the farm, and you will be surprised to see how it will grow, both in size and interest.—"The Doctor," in American Agriculturist.

STAINED FLOORS.—Soft wood floors treated in the following manner have given general satisfaction: Mix about equal parts of raw and burnt umber with turpentine and Japan, adding a little boiled linseed oil to prevent it drying too rapidly; have the floor perfectly clean and free of grease spots, as they prevent the stain from drying, apply the preparation with a well-worn paint brush, rubbing it across the grain. In a few minutes, say ten, take a woolen rag and rub off all the surplus color, rubbing this time with the grain. When dry, apply a coat of boiled oil. This may be repeated twice a year—spring and fall, which is often enough under ordinary circumstances. The stain may be varied by using more or less of either color. If a dark rich color is desired, add burnt sienna. With these three colors almost any shade from oak to black walnut or mahogany may be produced.—New York Tribune.

RENOVATION OF OLD CARPETS.—To brighten and cleanse old carpets that look dingy from hard service, sponge the surface, or if much soiled scrub it with a mixture of ammonia, borax, ox gall and water. To every quart of warm water, put a tablespoonful of each of the ingredients. The carpet should be gone over for grease spots first. These should be washed with the preparation, with only one-half of the quantity of water to it, sponging well and wiping the spots as dry as possible. A portion should be done at a time, and only so much wet as can be immediately washed clean and dried with a woolen cloth before more is wetted. The windows should be left open until all moisture is evaporated. If the carpet is not too faded and worn, this process will be found to brighten it wonderfully.

MITTENS KNIT LENGTHWISE.—Cast on fifty-six stitches. Make a stitch every time up. Slip the first stitch at each end of the needle (use two needles,) widen until your have thirteen purls, then knit five plain purls, narrow thirteen purls, widen thirteen purls; plain five purls, narrow thirteen purls, then bind off and sew together. Commence the thumb with one stitch, when until you have eleven stitches at each end of the needle, then knit on ten stitches, widen four purls at each end of the needle, knit plain two purls; narrow four purls, widen four purls, narrow at bottom, plain two purls, narrow four purls, bind off ten stitches, then narrow each end of the needle until only one remains. Sew together and fit to the mitten in the right place for the thumb.

ANTS IN THE CLOSET.—The best ant-trap is an ordinary dinner-plate, the interior of which, all below the rim, is smeared with lard. Lay cards or a few sticks from the shelf to the edge of the plate, to afford a bridge upon which the insects can pass up to the inside of the plate, and reach the lard, of which they are very fond. Of course this trap will only succeed where the temperature will keep the lard soft and adhesive. From time to time scald out the plates, apply fresh lard, and set them anew. To sprinkle the shelves well with slacked lime will drive away insects. And the free use of borax is good, especially against the encroachments of cockroaches.

VALUE OF AMMONIA.—Ammonia will remove finger-marks from paint, where there would otherwise have to be a good deal of scrubbing with soap, which takes the paint off too. Ammonia is useful to wash all the brushes that are used in a household. Nothing will cleanse greasy sinks, pans or scrubbing-brushes so well. A teaspoonful in a basin of water will make hair-brushes beautifully white. Take care not to let the back of brushes dip below the surface—rinse them with clear, warm water, and put them in a sunny window to dry. A small bottle of ammonia is also useful for the wardrobe. Wet a little sponge with it, and you can take out most any spot.

TO RESTORE A GILT FRAME.—Wet the places of the frame that have become bare with some size, or a bit of isinglass dissolved in a little spirits of alcohol, and let it get very nearly dry; then apply gold leaf and press gently but firmly with a ball of cotton. To keep a gilt frame bright, wash it over with copal varnish using a fine brush for the purpose. Fly specks can be washed off and leave no discoloration.

Educational.

SPECIALTIES.—The teacher who makes a specialty of each branch he teaches, can enchain the attention of the most careless in his class. But to attain this excellence one must work. And such work gives scholarship and culture, both of which are desirable in a true teacher. Too many teachers have almost no general information. A teacher who does not keep pace with the events of the day, who does not read newspapers, is not fit to take charge of a school.

If any event of importance takes place in the country or in the world, the class should know it. It is the duty of every teacher to be familiar with the current events of the day. The newspaper should reach every teacher in the land. The pupils will thus get a thirst which will last them through life, for that knowledge which is so essential to good citizenship. There is no necessity that teachers should lack culture. No other profession is so full of stimulants. While the teacher is teaching a certain branch he should study it, and thus the pupils will get the benefit of his thoughts and labor.—Pennsylvania School Journal.

—According to a recent report of the French minister of public instruction to the president of the Republic, the total amount spent in France since June 1, 1878, for new school buildings and the improvement of old ones is 207,830,969 francs. Of this amount the state contributed 74,457,806 francs; the departments 6,961,736 francs, the communes 126,411,427 francs; total, 207,730,969 francs, or say $41,566,191. The obligatory education law will require the erection of new schools in almost every department of France. An additional sum of $25,000,000 will hardly suffice to accommodate all children of school age.

—At the great English universities of Oxford and Cambridge there has been a surprising increase in the number of matriculations since the year 1871. In this last decade half a dozen flourishing colleges have been created and developed in different parts of Great Britan, but their success has been far from prejudicial to the two great universities. Cambridge has this year the largest matriculation she has ever known, the freshmen numbering 835.

—The Princeton College Library contains 55,000 volumes and 12,000 pamphlets. The Hall libraries number upward of 16,000 volumes, making a total of 83,000. The arrival of the new telescope at Princeton College is looked forward to about May 1. The gas engine to supply motive power to the dome and the electric lights has arrived and will be put in the east room of Halsted Observatory.

—During the twelve years since the University of Minnesota was founded the average attendance in the Department of Agriculture is said not to have exceeded one student a year, although a majority of the several hundred young men and women pursuing other courses in the institution have been the sons and daughters of farmers.

—It is formally reported that there are 2,652 less than half as many seats in the public schools of the District of Columbia as there are children of school-age. The reduction in appropriations has placed the school-board in the position of not for months having a cent with which to replace a broken window pane.

—At a teachers' meeting recently held in Hartford it was suggested as a good plan for self-cultivation that teachers should devote an entire year to one study at a time, taking up sculpture one year and the next engraving or chemistry or history.

—Thirty Indian students who have spent the past three years in the Hampton Normal School left recently for Dakota, to become instructors among their respective nations and tribes. Superintendent Armstrong expects to bring back an equal number of students.

—The minister of public instruction for Wurtemberg (Germany) has decreed that corporal punishment in schools may be rendered more severe than heretofore, and that pupils may be kept in school from one to twelve hours after the close of the regular session.

—About fifty women graduates of various colleges recently met at Boston to discuss the higher education of women. It was decided that physical culture is the great necessity for American women and the establishment of a department of physical education in the schools was urged.

—Newnham, the woman's college at Cambridge, England, has now eighty students in residence, and many others who live outside the college limits. Of these students thirty-two are working for the tripos examinations.

—There are now eight fellows studying at Princeton. One has gone to Leipsic. The college is also instructing fifty-four post-graduates and eighteen special students. Altogether, Princeton has 538 students. This year there are thirteen post-graduate courses, against seven last year.

—The entire teaching staff of the College of the City of New York consists of a president, salary $7,500; twelve professors, at $4,500 each, and another, at $3,000; nine tutors, at $2,375 each; five others, at $1,500 each; two others, at $1,200 each; one at $2,000, and one at $800. Thirty-two professors and tutors, at an aggregate annual salary of $99,575.

—M. Edonard Lockroy, in a recent lecture, said that what was aimed at in English schools was to prepare boys for the struggle of life and to teach them self-reliance. By means of the museums, wherein an artisan could study and compare models from all all parts of the world, England, he declared, threatened to eclipse French workmanship.

—The University of Pennsylvania promises to establish fifty free scholarships for pupils of the Philadelphia public schools, at an annual value of, at least, $7,500, in consideration of the city's selling to them a small plot of ground adjoining their institution.

—The school population of Ontario is four hundred and eighty-nine thousand, nine hundred and twenty-four, and the total expense of instruction is two million eight hundred and twenty-two thousand and fifty-two dollars.

—The standard of the Louisville Female High School has been raised, and the result has been that one hundred and ten of the young women failed to pass the examinations and twelve failed for graduation.

—The University of Vermont has graduated a class of twenty students, six of whom were young women.

—It is estimated that there are in Philadelphia between twenty-seven and twenty-eight thousand children who are not attending any school.

Obituaries.

HARELSON—PLEASANT SAMUEL HARELSON was born, June 22, 1843, at the old homestead, in the parish of East Baton Rouge, La., and died February 11, 1882.

Bro. Harelson died well. He was at peace with God and the world. It cost him a struggle to go away from wife and children, and his only desire to live seemed to spring from this alone. His long sickness and continued suffering had rendered death, personally, rather desirable than otherwise. He did not plead for longer life on his own account. In a close, searching conversation with him some weeks before his death, and before he was confined to his bed or room, he said finally to the writer: "Pray for me. Pray to the Father that, if it can be possible, to prolong my life for the sake of my wife and house full of little ones." He said then: "I am ready; I have no fears of death." The struggle, however, in submitting his will to the Father's will, in reference to leaving his family, ceased only on the near approach of death. He then gained the victory. Calling wife and children around him, with a pleasant smile he announced his speedy departure, and that, without fear or regret, he committed them into God's hands. From thence, until the close, his pale, wasted face seemed almost illuminated. Even death could not rob it of the quiet, sweet expression of perfect repose. So he smiled, and seemed only to sleep, until the moment of descent into the grave.

The religious life of Bro. Harelson was one of those that developed most rapidly as the journey lessened to the point of death. He had never been loud in his profession of Christianity. A consistent, steady member of the church for years, naturally reticent in his disposition, he had said but little. He was a good hearer, and the pastor always found in him a friend and brother. The presence of disease, and manifest drawing near of death, gave the pastor full liberty of approach, of close and earnest conversation. To this he was never averse. His trust in Christ, as a present and personal Saviour, came out strong and active. He was saved through faith in the blood of the Lamb. He had no other hope, no other stay. The gospel was to him the power of God and the wisdom of God. In all the relations of life, as husband, father, neighbor and friend, Bro. Harelson was a true man—one loved by all who knew him, and loved and trusted most by those who knew him best.

From the "old home," in which he began to live, we bore his body, worn and wasted by lingering sickness to a skeleton, to the family graveyard near by. On a sweet Sabbath afternoon, as slanting shadows told of the dying day, we laid him away to sleep, with father, mother, baby girl, and other loved ones close beside him—to sleep until the morning of the resurrection. He rests in peace. JOEL T. HAYES.

BIRDSONG—MRS. JANE E. BIRDSONG, wife of J. J. Birdsong, died March 11, 1882, in Hinds county, Miss. She was the daughter of Samuel and Harriet Brown, and was born in Fairfield district, S. C., September 21, 1824. She was educated in Columbia in that State. The family having moved to Mississippi, in 1838 she was married to Bro. Birdsong, who survives her after a wedded life of more than forty-three years.

Her history all along was that of a good woman: as a wife and mother prudent and loving, and in her home careful and hospitable. Her husband honored her, and her children rise up and call her blessed. Her neighbors loved her; for at the bedside of affliction she was prompt to minister, and in all trouble a faithful friend and counselor. A marked feature of her character was her charity, both in thought and speech, and, being attractive in person and agreeable in manners, she was esteemed by all.

In the year 1855, under the ministry of Rev. J. A. Godfrey, she became a member of the church, and began a devoted and useful Christian life. Her pastors since that time can bear testimony how helpful she was to them by her presence in the house of God, by her life of piety, by her earnest prayers, and by her devotion to the cause of Christ. Her religious experience was bright and clear. It was her lot to suffer much during the last few months, though previously God had blessed her with good health. While her naturally strong constitution was giving away gradually to the ravages of disease, it was beautiful to see her triumph over suffering and over the fear of death. She was submissive, but not in dull despondency, hope and patience being blended in her experience. The walls of clay were growing thin and more transparent day by day, while the soul, beginning with faith and love, was letting itself be seen more distinctly. She rejoiced in the prospect of that heaven toward which she was going, and in the deepest distress of body was still enabled to praise God. There were many strong ties to keep her here, but she was ready to go. She leaves five children—two sons and three daughters—all grown up and settled in life. It was permitted them to be with their mother in her illness, and at the last hour to minister to her, and receive her counsels and blessing. Now, that she is gone, she will be sadly missed at home, in the community and in the church; but the memory of her virtues still remains, and, as we think how she lived and in whom she trusted, we have the sacred hope that she is among the blessed dead, who rest from their labors and are forevermore with the Lord. E. H. MOUNGER.

CLARK—C. B. CLARK departed this life on the twenty-ninth of March, 1882, in the seventieth year of his age. Bro. Clark was born in Claiborne county, Miss. Before the war he was a large and successful planter; but the war came on, and he like others sustained great loss, but no change in his Christian character. The writer had been his pastor five years during his ministry, and always found him a good and faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. Bro. Clark leaves a wife and two daughters. He had been married three times, and his second and last wives were members of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and it would be difficult for a member of the church to live with such Christians without being one himself. He was kind to the poor, liberal in supporting all the benevolent institutions of the church; but when it came to paying his preacher, he did not look upon that as an act of charity, but one of the first debts that a Christian should pay. No one will be missed more on the Brandywine circuit than Bro. Clark, not only as a faithful steward, but a paying member, of the church, whose place will not be filled soon. His remains were interred in the cemetery on John McCoiet's plantation in Claiborne county, Miss., there to rest until the morning of the resurrection of those who sleep in Christ Jesus. His affliction was what his physician called dry gangrene, with which he was a great sufferer; but he had the support of Divine grace which enabled him to bear the intense suffering without a murmur. During his illness nothing did him more good than to have his Christian friends sing for him, for he loved the songs of Zion. He has gone where the wicked cease from troubling and the weary are at rest.

C. P. FRENCH.

ALLEN—HENRIETTA CORNELIA ALLEN (maiden name Pace) was born at West Bend, Clarke county, Ala., June 10, 1818, and married to Dr. B. M. Allen, December 22, 1864, and died March 9, 1882. She was happily converted at Tallahatta, in the fall of 1867, under the ministry of Rev. R. M. Powers. In this triumphant hour she shouted aloud the praises of God, cast her lot with his people, and remained a faithful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, until called to her reward above.

Sister Allen was one of the meek, good women who make earnest friends in the Christian world. To know her was to esteem her for her faithful spirit, to admire the quiet, even tenor of her way, and to love her for a perfect model of a wife and a mother.

A dear, good woman has been laid away; a bright, shouting angel has been received into heaven; a little family is left sorrowful and desolate; an appreciative community has lost one of its fairest ornaments, and the church one of its truest members; attractive in person, genial in spirit, and she looked well to the ways of her household and the good of her church. She has entered the Father's mansion, where the gates are of pearl, and where robed in white she is freed from sorrow, sickness, pain and death. May God deal very tenderly with this afflicted little household! JULIA T. POWERS.

JOHNSON—MRS. MARTHA A. JOHNSON, wife of Dr. W. H. Johnson, was born in Tallapoosa county, Ala., October 20, 1839, and was married December 5, 1858, was converted and joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in the fall of 1861, at Rocky Mt. Church, under the ministry of Rev. W. B. Neal, and died of congestion at Loachapoka, Ala., April 6, 1882.

The subject of this notice was the eldest daughter of W. S. and Helen Warren. Her parents both died while she was quite young, leaving the younger children in her care. She did a mother's part by them, raising them all to be good citizens and useful members of the church. Her life was devoted to others. Her motto was to do all the good she could, and do no harm. She was as mild and gentle as a lamb, and yet as firm as truth itself. She was one of the most even and smooth and consistent Christians of her day. She was a dutiful wife and an affectionate and devoted mother, a good neighbor, a consistent and godly member of the church. She lived religiously while in health, and when her last sickness came on, and she was told that she must die, she replied, "I am not afraid to die." She then called her children, three lovely daughters, and told them how she had lived and how she desired them to live, never to speak unadvisedly, and to use no by-words. Here she called to her pastor, and remarked: "I never called any one a fool nor any other bad name in my life. I never used but one by-word in my life. I have used very few idle words in my life."

She was as calm and as confident of her final salvation as she was that her Saviour was sustaining her in this, her last battle in life. Her death was one of the happiest victories through Christ that we have ever witnessed. It was good to be there. She leaves three daughters and a husband to mourn her loss; but, thank God, they do not mourn as those who have no hope. May God bless the doctor and his daughters in this, the darkest hour of their lives. H. M. GILLIS.

IRWIN—Died in Delhi, La., May 2, 1882, of consumption, MR. EDWARD IRWIN, aged forty-seven years. The deceased had been for many years a citizen of Delhi. He was a charitable man, and no worthy enterprise was ever turned from him unencouraged by his liberality. Just a few days before his death he spoke with pleasure of assisting in entertaining the District Conference, which convenes in Delhi this summer. His wife and other friends conversed with him repeatedly about dying. He said: "I am no atheist; I believe God is just. I have prayed to him, and I am trusting in his promises." This inspired well for him, for he was a man of very few words and had never made such professions previously. His aged mother remains to mourn her loss with three sisters, who reside in Ohio, and were denied ministering to him. He was attended by his faithful and devoted wife, whose heart was already crushed; for scarcely had the shadow of loosing an only child, a beautiful baby boy, been lightened, ere the deeper gloom of a husband's loss was added in five weeks, and she saw them both laid away beneath the sod. The babe had brightened their home and made life so happy. It died in its father's absence.

These glimpses of happiness are but to draw and win us to that purer happiness above, the loss of which here works out for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory in that home above, not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. There are many ministers in this Conference who have visited their home, and of these the writer asks for the bereaved wife a place in their prayers, that she may emerge from these deep troubles "the dross consumed, the gold refined."

COUSIN MOLLIE.

The following resolutions were passed by the Woman's Missionary Society and Sabbath-school of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at Bolton, Miss., April, 1882:

Whereas, After an illness of several weeks departed this life, February 25, 1882, Mrs. Missouri Youngblood; and

Whereas, We desire to give some expression to our grief at the loss of so useful a member of our religious associations; therefore, be it

Resolved, That while we humbly submit ourselves to this dispensation of God's providence, we deeply deplore our loss; for in Mrs. Youngblood we had a member who was ever ready with her zeal and earnestness to render any assistance in her power.

Resolved, That we tender her bereaved husband and near friends our heartfelt sympathy, that a copy of these resolutions be handed to Mr. J. Youngblood, and the same be spread upon our minutes by the secretary, and a copy sent to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

DANIEL PRATT IMPROVED
"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873.
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons, and several improvements have been added. It obviates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work within the same time, while economizing steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton, on this account, of a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint, added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every 100 bales ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

SELF-FEEDERS and CONDENSERS with latest improvements also made by the Daniel Pratt Gin Company to work with these Gins. Send for descriptive circulars. JOS. B. WOLFE & CO., New Orleans, La.

Ague Cure

Is a purely vegetable bitter and powerful tonic, and is warranted a speedy and certain cure for Fever and Ague, Chills and Fever, Intermittent or Chill Fever, Remittent Fever, Dumb Ague, Periodical or Bilious Fever, and all malarial disorders. In unhealthy districts, the rapid pulse, coated tongue, thirst, lassitude, loss of appetite, pain in the back and loins, and coldness of the spine and extremities, are only premonitions of severer symptoms which terminate in the ague paroxysm, succeeded by high fever and profuse perspiration.

It is a startling fact, that quinine, arsenic, and other poisonous minerals form the basis of most of the "Fever and Ague Preparations," "Specifics," "Syrups," and "Tonics," in the market. The preparations made from these mineral poisons, although they are palatable, and may break the chill, do not cure, but leave the malarial and their own drug poison in the system, producing quinism, dizziness, ringing in the ears, headache, vertigo, and other disorders more formidable than the disease they were intended to cure. AYER'S AGUE CURE thoroughly eradicates these noxious poisons from the system, and always cures the severest cases. It contains no quinine, mineral, or any thing that could injure the most delicate patient; and its crowning excellence, above its certainty to cure, is that it leaves the system as free from disease as before the attack.

For Liver Complaints, AYER'S AGUE CURE, by direct action on the liver and biliary apparatus, drives out the poisons which produce these complaints, and stimulates the system to a vigorous, healthy condition.

We warrant it when taken according to directions.

WONDERFUL and SCIENTIFIC DISCOVERY

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European oculists claim that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time; but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:
1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS—NONE GENUINE UNLESS STAMPED.
The MEDICATED GLASSES are all stamped on the frame H. HOUSAH, MEDICATED.

GOOD GENERAL CONFERENCE PREACHING.—At the German church in Nashville, after two sermons from Dr. Ahrens on successive Sabbaths sixteen persons have applied for membership.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

CINCINNATI, May 17.—A Memphis dispatch says: The frost in Northern Mississippi last night was severe enough to do considerable damage.

NORFOLK, Va., May 17.—The eighty-seventh annual council of the Protestant Episcopal Church in Virginia diocese, assembled to-day, Bishop Whittle presiding. The session is considered of unusual importance, as the question of a division of a diocese is likely to be discussed, and a large majority is believed to be in favor of the project.

ATLANTA, Ga., May 18.—The General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, South, convened this morning in the First Presbyterian Church, on Marietta street. About one hundred delegates put in an appearance. Every seat in the spacious building was taken long before the exercises opened, the congregation being one of the largest and most intelligent ever seen in Atlanta. The territory of this assembly includes the Southern States, from Maryland to Texas, with West Virginia and Kentucky and Missouri, also one presbytery in Brazil, and under its wing 67 presbyteries, 72 licentiates, 144 candidates for the ministry, 1061 ministers, 1957 churches and 21,915 communicants.

NORFOLK, May 18.—At the session of the Episcopal Council to-day, Bishop Whittle refused to entertain the question of the division of the diocese. He claimed that under the canons he alone had the right to take the initiative in the matter.

NASHVILLE, May 18.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, decided not to elect a Bishop in place of A. G. Haygood, elected on Monday, and who declined to be ordained. The Committee on Revisal presented a report recommending a change in the name of the church to the Episcopal Methodist Church. Rev. Amos Kendall, of the Mississippi Conference (expelled) was remanded for another trial. A. H. Sutherland, of Texas, presented a resolution which lays over for consideration, declaring that it is contrary to the principles and policy of the American Bible Society to teach the peculiar doctrines of any church, and claiming that they teach Calvanism by the publication of the Spanish version of the Bible, with notes and comments. The Conference adopted a plan for church extension. Drs. Linus Parker, of New Orleans, R. K. Hargrove, of Nashville, J. C. Granberry, of Nashville, and A. W. Wilson, of Baltimore, were ordained Bishops of the Southern Methodist Church in the presence of 1000 people, at McKendree Church, this afternoon.

NASHVILLE, May 19.—Rev. A. T. Hunt, secretary of the American Bible Society, was before the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to-day, and made a model statement of the good work being accomplished by the society. A resolution was presented commending the work of the Young Men's Christian Association. A resolution was also adopted to visit Mrs. ex-President Polk to-morrow. Book agent McFerrin gave notice that he would shortly publish, in the Christian Advocate, the reply of Rev. A. S. Redford, former book agent, to the charges of the book committe, together with the forthcoming report of the committe on publishing interests.

ATLANTA, May 19.—The Presbyterians met again in council this morning at nine o'clock, the exercises opening with prayer by Moderator Smoot. There was a full attendance of delegates, and the house was packed with spectators. The report of the committee on foreign missions showed an encouraging state of affairs. Five hundred children are being instructed in the mission schools, and a presbytery, composed entirely of native Greeks, has been established in Greece. The report declared that no missionary debt exists, and showed a fair balance in the treasury. Other reports showed that 133 ministers under the assembly, not being adequately supported by their congregations, were compelled to engage in secular pursuits in connection with ministerial duties; that 323 churches need pastors, and that there are 130 congregations needing pastors; also, that Dr. Stuart Robinson, of Louisville, Ky., had bequeathed $25,000 to the invalid fund on condition that the sum be swelled to $100,000 before it is used. Dr. Girardeau, of Charleston, S. C., is preaching to a great crowd to-night, and Rev. J. H. Nall, of New Orleans, will preach to-morrow night.

NASHVILLE, May 19.—The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church met at Huntsville, Ala., yesterday. Rev. S. H. Buchanan, of Little Rock, Ark., was elected Moderator. Rev. W. J. Darby, of Evansville, Moderator of the last Assembly, delivered the opening sermon.

ATLANTA, May 20.—The Assembly of Southern Presbyterians has developed into a very full one. In to-day's session the Assembly decided not to take action approving the Revised New Testament at present. Next year's meeting of the Assembly will be held at Lexington, Ky.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., May 20.—The 107th anniversary of the declaration of independence by the people of Mecklenburg county, on the twentieth day of May, 1775, was celebrated here to-day with great eclat. Senator Vance made the welcoming speech.

NASHVILLE, May 22.—The Methodist Conference to-day elected the following book committee: James Whitworth, Thomas D. Fite, William Morrow, Samuel J. Keith, W. H. Evans, R. A. Young, Nathaniel Baxter, of Nashville; John A. Carter, of Louisville; M. S. Andrews, Montgomery; T. S. Wade, West Virginia; J. S. Key, Georgia. Book agent, J. B. McFerrin.

Board of Missions—Rev. L. C. Garland, president; Rev. A. G. Haygood, vice president; Rev. R. A. Young, secretary; Rev. D. C. Kelly, treasurer.

Missionary Secretary—Rev. A. A. Young.

Treasurer of the Board of Missions—Rev. D. C. Kelly.

Editor of the Christian Advocate—Rev. O. P. Fitzgerald.

WASHINGTON, May 22.—The announcement that the court, in banc, upon the exceptions in the Guiteau case would be read this morning, attracted an unusual gathering at the Circuit Court room. At a quarter past ten o'clock the judges filed into court and took their places upon the bench. Soon after the formal opening of court, Justice James said: "I am instructed by the court to announce the decision in the case of the United States against Charles J. Guiteau, upon the exception to the judgment of the Criminal Court." He then read from manuscript the decision of the court. Chief Justice Carter made the following announcement: The opinions which have been uttered are the unanimous opinions of the court—that a new trial is denied and the judgement below affirmed in this case. The court then adjourned.

SAN ANTONIO, Texas, May 24.—The Episcopal Convention for the Western District of Texas adjourned Saturday evening, after three days' session. The committees report the diocese in good condition.

NASHVILLE, May 23.—The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, elected to-day the following Board of Managers of Church Extension: president, James G. Lightgow, Louisville; vice president, Presly Meguiar, Louisville; treasurer, J. A. Proctor, Danville, Ky.; secretary, David Morton, Louisville; managers: Messrs. J. G. Carter, Charles B. Seymour, T. C. Morris, and H. C. Settle, Louisville; J. C. Woodward, Lexington, Ky.; T. D. Carroll, Parkersburg, W. Va.; G. D. Shand, Senatobia, Miss.; C. T. Vandeventer, St. Joseph, Mo.; C. E. Brown, Texas; W. F. Harris, Brownsville, Tenn.; W. F. Compton White, California; Joseph Emory, Coavallis, Oregon; James J. Carlisle, South Carolina.

The Committee on Episcopacy presented their report allowing the general superintendent a salary of $3000, including traveling expenses. The whole amount necessary for their support and for Mrs. Wightman for the next five years is $111,960, and is distributed among the Annual Conferences. The report provides that in case of the death of a Bishop, his widow shall draw the amount due the Bishop during that year and thereafter $1,000 per year. The report was adopted.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, May 18.—According to trustworthy data the material damage done by the late Jewish movement, including houses, breadstuffs and other property destroyed and money taken away by the immigration of Jews, amounts to £22,000,000—all lost to Russia. To this must be added the losses resulting from the prevention of labor and profit, not only of Jews but of others during the riots and from the stagnation of business generally, which would increase the total by many more millions.

Advices from Soham, Upper Egypt state that the eclipse of the sun was successfully observed from that place yesterday by English, French and Italian astronomers. A fine comet was discovered close to the sun. Its position was determined by photography. Spectroscopic and ocular observations, just before and during the period of totality, gave most valuable results, the darkening of the lines observed by the French astronomers indicating a lunar atmosphere. The spectrum of the corona was successfully photographed for the first time.

ALEXANDRIA, Egypt, May 20.—The main points of the Suez canal are now guarded by French gunboats.

Consecration of the New Bishops.

The consecration of the new Bishops took place in McKendree Church at four o'clock yesterday afternoon. The choir sang the grand old hymn, "Am I a soldier of the Cross?" The opening prayer and the first lesson were read by Bishop McTyeire; the second lesson by Bishop Keener. The congregation then joined the choir in singing hymn 258. Bishop Kavanaugh gave a plain, practical sermon from Titus, I, 7-9, on the duties of a Bishop. He presented some shrewd and striking points in homely phrase. The consecration services were read by Bishops Paine, Pierce, McTyeire and Keener. The presence of Bishop Paine, in his extreme feebleness, gave an increased solemnity to this interesting occasion. Bishop Wilson was presented by Dr. J. S. Marlin and Dr. Samuel Rodgers, of the Baltimore Conference; Bishop Parker by Dr. C. W. Carter and Rev. B. F. Alexander, of Louisiana; Bishop Granberry by Dr. W. W. Bennett and Dr. J. E. Edwards, of Virginia, and Bishop Hargrove by Dr. J. B. McFerrin, of Tennessee, and Dr. M. S. Andrews, of Alabama. The new Bishops received the hearty congratulations of many friends.—Nashville Daily Advocate, of May 19.

Washington's Stately Etiquette.

President Washington never went to Congress on public business except in a state coach, drawn by six cream-colored horses. The coach was an object which would excite the admiration of the throng, even now, in the streets of London. It was built in the shape of a hemisphere, and its panels were adorned with Cupids, surrounded with flowers worthy of Florida, and of fruit not to be equaled out of California. The coachman and postillions were arrayed in gorgeous liveries of white and scarlet. The Philadelphia Gazette, a government organ, regularly gave a supply of court news for the admiration of the citizens. From that the people were allowed to learn as much as it was deemed proper for them to know about the President's movements, and a fair amount of space was also devoted to Mrs. Washington—who was not relished to as Mrs. Washington, but as "the amiable consort of our beloved President." When the President made his appearance at a public reception, a dais was erected for him, upon which he might stand apart from the throng, and the guests or visitors bowed to him in solemn silence.

"Republican simplicity" has only come in later times. In our day the hack-driver who takes a visitor to a public reception at the White House is quite free to get off his box, walk inside by side with his fare, and shake hands with the President with as much familiarity as anybody else. Very few persons presumed to shake hands with General Washington. One of his friends Governor Morris, rashly undertook, for a foolish wager, to go up to him and slap him on the shoulder, saying, "My dear General, I am happy to see you look so well." The moment fixed upon arrived, and Mr. Morris, already half-repenting of his wager, went up to the President, placed his hand upon his shoulder, and uttered the preseribed words. "Washington," as an eye-witness described the scene "withdrew his hand, stepped suddenly back, fixed his eye on Morris for several minutes with an angry frown, until the latter retreated abashed, and sought refuge in the crowd." No one else ever tried a similar experiment. It is recorded of Washington that he wished the official title of the President to be "His Serene Highness," and at one time it was proposed to engrave his portrait upon the nation's coinage. No royal levees were more punctiliously arranged than those of the first President.—Quarterly Review.

PUBLISHING COMMITTEE.

—After Longfellow's visit to Windsor Castle, in 1857, the queen said to Sir Theodore Martin: "I noticed an unusual interest among the attendants and servants. I could scarcely credit that they so generally understood who he was. When he took his leave, they concealed themselves in places from which they could get a good look at him, as he passed."

Rev. M. P. Remington, Ithaca, N. Y., writes: "From too close application to my calling, my health underwent a severe strain. I felt a weakness in every part of my body. My digestion especially failed me, and my nerves became all unstrung. Recreation did not do me proper benefit. Finally on the recommendation of a brother minister, I tried Brown's Iron Bitters. It has made me feel better and stronger than I ever before felt since I was a young man."

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an imported piano [illegible] their mothers and grandmothers used to, have one of the same make. What was considered a fine piano a hundred years ago, would be called a tin pan now; what suited our ancestors would not suit our daughters. Music more than all other arts, is progressive, and the difference between the spinette on which Mozart and even Beethoven, played is, in comparison with the concert piano, say the Chickering of to-day, is as great as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European manufacturers adhere to their old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. American pianos alone have improved and reached a state of perfection that cannot be excelled. The Americans excel in durability by their iron plates and bars, volume of tone by overstringing, light touch by improved mechanism of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board. If a European piano has a valuable feature, the American makers adopt it. There is no patent or copy-right on them. Take, for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago; this point is very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which no other pianos possess. Their pin block is of iron, the holes are bushed with maple, and the pins are inserted into maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as many pianos. Therefore it is not advisable for people to buy French pianos on which the government receives about $100.00 in duties, if a better toned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for less. I have no prejudice against foreign manufacture, and sold myself large numbers of imported pianos, but that was at a time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since I am in the business I have always striven to keep good, reliable and first-class pianos, and sell them as low as possible. By this policy, and fair dealing, I have built up my business, referring with pride to the thousand families I have supplied with music.

SONG AND WORK.

E. B. BROWNING.

The woman singeth at her spinning-wheel
A pleasant chant, ballad, or harcarolle.
She thinketh of her song upon the whole,
Far more than of her flax; and yet the reel
Is full, and artfully her fingers feel
With quick adjustment, provident control
The lines, too subtly twisted, to unroll
Out in a perfect thread. I hence appeal
To the dear Christian church, that we may do
Our Father's business, in these temples work
Thus swift and steadfast, thus intent and strong:
While thus apart from toil, our souls pursue
Some high, calm, spheric tune, and prove our work
The better for the sweetness of our song.

General Conference.

W. H. Potter and A. G. Haygood, of North Carolina, presented the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That this General Conference has heard with profound satisfaction the statement of the work of the American Bible Society by Dr. A. S. Hunt, its efficient secretary; that we rejoice to see Dr. Hunt in our Conference, and pray that the God of the Bible will cause all grace to abound to him, personally, and the society he so ably represents.

The following was presented and referred to the Committee on Fraternal Correspondence:

Whereas, among the agencies of Christian effort, aiding and co-operating with the church in this and other lands during the past few years in the work of the Master, that of the Young Men's Christian Association has been greatly prospered of the Lord, thereby showing that it has the divine approval in its aims and efforts; therefore,

Resolved, That this Conference recognizes the Young Men's Christian Association as an organization worthy of our cordial sympathy and hearty indorsement; acknowledging, as it does in all its utterances, its origin to the church, its dependence upon the church, and humbly ask the sympathies and prayers of the church, while it shall strive by God's blessing in aiding and co-operating with the church in the special work it has undertaken of the watch-care and protection of the vast number of young men in the towns and cities, surrounded as they are by temptations and changes peculiar to this age, and greater, perhaps, than any that has preceded it; and in its efforts to energize and sympathize active Christian effort by aid for young men everywhere, and for others whom it may reach in public institutions and elsewhere, which denominational effort can not successively approach. We commend the work, and will ever pray that the blessing of the Lord may rest upon it.

Your committee appointed to wait upon Mrs. James K. Polk, and to ascertain what time would suit her convenience to receive a call from the Conference in a body, reported:

We have discharged the pleasant duty imposed upon us. Mrs. Polk expressed her full appreciation of the delicate compliment paid her in this action, and a desire that the Conference should suit its own convenience, but suggested Saturday, the twentieth instant, just after adjournment of the regular morning session, at the same time saying that if, for any reason, the time named was not convenient for the Conference, at any time it might designate.

We recommend the adoption of the following:

Resolved, That when the Conference adjourns at twelve M. on Saturday, the twentieth instant, it proceed in a body to the residence of Mrs. James K. Polk, in such order as may be designated by a committee of three, to be appointed by the chair.

The resolution proposed was adopted, and the same gentlemen appointed the committee named in the report.

A memorial was presented from the Rockvale Church, Burnet county, Texas, asking to be placed in the Northwest Texas Conference, which was referred to the Committee on Boundaries.

On motion of W. M. Rush, of Missouri, the Conference resumed consideration of the subject of church extension, the business they were considering when the Conference adjourned yesterday.

The secretary read section 5, which was under consideration, and an amendment proposed by Rev. Dr. Vandeventer, of Missouri.

Mr. Vandeventer withdrew his amendment, and the question recurring upon the section, Mr. Powell, of Alabama, secured the floor.

He said that he was associated at home with the rural class of the church, and they would object to taking up so many collections. The church, he said, usually sent out the younger members of the Conference among the rural people, who have charge of several country churches, and when they made a round of the churches, taking up so many collections, the preacher would be placed in the light of an ecclesiastical tax collector. It was expected when Dr. McFerrin went the round of the church that he would take up a collection, and if he did not, some of the good members would be disappointed. He favored the organization of the Church Extension Society, but thought its work should be done by the Missionary Society.

Rev. J. H. Dye, of White River, favored the movement, and was desirous of "seeing the people trained to systematic Christian giving."

Article 5 was adopted without further discussion.

Article 6 coming up, J. H. Scarritt, of Southwest Missouri, proposed an amendment so as to make the board regulate its own business, make its own plans for raising money, the manner of disposing of it, etc.

At this juncture the Bishop announced that Rev. Henry Bascom Ridgaway, the fraternal delegate from the Methodist Episcopal Church, was in the room, and, as he left for home to-night, he desired to take an official leave of the Conference.

Dr. Ridgaway was introduced, and said:

Dear Brethren:—I have already occupied your time at such length in fraternal greeting on the evening appointed, and you listened to me with so much patience and charity, that I can not presume to occupy your time now, valuable as I know that time to be. Yet I feel that it would be unbecoming in me to leave Nashville, and to leave these associations, without a little formal leave-taking. I have enjoyed my visit—every moment of it. I have felt entirely at home, not only because of the official relations which I have sustained to you, but also because of the many personal friends I have met in your body. I have found myself at times in a sort of day-dream which seemed real. I can hardly get it out of my mind that I am not one of you. As I have met one whom your votes have honored in choosing to the high office of the Episcopacy, I was carried back to my boyhood days when shoulder to shoulder, he and I were young preachers in the Baltimore Conference. As I looked in the faces of the Baltimore delegation—as I have met men here and there who were connected with me in college and in the early struggle of Christian life—I could not feel otherwise than that I was entirely at home. And your Bishops have treated me with such courtesy. It is said that the old Romans never offered incense to their heroes until after their death; but I have felt, as a Methodist, like offering incense to these heroes of your church, who sit upon this platform, whose days well accord them honor, and whose lives have been full of usefulness, and who are now about to bid adieu to earthly scenes, and whose salvation is assured not only for time, but for eternity.

I feel that the incense of my reverence affection will be properly offered at their shrine to-day. I am glad that I have had this great privilege of mingling with you, of coming heart to heart and face to face with you. I believe firmly in the communion of saints. I believe in the advantage of this communion in promoting this great spirit of Christian unity. Let me not be misunderstood. Now abideth faith, hope, charity, but the greatest of these is charity. Above all formal unions, above all outward organizations, overlapping, encompassing all, is the spirit of love in Christ Jesus. And this is the spirit which we hope to promote, which we mean to promote. Years ago I remember to have heard the venerated James Sewell, who was a pastor in the city of Charleston, say that he once attended a camp-meeting near the borders of Canada, near the place where the British soldiers were in barracks, and near where the American soldiers were in camp. The soldiers were permitted to come to this meeting, but the officers gave direction that they should be kept apart by a line being run between them; but the spirit of God came down among them, and the blue coats got happy and the red coats got happy and the blue coats got among the red coats, and the red coats got among the blue coats and then there was no keeping them apart. (Applause.)

"And speaking the truth in love, that we may grow up unto him, our Head, in all things, from whom the whole body, fitly joined together, compacted by that which every joint supplieth, the effectual working maketh increase unto the edifying of itself in love."

We grow from Christ as our great source unto Christ, whose likeness we find the highest perfection of character. We grow in love as the element in which we breathe and move, into love, as the highest expression of Christian life; and we grow from Christ unto Christ, from love, into love, by the fellowship of kindred spirits. While fellowship coming from formal letters of fraternal greeting is well, it is not like the fellowship which comes from contact of heart with heart in our personal meetings, when we feel the fire leaping from soul to soul. I know that I have felt this fire in my heart as I have mingled with you. I shall go back to my brethren and say we are one in Christ Jesus, and in fellowship, Methodist experience, and work. We all stand up with you in the struggle to plant the banner of holiness until Methodism shall fill this land and prevail in the world. I congratulate you on your peaceful, harmonious session, upon your progress, and the felicitous selection you have made in your choice of Bishops.

Bishop Kavanaugh: I was in the chair, sir, when the pleasant, courteous, and beautiful words of farewell were offered to us by the the delegate from the Methodist Episcopal Church, and I felt at the time that he ought to have had at least a brief and respectful response.

Presuming that some one would offer a resolution to that end, I refrained from any remarks, and I just ask the liberty now. I say to our distinguished and beloved brother that his presence here has been a benediction to us, not only in the church he represented, and the fraternal relations and expressions that he bears to us, but in our personal regard for him. Our high appreciation for the manner in which you have discharged the duties that devolved upon you as the representative of your church, and the personal attachment which we feel to have often realized by us all to you. For myself, there is a sort of charm about the name you bear. Henry Bascom. (Applause.) That is a name not to perish with us I believe, as indicated by yourself to stand by us in a unique and distinct individuality. I have always looked upon him as a man standing by himself pre-eminent and grand, and I pray that God may bless you in your present duties, in your family, in your pastoral charge, and bless you with the assurance that you have found a place in the hearts of your brethren of this Conference. (Applause.)

Resuming the consideration of the church extension report, Mr. Hunnicutt, of Mississippi, wanted to see one-third of the money raised in his own Conference spent there.

Dr. E. A. Yates, of North Carolina, favored one-half being spent in each Conference.

The amendment of Dr. Scarritt, after a slight correction at the suggestion of Dr. H. F. Johnson, of Mississippi, was adopted, and as amended, Article 6 was adopted.

Article 7 coming up was discussed at some length by the delegates on the subject of the right to loan and borrow money, execute mortgages and liens, and finally Dr. H. F. Johnson presented an amendment to strike out "other than liens on the church property," and to insert "to be disbursed by the board."

The amendment was agreed to, and as amended the article was adopted.

Article 8 was adopted without discussion.

Article 9 was next considered.

Dr. E. A. Yates, of North Carolina, moved to amend by providing that fifty per cent. of the money raised be expended in the Conference in which it was collected.

Rev. F. Richardson, of Holston, moved to amend by striking out the phrase, "under its direction," in the first paragraph, and by striking out the second paragraph and inserting "the preachers shall take up a collection in every congregation annually for church extension, and of the funds thus collected, or in any other way coming into the hands of the Annual Conference Boards, fifty per cent. shall be turned over to the general board to be expended under its direction; but donors may give special direction to their contributions."

In speaking to the question, Mr. Richardson said that a portion of the fund ought to be expended in the territory in which it was raised. There was a strip of land, he said, extending from Alabama to Pennsylvania, which was just being opened up; mines were being opened and manufactories started, and this was the finest field to be found anywhere for such work. Under the plan suggested he thought there were two heads to the society—one in each Conference and a general head—and that if each Conference society were given control of the work in the Conference the parent society would neither build nor repair churches as was their intention.

Mr. Hunnicutt, of Mississippi, proposed an amendment, providing that one-third of the funds raised be used in the Conference raising it, but was declared out of order.

Dr. McFerrin said that the moment the Conference adopted the amendment, and the Conference got any per cent. of the amount raised, they would be cut off from the sympathy of the parent board, and would get nothing from that source. He thought that all the funds raised should go to the general fund, and that each Conference should share like the others.

Rev. S. W. Turner, of Texas, insisted that so long as the Conference had the per cent. in its hands they wanted no sympathy from the parent board. He favored fifty or sixty per cent. being retained at home.

Rev. H. C. Morrison, of Louisville, compared the Church Extension Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to Samson, and the moment any Conference kept back for its own use any of the funds that moment were they chopping his locks.

Mr. Browning, of Little Rock, urged the adoption of the section without allowing the Conferences the drawback.

Dr. Hiner, of Louisville, thought that the collections would be weakened if all the money was taken by the parent society. He favored keeping a per cent. of it for use at home.

The amendment of Mr. Richardson was agreed to.

Dr. H. F. Johnson, of Mississippi, proposed a further amendment by adding, "at least fifty per cent. of the amount collected in each Conference may be appropriated by the parent board in such Conference, provided application be made for the same within one year."

Pending discussion of the amendment the hour of adjournment arrived.

After reading the appointments for the churches on Sunday the Conference adjourned, with the benediction by Bishop Pierce, until half-past eight o'clock Saturday morning.

SATURDAY, MAY 20—SIXTEENTH DAY.

The Conference met at half-past eight o'clock this morning, Bishop McTyeire in the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. H. J. Adams, of North Georgia. The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

The following invitation was received:

To the Bishops and General Conference of the M. E. Church, South—Dear Brethren:—On behalf of the trustees of Seashore Camp Ground, this General Conference is respectfully invited to attend the camp meeting of 1882, on said grounds, commencing on Wednesday, July 12 next. Seashore Camp Ground is pleasantly situated nearly midway between the cities of New Orleans and Mobile, and, fronting directly upon the Gulf of Mexico, enjoys its cool, refreshing, healthful breeze. Comfortable accommodations are provided for all on reasonable terms, and all preachers are entertained free of charge.

W. H. FOSTER,
President Board of Trustees.

P. P. Ellis, of Missouri, arose and said that there was one thing lying upon the table of the utmost importance. He referred to the election of church officers, and moved that the regular order of business be suspended for the consideration of the question of the election of officers, which motion failed.

Dr. W. W. Bennett read the report on episcopacy, No. 8:

The Committee on Episcopacy has examined into the official character and administration of the following general superintendents of the church, to-wit: Robert Paine, George F. Pierce, Holland N. McTyeire, Hubbard H. Kavanaugh, and John C. Keener, and report approved.

Dr. Rodgers, chairman of the Committee on Itinerancy, submitted a report which was discussed at some length, and the committee were criticised by some of the members for their action on the journals.

SPRINGFIELD, ILL., May 19, 1882.

To the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, Nashville, Tenn—Brethren:—We hail you with Christian joy, and bid you God speed in behalf of the General Assembly now sitting at Springfield.

HERRICK JOHNSON.

At this stage of the proceedings Bishop Wilson took the chair for the first time since his elevation to the Bishopric.

Mr. Crawford, of Alabama, climbed the floor. He said:

MR. PRESIDENT:—I desire to lay before you and the members of this body a little matter entrusted to me by the Rev. E. Philips, of the Alabama Conference. He has constructed a gavel for the use of the chairman of this body. In presenting it to you he has no wish to obtrude himself on your time or attention, nor to advertise a collection of beautiful woods of which the mallet is composed, or skilful in construction (for that is not perfect) but to present to the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, an emblematic gavel. It is composed of nine kinds of timber—the live oak, orange, pomegranate, osage-orange, fig, grape-vine, china, mahogany and mesquite. The following is the arrangement in construction: The head of the mallet is barrel-shaped, and is made of live-oak wood. Inserted into and uniting in the center of this head, with tongued and grooved edges, are two blocks, one of orange and the other of pomegranate. The handle, of osage-orange, is inserted into the mallet-head through these blocks of orange and pomegranate. The fig-wood is inlaid in the side of the handle as the upright beam of a cross, and the transverse beam of the cross is a piece of grape-vine. In one end of the head is a piece of china-wood, in the other end two pieces of mahogany and the other mesquite-wood. Some of these woods are not the most suitable for the subjects they are intended to represent, but are the best that could be obtained to meet the present occasion. Means and time were wanting to secure suitable materials.

The design in the construction of this mallet. This block (putting his finger on the block) having the shape of a book, made from the orange tree, which bears the golden fruit, is at the base of this combination to represent the Bible the foundation of all true religion and worship of God. On this block, and grooved into it, is the block of pomegranate, representing the Discipline for its fruitfulness, its fruit being in sections, and these sections filled with seeds distinct from each other. The handle, which is of osage-orange (used for hedges) rises in the Bible block and passes through the Discipline block. It represents the church of God in the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, lifting up the cross of Christ, which is here represented by an inlaid cross of fig and grape-vine in the handle; also reminding us of the adage, "We worship God under our own vine and fig-tree." You, Mr. President, and your associates in office, are the chief executive of the laws of the church contained in the Discipline, which emanates from the word of God, as you exercise this function over the church. The handle, then, representing the church rising out of the Bible and Discipline, is exceedingly significant of the power and authority by which you rule in the church of God. With this arrangement of the woods in the construction of the handle, expressive of the foundation, organization, and purpose of the church, in which you and your colleagues have been set apart as overseers, you will find other woods gathered about the handle, to signify the nationalities where you now exercise that jurisdiction. The live-oak in the head representing the United States of America; the china-wood in one end of the head-piece, the Chinese Empire; the mahogany and mesquite representing respectively the Empire of Brazil and the Republic of Mexico (Here he handed the mallet to the president.) With that mallet in your hand may you so control and direct this body and the church of God that his Holy Spirit may empower you to lift up the cross of Christ in all lands, so that in your quadrennial assembly ere long there shall appear delegates from all nationalities of the world in council together.

Bishop Wilson thanked the donor, on behalf of the Conference, for the symbolic gift, and called for the regular order of business.

The report on publishing interests, No. 6, was adopted:

With respect to the Spanish publications submitted to us from Dr. W. W. Patterson, superintendent of the Mexican mission, not being able to read them, we can only say that it is eminently proper that the effort should be made to reach the people of Mexico through the press, and, for aught that we know, the books and papers submitted to us have been nicely and well prepared, and are likely to help the missionary work in that field. We certainly hope, and, from the best information we can obtain and the representations of Dr. Patterson, venture to believe so.

The report on publishing interests, No. 7, was then read:

Having duly considered the petition of A. H. Redford, asking the General Conference to relieve him from the payment of certain items included in the amount found to be due by him to the Publishing House, we report, that it appearing to us from the facts that the settlement with Dr. Redford is the result of a compromise of controverted claims and that we should be under the necessity of re-opening the matters in dispute in order to be able thoroughly to investigate the whole subject, we are of the opinion that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted, and so recommend.

When the conclusion of this report had been reached, Dr. Hayes, of Louisville, arose and moved to amend the report by striking out the word "not," and providing that it does recommend the granting of the request. He said: "We of the church know but one law, the law of love. Here was taught the wisdom of coming down from above, and justice and equity. The Cromie debt, of which mention is made in the report of the Book Committee, is properly an asset of the Church, and not of Dr. Redford, as an individual. It can not be doubted and can be proved that the debt was created by Dr. Redford to assist the House out of some of its financial troubles. The House got the benefit of the money, and they might not to refuse to relinquish the claim."

Mr. Bright asked the amount of the Cromie debt, when Dr. Johnson replied that the original debt was $6,000, of which Dr. Redford had received $1,680, with which he bought $2,400 in Publishing House bonds, which were paid over by him in part payments of his indebtedness to the House.

Dr. Walker, chairman of the Committee on Publishing Interests, made a short statement on behalf of the Publishing House, and the Conference adopted the report as presented.

The Report No. 6 on boundaries was adopted:

Your Committee on Boundaries have considered the resolution referred to them signed by J. M. McPher and T. P. Saunders in reference to change of boundary between the Baltimore and Holston Conferences, and recommend the following changes in said boundary line—to-wit: In the description of the Holston Conference line insert the words, "Auburn, in Montgomery county, Virginia," for the words "the territory known as the New Hope circuit," and in order to conform the Baltimore Conference line to that of Holston recommend the following reading in said boundary, to-wit: "from the top of said mountain with the Holston line to Central depot on New river instead of Pepper's Ferry, as now stated."

The following invitation from Fisk University was accepted:

Bishop McTyeire presented the following recommendation from the College of Bishops, which was referred to the Committee on Boundaries:

Resolved, By the College of Bishops, that we recommend to the General Conference that the Indiana Annual Conference be united with the Louisville Conference.

After the announcements for preaching on Sunday, and the meetings of the committees, the Conference adjourned.

Good Words.

If sad to-day
'Twill pass away,
And with it cares and sorrow;
Tho' clouds may lower
And rain may pour,
The sun may shine to-morrow.

—People think they can hide themselves from their fellows. They forget that no French plate mirror ever reflected the outside man as faithfully as our conduct does the man within. The snappish tone, the surly words, the waspish speech, the fox-like suspiciousness, the lamb-like gentleness, and the good returned for the evil done to or said about us; reveal what spirit is at work in the place of authority within. After all, there is nothing that tells what a man is half so effectively as what he does; that is, what he is in the habit of doing.—Recorder Covenant.

—The Golden Rule is not dead. It —is—the—Rule! If it conflicts with business, so much the worse for business; and so much the worse for those who are in business, unless they make good their escape. It is forever certain, in all places, and in the long run it will always be found out, that commerce and just gain arise only in the free exchange of equivalents. The forced exchange of non-equivalents, no matter how subtle the force, and no matter how or by whom applied, carries with all advantage voluntarily taken of it, the curse of fraud.

—Faith in God is the root and source of all efficacy of prayer. And faith is that grasp of the heart upon the divine nature by which it appropriates God to its own relief and help in its struggles after holiness. If we say that it is an "affectionate confidence in God," we mean by this that it is such a reaching out of the affections and desires toward Him as finds rest only in the sense of His presence and favor. The prayer of faith is, therefore, a spiritual power akin to Omnipotence.

—Let not any man deceive himself with the thought that, because the general spirit of his life is right, his minor shortcomings shall bear no bitter fruit. No man sins and does not suffer for it. Toward our infirmity God has infinite tenderness; but he never lets us do wrong and escape the evil consequence. This is his kindness toward us—that by his chastisements he forever seeks to turn us back into the way that leads to blessedness.—George Merriam.

—When we know God as he is, we have found a friend who knows us better than we know ourselves, helps when we cannot help ourselves, forgives us when we can not forgive ourselves, and, in the midst of our mighty despair breathes around our heart the perfumed breath of a new and divine hope. All our faculties unfold in their true method and order.—J. F. Clarke.

—An idle word may be seemingly harmless in its utterance; but let it be fanned by passion, let it be fed with the fuel of misconception, of evil intention, of prejudice, and it will soon grow into a sweeping fire, that will melt the chains of human friendship, that will burn to ashes many cherished hopes, and blacken more fair names than one.—Charles A. Dickey.

—Christians are like passengers sailing out together in a ship for some distant country. Very frequently one drops overboard, but his companions know that he has only gone a shorter way to the same port; and that, when they arrive there, they shall find him, so that all they lose is his company during the rest of the voyage.—Payson.

—No Man can be in a proper frame of mind for the discovery and reception of truth, who is not utterly regardless of the questions, whether his being in a majority or minority will be the result of his investigations.

—The question is often asked if ministers can be honest and earnest and pay so much deference as they do to wicked rich men? It is not like the Master. He admonished such as sternly and faithfully as he did the poor.—Dr. John Hall.

—Longing desire prayeth always, though the tongue be silent. If thou art ever longing, thou art ever praying. When shall cepeth prayer? When desire grows cold.—Augustine.

—God often works more by the life of the illiterate, seeking the things which are his, than by the ability of the learned, seeking the things that are their own.—Anselm.

AWAKE, AWAKE, FOR THY LIGHT HAS COME!

BY SUSAN COOLIDGE.

Long time in sloth, long time in sin,
Cumbered with thy dark estate
Hast thou abode, O soul of mine!
Now dawns the morning, fair, though late.
Her sunny tides are sweeping in
Thy light has come, arise and shine!

The sheathed bud which all night long
Has folded close its purple up
Upon the morning-glory vine,
At the first rose flush the first sun
Unrolls its petals, pours its cup,
And, light being come, makes haste to shine!

It can not clasp the whole bright day,
Nor the wide-beaming sea of dew
Within its curve exact and fine,
Of countless beams a single ray,
One little freshening spirit two
It takes, and so is glad to shine!

Make ready likewise, O my soul!
Lo! a blessed day has dawned, its rays
Around thy head with joy and wine
Are the great sun, the mighty whole,
Thy little rough and partial beak,
And, giving thanks, arise and shine.

SUNDAY, JUNE 25, 1882. MARK IX. 17-29.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"All things are possible to him that believeth."—MARK IX. 23.

THE AFFLICTED CHILD.

Christ's life was strikingly human in the vicissitudes which attended it. His many labors and toils were here and there interspersed with light and joy; a quiet home in Bethany, where a welcome ever awaited him; a company of angels to minister unto him after his strange temptation; an ascent to the holy mount, where, for a brief moment, he was permitted to enjoy the atmosphere of heaven and talk with old friends; and then toil and sorrow and persecution. He lived an uneven life, like many; the places of darkness more frequent than places of light lay along his life's road.

The descent from the mount of transfiguration, and its congenial company, was to the low plains of a sin-cursed earth, to meet at every turn some form of sin. How his pure nature protested against this continual beholding of the hideous features of sin. What a scene met his eye when he came down the mountain early in the morning. His disciples disconsolate, chagrined and disgraced, and pushed to the very wall by questioning and scoffing scribes. He pushed his way at once to the rescue and relief of his hard-pressed disciples, the nine he had left the evening before when with Peter, James and John he had gone up the mountain side. Coming suddenly face to face with their questioners, he inquired: "What question ye with them?" His coming put an end to the dispute for the moment. His sudden appearance, and the wonderful light of the celestial glory, which still played upon his features, and which as yet had not faded into the light of common day, filled the beholders with awe and wonder. They were greatly amazed, and, coming to him, saluted him, I suppose, by some reverent gesture, not trusting their voice to utter a word. I have seen holy men at eventide come forth from their place of prayer with a halo of spiritual brightness on each feature which would make you wait in reverent awe for them and not yourself to break the solemn calm. They had been looking into the face of Jesus, and caught upon their own features some of this very glory light which so amazed these people. But it soon fades in the presence of sinful men. One of the multitude, the one most interested, broke the silence, and in a brief way, with pathetic eloquence, stated the cause of strife. I have brought unto thee, my son, which hath a dumb spirit, that teareth him, and he foameth and gnasheth with his teeth, and he pineth away—a roaming, fearing, foaming, gnashing devil, with his victim gagged so that he could not even cry his way out of danger—a dumb spirit, who would lead off his victim by the flood or by the fire, and then intent upon his destruction, would endeavor to cast his victim into the fire. This devil had ensconced himself in this youth when he was a mere child, and he had gradually grown with the boy until he had insinuated his hellish powers in every organ and sinew of the youth. He had all power of the youth, save the power of his life, and it looked like he would finally succeed in drying up the very springs of his life. This was no common case. I brought him to your disciples to have him healed, and they could not. Christ understood the case at once. The scribes were glorying over the defeat of the disciples, and pressing them with all sorts of thrusts: We thought so, we knew the thing could not be done, here is proof of it. No doubt the disciples understook the case when the father brought the boy, with a perfect abandon of assurance that they could cast him out; they had done it before, time and again. I imagine they tried and tried, but this devil was too much for them. They tried to explain: We have cast out many before. Then why don't you cast off this one? What a failure; they had lost their power, they were disgraced, their Master was disgraced in them. The scribes, you may be sure, pressed their advantages, and poured volley after volley of ridicule upon them and their Master, making dark and horrible insinuations against them and their Master for being mere juggling impostors sailing under false colors. They were in a close place, to be sure, and Jesus never came more opportunely upon a company of faithless men. Their failure deserved the rebuke which it received from the Lord. You faithless generation, how long shall I be with you ere the end of my mission be realized in you? How long can I bear with your unbelief? How is that you are so slow in learning to exercise faith in me? Must I go over all the miracles, and remain for longer time with you ere you can be depended on.

How can we account for their failure? We answer, lack of faith to wield power sufficient to throttle this giant demon. But how did they lose faith? First, by over-confidence in themselves. They were so successful heretofore in casting out devils that they forgot to be humble; a little pride came in and neutralized their spiritual energy; they were shorn Samsons; they must pass through his experience before their strength comes again. I have seen this happen often. Preachers backslide after a great revival, which they credit to their superior ability; they have an encounter with an extra-sized devil, when they are flushed with a sense of power, and Satan gives them a high fall and leaves them down.

They lost their power, no doubt, by keeping bad company; unbelievers are sure to drain you of spiritual power if you stay too long in their association, and particularly if you will debate with them. They were absent from Jesus, and from the holiest and bravest of the other disciples.

Bring him unto me. The boy was brought, and, as is always the case with devil-possessed ones, this great devil was stirred into fiercest activity by the coming near of Jesus. Satan lets loose his wrath when he knows that his time is short. Men's evil tendency never shows their excesses so wildly as when conscience and the gospel are urging them to a new life. Christ saw the desperate condition of the youth, but he saw that it would take a greater power to overcome the demon of unbelief in that father's heart, and in the hearts of all who were to witness the cure than it would to cast out the devil. He began working on the father, who was indeed the greatest sufferer of the two, as his prayer seemed to imply: If thou canst do anything have compassion on us; help us. How much more a father can suffer in the person of his son than he can in himself. The Master's seeming delay in asking questions was the directest way. He must develop the father's faith; he must turn his unbelief into more than belief. He turns this if which the despairing unbelief of the father referred to Christ's power, thus limiting it, back upon himself. If thou canst believe, all things are possible to him that believeth, thus showing at once that the limit is not on the side of the power, but on the side of belief, which appropriates it. The man caught the truth, and with an intelligence and eloquence most wonderful offered one of the most appropriate and wisest prayers I ever heard: I believe, help thou my unbelief. He prayed it with tears. How could the sequel have been other than it was, the Master having done the greater miracle of casting out unbelief, with ease conquered the devil in the young man. The disciples looked, on thinking more of their disgraced failure than of the manifestation of power, and at the first opportunity wanted to know why they could not cast him out. The Master tells why. This kind can come forth by nothing but by prayer and fasting; a prayer in faith, which holds steadily on, and has not relaxed in the least by compliance with the demands of flesh; a faith that excludes everything else but the power and willingness of God to answer; it lays hold on his strength. There are fathers and mothers who will have to cultivate this very kind of prayer and fasting, which denies self with its doubts, clamoring doubts, and fears; a spiritual fasting, which denies the soul the least indulgence in its natural cravings for unbelief, if they would save their boys who have grown up from children afflicted with an evil spirit. By this time the devil in them is intent upon their instruction, and it will take help above human to keep them from the fire's flame.

Temperance Notes.

MR. EDITOR: I sympathize with our brother, C. B. G., in April 5, having had some of his experience. It is hard to keep from getting mad, and making rash threats. If he will allow I will give him some of my experience, that may help him to win the victory, and that right soon.

The Democratic party of the South is a party of white men; the Republican party South is a party of negroes. The white men can not afford to divide, and again turn loose on us the thieving carpet-bagger and ignorant negro. In this county there are about 1,400 white and 3,600 negro voters. The negro, as a general thing, vote for anything that gives the most whisky; the white for anything rather than divide the party. It looked like fanaticism to think of prohibition in this county, but we remembered the Lord's command, to "be wise as serpents, and harmless as doves."

We went to work early in 1880, talked the matter over, determined to keep it out of the canvass, but be sure to nominate none but good and true men. We succeeded in both, and elected our nominees. After the election we had Gerard Cook, a good lawyer, a true man, who is heart and hand with us, to draft a law to prevent the sale of intoxicating liquors in the county, out of the towns. We then prepared a number of blanks like the following:

PETITION AND COPY OF THE LAW ASKED FOR.

WHITES.

Names of males over 21 years.	Names of females over 18 years.

Each blank had four sheets of legal-cap, ruled and headed as above. One blank was sent to a white man, who had been consulted, in every election precinct in the county. Upon the receipt of the blank he went to every white man's house in his precinct, and requested the signature of himself, wife and grown daughters. In a few days we had a majority of the white voters.

We then saw the best and most influential colored preachers, got them to bring the subject before their congregations, and in a short time we had a majority of the negro voters. I visited every family in my vicinity, and failed in but two instances to get every name.

When the Legislature met we gave the petition to our representatives, and they had the law enacted. When the country dealers found they had been dried up they went for the town dealers, had another law passed, drying up them.

If the representatives from your county do not get the request granted, after such a petition, ask them to write their obituary, and at the next election see that they are buried, with appropriate services.

It will be well to get every church and school-house covered by a law prohibiting the sale of intoxicating liquors within its vicinity. If you can not get but one mile take it, and as much more as you can. It will work like the one measure of leaven. Cover every foot of territory as often as possible. I am covered three times; they would have to repeal three laws to reach me. Do not leave it to vote. Remember North Carolina. Petition. See every white man at his house, and he will not fail to sign your petition. Get the colored preachers to present the petition to their congregations, and have it signed in public. Keep it out of politics. Be sure to ask our Lord's aid, and you will succeed, and that soon.

MORGANSVILLE, ALA., April 10, 1882.

"Trifling With a Heart."

MR. EDITOR: There appeared in the ADVOCATE, some weeks ago, an article from Dr. West with the above caption. It must have tried the doctor's moral courage a little to have published that piece. There is so much sentimental trash now printed that a solid man like him is rather chary of an utterance of the tender feelings between the sexes. The article referred to pointed out a very common and very culpable practice. Gallantry upon the part of a gentleman is much admired from one side of the house. I do not mean officious attention; that is very disgusting. Every true gentleman is very properly mindful of wants, and attentive to any unattended lady with whom he comes in contact, whether she be young or old, rich or poor, and any little assistance rendered should be duly appreciated and thankfully acknowledged. I am sorry to say sometimes it is not. But no gentleman is excusable for paying strict and constant attention to a single young lady for several months merely for his pleasure and pastime, creating necessary surmisings, guessings and gossipings, and then suddenly leaving off and seeking some other sunny face to shed light on his idle hours. Sometimes a young gentleman will declare his love for a young lady, and vow to be faithful to her under all circumstances, and after a time, and perhaps for some frivolous thing, turn away from her, and leave her wounded in her feelings, and disappointed in one whom she had pictured, in her girlish fancy, to be all that was truly noble and good. I have heard it intimated that some of our young preachers might with profit study this subject, to enable them to give their young friends faithful warning, both by precept and example. But all the fault is not on one side of the house. As an honorable gentleman differs from a foppish coxcomb, so does a modest, affectionate lady differ from a heartless coquette. Some young women appear never so happy as when they have half a dozen young men dead in love with them at the same time. They seem to take great pleasure in thus victimizing the "lords of creation." A gentleman once said, with seeming pride and pleasure, "my wife was engaged to four other men when we were married." This might have been a compliment to his skill in the art of wooing, but it was a very poor compliment to his wife.

An engagement should be held most sacred, as it is considered a crime by the civil authorities to break this promise, and the breach is punished with an assessment for damages. If all young ladies could know the remorse of conscience which is apt to follow a breach of promise they would be more cautious in breaking such sacred promises.

A PREACHER'S WIFE.

CHANGE.—The child on whose young face the mother now gazes so tenderly changes with years into the man with furrowed brow and silvered hair; constitutions are formed and broken, friendship pass, love decays—who can say he possesses the same now that blessed him in his early life? All passes whilst we look upon it. A most unreal, imaginative life. The spirit of life ever wearing—the spirit of death ever unweaving; all things putting on change.—Robertson's Living Thoughts.

General Conference.

Dr. McAnally: There have been at least two questions before this body of intense interest. The one was disposed of yesterday. I rise now to ask the privilege of calling up the other. It is the report on church extension. I wish to get it before the members of the Conference at the earliest practicable period, so that they may analyze it and make up their minds, after due deliberation, as to its merits or demerits.

Dr. McAnally moved that it be taken up, but withdrew his motion, as all reports of committees had not been read:

After reports of committees were read, Dr. McAnally said:

I hope, Mr. Chairman, the Conference will do us the favor to grant this request. It is a matter in which they are all deeply interested. I therefore move that it be taken up this morning.

Dr. Rodgers—I move as a substitute that it be made the order of the day for ten o'clock to-morrow.

Rev. B. F. Alexander, of Louisiana, offered a resolution to the effect that further consideration of the subject be postponed to the second Wednesday of the next session of the General Conference.

Dr. McAnally called for the reading of the plan of the report. It was read. There was a great noise in the room, and Dr. McFerrin rose and requested the visitors to keep silent.

Dr. Fitzgerald said he hoped the question would come before the body, as it was one of the most important that could engage its attention. It had been put off at Atlanta four years ago, and he hoped that gag law would not be again applied.

The Conference took up the question,

Article first of the report was read. A substitute was offered, which a member said was out of order.

Dr. Hiner said he understood the article before the Conference, proposed the creation of this society. He thought that question should be considered, and then they could proceed to whatever should follow. He hoped the consideration of this matter would be fixed for to-morrow. Some of the delegates were not ready for it, but in their present state of mind were opposed to the creation of the society. He thought he was right as to the first article. If he was not, he would like to be corrected.

The chair thought he was right.

Rev. E. B. Prettyman moved to lay the substitute to the first article on the table. Carried.

In reference to the second article of the church extension report, Dr. West, of North Alabama, said he would like to give the impression that it made on his mind, and to express his sentiments. He thought it creates a board, provides officers, and demands funds for the support of the society. He thought that the Missionary Society could do all the work that this society proposes, and could do it in perfect harmony with other plans.

Dr. Anderson, of Pacific Conference, said he had not had the attention of the Conference since he came. He thought it would be most unfortunate to defeat the enterprise, and to let it remain in the Missionary Board would be like putting two irons in the fire at the same time. He thought such a society was needed in the church. He spoke of the successful working of such societies by other churches.

A motion was made to confine the discussion to the section read.

Dr. Anderson said he was perfectly willing to do so, and would postpone his speech until the whole question was brought up, and then he wanted to make a talk and have his time about it.

Dr. Edwards suggested a reconsideration of the first article of the church extension report.

Dr. Fitzgerald moved such reconsideration, so that all unnecessary discussion should be avoided, and so that it shall be determined whether there shall be such a society at all. Carried.

It was moved to make that question the order of the day for ten o'clock to-morrow. Carried.

There was a great deal of noise in the house, and Dr. McFerrin created a laugh by proposing the appointment of a sergeant-at-arms.

The secretary read the following letter:

NASHVILLE TENN., May 1, 1882.

To the Bishops and members of the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South—My Dear and Honored Brethren: I am deeply moved by your action, yesterday, in electing me a Bishop of our beloved Church. Though I might fear the responsibilities of the office, I do not shrink from the labors. Yet with a clear conviction and a deep sense of my duty, I respectfully and humbly decline to accept the position to which you have called me. I can not with a good conscience lay down the work which I have now in hand.

With perfect respect and abiding love, I am truly your brother,

ATTICUS G. HAYGOOD.

Bishop Pierce said: Let me make a remark or two on the communication which has just been read. It is due to my honored friend, Dr. Haygood, that I should say the decision announced in that paper is not with him a rash or hasty conclusion. It has been deliberately considered. After all that has been written and spoken, of course he knew the possibility and even the probability of his election. But circumstances of a peculiar kind have all along constrained him to silence. He never sought the office; never desired it. Two or three months ago I addressed him a private letter, inviting a confidential interview on this subject. He declined on the ground that his sense of propriety demanded of him absolute silence on the whole subject. I have known Dr. Haygood from his boyhood up. Our friendship has been [illegible] confidential. He came to see me, [illegible] with deep emotion purported to me his views upon this subject, and [illegible] announced to me his [illegible] decline. I was surprised. I [illegible] with him earnestly, [illegible] discussion on this important matter. He assured me that his own convictions of duty were clear, strong and decided. He is the president of Emory College. Under his administration the institution has come up from a condition of financial weakness and embarrassment into a large and successful institution. He has inaugurated plans of improvement, projected methods of life and growth and vigor of the institution largely, if not absolutely, dependent upon himself. Another man may be obtained to preside over the college, but no man can adopt the methods which he has projected, and carry them forward as successfully as he could do it. Protected by his plans and propositions, young men excluded from the advantages of higher education have come to the institution; about thirty of them are candidates for the ministry, and all of them are dependent upon his plans and arrangements, and he feels that he could not forsake them now. He has committed himself largely to education, and in view of all the surroundings and all his prospects he feels himself under obligation to the parties mentioned. These, I think, are the controlling reasons which have elicited that paper. Allow me to say that for one I could but sympathize with him. In some respects I was under a like condition when I was elected to this office, and hesitated on the same grounds, and if I had not adopted in the beginning the general rule that the voice of the church should be to me the call of Providence, I should unquestionably have resigned, as he proposes to do. Whether I acted wisely after all in accepting has been a question in my own mind. Dr. Haygood feels that he can accomplish more in his present position than in the office to which you have called him.

Dr. Boring said he would like to make a request. It was that this General Conference take no action on that communication for at least a day or two. He said he only wanted to add that while he had no right to interfere with Dr. Haygood's conscience, he felt on yesterday, at the conclusion of the election, that he knew of no man elected who was more clearly the choice of this General Conference, under the indications of divine providence, than Dr. Haygood. He hoped the Conference would defer action for at least a little farther consideration. He was satisfied that the call of the church, in such a body of Christian ministers as this, was the call of God. He so accepted it, and entreated delay on this subject.

The Rev. H. J. Adams, of North Georgia, moved as a substitute that the resignation be accepted. He knew Dr. Haygood, and thought it due him.

Dr. Boring insisted on delaying until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Dr. Hendrix: I think it is courteous to Dr. Haygood to delay, and I hope we will defer action until to-morrow.

The motion to defer prevailed.

Dr. Hiner suggested that if the word "resignation" was used that it was not the proper word. He had not been ordained. He might "decline" ordination. He was informed that "decline" was the word used.

Judge Foote said he hoped the business of the Conference would proceed in the regular order, and that members would not be allowed to take up their favorite measures out of their regular order, for if they were adopted they would leave us and go home. He hoped the business would proceed in the order in which it was found on the Journal.

The following was presented and referred to the Committee on Missions:

Resolved, That the Committee on Missions be, and are hereby, instructed to ascertain and report to this Conference, as early as possible, an itemized statement showing the amount of money expended upon the various missions of the church during the last four years, and also the present deficit of the Missionary Treasurer and during what period this deficit has been created, and also the sum that this deficit is likely to reach by the time the sessions of the Annual Conferences begin.

The Rev. P. A. Peterson, of Virginia, moved that the Conference take up for consideration the report No. 1, on Revisal, which motion was subsequently withdrawn, and Judge Wood moved that the Conference take up the reports in the order in which they were presented, which prevailed.

Report No. 1, on education, relating to the appointment of a commissioner of education in aid of the colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America was taken up and read by Dr. W. P. Harrison, chairman of the Committee on Education. Various amendments were proposed, all of which were rejected, and the report was adopted.

Report no. 2, on education, relative to the changes in the Discipline regarding the admission of male teachers in Annual Conferences and statistical reports, was taken up, but the Conference adjourned before the question came to a vote.

THURSDAY, MAY 18, 1882—FOURTEENTH DAY.

The General Conference met at nine o'clock, Bishop Keener in the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. W. A. McCurry, D. D., of Alabama. The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

Rev. H. J. Adams, of North Georgia, asked permission to present a resolution, at the same time reading a resolution providing for the election of a Bishop in place of Dr. A. G. Haygood, resigned, at twelve o'clock to-day.

Dr. Blue, of Alabama, raised the point of order that the Conference had laid over the resignation until twelve o'clock to-day, and that the question could not be taken up until that hour.

Rev. H. J. Adams, of North Georgia, said that the question would not be considered until twelve o'clock, but he only wanted the resolution adopted so that the Bishop could be elected at that hour.

Bishop Pierce (in the chair) decided the point of order well taken, and the question could not be taken up.

Mr. Adams then moved that the Conference do not adjourn until the election of a Bishop, as the new Bishops would be ordained at four o'clock, and he wanted to have all ordained at once.

Bishop Pierce, in reply, announced that the question could not be taken up.

Dr. W. W. Bennett, chairman of the Committee on Episcopacy, read the following report:

The committee has considered a paper signed Jordan Stokes, in reference to Episcopal visitation of our mission fields, and think that no action on this subject is necessary.

2. Also a paper signed J. E. Edwards and W. W. Walker, in reference to Episcopal visitation to the presiding elders' districts, and requiring such visitation to be made previous to the sessions of the Annual Conferences over which the Bishops are to preside, instead of afterward. The committee is of opinion that no action is necessary.

The question of conducting Annual Conferences was considered upon a paper presented to the committee by John B. McFerrin, and, after full discussion of the committee adopted the following, which is presented and recommended for adoption by the Conference:

Resolved, That in the judgment of this committee sufficient time should be given at all the Annual Conferences for full opportunity of deliberately transacting the business of the Conference, and that sufficient time should be taken to deliberate carefully the stationing of the preachers.

2. That the adjournment of the Annual Conferences on Sunday night is inexpedient, and makes a bad impression on the public mind, and should be avoided, unless in cases of extreme necessity.

3. That the Bishops be earnestly requested to so arrange the dates of the meeting of the Annual Conferences as to give themselves full time to conduct the business of the Conferences.

When Dr. Bennett had reached the name of Dr. McFerrin in reading the report, Dr. Anson West, of Alabama, raised the question of order that the paper reported upon was referred to the committee by Dr. McFerrin, and not by the Conference, and that the committee had no jurisdiction over a paper which was not referred by the Conference.

In reply Dr. Bennett said the subject had been before the committee upon the consideration of other papers, and the committee voted almost unanimously to consider the paper of Dr. McFerrin.

Bishop Pierce deemed, after the explanation, the paper properly before the committee, and the report should be considered.

On motion of Dr. Edwards, of Virginia, the report was adopted.

The Rev. Mr. Anderson was granted leave to present the following memorial, and have it referred to the Committee on Missions:

SACRAMENTO, CAL., May [illegible].

At a meeting of the Board of Trustees and Stewards of Sacramento Station, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, it was resolved that we present the condition of our affairs to our General Conference, now in session at Nashville, Tenn.

We are a small membership and congregation, and have been struggling to maintain our existence as a station. We have not been able to raise more than eight hundred dollars per annum for the support of our pastor, besides other expenses, for a number of years previous to the coming of our present pastor, Brother Anderson, who has a large number of friends outside of the congregation who have enabled us to do better by him.

Our house of worship needed repairs throughout, to restore it from decay and ruin. Plastering, painting, platform, pulpit, railing, carpet, etc., on the inside, and roof and sidewalk repairs on the outside all had to receive our attention. One year ago we took advantage of Brother Anderson's pastorate, and made inside improvements, when we found that we could not prudently incur additional expenses by improving the outside.

We have a total indebtedness of nearly one thousand dollars, being balance on improvement and a small incidental sum. To enable us to pay off our present indebtedness, protect the improvements just completed, and support our pastor, it was further resolved that we memorialize our General Conference for an appropriation of six hundred dollars to complete repairs on church building, and for the procuring of a parsonage the additional sum of twenty-five hundred dollars, a total of thirty-one hundred dollars, which sum we deem necessary to relieve us of the burden which endangers the loss of our property and the existence of our station.

We hereby authorize and request our delegates and pastor, Rev. T. H. B. Anderson, D. D., to present the claims of this charge, and to state such facts as are pertinent thereto.

The following report on revisal, No. 8, was read and laid over under the rule:

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report that they have given patient and close consideration to divers memorials on the subject of a change in the name of our church. One from the Nozosha District Conference, one from the Lexington District Conference, one from the Walnut street Quarterly Conference, one from the Washington-avenue Quarterly Conference, one from the Lydia-avenue Quarterly Conference, one from the Miami and Mt. Carmel Quarterly Conference, all of the Southwest Missouri Conference; and also one from the Quarterly Conference, Station, North Texas Conference. The committee recommend for adoption the following paper, to wit:

Whereas, The word South, as affixed to our name, was the result of the plan of separation of 1844, and was designed to have simply a geographical meaning; and

Whereas, The dividing line in said plan has long since been utterly obliterated and ignored by both branches of the church, thereby freeing us from any geographical limitation; and

Whereas, This fact renders the aforesaid word in its aforesaid geographical meaning a misnomer; and

Whereas, The opinion extensively prevails that the word "South" in our name has either a political or sectional meaning; and

Whereas, This fact operates in many portions of our country as a serious hinderance to our work, and in many places almost utterly shuts the door of success against us; therefore,

Resolved, That we recommend the elimination of the word "South" from the name of our church.

Resolved, That we recommend a change in the order of the appellative words "Methodist" and "Episcopal," making the name "Episcopal Methodist Church."

Resolved, That the above resolutions be submitted to all the Annual Conferences, to be acted on by them at their next ensuing sessions, and that their decision on the case be final.

Dr. J. B. A. Ahrens, of the German Mission, gave notice that he would submit a minority report.

The following report on revisal, No. 9, was read and laid over under the rule for future action:

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report as follows:

1. W. S. Johnson and John A. Carter ask that it be made the duty of Joint Boards of Finance to receive and pay over to the Bishops the money collected for their support; and that they also be required to preserve a record of their transactions. We deem any further legislation on these subjects unnecessary, and recommend non-concurrence.

2. John E. Edwards and R. N. Sledd, ask that the Discipline prescribe who shall be the chairman of the stewards' meeting, or else how he shall be chosen. We deem it best to leave this question where it is, and therefore recommend non-concurrence.

3. H. J. Adams and W. A. Turner, ask that Annual Conferences be required to sit one week, unless three-fourths vote to adjourn earlier. We recommend non-concurrence.

4. The same persons also ask that the reading out the appointments of the preachers by the Bishop on the Sabbath-day be forbidden. Your committee, believing that the instances in which this has been done are exceptional, and that the circumstances rendered it necessary, would recommend non-concurrence.

5. Charles E. Brown, Horace Bishop, A. Davis, and Wm Price ask that stewards be required to make assessments for the support of the ministry on the members of the church, and that refusal to pay said assesments shall be dealt with as an immorality. We recommend non-concurrence.

6. O. R. Blue and J. B. McFerrin ask that the phrase "and relations" be restored as part of question 3, section 2, chapter 2, page 43, of the Discipline, for the reason that it was left out of the book without authority. We recommend non-concurrence.

7. E. B. Prettyman and J. S. Gardener ask for certain changes in the order of Quarterly Conference business. Believing that the object contemplated in the proposed change is secured by existing regulations, we recommend non-concurrence.

8. E. S. Smith, B. D. Orgain, J. T. Swearingen, and H. V. Philpott ask that the law relating to deacons and elders, who cease to travel without the consent of the Annual Conference, be so amended as to provide for the formal trial of such delinquents. Believing that the Discipline now provides for such a trial, your committee deem further legislation unnecessary.

9. A paper presented by E. A. Yates, T. S. Burkhead, and N. M. Lawrence, and one by N. H. H. Wilson and H. T. Hudson, asks that the Discipline be so amended as to require a special meeting of the official members, or board of stewards, to be held to perfect the financial and statistical report of their charge, to be presented to the Annual Conference, in case there was a failure to make up said report at the fourth Quarterly Conference. We recommend non-concurrence.

10. A memorial from Lehi Quarterly Conference, Pine Bluff District, Little Rock Conference, asks that question 1, and 2, in the order of Quarterly Conference business be stricken out. We recommend non-concurrence.

11. A paper signed by John E. Edwards and George M. Bain, one by W. L. C. Hunnicutt, S. B. Watts, and C. B. Galloway, and one by J. B. McGehee and J. S. Key, ask for sundry changes suggested would not be improvements, and we therefore recommend non-concurrence.

J. D. Barbee asks that the presiding elder only have the right to nominate the district steward. We recommend non-concurrence.

13. A memorial from the Quarterly Conference of Trinity charge, South Carolina Conference, asks that the traveling expenses of preachers be raised on a special assessment to be made for that purpose, to be collected by the stewards. Believing that the manner of raising the money for the object specified had better be left to the discretion of the Board of Stewards, we recommend non-concurrence.

14. W. W. Graham asks that a member of the church refusing to give testimony when required so to do shall be dealt with as in the case of one charged with immorality. Believing that the law now amply provides for the punishment of such offenders, we recommend non-concurrence.

The Committee on Appeals, on the case of Rev. Amos Kendall, of the Mississippi Conference, remanded it for a new trial.

The Committee on Education report as follows:

Your committee have carefully considered the paper referred to them, and signed by J. D. Shaw and D. H. Snyder; also one signed by W. F. Cook, C. W. Carter, and A. B. Stark, beg leave to report;

We recommend that in chapter 2, section 2, question 8, answer 1, page 50, line 8 from the bottom of the page, after the word "Conference" these words be inserted: "organize a Conference Board of Education," so that the paragraph will read:

Answer 1. Let every Annual Conference organize a Conference Board of Education: Inquire into the state and character of all the institutions of learning that may be under its care, and the best means of promoting their interests, and, if necessary, of increasing their number.

We recommend that in chapter 3, section 4, answer 16, page 83, the following words be inserted: "To preach upon the subject of Christian education," so that answer 16 shall read:

16. "To preach upon the subject of Christian education, and to urge upon parents the importance of educating their children, advising them to patronize, as far as practicable, those institutions of learning under the care of our church.

After a long and patient examination of all propositions relating to the subject, the committee deem it inexpedient to organize a General Conference Board of Education at the present time.

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence present the following resolution which was adopted:

Resolved, That this Conference has heard with deep emotion the expressions of sympathy in the resolutions by the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, on the death of Rev. Thomas O. Summers, D. D., L.L. D., and hereby record on the Journal the profound sense of loss which said church feels in view of the relation of the deceased to Christian literature, to Methodism everywhere, and in particular to themselves as a father and friend in the best sense of the word.

Rev. A. S. Hunt, D. D., secretary of the American Bible Society, was presented to the Conference, and took a seat among the Bishops, on the speaker's stand.

Judge Ireland, of Western Virginia, presented a resolution which was adopted, authorizing the appointment of a committee to call upon Mrs. ex-President James K. Polk, and ask when it would suit her to have the Conference call upon her in a body.

Permission was asked, and leave granted, to introduce the following resolution, which was referred to the Committee on Bible Cause.

Whereas, In the headings of the chapters in the Spanish version of the Scriptures, as published by the American Bible Society, there are notes and comments contrary to the published plans of said society, and

Whereas, The said notes and comments are very erroneous, as we consider, in that they teach the peculiar doctrines known as Calvinism: therefore be it

Resolved, That it is contrary to the principles and policy of the American Bible Society to teach the peculiar doctrine of any church, but to publish the Holy Scriptures in all languages without note or comment, and that the said society be, and is, hereby requested to discontinue the publication of said headings from its future editions of the Spanish Scriptures.

The time for the consideration of the subject of church extension, made the special order for ten o'clock, having arrived, Dr. Hiner, of Kentucky, secured the floor. He said that the church was making advances all along the line, but the election of a treasurer and secretary of the missionary board, and the proposed election of a secretary on church extension, was mostly advance. The people have always believed that the money contributed by them for missionary work went to the purposes for which it was intended, but the payment of these salaried officers might have some effect on the collections. His Conference, he said, took up collections for church extension, and within the bounds of that Conference seven or eight churches were now in course of erection. He would move that the whole matter be recommitted to the Committee on Church Extension, with instructions to report an amendment to the Discipline requiring collections to be taken up in all the Annual Conferences for the purpose of church extension. He proposed the following amendment, signed by himself, J. W. Proctor, C. W. Miller, H. P. Walker and J. W. Fitch, which he desired to be passed in lieu of the second section of the plan proposed, now under consideration by the Conference:

Resolved, That said church extension shall be under the control and direction of the several Annual Conferences through their Board of Missions, in all respects as the funds raised for Domestic Missions is now assessed, apportioned, and distributed.

Dr. D. R. McAnally, of St. Louis, asked that the report of the Committee on Church Extension be read, which was done by the Secretary.

Dr. W. M. Rush, of Missouri, contended that the measure proposed by Dr. Hiner would do well enough for the old established Conferences, but when Montana, Columbia, and Denver were reached, it was different. Forty years had he served on the border, and he knew the substitute would not answer, as it might in the Gulf and Atlantic Conferences.

Dr. O. P. Fitzgerald, of the Pacific, referred to section 6 of the proposed plan for Church Extension, and reading it, said this movement was a great necessity. Unless the society was created, the church could not compete with the other denominations in the West—a field in which he had worked for twenty-four years, and whose wants he knew, and he would say if the society was not created the church might as well withdraw from those fields and leave our men there to perish, and build a Chinese wall around the old Conferences and die of inaction. The Southern Methodist church had been instrumental in the conversion of as many souls on the Pacific coast as any other church. As to the cost of the society he said it would not exceed six thousand dollars, and he thought four thousand would be a nearer estimate, and it would be worth fifty thousand dollars annually to the church. The speaker referred to the great work of the church-extension society of the Northern church, which had averaged the building of one church a day. Dr. Fitzgerald insisted that these great fields did not belong to other churches exclusively, but that Southern Methodism had a work to do in all the great West.

Dr. T. H. B. Anderson, of the Pacific, said that the Northern church took up eleven collections annually, while the Southern Methodist church took up not so many, and the most popular collection among the Northern Methodists was the church extension collection. He recited instances of the work done by them, and said that the height of his ambition, if he wished to make his life a success, would be to be placed in charge of the business of the Church-extension Society. He pictured the great results which would follow the creation of the Society, and was frequently applauded.

Dr. J. W. Fitch, of Kentucky, as one of the signers of the substitute, said that he was heartily in favor of the object sought to be reached, yet he did not want to increase the church-machinery and thought its duties could be performed by the Board of Missions.

Dr. J. S. Key, of South Georgia, heartily favored the organization of the society, and thought the substitute proposed would so load down the Board of Missions as to make it ineffective. He thought that the office of Secretary of church-extension was necessary. He felt the want of such a society in his own district as well as others.

Dr. Hendrix, of Missouri, thought that adding the work of church extension would so cripple the work of the Board of Missions as to render it ineffective, and he urged the creation of another officer whose entire time should be devoted to the work of the society. He insisted that no organization had ever prospered without an individual head, and that the society should be made a distinctive feature of our economy.

Dr. Hiner expressed a willingness to withdraw his substitute, provided something was inserted in the plan of organization by which some of the money raised should be expended in the Conference from which it came.

Rev. R. Richardson, of Holston, arose with the intention of presenting an amendment, but was declared out of order.

Rev. C. E. Brown, of Northwest Texas, referred to the work of the church-extension society of the Northern Methodist church, in building 56 churches in Texas, 28 in Canada, 130 west of the Mississippi River, and with equal results in other parts of the country. He believed that a great deal could be accomplished by such an organization.

Mr. Cupples, of St. Louis, said that all the discussion had been done by the ministry, and he thought the lay members ought to have a representative. He wished the members of the Conference to look at the question of dollars and cents while they were considering it. There was no comparison between the Methodist Church, North, and the Methodist Church, South, and we could not do what they were doing. As far as the practical results were concerned, every one knew that the people of Missouri would not contribute to the building of a church in Montana, nor the people of Virginia to build a church in Missouri. Missouri to-day wanted ten churches where her people are able to build one.

Rev. E. B. Prettyman, of Baltimore, said that the most eastern Conference of the church should be heard. He heartily favored the creation of the society, and was a member of the committee which recommended the plan under discussion. He opposed placing the work in the hands of the Missionary Board, and gave instances of the urgent necessities of the work in the western border-fields.

Rev. C. A. Vandeventer, of Missouri, was heartily in favor of church extension, and referred to the great good which could be accomplished under the proper working of such a society as it was proposed to organize.

Dr. H. P. Walker, of Kentucky, was also a signer of the substitute, and favored the society, but he wished at least sixty per cent. of the funds raised to be disbursed in the Conference where it was collected.

Dr. J. B. McFerrin said that great work could be done with such an organization. All the objections raised amounted to nothing at all. Nothing could be accomplished without a head or an agent. The Missionary Secretary was now doing the work of two men. He had been Missionary Secretary for twelve years, and not one dollar was spent by him so well as in helping destitute churches. There was no such thing as competition. He would say, "God bless every man who is trying to save souls." (Applause.) He believed in spending liberally, and the returns would be a thousand-fold.

Prof. N. T. Lupton favored the movement. It was a spontaneous movement and universal, but the only trouble was in the manner of organization. He told several incidents from his own travels through the territories, showing the importance of such an organization, whose purpose would be the building of churches in needy neighborhoods.

Rev. R. Smithson, of Baltimore, called the previous question, which, on a vote of the Conference, was agreed to, and the substitute proposed by Dr. Hiner was rejected, and the first article of the report, creating the Society for Church Extension, was adopted.

Article 2 was taken up and adopted without discussion.

The hour for the consideration of the resignation of Dr. Haygood, made the special order for 12 M., having arrived, Dr. O. R. Blue, of Alabama, moved that the special order be suspended until the completion of the consideration of the subject of church extension, which motion failed.

Dr. Boring, of North Georgia, said that he moved, on yesterday, that the consideration of Dr. Haygood's declination be laid over until to-day, and he did so that the church and Dr. Haygood might consider the subject, and that he might have a conference with Dr. Haygood. He had since conferred with him, and found him fixed in his purpose not to accept. He regretted the declination.

Dr. J. E. Evans, of North Georgia, moved that the resignation be accepted.

George Thornburg, of the White River, moved the adoption of the following resolution:

Whereas, The General Conference has fully performed its resolution to elect five Bishops; therefore be it

Resolved, That we take no further action in the matter.

Dr. M. S. Andrews, of Alabama, asked if it would be in order to make a motion that the ordination of Dr. Haygood be postponed.

The Chair replied in the negative.

Dr. H. F. Johnson, of Mississippi, moved that the resignation of Dr. Haygood be spread upon the minutes of the Conference.

Secretary Martin said that a motion was unnecessary, as the resignation had already been spread upon the minutes.

J. H. H. Liggatt, of Baltimore, did not think it would be exactly right to elect five Bishops and ordain four. He thought that the Conference should elect a fifth.

F. Law, of Alabama, proposed the following resolution in lieu of all motions, resolutions and amendments:

Whereas, This General Conference did resolve to elect two Bishops, and in accordance with said resolution has elected that number, and

Whereas, One of those so elected has declined to be consecrated to said office; therefore be it

Resolved, That this General Conference elect no other Bishop.

Dr. Tudor moved that the Conference reconsider its action in adopting a resolution to elect five Bishops.

The previous question was called, and the resolution presented by F. Law, of Alabama, was adopted.

The Conference then, on motion of W. W. Bennett, of Virginia, resumed the consideration of the question of church extension.

Article 3 of the plan was adopted.

Article 4 was taken up, and amendments were proposed by W. M. Rush, of Missouri; J. H. Scarritt, of Southwest Missouri, which were rejected, and the article as presented was adopted.

Article 5 was taken up, and pending it consideration the hour for adjournment arrived.

A motion to adjourn until eight o'clock failed, but upon motion of Dr. Edwards, of Virginia, the hour for meeting was fixed at half-past eight o'clock instead of nine.

The chair announced the appointment of the committee to wait upon Mrs. ex-President Polk, and learn when it would suit her convenience to receive a call from the Conference.

After the announcement of the meetings of committees and religious services for the night, the Conference adjourned with the benediction by Rev. Dr. A. S. Hunt.

FRIDAY, MAY 19—FIFTEENTH DAY.

The Conference met at half-past eight o'clock this morning, Bishop Pierce in the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by the Rev. Isaac G. John, of Galveston. The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

S. B. Watts, of Texas, presented a resolution providing for afternoon sessions of the Conference from next Monday, but he withdrew the resolution before it came to a vote.

Mr. Powell, of Alabama, presented a resolution providing for the election of the officers of the church to be elected, but withdrew the resolution at the request of several members.

T. W. Dye, of the North Mississippi Conference, arose to correct an error in the report wherein the name of Amos Kendall was printed instead of Lewis Kendall. The report of the committee was read as follows:

Lewis Kendall, elder in the Mississippi Conference, expelled—remanded for a new trial.

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report as follows:

1. They have considered a paper presented by W. L. C. Hunnicutt, C. B. Galloway and C. S. Steward; one by Isaac Hardeman and G. W. Hinton; and one by N. Scarritt, asking that the Discipline be amended so as to make it designate what Conference is meant—whether General or Annual—in the parenthetical clause, contained in paragraph 1, section 1, chapter 8, page 160, and recommend that the word "General" be inserted before "Conference," in said paragraph, so that it shall read thus: "The appellant shall either state personally or by his representative (who shall be a member of the General Conference.")

2. B. F. Alexander, P. P. Ellis and C. W. Carter ask that answer 2 to question 3, section 2, chapter 3, page 71 of the Discipline be amended so that it shall authorize a Bishop to appoint a preacher for a longer time than four years to institutions of learning not under the care of our church.

We recommend that said answer 2 be amended by striking out at the bottom of page 71 the clause "for a longer time than two years," so that the paragraph, as amended, shall read thus: "and also, when requested by an Annual Conference, to appoint a preacher to any seminary of learning not under our care."

3. A memorial from the Local Preachers' Conference for North Carolina asks the law relating to the trial of local preachers, as it existed previous to the General Conference of 1878, be restored.

We recommend concurrence in the memorial as a whole, but we recommend that answer 1 to question 2, page 147, be amended by striking out the clause: "in the absence of a bill of charges signed by a member of our Church," so that the paragraph, as amended, shall read: "When a local preacher is under report of immorality, the preacher in charge shall appoint a committee of three members of the Church," etc.

J. T. S. Wade, J. W. Fitch, and H. C. Ireland, ask that the Discipline, chapter 9, question 1, page 170, be amended, so as to require each member of the Church to pay toward the support of the ministry.

We recommend non-concurrence.

Dr. John E. Edwards and R. N. Sledd, of Virginia, presented the following resolution:

Resolved, That the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Conference assembled hereby express it as the sense of this representative body that the American Bible Society ought not to make disproportionately large and liberal grants of Bibles to Churches and denominational associations for distribution, on their own account, that do not co-operate with and contribute to the funds of the Society, to aid it in printing and circulating the holy Scriptures, "without note or comment," in accordance with the commonly received version.

Dr. Edwards, in presenting the resolution, said that the reports of the society show that they have made disproportionately large grants to churches and denominational associations who do not co-operate and contribute to its support.

The resolution was adopted.

Drs. D. C. Kelley, R. A. Young, and J. B. McFerrin, of Tennessee, presented the following resolutions, which were adopted:

Whereas, a previous General Conference had requested Bishop Wightman to prepare a suitable biography of Bishop Joshua Soule; and,

Whereas, the death of Bishop Wightman had suspended the work, we deem it desirable that this General Assembly commit the completion of this work to other competent hands; therefore,

Resolved, That it is the sense of this Conference that Bishop H. N. McTyeire, by many tokens, as well as by the desire of the surviving members of Bishop Soule's family, is the proper person to complete this work.

2. That, should Bishop McTyeire find that the material to be obtained at this late day is not sufficient for a book such as he would regard worthy of the character of Bishop Soule, that we request him to give to the Church, through the Quarterly Review, such a digest of the materials as he may judge best.

Rev. P. A. Peterson and Dr. Edwards, of Virginia, presented the following resolution, which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Book Agent be directed to print, in a cheap and convenient form, for the use of candidates for church-membership, the questions and answers contained in the baptismal service for adults, and in the service for the reception and recognition of church-members.

Rev. C. E. Dawman, of Florida, suggested that the "General Rules of the Church" be included in the resolution, but no motion to that effect was recognized.

Rev. P. A. Peterson, of Virginia, stated that the object was to print and distribute the work free of charge.

Dr. J. E. Edwards, of Virginia, said that he had been a pastor for forty-seven consecutive years, and he often felt the necessity of such a work, and urged the Conference to order it.

Mr. President and Christian Friends: I certainly do not feel myself a stranger as I stand before you this morning, and I hesitate, because I am so much at home, to take even a few minutes of your time. I wish to say, sir, that the American Bible Society, during the last quadrennium, has been prosecuting its work with undiminished vigor, and has done the most successful work in the history of the Society. There are new features in the work which have been entirely developed during this quadrennium. The result of our efforts is, that we have nearly 200 men employed in this work at the present time, and a larger proportion in that part of the country which is more particularly your own field. I call your attention to it simply by way of illustration.

During the past four years, in Texas alone, 165,000 families have been visited by the Bible Society, and 27,000 of them supplied. In the State of Georgia, during the four years, 52,000 families have been visited. About one-fourth have been destitute freedmen, and all who were able to read have been given the Holy Scriptures. Wherever the work has been carried it has been successful.

Foreign work has been its aim in every direction. During these four years, the Turkish Bible has been completed; the Japanese New Testament, and other works. It has been their object to meet the demands of the Indians of our own continent as well as the various parts of the wide world, distributing the Scriptures in seventy-seven different languages and dialects through the various missionary organizations. And I wish to say that the policy of the American Bible Society is to know no denomination as such, but to work for and through all denominations.

It is true that we have not found it necessary to employ agents in foreign countries, except three in the American continent and five on the eastern. In Mexico the work has developed largely, and it is necessary to have a representative of our own. We are always glad to have an expression of opinion upon our work. We want to do the work in the best possible way. Find all the fault you can, and if given in a kindly spirit, it will be kindly received. We are distributing Bibles among pagans, Mohammedans, and in the fields of the Roman Catholic Church, and throughout this entire continent. We are meeting the Greek Church in Russia and Greece in all her forms, and you can not find a single field where there is not some representative of our American Bible Society. We have never had a quadrennium of such success. We have distributed 1,121,000 copies of the Scriptures. Right in the great metropolis people come from foreign shores and tarry with us awhile, and then scatter all over the country. A question arises: What shall we do with the people who come to us from the midst of superstition? The American Bible Society sends its agents there, and last year alone put nearly 80,000 copies of the Scriptures into the hands of men who had just put foot upon American soil. We scatter the Bible among all nations.

Dr. Hunt told of a Chinaman in whose hands a Bible was placed by the American Bible Society, who, when he learned the truth as it is in Jesus, asked, "And is it true that the Saviour lives?" He prayed for forgiveness of his sins, and felt that they were forgiven. He was about thirty miles from Shanghai, and asked to be carried there, and said he wanted to be a missionary. The people were astonished that he, a cripple as he was, wanted to be a missionary. But he insisted, and procured him a room, and several have been converted by the effort of that one man. He also told of his pleasant relation with our Bishops who have gone to rest, and with Dr. Lovick Pierce, who in each letter used to say, "It is about time for me to write you another love-letter."

When Dr. Hunt had concluded he received great applause. The Rev. P. A. Peterson started the hymn, "Children of the Heavenly King," and the Conference joined.

PINKETY WINK.

Miss Pinkety Wink she had eyes that would blink
And small feet that turned out at the toes;
She had neat little hands, hair braided in bands,
And her cheeks they were red as a rose,
And she always was dressed in fine clothes.

Miss Pinkety Wink, I am sure you will think
Was a very nice lady indeed;
She was pretty and still, and she never got ill,
For the doctor there never was need;
To her mistress she always gave heed.

But Pinkety Wink, I'm afraid you will sink
When I tell you how sad was her fate;
For on airing gone out, and while riding about
In her fine little carriage in state,
It turned over, oh, sad to relate.

Poor Pinkety Wink, with her eyes that would blink,
From her shoulders had dropped off her head.
Little Carrie, she cried, while vainly she tried
Her dear dolly to mend; then she said,
"I'm afraid my sweet Pinkety is dead."

Now what do you think? Well, Pinkety Wink
She carried right straight to mamma,
Who melted some glue, and made her quite new;
And now Carrie is laughing, "Ha! ha!
Was there ever so killed a mamma!"

Electric Lamps.

If we examine one of the electric lamps in the streets, we shall find it consists of two rods, one pointing upward from the bottom of the lamp, the other hanging downward. The rods seem to touch, and the brilliant flame is exactly where they seem to meet. Once a day a man comes around with a bag of the rods. He takes out the old rods that were burned the night before, and places a new set in each lamp. After he has gone about, as if he were putting new wicks into the lamps, and each is ready for its night's work, all the lamps are lighted in broad day, to see that every one is in proper trim. They are allowed to burn until the men have walked about in the streets and looked at each lamp. If all are burning well, they are put out till it begins to grow dark. If one fails to burn properly, a man goes to that lamp to see what is the matter. The rods are made of a curious black substance, like charcoal, that is called carbon. When the lamp is out, the two rods touch each other. In order to light the lamp, they are pulled apart; and if you look at the flame through a smoked glass, you will see that the rods do not quite touch. There is a small space between their points, and this space is filled with fire. Look at the other parts of the rods, or the copper wires that extend along the streets. They have no light, no heat, no sound. The wires are cold, dark, and silent. If we were to push the two rods in the lamp close together, the light and heat would disappear, and the curious hissing sound would stop. Why is this? Let us go to the woods near some brook, and it may be that we can understand this matter.

Here is the brook, flowing quietly along, smooth, deep, and without a ripple. We walk beside the stream, and come to a place where there are high rocks, and steep, stony banks. Here the channel is very narrow, and the water is no longer smooth and silent. It boils and foams between the rocks. There are eddies and whirlpools, and at last we come to the narrowest part of all. Here, the once dark and silent water roars and foams in white, stormy rapids. There are sounds and furious leaping and rushing water and clouds of spray. What is the matter? Why is the smooth, dark water so white with rage, so impetuous, so full of sounds and turmoil? The rocks are the cause. The way is narrow and steep. The waters are hemmed in, and there is a grand display of dashing white foam and roaring water-falls, as the waters struggle together to get past the narrow place.

It is the same with the electricity flowing through the large copper wires. It passes down one wire into the other, through the lamp, in silence and darkness, so long as the rods touch and the path is clear. When the rods in the lamp are pulled apart, there is a space to be got over, an obstruction, like rocks in the bed of the brook. The electricity, like the water, struggles to get over the hindrance in its path, and it grows white-hot with anger, and flames and hisses as it leaps across the narrow space between the rods.

There is another kind of electric lamp, used in houses; it has a smaller and softer light, steady, white, and very beautiful.

In these lamps, also, we have something like the narrow place in the brook. They are made with slender loops of carbon, inclosed in glass globes. The electricity, flowing silently through a dark wire, enters the lamp, and finds only a narrow thread on which it can travel to reach the home-going wire, and, in its struggle to get past, it heats the tiny thread of carbon to whiteness. Like a live coal, this slender thread gives us a mild, soft light, as long as the current flows. It seems calm and still, but it is enduring the same fury of the electricity that is shown in the larger lamps.

This is the main idea on which these lamps are made. A stream of electricity is set flowing from a dynamo-electric machine through a wire until it meets a narrow place or a break in the wire. Then it seeks to get past the obstruction, and there is a grand putting forth of energy, and in this way the electric force, although itself invisible, is made known to our eyes by a beautiful light.

Chip-Reading.

Chip reading! What is that? some of our young readers may say. Read the following talk of a father to his son, and you will find out. All the boys and girls who are fond of reading the cheap and silly fiction that is so plentifully seen in these days, will understand the talk about chips. Here it is:

A boy returned from school one day with a report that his scholarship had fallen below the usual average.

"Well," said the father, "You've fallen behind this month, have you?"

"Yes, sir."

"How did it happen?"

"Don't know, sir."

The father knew, if the son did not. He had observed a number of dime novels and illustrated story papers scattered about the house; but had not thought it worth while to say anything until a fitting opportunity should offer itself. A basket of apples stood upon the floor. And he said to his son:

"Empty out those apples, and take the basket, and bring it to me half full of chips."

Suspecting nothing, the son obeyed.

"And now," he continued, "put those apples back into the basket."

When half the apples were replaced, the son said:

"Father, they roll off. I can't put in any more."

"Put them in, I tell you my son."

"But, father, I can't put them in."

"No, of course you can't put them in. Do you expect to fill a basket half full of chips and then fill it with apples? You said your didn't know why you fell behind at school; and I will tell you. Your mind is like that basket. It will not hold more than so much. And here you've been the past month, filling it up with chip dirt—dime novels and silly stories."

The boy turned on his heel, whistled, and said, "Whew! I see the point."

No such reading has been seen in that house from that day.

EXISTENCE AND MINISTRY OF ANGELS.—No fact beyond the limits of our world is more prominent in the declarations of the Bible, than the existence of a high order of intelligencies denominated angels. The equivocal and the lower application of the term in a number of instances can detract nothing from the palpable evidence of the fact. But who and what are angels? The effect of an assemblage of passages relating to them in the Bible, the inscriptions, narratives, and allusions, would seem to give an idea wholly different from that of stationary residents in particular parts of the creation—an idea, rather, of perpetual ministerial agency, in a diversified distribution of appointments, many of them occasional and temporary, in the fulfillment of which multitudes of them visit or sojourn in this world.—John Foster.

Our New Editor.

The connection of the undersigned with the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, as editor, ceases with the present number of the paper. After twelve years of labor in this department of church work other labors and responsibilities have been assigned me. It is with some feelings of regret that I part with the readers of the ADVOCATE. The aim has been to do them good. May it so appear in "that day."

It is with great gratification that I introduce to the friends of the ADVOCATE Rev. Charles B. Galloway as my successor. He was duly elected at a meeting of the Publishing Committee, May 30, and from this date assumes editorial charge. For the present he will be assisted in the office by Dr. C. W. Carter, who consents to perform such service as may be necessary during Bro. Galloway's occasional absence. Our new editor is well known in the churches, and especially in Mississippi, as a sound Methodist, an eloquent preacher and a facile writer. I have no doubt that he will put new life and interest into the paper, and that the change will impart freshness and power to its columns. Him, and the dear old ADVOCATE, I do most heartily commend to our people.

With such support as the preachers and people can give, a new era of prosperity and usefulness will open, and the paper will be more successful than ever. In retiring from the editorial chair I most sincerely invoke the divine blessing upon all our readers, and upon all who are in any way connected with the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. Wherever my lot may fall, my prayers will go up for the prosperity of the paper. May it abound more and more in all the elements of a faithful religious newspaper.

LINUS PARKER.

I am profoundly grateful to my honored predecessor for the above graceful introduction. By the voice of the church, which, to him, is the call of God, he has been invited to a higher sphere and wider responsibilities. He is no longer Mr. Editor, but Bishop Parker. In his new office he will have no truer, warmer friends than the readers of the ADVOCATE. You will miss his wise control of the paper, but his letters will often enrich our columns. The lateness of the hour before going to press allows only this word: Trusting that the ADVOCATE may not suffer loss in these new hands, and that the cordial support and confidence you have extended the retiring editor may greet his successor.

Adjourned.

The General Conference adjourned without day, at six P. M. Thursday, May 25. The last thing considered was the report of the Committee on Revisions, recommending that the name of the church be changed to "The Episcopal Methodist Church." The report contemplated an immediate action of the General Conference by a two-thirds vote, and the submitting of the question at once to the Annual Conferences, their concurrence by a three-fourths vote, making the change a finality. A substitute, however, was adopted, by which the name is to be changed to "The Methodist Episcopal Church in America, provided the Annual Conferences adopt it by the usual vote of three-fourths, and it receives the constitutional two-thirds vote in the General Conference to be held four years hence. The matter can not, therefore, be determined until 1886. As between the names, that of the substitute will probably meet with more general acceptance than the other. It is useless to anticipate what shall be. The old name will fly at the mast head for some time yet, and perhaps always. The debate on the change of name was earnest and as able as any debate can be under the five minutes' rule. Even when the speaker's time was extended the break in his speech impaired its force, if it did not altogether destroy its power.

The closing exercises were marked by deep spiritual feeling, the singing hearty, the prayer full of unction, and there were shouts, amens, and hand-shaking and embracing. In a few hours most of the delegates had left for home, and thus, in the utmost peace and good-will, the session came to an end. All in all, it was the most harmonious General Conference we have ever attended. In it no friendships were broken, but many were made. We recall no instances in which the courtesies of debate were violated; there were few, if any, harsh words, and no offensive personalities. The order, on the whole, was exceptionally good, and the delegates behaved themselves as Christian gentlemen.

Our temperance friends will rejoice over the fact that a section on temperance was reported and ordered to be put in the Discipline. Its language is very explicit, and there need be no doubt of the law on the subject now. Those who opposed this special legislation were faithful to the principles of temperance, but they believed that the rule on that question was sufficiently clear. Good and wise men differ. The line must be drawn somewhere, as it would be impracticable to mention all the vices that afflict society. It may however, be expedient to name certain forms of evil which most threaten the purity of the church. Those who join us will then know the import of their vows, and the pastor will be aided in the faithful administration of the Discipline of the church.

One of the most animated and able debates took place on a report from the Committee on Revisals recommending changes in the baptismal service and other parts of the ritual. The characteristic conservatism of the body was shown in the prompt and decided manner in which these changes were rejected. The laymen were especially firm in their preference for the old forms. The old book is about as it was, and not much harm has been done—perhaps no harm at all. The organization of the Church Extension Society was perfected, its location was fixed at Louisville, and Rev. David Morton was elected secretary. He is regarded as a fit man for the place, and it is to be hoped that the work will start off vigorously. Of this society much is expected. The church needs such an arm of service, and it must be made effective.

We have said nothing in our notes about the meeting of the "Executive Committee of the Woman's Missionary Society." The ladies, however, were out in full force, their daily meetings in the auditorium of McKendree were largely attended, and at times relieved the pressure of the crowded Conference-room. A speaker in the General Conference alluded them as "the upper house," and he was not called to order. The General Conference gave the Woman's Missionary Society a new constitution; Mrs. Hayes was re-elected president, and Mrs. Butler remains as editor of their paper. We were not able to attend any of their meetings, but were informed that there was much enthusiasm, and prospects of enlarged usefulness.

Connectional officers elected were: Robert A. Young, D. D., missionary secretary; David C. Kelly, D. D., treasurer; John B. McFerrin, D. D., agent of the Publishing House; D. P. Fitzgerald, D. D., editor of the Nashville Christian Advocate; Dr. Cunnyngham, Sunday-school editor, and W. P. Harrison, D. D., book editor. Thus manned for another quadrennial term, our church goes forth to its great work of saving souls, and of spreading Scriptural holiness. We have given few particulars in our brief notes of General Conference proceedings, as our ADVOCATE has given them nearly in full. The proceedings of the last two days will appear next week, with some reports that may not have been published heretofore for lack of space.

Mary of Bethany.

The enemies of religion have, unwittingly, paid it a high compliment in the contemptuous sneer that "it is a very good thing for women and children." These enemies have entirely overlooked one most important fact, and that is that religion never yet claimed to be an abstraction. There is no such thing as abstract piety. It can be seen only in human conduct, and when our enemies say "it is good for women and children," they simply say that its effect upon the conduct of women and children is a desirable thing. They are ignorantly bearing testimony to the truth that good can come out of Nazareth, and that, as far as women and children are concerned, religion shows itself, by its workings upon their characters, as an ornament of highest excellency and priceless value. The beauty of female piety is exhibited in the character of Mary of Bethany. Her history is narrated with such exquisite simplicity, and the lines of her character are drawn with such inimitable grace, that the attention is attracted pleasingly to her. There is not much said about her, but what is said charms both the mind and heart.

She is presented to us in three different scenes, and each time it is the same quiet, devout, loving, humble Mary, and each time in company with Jesus. We see her first, in her own home, sitting at the feet of the Saviour, listening to his precious words. While her busy, bustling sister, with a housekeeper's pride, is anxious that the feast shall be one worthy of her distinguished guest, Mary, with serene meekness in her countenance, and a thankful joy in her heart, sits at the feet of the great Teacher, learning the lessons which bring peace to the soul in the midst of the cares of life, and which open to the experience an intimitude of bliss hereafter. Her youth, her humility, her lovingness, her hopefulness won from the Son of God the encomium. "Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken from her." How Mary's peaceful spirit must have rejoiced when this commendation was uttered by the Lord. What a great yet gentle wave of love must have rolled out from her heart toward him who had so signally approved of her conduct. It was right for her to sit at the Master's feet.

We see her next in a time of deep distress. It was the time when death had come to their loved and loving household, and the darkest shadow that ever comes in this world had fallen along the hearthstone. Her brother, the stay and comfort of the home, had been stricken down. Those of us who have watched by the bed-side of a loved one, and seen life ebb away, and the cold form laid on its narrow couch, and then seen the friends come and bear to the last resting-place the one we loved so dearly, can understand something of the deep, inconsolable grief of the four dark days that intervened between the death of Lazarus and the coming of Jesus. When the news came that Jesus had arrived Mary arose hastily, and went out to meet him, and laid her dead hope at his feet, with the sad, sad lamentation: "Lord, if thou hadst been here my brother had not died." On the former occasion her conduct elicited words of commendation from Jesus, but now her bitter and deep grief opened the fountains of his sympathy. "Jesus wept." What a picture of sympathizing love is here. What a beautiful touch of the humanity of Jesus. How this young, sorrowing, suffering piety nestles itself with trustful composure in the loving sympathy of a weeping Saviour.

The third time Mary is presented to us is in the house of Simon, the leper, "where they made Jesus a feast." If we love to see modesty that is almost hidden by a shrinking timidity and a pure love, that pours itself out in self-sacrifice, we have only to look on the picture the evangelist draws here. Her loving heart prompts her to honor Jesus as best she can. She has in her possession an alabaster-box of fragrant ointment, which she gets, and, coming up softly behind Jesus as he reclined at the table, she begins to pour the perfume upon his head, and then her self-sacrificing love, flaming through all her soul, causes her to crush the beautiful box and empty its contents upon his feet, and then, as if checked by her modesty, she quickly stoops and wipes his feet with her hair. Half hidden behind the Saviour, she might have remained unnoticed, but deeds of love expose themselves, for the odor of the ointment filled all the room. When covetous eyes looked coldly upon her, and jealous hearts found fault with her generosity, her Lord simply said: "She hath done what she could. Let her alone. She hath come beforehand to anoint me for the burial. Verily I say unto you, wheresoever this gospel shall be preached throughout the whole world, this also that she hath done shall be spoken of for a memorial of her." Out of the fulness of her love, she had done what Joseph and Nicodemus wanted to do, but lacked time; what Mary Magdalene and another started to do, but were too late. She had anointed the Lord for the tomb. It was her love for Jesus, so beautifully, so modestly expressed by this act, which drew this encomium from him. Hers was a loving heart, whose affection was as sweet as the perfume of her own alabaster-box, and it drew from the Son of God "the only eulogium of fame he ever pronounced." This simple act of anointing in the house of Simon, in the quiet village of Bethany, is going to fill the world with the fame of youthful female piety. "Spoken of throughout the whole world as a memorial of her." Here is a richer recompense of fame accorded to devoted love than any other human being ever attained. The deep love, the quiet devotion, the ever-widening fame of Mary of Bethany is a tribute to the truth and beauty and power of female piety. We may then turn the sneer of the infidel back upon himself by adopting his words: "The religion of Jesus is a very good thing for women." C. W. C.

General Conference.

MONDAY, MAY 22—SEVENTEENTH DAY.

The General Conference met this morning at half-past eight o'clock, Bishop Keener presiding. Devotional exercises were conducted by Dr. E. R. Hendrix, of Missouri. The minutes of Saturday's session were read and approved.

Bishop Parker here took the chair for the first time since his election.

Dr. McAnally, of St. Louis, arose and said that he desired to congratulate Bishop Parker, and hoped he would find little trouble in discharging his duties as presiding officer. He was glad to have an opportunity of first addressing the new Bishop, but he arose to make a motion to suspend the regular order of business to take up for consideration the report on church extension, as the election of officers would come off this afternoon, and before the election he desired to see the plan of church extension completed. There were yet one or two items in the report not yet acted upon, and it was important that they should be considered now.

Rev. P. A. Peterson, of Virginia, opposed the motion, saying that reports which should have been presented on Saturday had been delayed for the consideration of less important business. He therefore moved in lieu that the business be proceeded with, the call of committees commencing where the Conference left off on Saturday. The motion prevailed.

The following report on appeals was read:

T. C. Parish, elder of the North Mississippi Conference, suspended. Decision of the North Mississippi Conference reversed.

The following reports were read and adopted:

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence recommend that the following telegram be sent in response to the one received and signed Herrick Johnson:

To the Presbyterian General Assembly in Session at Springfield, Illinois—Brethren.—This General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South reciprocates in joy and love your Christian salutations. Hebrews, chapter xiii, verses 20, 21.

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence, to whom was referred the communication in behalf of the Young Men's Christian Association, offer for adoption the following resolution, viz.:

Resolved, That this Conference recognizes the Young Men's Christian Association as an organization worthy of cordial sympathy and hearty encouragement, and in the special work it has undertaken, of watching over and protecting the large number of young men in our towns and cities exposed to the peculiar temptations and dangers of this age, will ever pray that the blessing of God may rest on said organization, and give it good success.

The following report on Bible cause was read and adopted:

Your committee has had under consideration the paper referred to it, signed by Gen. S. Savage, asking for more definite action as to the annual collection for the American Bible Society, and respectfully recommends the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That we recommend to our pastors to give to their congregations annually, if practicable, the privilege of contributing to the American Bible Society; and they shall remit the monies collected to this Society, or one of its auxiliaries, and report the amount to the Annual Conference.

Your committee also recommends that the following question be inserted in the Discipline, in the order of business, of an Annual Conference, after question 29, on page 47, chapter 2, section 2, to be properly numbered by the book editor, namely:

What has been contributed for the Bible cause?

The report on episcopacy was read and adopted.

The following report was read and laid over:

Your Committee on Boundaries would respectfully represent that they have considered the resolution from the College of Bishops, recommending that Indiana Conference be united with the Louisville Conference, and concur in the same, and recommend that the boundaries of the Louisville Conference be enlarged, so that, in addition to its present boundaries, there shall be included all that part of the State of Indiana not now embraced in the Louisville Conference.

Prof. Lupton asked leave to state that the formal invitation from the faculty of Vanderbilt University has been delayed, because the final examinations, now in progress, and other duties of the professors, have been such as to preclude the possibility of the faculty receiving the Conference in a body. They are now, however, in condition to receive the Conference at any time that may be appointed, and conduct the members through the lecture-rooms, museums and halls of the institution.

W. W. Walker asked permission, which was granted, to take up the report of the Committee on Publishing Interests, adopted several days ago, and reconsider, in order to amend the report so as to make the annual meeting of the Book Committee in May, and requiring the book agent to make his annual statement on April 1 instead of June 1, and its publication in the Christian Advocate one time instead of one month.

The reconsideration was agreed to, the amendment made, and the report, as amended, adopted.

Prof. Lupton moved that the Conference take up for consideration the report on church extension. Agreed to.

Article 10 was read, and J. H. Scarritt proposed an amendment to article 10, which was declared out of order, whereupon he moved to reconsider article 9, which motion failed, and the tenth article was adopted without discussion.

Dr. Rush moved that the headquarters of the society be fixed, and that the State, for the procuring of a charter under which it would work, be named. Agreed to.

The cities of Louisville, Little Rock, Kansas City, St. Louis, St. Joseph, Nashville, Dallas, Sacramento, Springfield, Ills., Memphis, Richmond and Atlanta were suggested as the headquarters, and the Conference decided upon Louisville, Ky., and authorized the board to procure a charter in the State of Kentucky. The date of holding the annual meeting of the society was left with the society.

The question coming up on the plan as a whole, J. B. McGehee, of South Georgia, proposed a substitute to the plan, and in speaking to it said that he was heartily in favor of such a movement; but that as yet it was an untried experiment, and the plan proposed was too elaborate, and would not meet the sympathy and support which it deserves. He moved the adoption of his substitute.

On motion of E. B. Prettyman the substitute was tabled.

E. P. Powell moved that the whole matter be laid on the table. Lost—and the plan was adopted as a whole.

Dr. Rush proposed a resolution relative to the election of editors of the Annual Conference organs, which was tabled 85 to 81.

Dr. Evans presented a resolution to amend the rules of order so as to limit the time of speakers to five minutes each, which was rejected.

On motion of Dr. Shipp, Report No. 1, of the Committee on Fraternal Correspondence, was taken up and amended by inserting "we are prepared to join as Christians in an earnest appeal to Congress," instead of "as a General Conference," etc., relative to the prevention of running trains, and making up and delivering mails on Sundays, and as amended the report was adopted.

The following report on revisal was read:

The Committee on Revisal beg leave to report they have duly considered a memorial from the Fayette District Conference of the Missouri Conference, a resolution by S. D. Shaw, Horace Bishop, and A. Davis, and those by R. N. Sledd, and J. E. Edwards, and one by J. S. Gardner, J. H. H. Figgatt, and Ramsey Smithson, asking for changes in the service for the ministration of baptism to infant children, and respectfully recommend the following alterations.

1. In the rubric preceding the exhortation, on page 221, section 2, chapter 13, of the Discipline, after the word "the," insert the following: "People shall stand up, and the," and strike out the clause, "use the following or some other suitable exhortation," and after the word "water" add this: "shall say," so that the rubric as amended shall read as follows: "The people shall stand up, and the minister coming to the font, which is to be filled with pure water, shall say."

2. On page 222, Chap. xiii, Sec. 2, strike out the exhortation beginning "Dearly Beloved" etc., and insert the following: "Hear the words of the Gospel written by St. Mark in Chap. 10, verse 13—They brought young children to Christ that he should touch them, and his disciples rebuked those that brought them, but when Jesus saw it he was much displeased and said unto them, suffer the little children to come unto me and forbid them not, for of such is the kingdom of God. Whosoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall not enter therein: and he took them up in his arms, put his hands upon them and blessed them."

3. In the prayer beginning on page 221, chapter 13, section 2, strike out the words "was him," the clause "being delivered from thy wrath," and the clause "received into the ark of Christ's Church, and being," so that the prayer as thus amended shall read as follows:

"Almighty and everlasting God, we beseech thee for thine infinite mercies that thou wilt look upon this child, and sanctify him with the Holy Ghost, that he may be steadfast in faith, joyful through hope, and rooted in love, and may so pass the waves of this troublesome world that finally he may come to the land of everlasting life, there to reign with thee, world without end, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

4. In the same prayer, in the paragraph beginning, "Almighty, everliving God," page 223, chapter 13, section 2, strike out the words "out of" in the fourth, and the words "side both water and" in the fifth line, and in the first line, on page 224, substitute the word "this" for "thy," and in the sixth line strike out the words "and elect," so that the paragraph shall read as follows: "Almighty, everliving God, whose most dearly beloved Son, Jesus Christ, for the forgiveness of our sins, did shed his most precious blood, and gave commandment to his disciples that they should go teach all nations, and baptize them in the name of the Father and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost, regard, we beseech thee, the supplications of this congregation, and grant that this child now to be baptized may receive the fullness of thy grace, and ever remain in the number of thy faithful children, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen."

5. Strike out the Rubric and the lesson from the Gospel of Mark, page 224, chapter 13, section 2.

Dr. McAnally presented the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That a committee of five be appointed by the chair to nominate a Board of Managers for church extension, and they are directed to report to-morrow, at 11 o'clock A. M., and that election be made the special order for that hour.

BISHOP HOLSEY.

Dr. Wiley, chairman of the Committee on Introduction, presented Bishop Holsey, of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, to the Conference, and the secretary read the following letter:

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 15, 1882.

To the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, now in Session at Nashville Tenn.—This is duly elected to bear the fraternal greetings of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church, in America to your honorable body, now in session; also, by act of our General Conference, now in session at Washington, D. C., Bishop Holsey is empowered to confer with you on any subject, soliciting your aid to help build up our institutions of learning and missionary work, it having been agreed that any arrangement arrived at and agreed upon by your honorable body and Bishop Holsey will be generally commended by the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America.

Signed in behalf of the said General Conference.

J. C. BURK,
W. H. DANIEL, Sec.

Bishop Holsey was then introduced to the General Conference, and he addressed the Conference at length in an impressive and eloquent manner.

The Conference then adjourned until three P. M.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The General Conference met at half-past eight o'clock this morning, and was called to order by Bishop Pierce.

Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. T. T. Christian, of South Georgia.

The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

The following report on fraternal correspondence, No. 7, was read and adopted:

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence recommend for adoption the following resolution, viz.:

Resolved, That the General Conference has heard with pleasure the fraternal greetings conveyed in the address of Bishop Holsey, of the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America, and in the letter of Bishop Hood, of the African Methodist Episcopal Zion Church, and heartily reciprocating the kindly feelings of said churches, as expressed in the aforementioned address and letter, we pray that the God of all grace may continue to keep and prosper them in every good work.

The Committee on Fraternal Correspondence recommend the adoption of the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the secretary be instructed to send the fraternal salutations of this General Conference to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the United States, now in session at Atlanta, Ga., and also to transmit the following to Bishop Foss, our late fraternal messenger from the Methodist Episcopal Church, viz.: The General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, learns with pain the dangerous illness of Bishop Foss, and sends him Christian greeting and sympathy.

The above report was adopted:

The following report on episcopacy, No. 9, was read:

The committee has had under consideration a paper signed by P. P. Ellis and others, and referred by the Conference, asking that the pastoral address of the Bishops, issued in 1874, and inserted in the appendix of the present edition of the Discipline; be inserted in the next revised edition of the Discipline, with such alterations or additions as the college of Bishops may deem proper. The committee recommend concurrence.

The committee has considered the question of the support of the General Superintendents for the next four years, and reports as follows:

The allowance of each General Superintendent shall be $3,000, including traveling expenses. The whole amount necessary for their support and for Mrs. Wightman is ascertained to be, for the next four years, $111,960, and is distributed among the Annual Conferences as follows:

The committee recommends the following for adoption by the Conference:

Whereas, The Discipline requires the Board of Finance of Annual Conferences shall send to the book agent their receipts for payments on Bishops' fund; and

Whereas, The Discipline also requires of the Bishops to report to the book agent the amount received by them of the several Annual Conferences; therefore,

Resolved, That the book agent, as treasurer of the Bishops' fund, is hereby instructed to make an annual settlement with the Bishops, and to report the same to the General Conference.

2. That the balance of $1,022.16, now in the hands of the Bishops as a balance, shall be charged up to them as part payment of their salaries for the ensuing year. In case of the death of a Bishop during the year, his widow shall be allowed his full salary to the end of the year, and after that the allowance of his widow shall be $1,000 a year.

Mr. Bennett moved that the report be adopted.

Dr. Edwards moved to adopt item by item, and, upon the reading of the first item, moved that the Conference non-concur. He opposed allowing any alterations made in the Bishops' address, which position was also taken by Dr. McFerrin.

Rev. C. I. Vandeventer moved that the address be published as it now reads.

Drs. Evans, Guilford Jones, Mangum and Bennett discussed the question.

Bishop Pierce announced that the Bishops did not intend to alter the address, or to make any change whatever in it, and the motion of Mr. Vandeventer was agreed to, and as amended the item was adopted.

Item two, not requiring action, was received by the Conference.

Item four coming up was discussed at some length, and Dr. Edwards raised the point that the book agent was not treasurer of this fund, and to make him such would be a change in the Discipline, and would require the report to lie over for a day.

The question elicited some discussion, and resulted in the suspending of the rules and the creating of the book agent as treasurer of the Bishop's fund, and the item in the report was adopted, as was also the last item, and the report as a whole was adopted.

The report of the Committee on Itineracy, No. 11, was read and laid over under the rule.

The report on missions, No. 10, was as follows:

CHAPTER 10—DISCIPLINE.

Section 2. In view of the fact that the women in most heathen countries are accessible only to teachers of their own sex, the women of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, are hereby authorized to organize special missionary agencies under the following

CONSTITUTION.

Article I. This society shall be called the Woman's Missionary Society of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South.

Article II. The object of this society shall be to enlist and unite the efforts of women and children in the work of sending the gospel to women and children in heathen lands through the agencies of female missionaries, teachers, physicians and Bible readers.

Article III. The work shall be accomplished by organizing societies in each charge, Conference Societies in each Conference, and shall be controlled by an executive body to be known as the Woman's Board of Missions, each to be constituted as directed hereafter.

Article IV. The operations of this Woman's Board shall be conducted in connection with the Parent Board of Missions, and subject to its advice and approval. When appropriations are made, the funds shall be sent through the treasurer of the Parent Board to Missions under its charge, and shall be used for no other purposes than those designated by the Woman's Board.

Article V. The board shall consist of a president, a vice-president, corresponding secretary, treasurer, recording secretary, three managers, and an auditor, to be elected quadrennially by the board and the corresponding secretaries of Conference Societies; and the secretary of the Board of Missions shall be an honorary member of the Woman's Board.

Article VI. The Woman's Board shall meet annually to determine what fields shall be occupied, the number of persons to be employed in each, and to estimate and appropriate the amount necessary for the support of the missions under its charge.

A majority of the members shall constitute a quorum to transact business at the annual meetings. Five shall be a quorum for monthly or called meetings, the transactions of the called meetings to be subject to review and approval of the annual meeting.

Article VII. The funds of this board shall be derived from private efforts, membership, life, and honorary membership fees, and from public collections only in anniversary occasions.

Article VIII. The president shall preside at all meetings, and countersign all drafts on the treasury. In her absence the vice-president shall preside, or, in the absence of both, a chairman shall be appointed pro tem.

Article IX. The corresponding secretary shall conduct the correspondence, attend to all legal business, prepare the annual report, and publish quarterly a statement of the condition of the work. The corresponding secretary shall reside where the Board of Missions is located.

Article X. The treasurer shall hold the funds of the board in safe deposit, which deposit shall be made by her as treasurer subject to authenticated drafts. She shall furnish annual and quarterly reports, to be published with those of the corresponding secretary.

Article XI. The recording secretary shall keep the Minutes of all meetings in a permanent record, obtain the signature of the president as approved.

Article XII. The auditor shall be a business man, having no voice in the proceedings.

Article XIII. The board shall fill all vacancies that occur.

Article XIV. The three managers shall be members of some one of the Auxiliary Societies at the place where the Board of Missions is located.

In presenting his report, Dr. Kelley moved that the rules of order be suspended, and the adoption of the report.

Bishop Keener insisted that the plan proposed involved a most important work, and should be attended to as early as possible.

Dr. Boring opposed the suspension of the rules.

Rev. H. J. Adams said that he had been informed that the report did not express the views of those particularly interested.

Rev. W. W. Duncan, of South Carolina, said that if such was the case he wished to know all the facts before action was taken.

Dr. Kelley replied that the constitution proposed had been prepared by a sub-committee and reported to the Committee on Missions at their meeting yesterday, where perfect harmony prevailed, and the report was recommended by the committee.

Mr. Cupples asked if a resolution adopted by the ladies had not been presented to the committee or to the Conference.

Dr. West said that he had the resolution in his hands, and had made several efforts to present it, but had been unable to do so. He then read the following:

To the Fathers and Brethren in General Conference Assembled: The following action was taken by the general Executive association of the Woman's Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and ordered to be sent to the General Conference for immediate action:

Resolved, That we are willing to work under our present constitution the ensuing four years, unless the General Conference decides to the contrary.

MRS. M. L. HAYES, Pres.

Continuing his remarks, Mr. Cupples said that as the Woman's Missionary Society was co-ordinate with the Conference in its work, their wishes ought to be considered; besides, the constitution had never been presented to the ladies for their action.

The Rev. P. A. Peterson moved to lay the motion to suspend the rules on the table. Carried.

Rev. H. J. Adams moved to lay the report on the table, which the chair decided was unnecessary as it lay on the table under the rules.

Under the call for reports submitted and laid upon the table, and coming up in their order, the following business was transacted:

Report 1 on missions—adopted without discussion.

Report 1 on laundaries—adopted.

Report 1 on revisal coming up, Dr. Anson West opposed the changes proposed by the Committee on Revisal, because he thought it would take authority from the Annual Conference and place it in the hands of a committee.

Rev. R. B. Crawford was opposed to taking old men before Conference returning boards.

Dr. Hiner remarked that law was made not for the righteous man, but for the sinner, and that it was not the old, worn-out preachers who get into trouble, but the young ones.

Rev. P. A. Peterson urged the passage of the change, and Dr. Edwards insisted that it was a much-needed change.

Articles 1 and 2 were adopted, and then the report as a whole.

The hour having arrived for the consideration of church extension—made the special order for eleven o'clock—Dr. Miller presented a report, which was read, and Rev. H. J. Adams arose and said that he was anxious to have some man on the board from the Western part of the country.

Dr. Miller said that the committee had considered the question, but believed the expense attached to the traveling of a member from the Pacific coast would be too great.

Dr. McAnally suggested that the officers had not been nominated.

H. D. Hogan, H. J. Adams and O. P. Fitzgerald urged the appointment of a member for the Pacific coast.

On motion of E. R. Hendrix, the report was recommitted to the committee, who subsequently submitted the following report, which was adopted:

The committee to whom was referred the duty of nominating a Board of Managers for the Church Extension Society, beg leave to offer the following names:

President, James S. Lithgow, Louisville, Ky.; Vice-president, Presley Megnlar, Louisville, Ky.; Treasurer, John W. Proctor, Danville, Ky.; Secretary, David Morton, Louisville, Ky.

The following was the report on Bible cause, No. 1:

Your committee has had under consideration the resolution signed by A. H. Sutherland and M. N. Shive, in reference to the headings of chapters in the Spanish version of the Scriptures, as published by the American Bible Society. Brother Sutherland appeared before the committee, and after a free conversation on the subject, it was agreed that the best course would be for Brother Sutherland to correspond with the Committee on Versions of the Bible Society, which he said he would do.

Your committee recommend that no further action be taken.

Resuming the regular order of business, Report No. 2 on revisal was taken up, and, after a spirited discussion, participated in by Messrs. Prettyman, Peterson, Wilson, Evans, Edwards, Gardner, Alexander, Powell, Weir and Anson West, sections 1 and 2 were adopted, and, pending the consideration of section 3, the hour of adjournment arrived.

Periodicals.

—We have received the "Magazine of Art, for June, 1882. It is a very fine number of this splendid monthly. The engravings are numerous. Noticeable for their excellence are The Street Life Scenes of J. G. Brown; two of which "The Pups" and Tough Customers are a pleasant study by philosophers of human nature in its boy-state. Among the illustrated articles are: Glassmaking of the Nineteenth Century; "Art of the Savages;" "Queen Anne Plate." "Narcissus" of this number is depicted in modern light, and gives us a fresh view of an ancient conceit from another point of view. Art notes and record of American art close this excellent number. Published by Cassell, Potter, Galpin & Co., 739 and 741 Broadway, N. Y. Yearly subscription, $3 50; single number, thirty-five cents.

—The Century for June has, for its frontispiece a portrait of Cardinal Newman. Some breezy sea-sketches illustrating the opening paper, untitled "Around Cape Horn." We notice particularly in this June number the prize engravings. Other notable illustrated articles are "Opera in New York;" Bee Pastures in California; Marble Mining in Carrara. Accompanying the portrait of Cardinal Newman is a biographical study of this famous convert to the Roman Catholic Church. This article contains a short essay, by the cardinal on the inspiration of the Bible here published for the first time. Second part of Carlyle's posthumous My Irish Journey, describes this testy philosophers visit to Lake of Killarney, and like all his writing abounds in conceited personalities and incessive comments upon the wretchedness of other people.

—The Oriental Casket, for May, 1882, Vol. I, No. 5, claims to be "a paper for all times, all people, all places, a monthly periodical published by J. Lum Smith and edited by Emoraon Bonnett, Philadelphia, 912 Arch street. This Casket is filled with strictly literary gems. We should judge that it will find its way into many homes. The attractive table of contents will justify the universal claim it makes on all times, places and people, a further acquaintance with this beautifully printed periodical will elicit a more extended notice. Subscription, $2 per annum. To getter up of a club of six—free.

—E. L. Godkin, editor of the Nation, has a strong paper combating the argument advanced by the advocates of the spoils system that tenure in the civil service basis would bring with it the Danger of an office-holding aristocracy. Other articles are "Colonization of Palestine;" "In a Chinese Theater; The concluded part of Miss Woolson's Roman Story;" The Street of the [illegible], The Story of [illegible], A Slaver Deserted at Sea with a Cargo of Negroes Confined in the Hole. The poetry of this number includes "The Jewess," a plea for the Russian Jews, by Joaquin Miller. Two tributes to Longfellow "Wilhelmina;" "In the haunts of Bream and Boss" and Rose Gerardia. This month the department treats a most inviting variety of subjects.

SUCCESSFUL BUSINESS. The business of the Gorham Manufacturing Company as manufacturers of Solid Silver Ware was established about the year 1831, and carried on in a limited way until the year 1852, when the firm commenced to extend their operations, and such an impetus was given to the business, they soon become known as the largest manufactures of Silver Ware in the country, and until the year 1863, Solid Silver Ware was the sole business of the company, but in the latter year they again enlarged their works, and commenced the manufacture of fine plated ware, now well known as the Gorham Plate; and since that time this has been a department of their business, the manufacture of Solid Silver Ware continuing, however, to be the principal business of the Company. Under their direction and leadership this branch of industry has been wonderfully developed in this country, not alone their own productions, but the whole Silver trade has been constantly advanced in the manufacture of fine wares under the stimulus of the example of this successful business house.

NATURE'S RESOURCE IN REPAIR.—A few weeks ago, a lad, Geo. Holmes, had the misfortune to have his leg too crushed by the printing press of the ADVOCATE, necessitating amputation, which was done while chloroformed by Dr. G. Hendrick, of this city, removing the upper part nearly to the side. Sufficient vitality was retained in the remaining portion, for granulations to sprout out, which grew luxuriently, resulting in the reproduction of about one-half of the toe, which, though hopeless and nailless, serves him admirably in walking.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sheraz has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper, and I will send you free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

We would call special attention to the card of W. W. Carre. The cabins or cottages they are manufacturing, are specially adapted, to the wants of those who are contemplating putting up houses, tents, etc., at the Seashore Camp Grounds. Do not delay, until the last moment, but send in your orders early, so that everything will be completed before the meeting.

THE BEST COTTON GINS.

We are making the ECLIPSE EAGLE COTTON GINS, which proved such a complete success the past season, and which took the first prize at the Atlanta Exposition for ginning fully cotton which had been gathered with the locks. We also continue to manufacture our celebrated STANDARD EAGLE GINS, which have for the past twenty-six years been known as the leading Cotton Gins, receiving the indorsement of the largest and best planters. We also make a Gin having saw of ten inch diameter. Our FEEDERS and CONDENSERS are the best invented, and our Feeder was awarded the first prize at Atlanta. Edward Atkinson, Col. Barrow, the President of Williamantic Cotton Company, and other Northern manufacturers of cotton goods, indorse the Eagle Gins as producing the best sample of cotton. Planters in purchasing the Eagle Cotton Gins do so with the certainty of getting the best Gin ever made. Circulars sent on application giving prices and terms. A stock of all sizes kept in New Orleans ready for immediate delivery.

ABOUT POTATOES.—He came into the city with a load of potatoes and apples. The potatoes—Early Rose—were sizeable, neither too large nor too small, but just the happy medium that made them desirable for baking. "Do you find the Early Rose still a profitable variety to raise?" we asked. "Well, yes, on the whole I do. There are other kinds that yield well and are better for table use, in my opinion, than the Rose, but somehow the Rose always sells for a little more in market than any other potato. For my own table there are several kinds that suit us better, but, like the Baldwin apple, the Rose has a reputation, and that makes it profitable to raise for market." "Have you ever observed that the liability to become strong, unless closely covered from air and light, was greater in the Rose than in any other variety?" "It is more so than in any other variety here grown. On some accounts the late Rose is preferable to this, one reason being its better keeping qualities in the respect you mention." "Which yields the best?" "From what experience I have had with the late variety, I think that it will go a little ahead of the early. I find that it makes quite a difference on what kind of ground they are grown." "Do you plant on sod?" "No, not if I can avoid it. I usually sow my broke up ground to oats or barley and plant to potatoes the next season. This rots the sod and gives me a better chance to give finer cultivation. I believe the potato should have as fine tilth as corn. I would never use green manure less than a year old on my potato ground, if I could help it." "I notice your potatoes are very smooth and fair." "Old manure or compost of the yard, with superphosphate, does that. If I were to try to see how good potatoes I could raise for the table, I should want to plow up a piece of ground that has been pastured for many years. Let it lie over one summer, then manure it lightly with old manure and put a spoonful of phosphate in the hill. The potatoes on such land would be smooth and handsome, sizeable and in ordinary seasons full of starch.—Lewiston Journal.

HOW TO DEAL WITH PEAR BLIGHT.—It is a common idea that when a pear tree is struck with the blight it never recovers. The disease is regarded very much as consumption in the case of a human being—sometimes slow, but always sure death. This idea has no foundation in fact. I can see from my window a tree that was badly affected with blight ten years ago, but which is now a healthy tree. Such examples are plentiful. The object of this article is to try to impress upon the minds of the owners of pear trees the necessity of keeping constant watch of the trees at this time of year. As soon as the blight appears there should not be an hour lost before the part affected is removed. If this is done soon enough, in most cases the tree will be saved. The blighted limbs should be cut off below where blight is visible. Whatever is the nature of this blight, the poison appears to work downward, and consequently the germs of the disease below where the blight is visible; if the limb is promptly removed there is no more danger of that tree than any other. The danger consists in allowing the blighted part to remain until the poison has extended so far as to endanger the life of the tree. During the last year important observations have been made with the aid of powerful microscopes to ascertain the true character of this disease. These efforts, I think, have been perfectly successful. There is no longer any reasonable doubt of the true cause of pear blight. Prompt removal is the only remedy we know of at present. My advice is that this be quickly and thoroughly done.—Correspondent Rural New Yorker.

CANKER WORM.—This is how I got rid of them on four hundred apple trees (says a correspondent of the Germantown Telegraph.) I took one barrel and a half of tar, warmed it in a pail with half rain water, and applied it, about four o'clock in the afternoon, with a large paint brush. I made a ring around the body of the tree, about half way up to the limbs, and repeated it every day for thirty-one days, having commenced on the third of April. The habits of these destructive worms are peculiar. The miller that lays the egg for the worm commences coming out of the ground as soon as it begins to thaw in the spring, and immediately crawls up the tree and lays its eggs in and on the buds, which hatch as soon as the tree begins to leave, when its work begins. These millers are hardly ever seen in the day-time, and they never climb the trees except at night. From a half-hour to an hour after sundown they appear to pop out of the ground and start for the tree. The female has no wings and gets stuck in the tar, and that is the end of it. I had a man who tarred the four hundred trees in about two hours: none of the trees had been only four years set out. The tar was applied to the bark. No harm resulted from it to the trees, but the worms were exterminated. This was done some six years ago. My trees had been stripped for five years of fruit and leaves, but not a canker worm has been seen since.

ALFALFA.—A correspondent wants an article to appear in the Register, on Alfalfa or Lucerne, giving its early history, etc. The best authorities show that it was transplanted into Greece from Persia nearly five hundred years before the Christian era. At present it is largely cultivated in England France and other parts of Europe, and gives great satisfaction as a forage plant. It is being introduced quite extensively into our own country, and though as yet California is far ahead in its culture, in time Alfalfa will, we take it, be a prominent crop in all places where the winters are not too severe. Perhaps even more noticeable than its rapid and enormous growth is its hardiness and ability to withstand our long dry seasons, and to remain fresh and green when nearly everything else succumbs. On the pampas of South America it thrives, and appears rather to enjoy the drought than otherwise. The power to withstand great heat and dryness comes from the long, searching roots, which are sent deeply down into the soil to find the moisture that is accessible to other less energetic vegetation.—Mobile Register.

LUCERNE.—It is something wonderful that this Queen of forage plants is not universally cultivated on every farm in the South. There can be no doubt of its adaptability to almost every locality from the mountains to the seaboard. In latitude thirty-three north, it is dormant for but two months, December and January. In the latitude of Atlanta the writer has made the first of five cuttings for the season as early as the fifteenth of February. Five tons of hay have been so often taken from an acre of lucerne that the fact no longer excites remark. It is not, however, as generally known, that with perhaps the solitary exception of the cow pea, lucerne makes the most valuable dried forage that we can raise South. We have been informed by a friend who has tested the matter, that work stock fed on lucerne can do good service with but a single feed a day additional of corn or oats. A single acre of lucerne, properly set, will amply maintain five head of horses or mules a whole year. At the cost of $50 for preparation and a yield of five tons at $30 per ton, it would seem that we might venture on the experiment of trying a little lucerne on every farm in Georgia.—Dixie Farmer.

GARGET IN COWS.—Among the causes, says the Prairie Farmer, are congestion of the udder, bruises, from lying down on the udder on a hard floor, neglect in milking, &c. Continued friction with the palm of the hand often proves of service in reducing hardness and swelling of the udder. Such condition of the udder is generally of a chronic nature, slow of reduction and often not reduceable by any means. Besides friction a small portion of the following liniment may be applied morning and evening, but only to the hardened parts. The udder should be carefully washed before each milking if the milk is used. Take half an ounce of iodine, two ounces of glycerine, two ounces of mercurial ointment and two ounces of olive oil; mix. The bottle should be kept corked in a cool place and the contents well shaken before use. It would be beneficial in the beginning of the disease to give the cow a laxative dose of medicine, such as a pound and a half of epsom salts, dissolved in a quart of hot water, to which solution add a pint of molasses and an ounce of ground ginger. If there be much difficulty in drawing the milk from the affected quarter the careful use of a milking tube is to be recommended.

FALL PLOWING.—As there has been a great deal of talk in the club about fall plowing for corn I will give my observation in the matter. I am old in years, but a young farmer. In my experience of seven years I have several times tried fall and spring plowing side by side on the same kind of land (stiff clay;) have planted corn with a two-horse machine, set to drop four kernels, which it will do five times out of six; the sixth time perhaps it will drop three, perhaps five. On the land fall plowed the corn has always come up sooner, looked more vigorous and grown faster at first than on the spring plowed land. On spring plowed land I have never had as good a stand of corn. It comes yellow, looks sickly, always makes one sick. When corn on fall plowed land is knee high the other will be about half or two-thirds as high; but about that time it begins to put on a healthy color and soon overlooks the other in growth. In the end with me it has always made a larger growth, and although I have never weighed the crop I have generally thought I had more corn per acre on spring plowed than on fall plowed land.—"Wisconsin" in Husbandman.

IMPROVED STOCK.—Among the first stock imported to this country from England was short-horn cattle, the leading beef cattle of the world. The numerous importations for seventy-five years and our skillful breeding has given us as many and as good short-horns as old England. The Herefords are strong rivals for beef in individual excellence, but not in numbers, although of recent years they are being extensively imported. The Devons too are coming to the front for beef; they are hardy on the Plains and quick growth farm cattle. The Polled Angus and other polled breeds are rapidly coming to the front as beef producers. The horniess feature promises to play an important part in future shipping, and very deservedly, too. For the dairy Holsteins are taking the lead, as they are large size, good for milk and beef, giving the largest yield of rich milk. Their importation is becoming very extensive to this country as are also the Jerseys, the great butter cows which are small size and give a small yield of very rich milk.—Western Agriculturist.

PROF. BROWN ON CATTLE.—An average two or three-year-old steer will eat his own weight, of different materials, in two weeks. Two or three-year-old cattle will add one-third of a pound more per head per day to their weight upon prepared hay and roots than upon the same materials unprepared. A steady, frosty winter is better than an open one for feeding cattle. No cattle beast whatever will pay for the direct increase to its weight from the consumption of any kind or quantity of food. Fattening cattle on oats will eat less hay than when receiving corn or peas. Those on pea meal will drink one-third more water than those upon corn or oats. Clover lessens the consumption of roots. Apparently about one-fifth of ground corn passes through the cattle beast undigested. Pea meal (rough ground) gives twenty-one per cent. greater returns in fattening cattle than either corn or oats.

WHAT LETTUCE TO PLANT.—There are a great many kinds of lettuce, some with the leaves smooth or "plain," while other sorts are "curl-leaved." Of the "plain-leaved" varieties there is, perhaps, no better early sort than the "All the Year Round." The "Curled Simpson" and "Silesia" are the best of the curl-leaved varieties for a general crop. The "Boston Market" is now almost exclusively used for forcing in frames and green-houses; it is very much like the old "Tennis Ball," though with a hard, larger and better head. The new sorts should be tested only in small quantities, always relying on old, well-known varieties for the main crop. By a succession of sowings, a constant supply of this excellent green food may be had from early spring until mid-summer, or until its place is filled by other vegetables from the garden.—American Agriculturist.

GRASS HAY.—The Orange County Farmer has the following suggestion: "Our finest and best flavored butter is made from grass, and if a little corn meal or bran be added the quantity will be increased. Our best cheese is made in June and September, provided our cows be running on rich aftermath the latter months. Even with these indisputable facts before our eyes should we not the coming year make an effort to get our hay in the barn as near a grass condition as possible? and our stock will do enough better on it to pay us for the extra expense."

SHEEP.—A subscriber wants to know if he shall keep Southdowns or Cotswolds. For the ordinary farmer grades are better than the pure breed. A grade Southdown and Cotswold is more robust than a pure breed of either variety.

Household.

SUPERIOR YEAST.—After making and using many kinds, I prefer this: Fourteen potatoes pared and boiled until a silver fork will pass into them easily. Boil a handful of hops in one quart of water. Put the potatoes into a colander and mash them through, using one quart of fair boiling water to assist in the process. Add the quart of water in which the hops have been boiled, and stir in one small teacup of white sugar. When cool enough to be certain it will not scald and destroy the life of the same, put in a cup of yeast. Let it stand till light, which in warm weather will be not more than half a day; in winter till next morning, when stir in half a teacup of fine salt. Now put away in fruit cans or large-mouthed bottles. Keep in a cool place, but where it will not freeze if the weather is cold. When the salt is added to the yeast it will foam like soda water, and of course it must not be immediately sealed or corked tight, though this may be done in a short time after bottling. Keep the potatoes under water while they are being pared and never use the water in which they were boiled if you wish the biscuits to excel in whiteness. Let the yeast stand in a stone or porcelain vessel, or in a bright tin vessel, to rise. Half these proportions would make yeast for the bread of a small family two or three weeks.—Western Christian Advocate.

If you have tough steak or pieces of meat cooked which you are at a loss to know how to dispose of, try this way: Boil the pieces in as little water as will keep them from burning until thoroughly tender; season nicely with pepper and salt, and cut into inch squares. Make a gravy by adding butter, seasoning and a little flour, to the liquid in which the meat was boiled. Make a soft crust of flour, and a small bit of butter, one teaspoonful of cream of tartar and one-half teaspoonful of soda, and line a dish. Fill with your meat, moisten well with the gravy, cover and bake, using the remaining gravy to eat with it.

LEMON ICE.—Soak half of one box of gelatine in a pint of cold water, put it in a porcelain kettle, pour on nearly one pint of boiling water; when the gelatine is dissolved, put in two-thirds of a coffeecup of white sugar and half a coffeecup lemon sugar boiling long enough to make a jelly; remove from the fire, then pour in, three beaten yolks of eggs, the whites of the eggs beaten to a froth; flavor with two teaspoonfuls extract lemon; pour into a mold and set to cool. This is a delicious desert, nourishing and relishable for the convalescing sick.

DELICIOUS LEMON JELLY CAKE.—Take one cup of sugar, one-half cup of butter, one cup of milk, three eggs, two teaspoonfuls of cream tartar, one teaspoonful of soda, three cups of flour; mix, and bake in fine thin layers. For the jelly grate the rind of three small, or two large lemons, and add the juice of the same with one cup of sugar, one egg, one-half cup of water one teaspoonful of butter, one tablespoonful of flour, mix with a little water and boil till it thickens. This is a great favorite with us.

RICE AND APPLE PUDDING.—Boil a cupful of rice for ten minutes, drain it through a hair sieve until quite dry. Put a cloth into a pudding dish, and lay the rice around it like a crust. Cut six apples into quarters and lay them in the middle of the rice with a little chopped lemon peel, a couple of cloves and some sugar. Cover the fruit with some rice, tie up tight and boil for an hour. Serve with melted butter, sweetened and poured over it, or with cream.

ALMOND CAKE.—One and a half cups sugar, half cup butter, whites of six eggs, half cup milk, two cups flour, two heaping teaspoonfuls baking powder, almond flavoring. Filling for cake: Two cups sugar dissolved in very little cold water, put on range until candied, whites of two eggs beaten and stir in sugar while hot, stir in one pound of almonds shaved (having been previously put in hot water to remove skins) one teaspoonful almond flavoring.

CAN CORN FRITTERS.—Take a can of corn; open it, and spread the corn over a platter to make sure that there are not bits of stalk or silk left in it; beat two eggs very light, stir in with them two tablespoonfuls of flour, one teaspoonful (not heaping) of salt, half a teaspoonful of pepper; have some lard very hot in a sauce-pan; and drop in the corn, a large spoonful at a time; fry same as green-corn fritters till a light brown.

TO PREVENT PICKLES FROM MOULDING.—Horse-radish will prevent pickles from moulding. Cut in little round slices a piece of horse-radish root as large as your finger and twice as long, and throw into a two-gallon jar of sweet pickles just before setting it away, and you will find them all right when you go in haste to get a dishful for the table.

POTATO AND HAM CROQUETTES.—Take six good-sized boiled potatoes, rub them through a colander, and add to them three tablespoonfuls of finely chopped boiled ham, fat and lean together. Add a little pepper and some chopped onion or parsley, and two well-beaten eggs. Roll into small rolls; dip into egg and bread crumbs; fry in hot pork fat, and serve with watercresses or parsley for a garnish.

FROSTING.—Handsome and delicious frosting can be made by using the yolk of eggs instead of the whites. Proceed exactly as for ordinary frosting. It will harden just as nicely as that does. This is particularly good for orange cake, harmonizing with the color of the cake in a way to delight the soul of the esthetic.

CRAB APPLE MARMALADE.—Take the apples left after straining off juice for jelly, and put them through a sieve. To three pounds of the sifted pulp, add two of sugar and boil twenty minutes, stirring constantly to keep it from burning. Flavor with cinnamon or lemon extract.

SWEET-BREADS STEWED.—Soak the sweet-breads in warm water for an hour, then boil for ten minutes. Take them out, drain them, and stew them gently in some good meat stock for half an hour. Take them out of this, season and thicken the stock with flour for a gravy. Arrange the sweet-breads on bits of toast, and pour the gravy around them.

CRAB APPLE PRESERVES.—Scald the apples; then remove them from the water; to every pound of apples add a pound of sugar. Put the apples and sugar over the fire and cook slowly till the fruit is tender.

Scientific.

ANATOMY OF THE EARTH-WORM.—The body of a large worm consists of one or two hundred cylindrical rings or segments, each furnished with minute bristles, and is endowed with a well-developed muscular system. The mouth is provided with a little projection or lip, capable of taking hold of things, and of sucking. Internally, a strong pharynx, corresponding, according to Perrier, with the protusile trunk or proboscis of other annelids, and which is pushed forward when the animal eats, is situated behind the mouth. The pharynx leads into the œsophagus, on each side of the lower part of which are three pairs of large glands, which secrete a surprising amount of carbonate of lime. They are unlike anything that is known in any other animal, and their use is largely a matter of speculation. Mr. Darwin thinks they are partly excretions of the excess of lime contained in the leaves which the animal eats, and that they otherwise aid digestion by affording a neutralizing agent against the acids of its food. In most of the species, the œsophagus is enlarged into a cup in front of the gizzard. The latter organ is lined with a smooth, thick chitinous membrane, and is surrounded by weak longitudinal but powerful transverse muscles. Grains of sand and small stones, from one twentieth to a little more than one tenth of an inch in diameter, may be found in the gizzard and intestines, and are supposed to serve, like millstones, to triturate the food. The gizzard opens into the intestine, which presents a peculiar remarkable longitudinal involution of the walls, by which an extensive absorbent surface is gained. The circulatory system is well developed. Breathing is done by the skin, without especial respiratory organs. The nervous system is fairly developed, with two almost confluent cerebral ganglia situated near the anterior end.

Worms have no eyes, and are measurably indifferent to light; yet they can distinguish night from day, and are quickly affected by a strong light, and after some time by a moderate light shining continuously upon them. They do not much mind a moderate radiant heat, but are sensitive to cold. They have no sense of hearing, but are extremely sensitive to vibrations in any solid object. Worms in pots, which have paid no attention to the sound of a piano, when placed on the piano instantly drew into their holes when the notes were struck. Their whole body is sensitive to contact, as of a puff of air. Their sense of smell is feeble, but responds fairly well to the odor of the cabbage and onion or whatever they like, as was shown to Mr. Darwin by some very interesting experiments. They are omnivorous, and swallow enormous quantities of earth, out of which they extract any digestible matter which it may contain, consume decayed and fresh leaves and vegetable matter, and raw, roasted, and decayed meat, but like raw fat best.—Popular Science Monthly.

MACHINE FOR RAISING WATER.—Rotary machines for elevating water have been in use for a long time; but hitherto they have generally consisted of an immovable cylinder, in which the water is circulated by rotating paddles until it acquires the centrifugal force necessary to elevate it through a pipe. The height attained by the water in this way has been about 100 feet; and with the rotary elevator of M. Girard this lift is increased to 130 feet, the highest limit yet reached. Recently, however, says Engineering, a new machine was brought before the French Academy of Sciences, which is capable of raising water to a much greater altitude. It is the invention of M. de Romilly, and a laboratory model worked by hand projects water to a height of 500 feet. This centrifugal elevator consists of a flat horizontal cylinder or pan, which is fed with the water to be elevated, and rotated very quickly round a vertical axis by means of a pulley. The motion of the pan causes the water to circulate in a ring round the internal walls of the pan, and a tube reaching down from the height to which the water is to be raised is brought into the pan, and terminated in a curved nozzel, which is turned toward the circulating liquid. The water, by virtue of its acquired momentum, rushes into the mouthpiece and rises up the tube. In this case the turbine or pan is situated at the level of the source, but M. de Romilly also arranges for its being placed at the level of the overflow, or some intermediate point. In the latter cases the discharge tube, after leaving the pan, is bent downward into the source of water, where its point, like a spigot into its faucet, enters a second tube, which rises again to the receiving cistern on the upper level. To work this arrangement some water is let into the pan by a supply pipe from the upper cistern, and the turbine is rotated. The flying water then enters the tube leading downward, and its passage to the second tube sucks in the surrounding water from the source, which is thus carried upward to the elevated cistern, from which it is allowed to flow away.

ARTIFICIAL AMBER.—According to the Chronique Industrielle, considerable quantities of beautiful objects of artificial amber are now being produced in Vienna, and sold as of real amber. The substance employed is chiefly colophony, or rosin, obtained by decomposition of turpentine, though several other ingredients are used to give it the requisite qualities. The imitation is so perfect that the product has the electric properties of true amber. Ingenious manufacturers have even introduced into the substance foreign bodies, insects, etc., to make similarity more striking. Natural amber requires a temperature of 285° to 287° C. to fuse it, while the imitation becomes liquid at a much lower temperature. Also, true amber is attacked but slightly by ether or alcohol, and only after a long time, whereas the other loses its pallu on contact with these liquids, and becames rapidly soft.

THE SWAN ELECTRIC LAMP.—The Swan electric lamp, which is an incandescent light similar to Edison's and Maxim's in this country, continues to give great satisfaction in England, and begins to be regarded as a solution of the problem of electric lighting for domestic purposes. At Sir William Armstrong's house at Rothbury, Northumberland, where the lamp was first introduced, its performance continues all that could be desired. Forty lamps are in operation, each being equal to thirty-seven candles. The lamp is also regarded as a great boon to miners, and as likely to revolutionize the coal trade, since by its use explosions in mines will be impossible, except where a possible fall from the roof might break the glass globe.

Obituaries.

KING.—Died, in this city, Tuesday, April 18, 1882, JOHN E. KING, in the forty-fifth year of his age. The deceased was a member of the Felicity Street Methodist Episcopal Church, South, of which he waited, under the pastorate of Rev. Dr. J. B. Walker, in 1878; since which time he has walked humbly with God, and died in the triumphs of faith. Bro. King was born in Cumberland county, Ky., and lost his father in early childhood. But his mother married again, a most estimable Christian lady, to whom Bro. King was devotedly attached to the day of his death, and who remarked over his bier: "Never was there a boy like John!" A good son, a kind and affectionate friend, an indulgent father, a faithful brother, a friend in need has passed away, and many, both here and elsewhere will rise up and call him blessed. He was never known to turn the poor empty away. But he was so retiring, modest and unostentatious withal, that his worth was only known and appreciated by those who knew him most intimately. He came to this city when a young man and engaged as bookkeeper in the tobacco house of his father-in-law, Mr. James Turner, and, less than a year his wife fell a victim to that dread disease, yellow fever. Her mother, Mrs. T. H. Wilson, still lives in this city. His father-in-law retiring from business, Mr. King succeeded him, and by the hand of diligence and the blessing of the Lord, amassed a handsome fortune. In 1857 he married Miss Martha Howze, a devout Christian and member of the Presbyterian Church, but in 1867, just as he was preparing to leave the city with his family, yellow fever again invaded his home, carrying off his dearly beloved wife and the death of his eldest son was followed in a few days by that of his wife, leaving the heart-broken husband with five motherless children. But the grace of the Lord was in all this. Mrs. King died in possession of all her graces, shouting the praises of her Redeemer. Committing her precious children and dear husband into the hands of the Lord, and to the oversight of Christian friends, she bade an affectionate farewell to those about her and took her flight to the glorious realms beyond. After the lapse of a few years, Bro. King married again, his choice of one as noble and deserving as the former—one who feared God and kept His commandments, one in whom he could find a faithful and devoted friend, and who succeeded by her gentle influence and prayers in bringing the whole household to Christ. Bro. King was converted in early life, but on relating his experience to a pastor of the gospel remarked: "Young man, I hope you are not mistaken." This so startled him that he began to reason with himself, and often left the woods to wrestle and pray God to give him a clearer sense of his acceptance; but never doubting which to his satisfaction; so he gave up in despair, groping about in gloom and gloom for many years. After his last marriage the young wife, in the second marriage, died, and that little urn he promised to seek his face. Again and again Sister King urge the fulfillment of the vow, but the fear of being taken "deterred him." At last, unable to resist the spirit and wooing influence of prayer, he came again to seek in earnest. After many days of wrestling, long prayer, in the quiet of his home, the same sweet peace came and he laid hold on eternal life. Several days after he received a call and life before he would go, that he could not be missed. From that time until his death a cloud interposed between him and God; no doubts disturbed his perfect rest in Christ. Being in ill-health and growing worse all the time, retired from business three years ago, his house in order, and awaited the summons to the better world. He was not willing to die. With an ardent family, he felt he had just begun to live, and the belief that he was never those sweet lies for the heart of Christian love are sweeter, and any other he longed so to live, he was ready, and on two different occasions when near death, as he supposed, he made them a rehearsal of the same. He said, "Thy will of the Lord be done." Being the victim of a cancer which had fastened him many months with general good health, he fought it hard to die, and often said he could take some prostrating disease and die, how much better it would be. Strange to say, so it was. God, in His mercy, so far restored his health as to enable him to resume business, with the additional blessing of a sweet, sincere baba to love and cherish, as it were, a new lease on life. But alas! the chill of death seized the congestion and inflammation of the lungs set in, and in one short week his spirit took its flight to join the loved ones gone before. And who that stood around that death-bed will ever forget its scenes? The pious fervor with which he said, "O God! give me grace to suffer thy will;" the utter submission and trust with which he commended himself, his wife and children into the hands of the Lord; the earnest admonitions of the dying father to his children, as he took each one by the hand and talked to them about Jesus and His power to save! "Where is thy victory, O grave? where is thy sting, O death?" Where is his death, no sting; the Conqueror over death and the grave was with him. His pastor, Dr. Carter was with him, and says he never witnessed a more triumphant death; he has read of such and heard of them, but never saw one so complete. He acted like a man walking hand in hand with an enemy over whom he had already gained a victory. What a consolation to the grief-stricken ones! There was no reluctance to part when the hour came. He waited and watched the approach of death, felt his own pulse, asked if his face were getting cold, and retained his consciousness to the last moment. His last audible words were: "Faith and hope! Oh, my good God is!" "Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of His saints." He was a great sufferer; but he shall be no sickness there, sorrow and sighing shall flee away. Oh, that this triumphant death may be sanctified to the salvation of all who witnessed it! And may the thought of his happy transition cheer the bereaved in their loneliness and desolation; and his God be their stay and support, their refuge and consolation. A FRIEND.

STARLING.—WILLIAM P. STARLING, the subject of this brief obituary, the son of Thomas E. Starling, of Walnut Grove, was born February 5, 1808, and died April 30, 1882. His death was one of distressing sadness. Having mounted a mule to ride it to water, he had scarcely turned the yard when the mule made an effort to throw him, he fell, and when found in a minute afterward was taken to the house in an unconscious state, his head being crushed in behind, his back badly bruised and probably broken, and his chest also being badly bruised. He lived about one hour in a state of unconsciousness, and passed away to a better world. Willie was a good boy. His acquaintances say they never heard him use a bad word. His associates loved him dearly. Though he had made no public profession of faith in Christ, yet his orderly, smooth and acceptable life shows the result of his Christian education and training, that such a course was his choice which, doubtless, he would have soon publicly declared. Willie was a member of the Sunday-school, and the Sunday-school, with sad hearts and tearful eyes, hereby express their deep grief, and tender to the bereaved family their warmest sympathy on account of such a sad misfortune, and with humble submission bow to the decree of their Creator who has said that "it is appointed unto man once to die;" and, in bearing the pain of their loss, trusting, rejoice in his gain in a better existence where accidents never occur, where hearts never swell with grief, and all tears shall be wiped away; in looking prayerfully to their gracious God and heavenly Father for grace to help them so to live as to pass the waves of this troublesome world and finally, gladly, meet their beloved comrade on the banks of the river of life, to part no more, ever to praise God for Christian parents and Sabbath-schools.

J. W. ELLISON, for Committee.

DANCER.—J. W. DANCER, son of Rev. J. P. Dancer, was born in Tishomingo county, Miss., September 28, 1818, and died in Orange Grove, Jackson county, Miss., May 2, 1882.

He professed religion and joined the Methodist Church in the fall of 1837, and from thence to the close of life he lived a consistent Christian, not without the foibles of our dethroned humanity; but by the exercise of that humbleness, which the grace of God alone can inspire, did he strive to eliminate the sinful emotions of the heart, and to repell the subtle beguiling of the evil one. Neither were his spiritual triumphs the occasion of emotional display; but the ebullition of his grateful heart assembled to the Father, and the savor of his consecrated life fell upon those around him like the whisperings of a pleasant dream.

For two years he realized that he was as one walking a narrow path with an impassible mountain on either side, while at the further end sat the giant form of Death hiding from his vision the beauties and joys of the soul's eternal rest. But when the last step was taken, and the grim form of Death stronged his mortal frame, he proclaimed his victory through Christ and, lo! he is not, for God took him.

True, there were earthly ties that made his stay a great pleasure, and his departure a sore trial. In 1872 he was happily married to Miss Bettie C. Board, who, with four little children, are made sad indeed by this affliction. The leaving of his affectionate wife and little ones, together with the fact that his father had to leave last fall on account of his ill-health, was a great cross to him. But ere this he hath joined the loved ones gone before, and by a blissful experience has realized that

"Death is a debt to nature due,
Which I have paid, and you must pay."

J. W. WILMS.

LAVRE.—Died, March 26, 1882, near Pearlington, Miss., UNIZAN LAVRE, aged forty-two years.

The subject of this notice was delivered to God by baptism in infancy by a pious mother who is still living. He served his State and country faithfully as a soldier in the Confederate army during the late war. When he was about thirty years of age, having previously joined the Methodist Church, he was married to Miss M. C. Sconier. They had five children, four of whom are living, with their mother and share with her the loss of a loving father and devoted husband. He was kind and gentle in his family, friendly and sociable in his bearing in the community, a good citizen, and especially kind and devoted to his aged and afflicted mother, who feels a sad loss in his death. He was taken with a violent fever, followed by pneumonia, which, after about fifteen days suffering, terminated in death. He was aware of his condition from an early stage of his sickness, and sought a preparation for death. He confessed the faults of his life as a church member, prayed for forgiveness, and expressed trust in the Saviour, and a willingness to depart. Conscious of his approaching end he sought and obtained such assurances as were satisfactory to him concerning his temporal affairs. He has gone to receive his reward from the Judge of all the earth who will do right. The large concourse of relatives, friends and acquaintances, who were present at the funeral, may be considered as the best evidence of the esteem in which he was held by the people among whom the greater part of his life had been spent. May the blessed Comforter abide with the mother, brothers and sisters, who and children forever.

J. W. SANDELL.

FRANKLIN.—WILLIAM H. FRANKLIN was born in Tennessee, February 12, 1810, and died at his home in Rankin county, Miss., May 3, 1882. He married in early life and was the father of twelve children, six of whom with the mother preceded Bro. Franklin to the other world. He joined the Methodist Church about forty-five years ago, and was ever devoted and consistent as a Christian. He was appointed a class leader soon after he joined the church, and continued most of his time in that office. He came into the church in the good old days of class meetings, and from the beginning his religious character was well formed. He loved the class meeting and loved class. He felt his religion and manifested his feelings. He often got happy in our meetings and would shake hands and exhort the people, and tell how he loved Christ. He was a man of faith and prayer, and, consequently, a very useful man in the church. In his last days he was a great sufferer from nervous prostration. He knew of his approaching dissolution, bid his children and friends present good-bye and asked them to meet him in heaven. He was the father-in-law of Rev. J. H. Evans, of the Mississippi conference, and was a member of Bro. Evans' charge. C. McDONALD.

DANIEL PRATT IMPROVED
"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873.
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons, and several improvements have been added. It obviates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work within the same time, while less consuming steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton, on this account, at a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint, added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every 100 bales ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

A SURE PREVENTIVE OF FEVER AND AGUE.

As an antidote against malarial poison, fever and ague, and other intermittent fevers, nothing equals Brown's Iron Bitters. A true tonic! A perfect safeguard!

REST ONE DAY IN THE WEEK.—Lilienthal, Washburn and Southy, the well-known photographers on Canal street, have consented to close their establishments Sundays from the twenty-eighth instant. This is a good idea, and it is to be hoped that all business houses will follow suit.—Times-Democrat.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

ATLANTA, May 24.—In the Southern Presbyterian Assembly to-day the committee on bills and overtures made its report. The question of the relation of colored ministers in church courts was taken up but not decided. The assembly sent the following telegram about fraternal relations to the Northern Assembly at Springfield, Ill.: "In answer to overtures from the Presbyteries the following paper was adopted, almost unanimously: In order to remove all difficulties in the way of that full and formal fraternal correspondence which, on our part, we are prepared to accept, we adopt the following minute: That while receding from no principles, we do hereby declare our regret for and withdrawal of all expressions of our assembly which may be regarded as reflecting upon, or offensive to the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of the United States of America.

Resolved, That a copy of this paper be sent by telegraph to the General Assembly, now in session at Springfield, Ill., for their prayerful consideration, and mutatis mutandis for their reciprocal concurrence, as affording a basis for exchange of delegates forthwith.

SPRINGFIELD, Ill., May 25.—In the Presbyterian General Assembly West, to-day the dispatch of yesterday from the Presbyterian Assembly in Atlanta, was read. It was received with great delight and referred to the committee on correspondence, and it is understood will elicit a most cordial response.

SAN FRANCISCO, May 25.—A Fort Thomas dispatch says: Esketleschew, chief of the Coyote Apaches, has visited Col. Herbert G. Brockett, of the Third Cavalry, commanding the post, and states that he wishes the government to allow his people to go back and live at their old home in the White mountains. There is plenty of grass and water for stock raising, and they can farm. He also stated that they wished the military to protect them from Americans, Mexicans and hostile Indians. Referring to the cause of the Chircohua outbreak, he said that it was caused by Agent Tiffany not assisting them to make water ditches to irrigate the land. Two of the chiefs, Juh and Meciise, went on two different occasions to Tiffany, begging for this assistance in getting out ditches, and Tiffany would not reply or give them any satisfaction whatever. The chief stated that he represented fifteen chiefs of different Apaches, who had sent him with this message, and hence he spoke by authority.

ATLANTA, May 26.—The Presbyterian General Assembly agreed by a vote of 81 to 41, that the negro Parks, of Memphis, was entitled to the full benefits of ordination on the same basis with white members of the Southern Presbyteries. The reply of the Northern Assembly, accompanied by a modifying resolution, was received with much disappointment. The committee on foreign correspondence has the matter in charge, and will reply to the Northern Assembly to-night or to-morrow.

TROY, N. Y. May 26.—An infernal machine, containing powder and a fuse, was found on the porch of the office of the Weekly News at Warrensburg, Warren county. An attempt had been made to fire the fuse. The inscription on the machine warned the editor to leave town. He had offended some by the utterance of temperance principles.

JACKSON, Miss., May 26.—The annual meeting of the Press Association of Mississippi will be held at Natchez, June 7. It is understood that the Natchez and Jackson railroad will be completed to Raymond by that date, and that most of the members and visitors will go by that route. An unusually large attendance is looked for.

BATON ROUGE, May 26.—A grand entertainment was given to-night at the residence of Mr. J. W. Bates, under the auspices of the Ladies' Aid Society, for the benefit of the parsonage fund of the Methodist Church. The large grounds were beautifully illuminated by numerous lights, and were filled to overflowing by the best people of Baton Rouge. Bernard Shields, of New Orleans, recited several poems, and otherwise assisted in the success of the entertainment.

ATLANTA, May 28.—In the Presbyterian General Assembly yesterday an issue of $10,000 of bonds was authorized, to re-establish the publishing house of the denomination. Further communications were received from the Springfield Assembly, which satisfied the scruples of members, after which fraternal messages were exchanged and fraternal messengers duly appointed.

NEW YORK, May 28.—The steamer Celtic, having on board four survivors, of the Jeannette expedition, was reported early this morning outside the bar. A number of waiting friends of the hardy Arctic voyagers, temporarily staying in the city, were taken down the bay to meet them on board the steamboat Birkbeck. Among them were the parents of Lieut. Danenhower and a number of officers of the American Geographical Society. As the Celtic approached the Birkbeck, a tall, full bearded, dark complexioned man, clothed in dark material and wearing guarded eye glasses, was seen on her deck, waving his hat. A joyful cry went up from the lips of his father and mother, and as the two boats came together Lieut. Danenhower jumped aboard the Birkbeck, and was clasped in his mother's arms. The scene was an affecting one. After congratulations, the Lieutenant conducted his weeping parents to his cabin on the Celtic, where he introduced them to his fellow sufferers. The party remained aboard the Celtic, listening to a recital of dreadful sufferings in the far north and sorrowful tales of the fate of Commander DeLong and his men, until the steamer reached her dock, where Lieut. Danenhower was surrounded by congratulating friends who had gathered in anticipation of his coming to give him a hearty welcome.

ATLANTA, May 27.—The most important action of the Southern Presbyterian Assembly this session was taken this afternoon. A telegram was received about one o'clock from the Northern Assembly at Springfield, stating that they positively withdrew everything which might in the past have reflected upon the Christian character of the Southern Presbyterians and that their action was unequivocal. The dispatch was similar to that sent by the Southern Assembly a day or two ago. It was received with enthusiasm, and the Assembly proceeded at once to elect the following delegates, who will attend the next meeting of the Northern Assembly: Dr. Wm. Brown, of Richmond, Va.; Dr. T. A. Hoyt, Nashville, Tenn; Hon. B. M. Estes, of Memphis, Tenn. The alternates are: Dr. R. P. Farris, of St. Louis, Rev. Henry C. Alexander, of Virginia and Hon. Patrick Joyce, of Louisville, Ky.

NEW YORK, May 29.—The World has special dispatches from New Orleans, Galveston, Memphis and Mobile, which it is claimed have been carefully prepared, showing the present condition and prospects of the cotton crop. The report sums up as follows: If the season from the present time until cotton picking begins is an ordinary one, the outlook is that there will be a considerable increase in the amount of cotton grown in Alabama and Texas over last year, and quite as much, notwithstanding the overflow, in the States of Arkansas, Louisiana and Mississippi. Reports from the Atlantic coast and the Northern belt may not be expected to be quite so favorable as those from the Gulf States, but the whole situation at this time may be regarded as promising a yield in excess of that of the current season last year, and approximating, no doubt, the largest ever raised.

CHARLOTTE, N. C., May 29.—The Southern General Synod of the Lutheran Church is in convention here. During to-day's deliberations it was decided to send and support a missionary in India or Japan. It indorsed the Howard University, and the appointment of Dr. Butler as its representative in said institution; agreed to send to and support colored young men who are to study for the Lutheran ministry in said university. The subject of union or reunion with the General Synod of the North caused considerable debate, and is as yet undecided.

LITTLE ROCK, May 29.—At seven o'clock this morning the fast freight train bound South on the Iron Mountain railroad ran off the track near Austin, twenty-five miles north of Little Rock, and ditched nine or ten cars. An old man named Bryant, who got on at that station was instantly killed, and another, name unknown, fatally injured.

VICKSBURG, May 29.—Yazoo and Sunflower rivers have been swelling some, on account of the rises in the upper rivers, but not enough to cause any anxiety. Crop prospects on the streams named are reported very good, and only need some hot weather to render them a success.

ATLANTA, May 29.—The Presbyterian Assembly is engaged to-day in closing up the routine work of the session, and is expected to adjourn to-night. The Presbyterian General Assembly adjourned at half-past six to-night, to meet at Lexington, on the third Thursday in May, 1883.

FOREIGN.

ST. PETERSBURG, May 24.—The Official Messenger to-day announces, by order of the Emperor, that the government is firmly resolved to punish inexorably all outrages against the persons and property of Jews, seeing that the latter are under the protection of the laws, which are equally binding on all subjects of the Czar. Governors and other authorities are therefore commanded, on their personal responsibility, to take timely measures to prevent or suppress outrages on the Jews. Any remissness will entail dismissal from office.

The Official Messenger publishes the regulation agreed upon by the committee of ministers, and approved by the Emperor on the fifteenth instant. They provide that Jews shall henceforth be prohibited from settling outside of towns and villages, except where Jewish settlements already exist. Jews are prohibited from trading on Sundays and Christian holidays. These regulations only apply to governments where Jews are permanently settled. All contracts of purchase or tenantry with Jews are provisionally suspended.

LONDON, May 28.—The Standard's Cairo correspondent says: The Khedive was informed that an armed force was in readiness to convey him a prisoner to Kubbeh if he refused to reinstate Arabi Bey. He replied: "I bow to the will of the nation." The correspondent adds: "A blow is inflicted on the prestige of England and France, which only the utmost energy on their part can parry. The Khedive is now a mere puppet in the hands of Arabi Bey."

ALEXANDRIA, May 28.—Mr. Cookson, British consul here, called a meeting of British subjects this morning. He said there was no reason to apprehend danger to life or property from the Egyptian garrison, but that if necessity should arise for their leaving the city they would be protected by the ironclads while embarking.

CAIRO, May 28.—The Khedive to-day received a telegram from the Porte expressing disapproval of the attitude of the military party, and asking the Khedive to advise them to observe moderation, otherwise foreign intervention may become inevitable.

HAVANA, May 27.—During the week ending yesterday there were twenty-eight deaths from yellow fever, ten of which occurred in one day. The disease is increasing, owing to continuous heavy rains.

ST. PETERSBURG, May 29.—The Czar, desirous to appease the people, has decided to grant reforms. Two commissions will be instituted to consider the question of central institutions and a share in the administration to be given to the people. There is a commission already sitting under the presidency of Gen. Kachanoff, to examine local institutions.

CONSTANTINOPLE, May 20.—A majority of the Ministers favor the immediate dispatch of a squadron to Egypt, with an Imperial commission. It is stated the British and French Ambassadors have withdrawn their objections to Turkish intervention.

DEAR BRETHREN.—Please come to our help in the way of subscriptions and remittances.

THE BATTLE.—Life is often spoken of as a battle. From birth to death it is one prolonged struggle for existence. We are in the main conscious of this most fully when disease attacks us and suffering ensues. Most of the phisical ills of life are due to our thoughtlessness or recklessness. We do not sufficiently appreciate the strength of the enemy. We somehow think that we shall escape the penalties of wrong-doing. So, too, of the business ventures we undertake. We cannot ignore the difficulties, but we are prone to think them chained, like the lions in the way of Bunyan's pilgrim. It is not right that we should over-rate possible difficulties in the way of success. To do this would perhaps paralyze all effort. Nor should we under-rate them. To do this is to insure defeat, sooner or later. Rather measure the full strength of the enemy. Measure, too, your own strength, of the Lord, go bravely forward, and win, every time, in the battle of life.—Good Work.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an imported piano because their mothers and grandmothers used to have one of the same make. What was considered a fine piano a hundred years ago, would be called a tin pan now; what suited our ancestors would not suit our daughters. Music more than all other arts, is progressive, and the difference between the spinette on which Mozart and even Beethoven played is, in comparison with the concert piano, as the Chickering of to-day, as great as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European makers adhere to their old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. American pianos alone have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The Americans obtain durability by their iron plates and bars, volume of tone by over stringing, light touch by improved mechanism of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board. If a European piano has a valuable feature, American makers adopt it. There is no patent or copy right on them. Take, for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago; this progress is very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which no other piano possess. Their pin block is of iron, the holes are bushed with maple and the pins are inserted into the maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as many other pianos. Therefore it is not advisable for people to buy French pianos on which the government receives about $100.00 in duties, if a better toned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for from less. I have no prejudice against foreign manufacture, and sold myself large numbers of imported pianos, but that was at a time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since I am in business, I have always striven to keep good, reliable and first-class pianos, and sell them as low as possible. By this policy, and fair dealing, I have built up my business, referring with pride to the thousand families I have supplied with music.

General Conference.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Conference was called to order by Bishop Wilson. W. W. Duncan, of South Carolina, conducted the devotional exercises. The familiar hymn, "A charge to keep I have," was sung in a spirited manner, followed by prayer.

The minutes of the morning session were adopted.

Bishop Parker then took the chair. On motion, the rules were suspended and W. H. Potter submitted a resolution to adjourn sine die at five o'clock. It was opposed by J. E. Evans and D. R. McAnally on the grounds that to thus hurry over matters was not carrying out the purposes for which they met here.

The resolution was amended by J. E. Evans to adjourn at ten o'clock to-night, which was lost. Six o'clock was then fixed as the hour.

A note was read from Dr. Fitzgerald, expressing his regret at not being able to be present on account of illness, and asking that the members of the General Conference be kind enough to furnish their remarks for publication.

Upon call of the committees, A. M. Shipp, chairman of Committee on Fraternal Correspondence, offered Report No. 10, authorizing the secretary to convey the fraternal greetings of the Conference to the General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church, now in session at Huntsville, Ala.

P. P. Ellis offered and the Conference adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the thanks of this General Conference are cordially due and are hereby heartily tendered to the Secretaries, Bros. John S. Martin, J. D. Powell, W. M. Leftwich, B. Craven, J. C. Thompson, J. J. Tigert, and F. Dreyfous for their patient, diligent, laborious, and faithful services during this Conference session.

The Conference, at the request of J. A. Peterson, substituted Report No. 8 for Report No. 5, of the Committee on Revisal on the calendar. This report, when read, was found to embody the proposition to change the name of the church.

Before any discussion, W. W. Bennett moved to postpone the whole subject indefinitely.

The chair decided the question not debatable.

Geo. Thornburgh appealed from the decision of the chair, and the Conference did not sustain that decision, and the subject was opened for discussion.

W. M. Rush, of Missouri Conference, proceeded to discuss the report of the committee. He favored their report, and said that there now no longer remained a reason for the suffix "South," and strongly urged that the Conference would adopt the report.

J. B. McFerrin stated that on behalf of himself and O. R. Blue, to prevent discussion, he would offer the following resolution as a substitute:

Resolved, That the matter of changing the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, be referred to the several Annual Conferences by the Bishops during the ensuing four years, and that they report the result of the vote to the General Conference of 1886 for ratification.

G. H. Hayes, of Louisville, opposed indefinite postponement, and said he wanted the name changed to what the term South means—"Original Methodist Church."

D. C. Kelly, of Tennessee, said that the change of name is almost universally favored by our Western members, who ask it for the success of church in that section. From a personal observation in the West he found that our present name was retarding our growth there. It is a perpetual barrier to our success. He said nearly every Western man, in leaving Conference from home, said to him: "Do n't forget to leave that word 'South' out of our name."

J. Wofford Tucker, of Florida, said names had in them history, and history crystallizes itself in creeds. Although it is claimed that the word "South" in connection with our church is no longer applicable, if it is called by another name we will confuse the subject in the mind. Were not nine-tenths of the members South of Mason and Dixon's line? What was the reason of the pressure to remove the suffix "South?" It was an influence antagonistic to the South. Were we to change it, it would be a reflection on our past history, and it would be said by our opposers that it was the same old rebel church trying to hide under a new name, ashamed of its old one. He favored no such measure. By this change we would lose more members in the South than we would gain in the West. We must grow and thrive as a Southern Methodist church. He was not ashamed of our past record. History could not be unrented. We must retain our designation. We have increased at the rate of 25,000 per annum, and have built up schools and churches. He loved this as the church of his choice, but he hoped they would not change its name till he was dead.

P. A. Peterson, of Virginia, said that they would have to discard sentiment and look at facts. The suffix "South" would have never been added to our name, but to distinguish it from the M. E. Church. Our mission is to plant our church in every section of the country, and not alone in the South, as our name would seem to indicate. We say we wish to plant our church in the North, the Northwest, the West, and the Southwest. If so, we are not justified in retaining that part of a name which seems to be naturally offensive to a large part of our fellow citizens who would be glad to cooperate with us. Let us change our name and adopt ourselves to the whole country.

E. K. Miller, of Missouri, said a change in name was demanded. No one could visit the Northwest and view things as they exist, and deny this. A brother transferred to Kansas City from Louisiana had written the committee, urging the change. To retain the name meant retrogression, decay and death. To change it means perpetuity, advance, success.

J. D. Shaw, of Texas, said he wanted the polity, doctrines and name of our church to be for all the world. It is our commission to go into the whole world. This is the "great commission." He said we are too much limited. Our success demands the change.

Anson West, of Alabama, said he thought there was not much agitation on the subject. He favored an indefinite postponement because he did not want the matter agitated. We are not claiming the whole world, and especially the Northern part of our country. That was simply poetry. We would gain nothing by a change. They would still be called "that old rebel church." The time was there, and would stay there till they were dead and buried.

L. B. Stateler, of Montana, spoke of the embarrassment growing out of the name which all Southern Methodists in his section felt. The people there are our friends, and if we remove that suffix we would succeed where we are now failing.

J. H. McLean, of North Texas, said that to change our name would cause more disquiet than it would do good. Nineteen-twentieths would feel the recoil, the one-twentieth were accelerated. He did not think his section would be benefited by a change of name.

J. W. Fitch, of Kentucky, thought the Western brethren had exaggerated ideas of the benefits to accrue from a change of name. The tide of immigration to the West was from the North and East, and would seek affiliation with the M. E. Church, no matter what name our church might bear. He illustrated the effect of a change of name by repeating an amusing anecdote. He opposed it.

C. I. Vandeventer, of Missouri, wanted the question sent to the Conferences for their action. Although having heretofore voted against it, he now, however, favors a change of name.

Jas. Whitworth, of Tennessee, said that in the South we have a population of about six millions, and a Southern Methodist membership of only about nine hundred thousand. A change of name is a question of the greatest moment to us. He is not ashamed of the word "South," but felt that if we would reach a large element, namely the colored people, it must be done by some such measure. The spirit manifested by Bishop Holsey in his speech to this Conference a few days ago should be cultivated.

J. W. Tucker asked how he would explain his reason for changing the name should it be done.

In reply, he would say that the reason for taking the name "South" had ceased to exist. They never were any thing but the M. E. Church, except on one question, namely, slavery, and that had been removed.

Anson West asked if they took off the word South did Mr. Whitworth suppose the negro would join them.

He replied in the affirmative. The Northern Methodist church was rapidly building up in the South. They are coping with us in every section. This change of name is a practical, common-sense question. Let us brave it it slowly, but let us adapt ourselves to changed conditions, and submit this question to the Annual Conferences for their adoption.

W. H. Potter, of North Georgia, said the logic of the matter was to go back into the M. E. Church. They could not blot out their history, and there was no escape except to ac knowledge the truth—if it be the truth—and go back to that church. He could stand any thing but to be laughed at, and that is what the world does at any one who changes his name.

H. D. Hogan, of Western, from a long experience in the West, is of the opinion that the greatest barrier to our success in that region is the word "South." There is a great prejudice against it. Unless we do something in the direction of a change, we might as well build a Chinese wall around the church.

W. B. Brown, of the Pacific Conference, said that in the richest portions of California they had sixteen stations at the commencement of the war. Nearly all of these had been lost to our church. He had been told in what was known as the "rebel corner" of California that the name would have to be changed or we certainly die there. He said he was a good Southern man, but a better Christian and Methodist, and for the life of our church in the West he favored a change in name.

R. A. Young called the previous question, and the call was sustained.

The motion to indefinitely postpone was lost.

J. B. McFerrin again read his and O. R. Blue's substitute, and strongly urged its adoption.

M. S. Andrews, of Alabama, spoke in favor of immediate action. He opposed the substitute, but favored the original report.

J. E. Evans, of North Georgia opposed a change of name, but said if it must be done, he was in favor of submitting it to the Conferences, and his favorite would be "Methodist Episcopal Church of Christ."

J. E. Edwards, of Virginia, rose to a question of privilege, saying that he had once before got the floor long enough to remark that he was the first man, living or dead, which he was gaveled down. He would now correct that statement, and concede that Adam was the first man. But he was the first man that had proposed the name "Episcopal Methodist Church."

D. R. McAnally, of St. Louis, said a non-aggressive church must die. If they were to spread as they must be in the West, where there was an opening as broad as all out of doors. All the Conferences should be given a chance to express their views on this proposed change of name. This much should, and he felt certain would be granted them.

S. Rodgers, of Baltimore, asked how it would be if a majority of the Conferences opposed the change.

D. R. McAnally said the decision would be acquiesced in.

W. W. Bennett of Virginia spoke strongly against the change, saying it was a surrender. The great body of the church must be located in some part of the world, and he referred to the Established Church of England and the Roman Catholic Church to show that local names stand wherever these churches exist. The center of our church must ever be in the Southern States. Here we have increased more rapidly than any other church.

P. P. Ellis moved the previous question, and the call was sustained.

J. E. Edwards asked if this question of change of name could be sent around to the Conferences within a two thirds vote by this General Conference.

The chair replied that a majority vote was sufficient.

A call was made for the ayes and noes, but it was lost.

J. B. McFerrin and O. R. Blue's substitute was then adopted by a vote of 105 to 40.

Bishop McTyeire took the chair.

The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

While they were being read Bishop McTyeire called attention of the secretary to the fact that the substitute had been adopted by a vote of 105 to 40, and asked the insertion of the fact in the minutes.

Bishop Keener here made the point, "that the attention which the chair has called to the members, voting in the affirmative and negative on this question, must not be mistaken for a constitutional vote of this General Conference; inasmuch as the substitute of Dr. McFerrin expressly states that after the Annual Conferences shall have voted it is then to be ratified by the General Conference of 1886, before becoming a law."

W. W. Bennett said if this went around the Conferences, and received a two thirds vote, could it not be plead that the measure was consummated?

Bishop McTyeire made a statement in reference to the matter, saying that the Conferences were compelled to take the initiative by the adoption of this substitute. Their action is to be passed upon by the next General Conference.

Bishop McTyeire suggested that the hour of adjournment was at hand. The session had been a very harmonious one, and suggested that it be closed with devotional exercises. He lined out as a closing hymn that song of Charles Wesley's, beginning:

"And let our bodies part,
To distant climes repair,"

It was sung with true devotion.

Dr. D. R. McAnally offered a fervent prayer, touching the hearts of many.

"Let me love thee more and more," was then sung, during which a great deal of emotion was manifested by the members.

Dr. McAnally advanced to Dr. McFerrin, and they clasped each other, while the tears ran down their cheeks. He then clasped the hand of each of the Bishops after the true Methodist style. There were few dry eyes in the audience.

In concluding the exercises, Bishop McTyeire congratulated the Conference that there had been harmony under the Divine Spirit. Warm discussions had taken place, but nothing unchristian had been said. He thought their constituents would approve, in the main, not only what they had done, but also what they had not done. He and his colleagues of the old panel were thankful for the men and the manner by which the episcopacy had been strengthened. Every one of their new colleagues they took to their hearts, and joined hands with them to cultivate the wide field and to make it wider.

He prayed that the good hand of God might be upon them for good, and bring them to their homes and flocks and families in peace. Might God guide them with his eye and cause his pleasure to prosper in their hands. He then pronounced the General Conference adjourned sine die to be succeeded by another consisting of an equal number of bishops and laymen, to be elected according to law, and to meet on the first Wednesday in May, 1886, in the city of Richmond, Va.

The doxology was then sung, and Bishop Pierce pronounced the benediction.

Bishop Holsey's Address.

To the General Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South—Reverend Fathers and Brethren:—I come to you to bear a message of love and Christian fraternity from that body known as "The Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America," the only body set apart by your authority.

The name is a little long, and hard for some to pronounce, but as the Methodist vocabulary had been exhausted of names for its numerous progeny, our mother, the grand old lady of the South, searched in vain to find a shorter name, so she called her firstborn "The Colored Methodist Church in America." I wish to inform you that we are proud of our ancestry and noble parentage. (Applause.)

But, fathers, we come to you not as strangers and foreigners, not as aliens from some far-away and uncongenial clime; but as fellow citizens with the saints, who are of the household of Methodism, and built upon the same foundations of grace and truth in common with yourselves. The fire of love and holy zeal that stirred and stimulated the apostles and early Christians, and took hold upon the reformers, and thrust out the Wesleys and their coadjutors to raise up a holy people for the Lord, that sent Methodism flashing across the broad Atlantic to light up the American continent with the gospel of free grace, and that flamed on down through the ramifications of all true Methodism, still scintillates in the souls and warms the hearts of the negro race. To him Methodism has bequeathed her richest boon and greatest blessing—a spiritual Christianity. With him Christianity is more than a mere fact and theory, more than historical event and philosophy; it is a real, tangible, and experimental reality. It enters deeply, minutely, and thoroughly permeates all his religious manhood, thrilling every fiber of the soul, marshalling every emotion, sentiment, and impulse around the standard of the cross, consecrating the whole to Christ.

While England, Germany, and our own country, have produced infidel and semi-infidel writers corrupting our theology, the negro has stood squarely upon the lofty eminence of an active, living and spiritual Christianity. With him religion is the chief concern of life, the necessity of his being. In the providence of God he seems the repository and the grand retainer of experimental Christianity. Though ignorant of the great problem of life at present, excelled in social culture and religious refinement, degraded in race, without wealth, and unstable in politics; yet he is ever sound in theology and faith, and true to Christ as he has learned him. His want of culture and social refinement is to be deplored by all who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity; yet none may question his simple earnestness and true faith. Thrown rough-cast from the state of slavery, and heaved into view by irrepressible evolutions of progress and development, he stands out with a broad margin, and vast religious and spiritual outcome. Sir, I am glad that I belong to a race whose records are untarnished with the foul blotch of infidel sentimentalism, and all other corrupting and corroding isms.

In the year 1870 we were set up into a separate and distinct body, with all the outfits of an ecclesiastical organism, but from the very necessity of the case the whole was in embryo—small, stinted and undeveloped. It was an experiment as well as a phenomenon in Methodism. Under very adverse circumstances we trembled for the results. A thousand difficulties marshaled their black squadrons against success. Giant forces of persecution, falsehood and slander ramified every pathway, and blockaded all the probable avenues of success; poverty and ignorance, the want of experience and tact—all, with fearful and united onslaught, militated against us on the field of battle. But, believing in the righteousness of the cause we had espoused, and that God had called us unto it, we continued to pray, work, travel, preach, and trust in God.

Besides all this the relation that we sustained to you placed us in a very peculiar attitude—an attitude that none could fully comprehend but those who occupied the position. It thickened the gathering clouds of darkness, it mantled our spirits in mourning, and made all the timbers of our soul groan beneath the burdens to be borne. It was taken for granted that, as we were the child of Southern Methodism, created for an unholy purpose, that, of necessity, we were of the same political caste and opinions. This was deemed a sufficient ground to meet us in an open war of extermination, and finish our entire subversion by the hand of secret intrigue. "Absorption and disintegration," the two hideous monstrosities of modern Methodism, poured in upon us from every direction, and many of our churches and congregations were taken by storm, then turned upon us with a mad fury unparalleled in the history of Methodism since the days of the Wesleys. We thought it best, as ministers of the gospel, to stand aloof from the corrupting and entangling alliances of party politics, because we wanted to raise up a set of holy men, fully consecrated to the work of the ministry, and to preach the simple and pure gospel of Christ to our people, a people that needed it more than any other on the continent. We felt that we could not do the evangelical work of the gospel while engaged in the intrigues of the politician. The former filled our hearts and hands, and demanded all our strength, the latter destroyed our usefulness as ministers of the gospel, and subverted the purposes for which we had been set apart into a separate church organization. We looked forward to the evangelization of our people, and their advancement in the scale of Christian intelligence and social refinement. We wanted to make them useful citizens as well as good Methodists, and we sought to plant in their early national manhood the hidden life, the true stamina of a pure Christianity. This being firmly plated upon the bedrocks of man's nature we have but little to fear in the future growth and development of national greatness. This we conceive to be the most potent means in our reach, or even known among men, to raise any people from the depths of sin, of moral and mental blight, and save their souls.

All along the line of march poverty and ignorance have been, and now are, our greatest enemies. We are suffering for a more intelligent ministry to preach the gospel to the benighted sons of Ham. The day-schools and church schools of other denominations have done something for us intellectually, but nothing methodistic and denominationally, and the present process, although slow, is the surest mode of "absorption and disintegration." God has placed us among you in this broad land; your home is our home; your interests are our interests; your happiness is our happiness; and whatever may affect the one must in a large degree affect the other. As two plants can not grow in the same soil without receiving the same amount of light, air and moisture, so the two peoples can not inhabit the same territory without partaking of the same prosperity and adversities.

Whether God designed the institution of slavery or not, we know that it did, and that it does not now exist. It is numbered with the things of the past. While we may not thank God for its existence, yet we do thank him that he has overruled all things, sweetly, strongly, and for the best. What then seemed an evil has proved a blessing in disguise, and what seemed adverse to African christianization is destined to be a mighty factor in its accomplishment. While we feel it a duty to train and educate young men to carry the gospel to our fatherland, and pour light and salvation upon "the dark continent," yet here, in these United States of America, the colored people, as a race, must live and die, and must make up an important part of the body-politic in Church and State.

To you we sustain a three-fold relation: 1. As your servants. 2. As citizens with you. 3. As your church children. With this three fold cable we are strongly bound together and united in a manner that can not be analyzed nor fully understood by a stranger. This cable has stood the test of bloodshed, revolution and war, and even freedom itself did not sever its strong and adamantine links. The heavy pressure of nearly two decades has tried its strength, and found it sufficient for all past occasions. We trust that it may never be broken. This being the case, it seems natural that we should follow you, and make ourselves a duplicate of you as far as we are able. We have looked, and still look, to you for guidance and counsel. We ask your sympathy, aid and co-operation in redeeming your friends and former slaves from the long night of darkness and degradation. Who will come to the rescue? Who will hear the cries of the children of Ham?

In 1870 you launched our ship of church. Her keel was firmly laid with good old Wesleyan iron, her hull was strongly built, her sails were thrown to the winds of heaven, her gang board was hoisted, her engines moved, her signals rang out with no uncertain sound, and she was off for the promised Canaan. She has been sailing over a rough sea for more than eleven years. The storms have raged, and the waves, rolling high, have dashed their angry spray against our almost foundering bark. For months and years we sailed under a clouded sky and gloomy heavens. But at last we have reached mid-ocean, and we are battling with the winds and tides, and the agitated billows of an open sea. Many thought she would founder and go to the bottom; but, fathers and brethren, I am glad to say to you that she is still upon the high seas, making her way to the haven of success and salvation. To make the voyage doubly sure we must have trained officers and skilled navigators. We seek your helping hand, your prayers, your co-operation, and your money. You have much that we need; we have something that you must have. May God bless you and the great church which you represent.

Good Words.

In the still air the music lies unheard.
In the rough marble beauty hides unseen
To make the music and the beauty, needs
The Master's touch, the Sculptor's chisel keen.

Great Master, touch us with thy skillful hand;
Let not the music that is in us die!
Great Sculptor, hew and polish us, nor let,
Hidden and lost, thy form within us lie!

Spare not the stroke! do with us as thou will!
Let there be naught unfinished, broken, marred
Complete thy purpose, that we may become Thy perfect image, thou our God and Lord!

Bonar.

—This is emphatically, gloriously true. Christ himself pronounces a blessing on those who earnestly seek him in the sanctuary. For, speaking through the mouth of one of his servants, he is constantly saying, "Blessed is the man that heareth me, watching daily at my gates, waiting at the posts of my doors." Tens of thousands of men and women in our lands to-day are prepared to attest that they have found those words true.

—He who wishes to exert a useful influence must be careful to insult nothing. Let him not be troubled by what seems to be absurd, but let him consecrate his energies to the creation of what is good. He must not demolish, but build. He must raise temples where mankind may come and partake of the purest pleasure. Goethe.

—As the eye which has gazed at the sun can not immediately discern any other object, as the man who has been accustomed to behold the ocean turns with contempt from a stagnant pool, so the mind which has contemplated eternity, overlooks and despises the things of time. Edward Payson.

—An undue love of notoriety is to be found in too many of the ministry of the present day. Pulpit display is but a poor way in which to commend the gospel of salvation to any people. An air of conscientious earnestness should pervade every department of the service of the house of God.—Dr. Baldwin.

—Coleridge said that God gives civilization in its Sundays fifty-two springs a year.

THE AFFLICTED CHRISTIAN.

The following lines, says the Pascagoula Democrat-Star, were written by Judge J. W. Starr, of Orange Grove, in this county, and dedicated to the Christian wife of Col. W. R. Stuart, of Ocean Springs:

Father of all, to thee I come,
Affliction is my lot—
I'll kiss again thy chastening rod,
And murmur not; I will not.

I'll suffer on; and be content,
My Maker knoweth best;
And wait the bidding of my Lord,
To enter into rest.

My bark is frail, my faith is strong,
My zeal is unabated;
While thus the casket holds the soul,
I'll stand to thee related.

I'm nearing now the blissful realm,
My sky is clear to-day;
I claim thy blessed promise, still,
I've found the better way.

'Tis sad to part with earthly friends,
With earthly scenes to sever;
'Tis better far to be with Christ,
And reign with him forever.

Rewarded thus by God above,
Rewarded by the Son;
My heart will make its latest zeal,
My life in heaven begun.

Welcome then the blissful shore,
Welcome now the God above;
Welcome those who've gone before,
Welcome—welcome—God is love.

SUNDAY, JUNE 18, 1882.—MARK IX. 33-50.

GOLDEN TEXT.—"I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit."—ISAIAH lvii. 15.

THE CHILD-LIKE BELIEVER.

The subject of discussion along the way from the mount of transfiguration to the home in Capernaum the disciples did not care to have the Master hear. They instinctively felt that the Lord could be no party to their dissension. To keep him from hearing they lagged behind in the way, so as to let sufficient distance come between them and their Leader, to prevent his hearing their words intelligently; keeping in easy reach of him, so that they would not appear to have parted company. The Saviour walked alone, as he never intruded himself upon any one. The disciples did not know that Jesus could hear thoughts as well as articulate words. On the way from high spiritual rapture back to their home in Capernaum their thoughts and conversation was upon themes which were in shameful contrast to their thoughts and feelings on the mount. This scene is no unfrequent one. How often do we see Christians following their Lord at a distance, while they indulge themselves with a thousand petty, ambitious and sinful desires. The descent from the raptures of religion to the work and conflicts of faith is often attended with many an idle word and sinful discussion, which is not intended for the Lord's ear.

We do not wonder at their silence when the Lord inquired the subject of their discussion. Their silence was an eloquent confession of their sinful ambition. Who should have the highest position in the kingdom was the subject of their dispute by the way. As they warmed up to the discussion a word or two might have been caught. They were comparing their respective claims on the new King for favors. Peter had already received the keys; he surely would be the lord chamberlain of the household; others claimed first favors. Were they not his brothers? John was his favorite, and therefore he hoped for the place of prime minister. Andrew was first called in the kingdom; may he not hope to be first preferred? Judas heard all in silence, and though he knew his place was last in the Master's estimation, but then he congratulated himself on having the bag. He knew the power of gold, and felt assured that in his place, as lord treasurer, he could dominate all the rest.

No wonder they were loth to answer, but the Lord did not wait for any other response than that which his question evoked from the guilty conscience—sealing their lips, and mantling their faces with the flush of shame. He began at once his lesson to them concerning what constituted true greatness in his kingdom.

He sat down and called them around him, and said unto them: "If any man desire to be first, the same shall be last and servant of all." A paradox. Those of you who desire first places in my kingdom let him take the last place and be servant of all, now and here, where the kingdom is to be won. The first place in any kingdom is to be won by those who take the last place out of that kingdom. Humility in action is the way, the only way, to be first. The Lord does not mean to teach that for seeking the first place we are to take the last, as if he would leave no place for ambition in holy things. He does not say by this that his disciples were not called to highest places in his kingdom, for he offers rewards of all grades, exceeding great and precious, far more exceeding and eternal—thrones and dominions. He did not rebuke the sons of Zebedee when they asked for the two places by his throne, but told them it would be given to them for whom it was prepared, and there would be those who prepared themselves for this place by this rule of humility which he here gives. The "Oh to be nothing" sentiment has no place in Christ's teachings, but, on the contrary, no kingdom offers such ambitious, stirring incentives to run for the first prize.

There is a place for those who have a high and holy desire to be nearest their Lord. You want to be first; that is all right; but you must strive lawfully; and the measure and standard of true greatness is here told us by the Lord. This standard is the one the Lord used to attain to his high place at God's right hand. He came to minister, not to be ministered unto. If you seek the things above, where Christ is, you must follow this rule.

How exquisitely he enforces the lesson of humility in action by calling a little child, and taking it up in his arms. We are to be like this child in our lives. We are to carry ourselves as one would who held a little child on his bosom. There is lesson here in this acted parable from which we can catch a vision of a child of the kingdom as wonderful as was seen by the Prophet when a little child was leading them. His lesson taught them how they were to receive him by receiving the humblest of his representatives; little one, the least ones seeing in each a representative of himself. John spoke up in vindication of himself, and showed, by an instance of his zeal, how heartily and thoroughly he had accepted him; so thoroughly that he allowed nobody to receive him except in his way. He betrayed in his zeal a bigoted and illiberal spirit, and showed that he had not yet received the humble spirit. He gives them to understand that the smallest act in his name had its reward, and the least offense to the least of his friends should not escape his wrath. Oh! let us with our hand win the reward by taking the cup of water of life to his perishing children, and let us pluck out our eye or lose our strong right arm sooner than offend one of these little ones, just new-born children of life. Only to-day I was reading how a just converted sinner came near losing his precious gift by the careless remark of another who dubiously uttered a hope that his friend's conversion was all that he seemed to feel it to be. That insinuated doubt caused this little one to be offended with his title to life, and came near, oh! so near, wrecking his soul. Oh! if he had been lost, who could tell the destiny of his murder. Christ would have pursued him forever with wrath. The Lord ends up this talk, the most terrible in the gospel. It seems the thought of being robbed of his purchased redeemed, once seem to stir the profoundest depths of his righteous indignation.

Those who shall win those first places shall be salted with fire. What is that? Fire is the emblem of persecution and trial distress. Salt is the emblem of preservation. We are the sacrifice; the fire consumes it; but the salt preserves it. Amid the flames we are to be preserved; by the flames of suffering and trial we are to be made meet for the Master's use. A life with no trials, no crosses, no flames, would be a worthless one; a sacrifice unburned and unsalted, or salted with salt which has lost its saltness.

Colportage Sketches—No. 27.

BY A. M. JONES.

THE ONLY ADDITION.

The February rains of 1878 had been falling for a week, and the level, wire-grass country, in many places, was one vast sheet of water. When my buggy stopped, late in the afternoon of one of those memorable rainy days, at the gate of the only place, within miles, where food and shelter could be had for man and beast, I was wet, cold, tired and hungry. My horses, having been going splash, splash, for more than ten hours, were in the same condition. That was an anxious moment. Though densely cloudy, I knew, from my watch, the sun was rapidly declining, and that nightfall, with deep, heavy impenetrable darkness, would soon be upon me. To have been turned away, in the face of such weather, would have been calamitous indeed. A halloo brought the lady of the house, twenty-eight or thirty years of age, to the door, who, in answer to my question, rather impatiently said: "We never takes in travelers, an' the old man is not at home nohow." Will he be at home to-night? "Yes; I'm lookin' for him now; but he wont let you stay; we never takes in travelers." I could not afford to be sent on in such style, and having no time to lose, as the weather continued to increase in severity, said: I am not a traveler, in the ordinary sense of that term; I am a Methodist preacher, and colportour for "the American Bible Society." My only business here is to supply the people with the Holy Scriptures. While in your community I am compelled to have some place to rest at night. The little earnest speech had a good effect, and I was rejoiced when she said: "Ef you's a preacher git down an' come in; the ole man wont kere." Having yet some fears, and wishing to be as far from ready to leave as possible when the farmer should return, I rolled my buggy under the shelter, put away the harness, stabled the horses, and was passing through the barn, on my way to the house, when he came in sight. His well-kept pony, apparently not much larger than the rider, came in rapid speed, and I watched him closely. He was short, not more than five feet and six inches in height, but stout, weighing at least two hundred and twenty-five pounds. His large head, long hair, short neck, huge whiskers, immense shoulders, and wool hat, with round top and broad brim, rendered him anything else than attractive. I have neither space nor the ability to fully portray the following scene: While passing between the gate and wagon shelter he suddenly, and for the first time, discovered my buggy. Curbing his pony, and bringing him to a standstill, he leaned toward the object of his wonder, and looked intently, as though searching for some small article in the sand. Then raising himself in his stirrups, and after a moment's hesitation, as if in bewildered amazement, glanced toward the house, at the buggy again, then catching sight of the owner, still lingering at the lot, flashed upon him one long, fearful, angry gaze. Having become fully convinced that a strange, living man, a buggy and one or more horses were on his premises, he rode up to the gate, where his wife was anxiously awaiting him, and in a hoarse, gruff tone of voice, loud enough to have been heard three hundred yards, demanded: "Who's that here?" While the nervous, agitated woman answered in an undertone, he gave me another piercing glance, and roared: "How long's he bin here?" During the explanation, which was almost in a whisper, he seemed to have seen the breast-tree and pole of my buggy, and, after minutely viewing for a half minute the recent object of his discovery, exclaimed, louder and with more vehemence than before: "Has he got two horses?" With as much composure as possible I waited at the lot. It is true, I felt no apprehension of personal danger, except the terrible calamity of spending the dreary hours of the approaching night in the woods, but must confess that the old nursery story of Jack, The Bear and The Giant, so often told for the amusement of children, vividly occurred to my mind. Having interrogated the poor, embarrassed woman to his heart's content, he turned, put spurs to the pony, and, though the distance was not more than thirty yards, came in a sweeping trot. Within ten feet of where I stood, feeling all the unpleasantness of being an intruder, an unwelcome guest, he halted, and deliberately, without taking his eyes, surveyed me from head to foot. A current of mingled contempt and indignation for a moment tingled through my veins at such rudeness, but circumstances dictated prudence, I was the first to speak. This is Mr. Jackson, I presume." "Well, sir, that's what they call me." In passing through the community I found it convenient to turn in and spend the night at your house. "Well, sir, I tell you corn is mighty skerce." I have been hearing that all day, but am glad to see that you have plenty. Horses traveling like mine must have something to eat. "Well, sir, I tell you I don't blame you for it; thar's the crib, an' thar's the fodder-stack, an' ef you don't give them critters enough it'll not be my fault." At this, with the rigid features of his face all relaxed, he actively, for a man of seventy-five, sprang from his saddle, and pleasantly said: "Let's feed 'em now; the chickens is all gone to roost." In a few minutes Mollie and Jollie were supplied with a sumptuous supper of corn, fodder and salt, and we, engaged in a pleasant conversation, were on our way to the house. The yard was large, containing two houses, thirty yards apart, with a path leading from the gate to the door of each. My host, in front, relating some remarkable war incidents, went direct to the kitchen, and did not observe that I was going to the other house until he stopped at the door, and said: "Go in." At first he seemed rather startled, and cried out: "Whar are you? What are you doin' dar? Whar are you gwine? Come this way." I thought that was the kitchen. "Well, sir, it is, but we stays in it. Thar's only five on us, me an' the ole 'oman an' the three children, an' we all stays together. We moves twist a year. In the summer we goes to the big house, an' in the winter comes back to the kitchen. Go in of you can git in for things hangin' on the jists." They were short people, and evidently the house was not intended for a six footer; but, after stooping several times, and rubbing my head against various articles of children's clothing hanging above, I finally succeeded in getting to a seat in the corner. In the old-fashioned, primitive style, with pots, ovens, hooks, tongs and shovel, the industrious wife was energetically preparing supper. While growing warm and dry in front of that brilliant fire, and listening to tales of war, bloodshed and murder, the most startling, I was for the time unconscious of the place and surroundings, when suddenly aroused by the already familiar expression: "Well, sir, supper is ready; turn roun' your chur, and let's eat." Fresh fried hominy, corn bread, in large pans, rather hot and strong, the very best of coffee, were tempting to the keen appetite of a healthy, hungry man, and especially one who had suffered the misfortune of missing his dinner. While doing justice to the occasion, the over-watchful landlord gave my plate a quick look, and with a vigorous movement thrust a vessel under my nose, and said: "Well, sir, won't you have some of this soup; it is mighty good." The repast over, and we again in our places around the glowing fire, the favorite theme of conversation was renewed: "Well, sir, I recon you think it curious to see a man like me away down here in these piney woods. Surveying his vast proportions, the thought occurred to my mind that it would be exceedingly difficult, as well as "curious," to find just such a man as he was anywhere, but held my peace. "I come down here before the war to make a fortune, an' I'd a made it too of it hadn't bin for that war. Is Judge Rice, who lives 'bout Montgomery, dead yit?" I think not. "Well, sir, ef he aint he ought to be long ago for all them lies he told." What lies has the judge been telling? "Did you never hear 'bout 'em? I tell you, sir, they was the biggest lies you ever heard. I heard him say one day, in one of his big lyin' speeches, that the war would only be a breakfast spell, an' we'd whip the Yankees with pop guns. But, sir, we didn't do it. They made us mighty glad to quit. I tell you, sir, I'd been a rich man to-day of that war hadn't come. Was you a sesesh?" Not wishing a controversy, I hesitated. "Well, sir, ef you was I don't blame you for it. I was one, but I'll never be another. We had a mighty bad time here when that war was gwin on. Four men come here one night when I was sick an' took most all the stuff we had. They took my dater's cotton cards, which she give sixty dollars for, and the fine comb, which was borrowed. When I saw them take that comb I was so mad I could hardly see. Ef I'd had a gun that night thar'd bin one dead man sure. Me an' my dater was livin' here by ourselves when the war was over, and a feller begun to come most ever week. She was a good-lookin' gal, so I says to her one day, says I later, ef you'll stay with me as long as I live I'll give you all my stuff. She wouldn't say a word, an' in two weeks they was married. She jist went off an' left all this stuff. Women is so curious." How did you do when she left? "Well, sir, I cooked about two weeks, but I tell you, sir, thar's too many women in this world for me to cook. I knowed that gal (pointing to his wife) ever sense she was a baby, an' I went over thar one day an' told her I was livin' by myself, an' come to ax her to marry me. She wouldn't say a word, an' put her apron over her face, an' I couldn't tell whether she was cryin' or laughin'. I says, says I, I'm no young man to be courtin' down here courtin', an' I want to know what you's gwin to do 'bout it. Says she, I can't tell you now. I knowed then she was gwin to have me, an', says I, I'll come down here next week an' see 'bout it. I knowed she'd have me. I had three thousand acres of land, beside a right smart of other stuff. I tell you, sir, men is mighty curious. When I went down to see that gal the first time I didn't love her a bit, but when I got to thinkin' 'bout it I never wanted to see anybody so bad in my life. When the next week came I went down, an' we was married in two or three days. She makes me a good wife. I'll never live to see these children grown, but I'll leave them a right smart of stuff, an' they'll git on somehow." The young wife seemed to enjoy the story of love, courtship and marriage, but did nothing but blush and laugh. It was now late, and I proposed to have prayers and retire. "Well, sir, I was gwin to ax you; I knows how to do when preachers comes." After service a little controversy took place as to where I should sleep. He, in the kindness of his heart, proposed to put down a bed before the warm fire, and all remain together, but I most earnestly insisted on going to the other house. "Well, sir, I don't blame you for it." And in a short time a pine knot fire was glowing on the hearth of my new quarters, and I was alone, doting the notes from which this sketch is written. After an hour's reflection, I retired to bed in another room, but, alas! just as my head was a large window, destitute of both sash and blinds. Having a little inventive genius, this difficulty was readily adjusted by placing a chair with me in the bed, and spreading over it my shawl and overcoat. Once quiet; "Tired Nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep," soon came to my relief, and I know nothing more until aroused by the industrious farmer just before light the next morning. After an early breakfast, and my horses were to the buggy, ready to move at any moment, I bid the mother and children adieu, and asked the old gentleman my bill. "Bill for what, sir." For so kindly keeping me during the night. "Well, sir, you don't owe me one cent. Who ever heard of anybody charging a preacher for stayin' all night. If you ever come back in this country again come right to my house." Their Bible was old, and having made the clever woman a present of a nice copy, I moved on to other scenes, fully impressed that this peculiar old man, with rough exterior and noble heart, was the only addition.

From Shreveport, La.

MR. EDITOR: Last night we closed a meeting of thirteen days. Rev. T. K. Faant LeRoy, of Franklin, and Rev. J. J. Billingsley, of Mansfield, did all the preaching, except that done by our presiding elder, Rev. T. H. McCollom, who gave us two strong discourses. The sermons were, all of them, of the first order, being clear, searching, pointed, personal, faithful, truly methodistic presentations of the law and the gospel. God's Spirit in power was with his people from the beginning to the end of the meeting. There were eighteen additions and doubtless as many, if not more, conversions. The church has been greatly blessed and strengthened, and many sinners are under conviction who yet would not yield to the Son of God. For what has been done in our midst we give all glory to God.

General Conference.

(Eighteenth day continued.)

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Conference reassembled at three o'clock, Bishop McTyeire presiding. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. J. D. Shaw.

Bishop McTyeire read a dispatch announcing the death of the wife of Rev. John A. Thompson, assistant secretary, who had died in North Alabama.

The following resolution was presented and adopted:

Whereas, We have heard of the death of the wife of Rev. John A. Thompson, a member of the Conference: therefore,

Resolved, That we tender him the sympathies of this body in this sad bereavement.

Rev. E. H. Moore, a brother of the deceased, was granted leave of absence.

The Conference resumed the consideration of Report No. 3 on revisal, and the remaining sections were adopted without amendment. Dr. W. H. Potter moved that action upon the report as a whole be indefinitely postponed. Lost.

Dr. Anson West moved to table the report. Lost.

The previous question was called, and the report as a whole was adopted—ayes, 123; nays, 52.

Dr. Craven, chairman of the committee having charge of the Quarterly Review, submitted a report, in which he stated that the committee had made satisfactory arrangements for its publication by the Publishing House, also recommending the election, by the Conference, of an editor of the Review. The Conference refused to adopt the report.

On motion of Dr. Scarritt, Report No. 10 of the Committee on Missions, providing a constitution for the Woman's Missionary Society, was taken up, and, after considerable discussion, the first seven sections were adopted.

Pending discussion of the eight section the Conference adjourned with benediction by Bishop McTyeire.

Just before the adjournment a communication was read from John H. Dye, of White River, stating that the excursion proposed to Arkansas had been postponed until July 15.

WEDNESDAY, MAY 24—NINETEENTH DAY.

The General Conference met at half-past eight o'clock this morning, and was called to order by Bishop Pierce. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. W. H. Browning, of Little Rock.

The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

Dr. Evans moved that the regular order of business be suspended, in order to take up for consideration the report of the Committee on Missions, No. 10, providing for a constitution for the Woman's Missionary Society, which motion prevailed, and the secretary read article 8 of the report, which was being considered when the Conference adjourned on yesterday.

Dr. McAnally took the floor, and proposed an amendment—"the management of the affairs of the society by a majority of the Board of Managers." He subsequently withdrew the amendment.

The Conference tabled the amendment of Dr. Scarritt, presented yesterday, and the article as reported was adopted.

Articles 9, 10 and 11 were adopted without discussion.

Article 12 was laid upon the table, and a substitute adopted, to read: "An auditor shall be elected annually to audit the accounts of the society."

Article 13 was adopted.

Article 14 was taken up, and Dr. Bennett proposed that three managers shall reside where the board is located, which was rejected, and the article as amended to suit the ladies having the matter in charge was adopted; and the report coming up as a whole, Dr. W. W. Walker took the floor, and moved that the Conference do not adopt the report. He said that it had been intimated in the Conference yesterday that some members had been lobbying with the ladies; he desired to say that he had taken a great interest in the work, but disclaimed any knowledge of lobbying, and referred to the great work accomplished by them during the past under their old constitution.

Judge James Jackson, of North Georgia, spoke of the sweet graces of women, and the work done by them. He thought that the report should go before the Woman's Missionary Society, and, if it were satisfactory to them, the Conference should adopt it. He thought the only point at variance was whether the corresponding secretary or the president should control it.

Dr. Kelley said, speaking for the committee: We wish it understood that we purpose that no officer shall supervise, but the Woman's Board shall do that work with the advice and approval of the Board of Missions.

Dr. E. R. Hendrix said he was not a partisan, and he thought the constitution proposed was the best that could have been prepared.

The Rev. H. Jewell called the previous question, which was sustained, and the report as a whole was adopted.

Judge Tucker presented a resolution allowing contributors to the missionary report to designate to what case it should be put.

The chair decided this point fully covered by the present laws, and the resolution was not entertained.

Bishop McTyeire left the Conference-room to preside over the Woman's Missionary Society during the election of officers.

The following report on the Bible cause, No. 3, was adopted:

The Bible is the foundation of our holy religion. It is the base of operations in all Christian enterprises at home and abroad—the sine qua non in every church work, and in personal and family religion as well. It is the great source of the principles of civil law, and civil government, and is the first factor in the advance of Christian civilization over the world.

The multiplication and distribution of the Bible until it shall be printed in every spoken language and dialect, and a copy placed in every family throughout the world, is an undertaking superlatively grand in its conception, and worthy of the united prayers and labors of all churches, the full accomplishment of which would thrill earth and heaven with joy.

The American Bible Society has this work in hand. It may be truly called the greatest of all missionary movements foreign and domestic in our land. We rejoice in its past history and pray that God may bless its future a thousand-fold more.

In reference to the paper of Dr. Sprague, suggesting a more definite plan for collections for the society, we recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we most cordially commend to all our congregations the American Bible Society as well deserving the support of all Christian people.

2. That we recommend to our pastors to give to their congregations, so far as practicable, the privilege of contributing to the Bible cause.

3. That we have greatly enjoyed a visit of Dr. A. S. Hunt, one of the corresponding secretaries of the society, and will always welcome him in our midst, and that a copy of this report be furnished him to be presented to the Board of Managers.

Dr. J. D. Shaw and Dr. Joseph Key presented the following, which was adopted:

Resolved, That this General Conference authorize the Annual Conferences owning and publishing churches to report to this Conference, through their delegations, the editors chosen by their respective papers.

The regular order of business was resumed, and the following business transacted:

Report No. 2 of the Committee on Missions adopted without discussion.

On motion of Dr. Addison, it was decided to consider the reports by items.

Report No. 3 on publishing interests. Dr. Lupton moved that the preamble be stricken from the resolution recommended.

Rev. H. H. Parks recited the names of numerous hymns which were omitted from the last edition of the hymn-book.

Dr. Edwards favored the appointment of a competent committee to prepare a revised edition of the seven hundred selected standard hymns.

Dr. Anson West thought the publication of a small hymn-book was the poorest speculation ever made by the church—that it might as well be published a small edition of the Bible with a portion of it omitted. He wanted the hymn-book to contain hymns suited to every subject and any occasion.

Prof. R. M. McIntosh protested against the tune and hymn-book being called an error. It was the only music to be found anywhere. We wanted a standard book for the church.

Dr. McFerrin stated that the cost of the tune and hymn-book was large.

The preamble was stricken from the report.

P. A. Magruder thought the music sung in the different sections of the country were sung differently. He urged the appointment of a committee of gentlemen versed in music from the different sections of the country, to prepare the revision of the hymn-book.

Rev. P. A. Peterson moved to lay the resolution. Rejected.

Rev. T. T. Christian proposed an amendment authorizing the appointment of a committee of seven to perform this work. Rejected.

Article 1 of the report was adopted, and Article 2, after being amended so as to appoint instead of elect the committee, was also adopted. The report so amended was adopted.

Report No. 5, majority and minority, of the Committee on Hymns coming up was discussed by Dr. Edwards, Blue, Andrews, Miller, Hiner, Morrison, Peterson, Pearman.

Dr. Hiner offered an amendment that the Bishop be instructed to appoint a preacher to a station more than four years.

On motion of P. A. Peterson the minority report was laid on the table, and the majority report adopted.

Report No. 3 on missions was adopted.

Reports No. 2 on boundaries, majority and minority, were read and discussed by H. W. Foote and L. Wilson. The hour of adjournment arrived before the question came to vote.

Dr. J. B. McFerrin, rising to a question of privilege, said that yesterday, in the paper submitted by Dr. Craven, he remarked that the agent he had no knowledge of the contents of that paper till a few moments before it was read. He said that the pencil memorandum on which the proposition for publishing the Quarterly Review had been made, some ten days ago, was incorporated in the paper without the knowledge of the business men. He said there was no conflict between the book agent and business manager. They have always acted in perfect harmony.

The Conference then adjourned with the benediction by Bishop Pierce.

AFTERNOON SESSION.

The Conference reassembled at three o'clock P. M., Bishop Haygood in the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. S. Babcock, of Arkansas.

The following report on fraternal correspondence, No. 9, was adopted:

Your Committee on Fraternal Correspondence beg leave to report for action the following resolution, viz:

Resolved, That the second Wednesday of the General Conference to be held in Richmond, in May, 1886, be suggested as the day for the reception of fraternal delegates, and that the evening of that day, and such other evenings as the Conference may direct, shall be set apart for listening to addresses from delegations, and that the bodies in correspondence with us be fully advised in our letters and by the visiting delegates of the day appointed by this body for the reception of fraternal delegates, their letters, and their words of greeting.

The following resolutions were read and unanimously adopted:

Resolved, That we, the members of this General Conference, tender to the citizens, churches, and pastors of Nashville our hearty thanks for the kind, generous, and delightful manner in which they have received and entertained us in their hospitable homes and churches.

2. That our thanks are due to the railroad officials, as well as the daily papers of the city, and the Daily Advocate for faithful reports and kindly notices.

The Conference resumed the consideration of Report No. 1 on boundaries, and adopted the majority report as a whole, with the exception of that part which refers to the boundary line between the Mississippi and Alabama Conferences.

Report No. 2 of the Committee on Boundaries was adopted item by item.

Report No. 3 on Sunday-schools was taken up, and, after much discussion, adopted with a few slight changes, and the old Committee on Sunday-schools retained.

The announcement of the election of the following named editors were made:

Samuel L. Weber, Southern Christian Advocate; W. H. Potter, Wesleyan Christian Advocate; T. T. Christian, Alabama Christian Advocate; F. Richardson, Holston Methodist; W. T. Black, and F. L. Reed, Raleigh Christian Advocate; Z. Merk, Central Methodist; I. G. John, Texas Christian Advocate; B. R. McAnnally, St. Louis Advocate.

RESIGNATIONS.

Bishop Wilson and C. W. Miller tendered their resignations as members of the committee appointed to publish the Quarterly Review, and D. H. Carlisle and J. W. Tucker were elected in their places.

Dr. B. Craven submitted the following report, which was adopted:

The committee on Quarterly Review has completed satisfactory arrangements for the publication of the Review, and has elected Rev. J. W. Hinton, of the South Georgia Conference, editor for the next four years.

Dr. Rodgers, chairman of the committee on Minerancy, made a report on the Journal of the Texas Conference, which was adopted.

Your committee respectfully submits the following report:

The Journal of the North Carolina Conference has been kept with much care, the secretary sparing no pains that he might have a perfect Journal. There are but few errors, and these of a minor character. Headings, marginal notes, and appendix, conform to the rules for the guidance of secretaries.

Pages 4-6-503: Greater explicitness would have placed the administration in a clearer light, but even in this case the record does not seem to call for any special criticism.

SAML. ROGERS, Ch'n.

West Texas Conference.—The Journal of this Conference has been well kept. It is evident that the secretary has spared no pains to secure a perfect record. Injustice, however, to others who have been criticised, we note a few errors.

During the session of 1878 "the order of adjournment arrived," as stated in the Journal, but afterward several items of business were attended to without any previous motion to extend the time. Under question 20, same session, H. A. Thrall is called, and read his report, but some other business intervened, and it is nowhere stated that his character passed.

In several cases under question 20, persons are elected to deacon's orders and admitted into full connection; also under same question persons are elected to elder's orders. In several cases the record is continuous, without spacing, paragraphing different subjects, and the questions are written afterward on the margin.

Page 13 states that the question, "Are there any appeals?" was called, which is at least unusual.

On page 91, an investigating committee reports a trial necessary, and offers charges, but they are nowhere recorded, nor is there any record of the appointment of a committee, though a committee was appointed, for in the appendix the committee report that they find the "evidence sustains the specifications, and the specifications sustain the charges," but neither charges nor specifications are to be found.

Remarks of E. B. Prettyman on Report on Limiting the Term of Presiding Elder to Four Years.

MR. PRESIDENT:—As a part of the membership of this Conference is composed of honored brethren who either are now or have been presiding elder's and whose lips are therefore closed by feeling of delicacy in this discussion, it seems proper that a few things should be said from a layman's standpoint. And first, though not a fossil, nor opposed to progress, but one ever disposed to recognize the logic of events, still, I beg to suggest, even though it may seem trite—that polity under which our church has flourished so long should not lightly be changed, and especially on what is probably the last day of the Conference, and under the influence of ardent and eloquent speeches.

In my Conference we have been fortunate in having generally bad, as presiding elders, our strongest and best men, and they are most welcome each quarter as they visit the charges; and, instead of the people running from the presiding elders (as the last speaker asserted) they run to meet them, and the church is edified and cheered.

The leading argument of the last speaker, though evidently not his personal motive, seems to be founded upon the ambition of the preachers of the church. It is claimed that the presiding eldership is the road toward the Episcopacy, and that when you place "shoulder straps," upon the younger men you stimulate them into increased exertion and zeal. It is suggested in reply that bad generals loose battles, and that ability and the fitness that comes from experience are the best recommendations for promotion. Humility is a grace much commended in the Holy Scriptures. As a Methodist by choice and by long descent, I love the polity of our church and I am willing to leave our honored Bishops untrammeled to the appointment of the presiding elders as the interests of the church in their discretion may require.

Mr. Prettyman, in claiming long descent from Methodists, said, in the haste of utterance, that his people had been Methodists for two hundred years—which brought a burst of laughter from the Conference.

Mr. Bright moved to lay the first hundred years of the pedigree years upon the table. (Laughter.)

The brother rallied, and amended by stating that his people had lived in Delaware for two hundred years, and that previous to 1784 his great-grandfather, Caleb Barrett, had built a Methodist Church—Barrett's Chapel—which is historic, as it was in that chapel that Dr. Coke, after coming to America, first met Francis Asbury, and embraced him in its aisle.

Dr. C. W. Miller suggested, as in point, that Methodism began on the day of Pentecost.

The following is a substitute for the report of the Committee on Church Extension, offered by J. B. McFerrin and others:

Whereas, It is the sense of this Conference that Church Extension Societies should be established throughout the connection; and,

Whereas, An enterprise so important and untried should not be allowed to assume any elaborate and permanent proportions till it has undergone proper trial; therefore, be it

Resolved, That the editors of our church papers, presiding elders, and pastors, are hereby instructed to bring the matter before their respective audiences.

2. That our Bishops are respectfully requested to bring it before each Annual Conference, and use their influence to have them organize a society on the basis of allowing each Annual Conference to retain fifty per cent. of the amount collected, the balance to be forwarded to the secretary and Board of Missions, to be applied to the churches who, in their judgment, might stand in the greatest need of help.

3. That the question of a Parent Board is hereby referred to the General Conference of 1886.

Conference then adjourned until eight P. M., with the benediction by Bishop Pierce.

NIGHT SESSION.

The Conference reassembled at eight o'clock, Bishop Keener in the chair. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. S. B. Jones, of South Carolina.

Rev. C. C. Mayliew, of Illinois, moved that the regular order of business be suspended, to take up the report providing for a change of name. Rejected.

Dr. Bennett, of Virginia, moved that the regular order of business be suspended to take up the report on education, providing for the establishment of boards of education in the Annual Conferences. Rejected.

Dr. Hendrix, of Missouri, moved that the name of W. M. McCarty be placed on the Committee on Sunday-schools, instead of W. M. Leftwich. Agreed to.

Report No. 3 on revisal was taken up. Article 2, recommending a change in the ritual, was read.

Dr. McFerrin opposed any change in the ritual, and moved nonconcurrence upon the recommendations of the committee.

Dr. Philpott urged the importance of the change, which had been proposed at every General Conference for sixteen years. He moved a concurrence in the committee's report, which motion prevailed.

Article 2 coming up, Dr. McFerrin insisted that the Conference would commit a serious mistake in making the proposed change. If the members wanted to adopt the report, he hoped they would wait until he and a few of the older members of the church had passed away.

Dr. Anson West earnestly opposed the recommendation of the committee.

Dr. N. H. D. Wilson had heard no reason why these changes had been made, and unless some reason was given he would have to oppose them.

Dr. Evans said he was one of the older members of the Conference, and he did not oppose the change. The ritual had come down to us from the Church of England. Some changes were made by the General Conference in 1854, and the church had been benefited thereby.

Dr. Fitch was in favor of the proposed changes. He believed in depravity, but he did not believe in baptismal regeneration. He did not want to retain a form of words so liable to misconception.

Rev. R. H. Mahon, of Memphis, spoke in favor of a non-concurrence in the recommendations.

Dr. Edwards favored the change in the ritual. He thought the words objected to smelled a little of Romanism, and should be stricken out.

Dr. W. W. Walker insisted that the ritual had been read by John Wesley, and ever since his day; and as he (Wesley) was not a believer in baptismal regeneration, neither are we for opposing these changes.

Dr. Hayes did not think the change was necessary.

Dr. H. P. Walker opposed the change.

Rev. P. A. Peterson called the previous question, and Dr. W. W. Walker asked that the vote be taken by orders, the clergy and lay members separate.

The Conference refused to take the vote in this manner, and the motion to adopt was rejected.

Mr. E. B. Prettyman submitted a resolution, which the chair refused to entertain, providing for the appointment of a committee to revise the ritual.

Rev. W. W. Duncan moved to indefinitely postpone action on the ritual report, which motion prevailed.

The report of the committee on the centenary of Methodism was next taken up, and adopted without discussion.

Report No. 4 on episcopacy, coming up, was adopted item by item, and then adopted as a whole.

Report No. 3 on boundaries, relative to a change in the line between the Tennessee and Holston Conferences, was taken up. Adopted.

Report No. 2 on education having been partially adopted on a previous day of the Conference, was considered. An amendment suggested by Rev. H. J. Adams, to strike out a portion of the report was agreed to, and the report, as a whole, was adopted.

After the announcement of notices the Conference, adjourned with the benediction by Bishop Kavanaugh, until half-past eight o'clock Thursday morning.

THURSDAY, MAY 25—TWENTIETH DAY.

The General Conference reassembled at half-past eight o'clock this morning, Bishop Wilson presiding. Devotional exercises were conducted by Rev. T. S. Wade, of Western Virginia. The minutes of yesterday's session were read and approved.

P. A. Peterson moved to change the rules of order so as to limit all speeches to five minutes. Carried.

The regular order of business was resumed.

Reports No. 4 on revisal, both majority and minority were read; the minority report was laid on the table, and the majority report was taken up. Article 1 was adopted. Article 2 was amended by striking out the word "non" in the recommendation of the committee, and as amended adopted. Articles 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11 and 12 were adopted. Articles 13 and 14 were tabled. Article 15 was taken up, and after a discussion indulged in by J. E. Edwards, of Virginia; W. M. Rush, of Missouri; Samuel Rodgers, of Baltimore; J. L. McLean, of Texas; O. A. Darby, of South Carolina, and N. H. D. Wilson, of North Carolina, the article was tabled.

Article 16 was discussed by R. B. Crawford, H. C. Morrison, T. S. Wade, P. A. Peterson, Frank Park, M. S. Andrews, S. B. Watts, G. H. Hayes, J. W. Fulton, L. W. Tucker, E. M. Bull, B. M. Messick, T. F. Mangum.

In concluding the discussion, Mr. Mangum said that, on behalf of the committee on Revisal, he wished to disclaim any intention to require a contract between the preachers and boards of stewards. The article was adopted.

The report as a whole was then adopted.

Report No. 5 on temperance, suggesting a chapter to be inserted in the Discipline, and the minority report, recommending that the chapter now in the Discipline was sufficient on the subject, and no legislation was deemed necessary.

The reports were discussed by M. S. Andrews, W. M. Rush, D. C. Kelley, P. P. Ellis.

The minority report was tabled; whereupon, P. P. Ellis presented a substitute as a chapter in the Discipline, which was also laid on the table.

The following is the substitute for that part of Report No. 4, from the Committee on Temperance, proposing a new chapter in the Discipline on temperance:

CHAPTER NO. —ON TEMPERANCE.

Qus. What directions are given concerning the sale or use of malt and distilled liquors to our members?

Ans. 1. That our members shall truly abstain from the manufacturing, buying, selling, or using as a beverage, malt, distilled, or alcoholic liquors.

Ans. 2. When any of our members disregard their obligation, as church members, by violating the directions in Ans. 1, of this chapter, they shall be deemed guilty of immoral conduct, and shall be dealt with as the word of God and the law of church provide.

The question recurring on the majority report, N. T. Lupton moved an indefinite postponement of any action on the question; and upon a call of the ayes and noes the motion was lost by a vote of 38 ayes and 102 noes.

When D. C. Kelley's name was called he arose to make an explanation of his vote, which the chair declared out of order.

J. P. Edwards also attempted to explain his vote, but was stopped in the midst.

G. H. Hayes proposed an amendment, which was declared out of order because the same subject had been voted upon before.

The majority report was then adopted.

H. W. Foote, of Mississippi, rising to a question of privilege, said: I desire to explain the reason of my vote as follows: So far as the drinking of spirituous liquors is concerned, the law, as it is, is sufficient, but as to the manufacture and sale it is not. Hence I vote no.

The Conference next considered reports, majority and minority, of the Finance Committee, No. 2, relative to the bequest of Mrs. Toby, of Russellville, Ky. The majority recommended that the bequest of $1,000 be used for missionary purposes, and the minority recommended that the money be used by the church at Russellville, her former home. After a spirited discussion of the will and the reports, the minority committee report was adopted by a vote of 76 to 66.

Report on finance No. 4 was adopted without discussion.

Report on education No. 2 was taken up. It recommends concurrence upon the paper for the organization of conference boards of education, etc.

The following is the substitute for Report No. 3 on education:

1. For the promotion of the work of Christian education among us, there shall be a Board of Education, consisting of six ministers and six laymen, members of our church, appointed by the General Conference.

2. The object of this board is to devise and execute measures for promoting the work of Christian education throughout the Church. And in aid of this object the board shall receive gifts for such general educational purposes as hereinafter named and securely hold them as hereinafter provided.

3. To promote the objects of this Board and to direct the minds of our people to its special work there shall be kept through out the church a day to be known as "Children's Day," on which appropriate services shall be held in all our congregations specially for children, and that on such a day a collection shall be taken in aid of the work of this board to be known as "The Children's Educational Fund." It is recommended that the second Sunday in May of each year be observed as "Children's Day."

4. The board shall endeavor to secure the establishment of suitable high schools or academies in the different church Conferences, one for each presiding elder's district if possible; and also to induce three or more Annual Conferences to unite in the support of not more than two colleges—unless more are already established—one for the education of young men and one for the education of young women, and to discourage the increase of colleges beyond the wants of the people and their ability to sustain them.

5. The board shall use the funds that may be given it in making loans or donations to young men preparing for the ministry, and young men or young women preparing for missionary work as preachers or teachers, and in aiding existing theological schools and Biblical departments in our institutions of learning, and in aiding in their general work existing institutions, and such as may hereafter be established with the approval of the board, provided that no appropriation of the general funds of the board shall be made for the purpose of erecting buildings.

6. In order to promote the work of education among us, and to give all our congregations proper information on the subject, it shall be the duty of each preacher in charge to preach once a year at least in each society upon the subject of Christian education, and to circulate tracts and books on the general subject. He shall also present the claims of an educational work to our members and friends in his regular pastoral intercourse with them, and endeavor to secure donations in aid of this cause. He shall also take an annual collection in every congregation to be known as the "Educational Collection," which shall be used for the purpose of promoting the work of education within the bounds of the Annual Conference in which it is taken, and to be controlled and applied by the Annual Conference Board of Education.

7. The board shall organize by the election of such officers as may be necessary to carry out its purposes, and shall obtain such a charter as may be deemed needful for the safe holding of its funds.

W. W. Bennett proposed a substitute, which he offered in lieu of the report which, he said, had received the approval of eight members of the General Conference, seven of which were now connected with institutions of learning, and the other was formerly connected with such an institution.

In presenting the substitute W. W. Bennett urged its adoption.

W. P. Harrison spoke in favor of the committee's report.

The substitute was rejected and the report was adopted.

J. Whitworth moved that the Conference take up the question of a place of meeting. Carried.

Jordon Stokes presented a resolution that the meeting of the General Conference, commencing on the first Wednesday in May, 1886, be held in Nashville, Tenn.

P. A. Peterson moved to amend by inserting Richmond, Va.

In favoring the report James Whitworth and Jordon Stokes made short speeches, showing the importance of meeting here in connection with the publishing interests here.

Mr. Peterson thanked the Tennesseans for their kindness, but said that the people of Richmond desired to show Virginia hospitality.

One hundred and one votes were cast for Richmond, and, on motion of Jordon Stokes, the vote was made unanimous.

After the usual announcements the Conference adjourned until three P. M.

GIVING.—Freely ye have received, freely give," is the rule which Christ gave to his disciples for their guidance in serving him and his cause in the world. Look the world over and a cheerful conformity to this rule brings spiritual prosperity to individuals and to churches. There is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty, says the proverb. Some churches furnish striking verifications of this law and its working. They are given to withholding more than is meet from the Lord's treasury, and he frowns upon it. They rob God in tithes and offerings, and they are cursed with a curse. And then they wonder why they are not prospered as others around them are prospered. One prominent reason in such cases, that others around them scatter and so increase. When this selfish, self-seeking, self-gratifying spirit is once thoroughly slain by a generous activity in discovering and supplying the wants of others, thrift and vigor come as the ordained result. This is the Master's promise, "Give and it shall be given unto you."—Christian Secretary.

HOW DEAN STANLEY ESTIMATED HIS DEFICIENCIES.—My story may serve to comfort others, as it did myself, in a sense of deficiency. I was talking to Dean Stanley about the difficulties of parochial work. Said the Dean, "No one feels up to his work. I have always thought a Dean should have three qualifications, none of which I possess. First, I think a Dean should know something about music; I am absolutely ignorant of the subject. Secondly, I think a Dean should know something about architecture; I know nothing about it. Thirdly, I think a Dean should know something about the management of business; I am always thankful when our audit is over and we have not come to some grevious mishap." Those who knew him will feel how badly the story is told, and what it loses at second-hand.—The Spectator.

"Bro. Thomas, I am out to-day with my list, raising subscriptions to our pastors salary."

"Well, deacon, you are late about it you ought to have finished this work before the year began. How did you happen to put it off so long? It is not treating either the church or the pastor right."

"Never mind about that now. I want your subscription, wont you put down $25. You'll never feel it."

"No sir, I'll do no such thing, I'll never give to the Lord what I 'never feel,' Did he not 'feel' what he did for me? Give me your list."

"A hundred dollars?" Bro. Thomas you are a good man, and cannot afford to give so much; change it to fifty."

"No sir, let it stand. I have to work hard for every cent I get, but all I can do would not begin to pay even the interest on what I owe the Lord. Of course it will pinch me to raise it, but the thought of Gethsemane and Calvary will make the pinching pleasant."

"Well have it your way. Good-bye. (Aside). It will never do for $100 to stand opposite his name, and only $50 opposite mine. I must make mine at least $100.—Central Baptist.

A good Methodist asked John Wesley what he thought as to his marrying a certain woman, well known to both. Wesley advised him not to think of it. "Why," said the other, "she is a member of your church. Isn't she?" "Yes," was the reply. "And you think she is truly a Christian woman?" "Yes," said Wesley, "I believe she is." "Well, then, why not marry her?" "Because," replied Wesley—"because my friend, the Lord can live with a great many people that you and I can't!"

Our Young People.

TWO LITTLE PILGRIMS.

So many hundred years to go
About the world, forever young!
So many hundred years to be—
Read over, talked off, sung

By horsey fees, that, warm and high
Thaw when the bitter north wind blows
By open casements, when the night
Is weighted sweet with rose!

So many hundred years of time!
So many hundred years since Fate
Drove the to together, hand in hand,
To wander for and late,

Two baby pilgrims, boy and girl,
That, after long and weary quest,
Fabled within each other's arms,
Lay down to dreams and rest!

So many hundred years to sleep
Within that forest's deep eclipse,
With soiled and bitter-torn little hands,
And bitter stained lips.

And still of that enchanting wood,
The robins flying—one by one
Within the red and amber light
Of the October sun—

Cover the darlings from the night,
And changes of the frost and dew,
With locks of the faded fern,
And leaves of brilliant hue.

So many hundred years to wear
The face of youth forever sweet!
So many years about the world
To go with tireless feet!

When mothers trim their nursery lights,
Singing half-forgotten rhyme
To children in their dreaming nights
At story-telling time,

Into their midst these softly come
Accept the place for ever good,
Sit by the fire, and take the kiss
The two," Babes in the Wood."

Wide Awake.

Pearl Gatherers.

DEAR MR. EDITOR: As I read the young people's corner, and see what other little girls and boys are doing, I thought I would write you a short letter. I am only twelve years old. I go to school and to Sunday-school every Sunday. I think it is very nice in Annie and Olive wanting to build a church in Mexico. We have no Methodist Church here; we use the Presbyterian Church which needs repairs very much. We have a society called Pearl Gatherers, and we have made twenty-six dollars which we will give to the Presbyterian Church. I hope my letter is not too long, and you will not throw it in the waste basket, as this is my first letter. I want to write again and tell you what we do and how much we make. Your friend,

ANNIE JENNINGS.

The Little Dove.

There is a true story of the childhood of a good German count, named Von der Recke, who lived to be a great blessing to the poor of his country, and an example to those who would do good in every land.

It was spring; a storm had just passed away in the night, and a very fine morning seemed to make all nature glad. The flowers were refreshed by the rain, and looked bright. The little birds sang a merry song in the air and among the trees. Little Adalbert—for that was the name by which good Count Von der Recke was called when a child—little Adalbert was not less gay than the birds who sang that merry song. He looked up to the clear blue sky, to trace the little birds like living specks as they flew across it, and as he looked he saw some pigeons at a distance which seemed as much to enjoy the morning breeze as he did, all but one tiny dove, which flew very feebly on its little wings; its short circle showed its strength was nearly gone; the rest flew round it, but could not help it. There was a large pond in the garden with a bridge over it, and a boat in it; but the bridge was so high and the boat so far off, that should the pretty bird drop into the water, the little boy could not hope to reach and save it.

With a sad heart he looked at the poor little dove as it faintly spread out its newly-got wings to keep itself up in the air. It grew weaker and weaker, till, almost worn out, he saw it fall, just as he feared it would, into the water. The little German's heart felt much, very much for the little drowning dove.

He saw, a short way off, a little washing-tub left by the servant maids, who had used it for their linen. He rolled it to the pond, caught up a pole which lay near, leaped into it, and pushed off.

With a pole for an oar, he paddled along till he came close to the drowning dove, and just as it was sinking he snatched it from the water.

On getting back to the bank he wiped its wet wings with his handkerchief, opened his jacket, and laid the dove in his bosom, covering all but its bill, and with a hasty step reached home, so happy in his prize. Rest and warmth soon made the little dove much better. It opened its red eyes, and Adalbert took part of his bread, put its bill to his mouth, and fed it with all the kindness of a mother.

The countess, his own dear mother, had all this time been watching from the castle window all that her boy had done. She loved him very much, and feared as she saw him get on the water; she was delighted with his kindness to the dove, saw him land safely, but said nothing.

When he came in, his eyes bright with joy, she let him tell his own story, for her child had always been led to tell her all that was in his heart, and he had not the least wish to hide anything. When he stopped speaking she said:

"I saw all. I guessed what you were about; but were you not afraid, my love, to get on the water in so unsafe a thing as a washing-tub?"

"Oh," he said, "but the poor little dove was drowning."

His mother looked at him most tenderly, and, as she threw her arms around him, she said, in a very earnest tone:

"God bless you, my dear child! may you never be less ready or less brave to trying to save unhappy men!"

These words went to the heart of her child; they seemed to him like a message from God; and through life he showed that this message was never forgotten.—Little Folks.

The Dying Miner.

Twenty miles from camp and night approaching. A young home missionary working for his Master in one of the mining communities of Colorado found himself in this situation one day, and was beginning to look about him for a desirable place in which to spend the night, when a little ways ahead he descried a rude cabin.

Approaching nearer, he saw it was one of the poorest of these rough habitations; and much of the "chinking" between the logs had fallen out, rendering the place additionally uncomfortable.

"Such a place as that is surely deserted," said the young minister to himself, "and I am inclined to think I would rather sleep out of doors to-night than inside of that shell, even if it should prove to be inhabitated by one who would make me welcome."

At that moment the sound of song floated out through the openings between the logs; and our traveler stopped his horse to listen to a man's weak voice singing that dear old home-song, "The Home of the Soul."

"Oh, that home of the soul! in my visions and dreams
Its bright, jasper wall I can see,
Till I fancy but dimly the veil intervenes
Between that fair city and me."

were the words which reached the ear of the listener outside.

"I must see the man who can sing like that, in such a place as this," thought the missionary, riding up to the cabin, and alighting from his horse.

A feeble "Come!" came from within, in answer to his knock; and entering, he found himself in the one small room of the cabin, which was almost destitute of furniture.

In one corner a rude bedstead had been constructed of boards and rude pieces of timber, on which some old blankets were spread; and on this hard bed lay a man, evidently very near to death.

"Dying alone, in this situation, twenty miles from the nearest camp, still his look into the beyond seemed so clear, so real, that the language of the hymn he feebly sung was indeed the language of his heart," said the missionary, as he related the incident afterward. "He died that night; and I have never ceased to feel a thrill of thankfulness, whenever I think of him that I was belated that day, and so enabled to be with that man when the end came. Surely, that which satisfies a man whom in the midst of such surroundings is not a thing to be lightly rejected. When a man leaves the home of his boyhood he can not afford to leave the religion of Christ too."—Golden Days.

I Can and I Will.

The difference between "I can't" and "I can and will" is just the difference between victory and defeat in all the great conflicts of life. Boys, adopt for your motto, "If I can, I will," and victory will be yours in all life's battles. "I can and I will" nerves the arms of the world's heroes to-day, in whatever department of labor they are engaged. "I can and I will" has fought and won all the great battles of life and of the world.

I know of a boy who was preparing to enter the junior class of the New York University. He was studying trigonometry, and I gave him three examples for his next lesson. The following day he came into my room to demonstrate his problems. Two of them he understood, but the third, a very difficult one—he had not performed. I said to him:

"Shall I help you?"

"No, sir! I can and will do it if you will give me time."

"I said: "I will give you all the time you wish."

The next day he came into my room to recite another lesson in the same study.

"Well, Simon, have you worked that example?"

"No, sir!" he answered; "but I can and will do it if you will give me a little more time."

"Certainly; you shall have all the time you desire."

I always like those boys who are determined to do their work, for they make our best scholars, and men too. The third morning you should have seen Simon enter my room; I knew he had it, for his whole face told the story of his success. Yes, he had it, notwithstanding it had cost him many hours of the severest mental labor. Not only had he solved the problem, but what was of infinitely greater importance to him, he had begun to develop mathematical powers which, under the inspiration of "I can and I will," he has continued to cultivate, until to-day he is professor of mathematics in one of our largest colleges, and one of the ablest mathematicians of his years in our country.

My young friends, let your motto ever be: "If I can I will."—Golden Days.

A BAD SIGN.—Whenever young Christians begin to inquire what harm there can be in the social dance, or what harm there can be in the theatre, or in games of chance, it is a sign that the love of Christ is declining in their hearts, if indeed it ever existed at all. It is an attempt to get something to satisfy conscience, and is virtually declaring that the bread of life with which Christ feeds the soul does not satisfy, and that therefore they are anxious to find some excuse for getting back to the service of Satan.

Instead of arguing the rightness or the wrongness of those things (of which no truly spiritual mind has any doubt) I would say, Take heed, my brother, to your own heart. Your Lord has warned you, not only against going back, but even against looking back; and you are instructed not to seem to come short. You are to shun the very appearance of evil; and the very fact that you are beginning to glance with approval at the iniquity of the world, shows that your love to the Redeemer is "waxing cold." Take that cold heart again to Jesus; and rest not satisfied till it is brimming over with his love, "who was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners."

A young artist once called upon Mr. Audubon, the great student of birds, to show him some drawings and paintings. Mr. Audubon was much interested, and after examining the work of the artist, said: "I like it very much, but it is a little deficient in details. You have painted the legs of this bird nicely, except in one respect. The scales are exact in shape and color, but you have not arranged them correctly as to number." "I never thought of that," said the artist. "Quite likely," said Audubon. "Now, upon this upper ridge of the partridge's leg there are just so many scales. You have too many. Nature does her work perfectly. Examine the legs of a thousand partridges, and you will see that the scales are the same in number. All partridges are made alike." The lesson shows how Audubon himself became great—by patient study in small things.

ORGAN OF THE MISSISSIPPI AND LOUISIANA CONFERENCES OF THE METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

CHAS. B. GALLOWAY, Editor.

Corresponding Editors:

REV. J. W. RUSH. REV. W. L. C. HUNNICUTT
REV. C. W. CARTER, D. D. REV. J. T. SAWYER.

THURSDAY, June 8, 1882.

"Non-concurrence" meant old Methodism to the conservative brethren.

"Missionary Day" is to be hereafter a special feature of Annual Conference sessions. May it be a day of power.

Bishop Parker is arranging a list of District Conference visitations. He commences at once the active duties of his high office. The ADVOCATE'S benedictions will follow him.

The new comet, astronomers tell us, will reach its perihalion on Saturday of this week, and be visible until September. It will come within five millions of miles of the sun, and has a tail nearly a million miles long.

With the apostolic blessing of three of its ex-editors, now honored Bishops in the church, this ADVOCATE ought to be happy, and allowed to indulge a little pardonable pride. It is a coincidence exceptional in the history of American Methodism. With such friends to encourage, and such practiced pens still to enrich our columns, we shall expect great prosperity.

The church name will again go the round of the Conferences, and be up for discussion in Methodist newspaperdom. We advise postponement for awhile. A rising mercury is not favorable to cool thought on a warm subject. It is a matter of great delicacy. To change the name will wound the affections and sadden the memories of many; not to change it, will disappoint the hopes and oppose the judgment of others equally loyal and true.

The Sunday law discussion in the Senate at Baton Rouge developed antagonistic sentiments on this great question. Whatever legislation may be had, one thing is incontrovertible, the moral well-being, and, therefore, civil and commercial life of cities and communities is intimately and vitally connected with Sabbath observance. The melancholly history of France should not be forgotten. A desecrated Sabbath made possible the "Reign of Terror." Let not the old cry of "puritanism" affect the voice or conscience of any citizen or legislator.

The average salary paid last year in the Mississippi Conference, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, was about four hundred dollars, while in the New York East Conference, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, the average was eleven hundred and fifty-three dollars. After all allowances for Southern poverty, that comparison is not very creditable to our grace of liberality. Sydney Smith described a curate as "the poorest and most respectable man in the parish"—a not inaccurate description of a Southern clergyman.

A brother up in Mississippi, a few days ago, sent his pastor a half ton of excellent hay—his first and finest mowing—with the compliments of the season. That is an example of practical church life that needs emulation and commands commendation. If, out of a meager salary, the preacher has to expend one-fifth to support the horse that carries him to his appointments, he has little left with which to supply his own larder, purchase books and educate his children. A half ton of hay out of a large mowing was not much to the farmer, but it was a great deal to his pastor. Such kindnesses supplement meager salaries. May his generation ever increase. He stands out in marked contrast to that other brother who paid his quarterage in nubbins at a dollar a bushel.

The General Conference, with marked unanimity of sentiment, resolved to give all possible aid to the Colored Methodist Episcopal Church in America. We hope the church will respond with a hearty good-will. Only our poverty has prevented this action before. Heart and hands were willing, but, alas! for the means. North and South there is a growing disposition to assist the colored people. Their greatest need is education in the pulpit. "Like priest, like people." Ignorance in the pulpit encourages superstition in the pew. We have long been convinced that all the bodies of colored Methodists ought to be in one church organization. If this were effected they would at once begin an advance movement.

Salutatory and Promissory.

Our last week's issue contained the bare mention of the new editor's election and acceptance. Some more formal words an immemorial custom seem to demand. And like all such formalities, they shall be salutatory and promissory, not, however, the promise absolute of what is to be accomplished, but of good intentions, honest effort and hard work.

We greet you, dear readers, in the name of our common Lord. With his blessing our association may be of mutual benefit. Though not entire strangers, it is hoped our limited acquaintance may ripen into the affection and confidence of a generous friendship. For years this writer has contributed somewhat regularly to the columns of the ADVOCATE, and in this pleasurable pastime has been encouraged by the perhaps too partial judgment of many friends. To his new position he brings some experience, and a fondness even to fascination, for journalism. What may be his ability and aptitude will soon be discovered.

The seeming embarrassment of immediately succeeding one so successful and distinguished is fully appreciated. But that embarrassment is only seeming. It is a help, and not a hindrance—an inspiration, and not a discouragement. The high character his great abilities gave this journal will conceal many deficiencies. The momentum he gave it will long keep the machinery in action with a less skillful hand at the wheel. On every page will be reflected the genial expression of his well-known face, and every damp sheet, fresh from the press, will enfold the aroma of his kindly, generous spirit. To maintain its high character will be our aim and effort.

This ADVOCATE has been eminently a religious journal. In these hands it must so continue. "Food convenient" for spiritual nurture will be gathered with anxious care and earnest prayer. In this respect, above all others, we humbly trust that the new administration may give none occasion to chant the sad refrain of the Lay of the Last Minstrel:

"Old times are changed, old manners gone."

If homes are brightened, and hearts are cheered and souls are saved by these columns, we shall rejoice in the gracious fulfillment of our dearest hopes.

We shall aim to be neither sectarian nor sectional, but catholic and connectional. With evangelical Christians we have no quarrel. In the presence of a common enemy, and amid imperative responsibilities, Judah and Ephraim can not afford to vex each other. Our great connectional enterprises shall have the warmest advocacy. Missions, Church Extension, Sunday-schools and our publishing interests command support, and must be emphasized. On all questions of moral reform and public virtue we shall try to speak with Christian courtesy, but with the candor and courage of profound conviction.

The editor will eschew both dogmatism and latitudinarianism, and will aspire to be neither sensational nor partisan. He has no ambition to be an inventor or adventurer in ecclesiastical or theological science, but, on the contrary, will seek diligently the "old paths." Whatever changes may have resulted to adapt our machinery to the exigencies of advancing years, the doctrinal integrity of Methodism has never been disturbed. Our creed needs no revision, our formulas no restatement. The old gospel will be preached, but methods and measures may be stressed that quicken spiritual life and speed on the Redeemer's kingdom.

As in the past, partisan politics will have no place in these columns. A religious journal is not commissioned to manipulate caucuses and conventions or to nominate and elect presidents. The moral phases of great issues may be discussed, the wrong rebuked and the right commended, but never in the spirit of a partisan.

All personalities will be excluded that may engender strifes and animosities. We shall be grateful to friends for their contributions, but will discourage personal controversy. Its fruits are never pleasant to taste or sight. The excellent contributors who have added so much to the interest of the ADVOCATE in the past we hope will continue to write. The corresponding editors especially will render great and grateful assistance.

With brethren of the press we hope to enjoy reciprocal courtesies, and work in harmony. As much as lieth in us, we shall live peaceably with all men, and endeavor to serve our generation by the will of God.

Church Extension.

With the possible exception of the timely and admirable increase of the episcopacy, the most important measure projected by the General Conference was the organization of a Church Extension Society. The demand for it has been increasing for years, especially in the ever-widening fields of the great West. Under the stress of imperative necessity, the Board of Missions has been compelled to do much church-extension work. Thus means have been appropriated that now may be employed in sending men to the regions beyond. We hail this new organization with hope and joy. Some features of the constitution might have been changed to advantage, but a four years' administration will test its efficiency, and suggest all needed modifications. The secretary, Rev. David Morton, at present presiding elder of the Louisville district, has reputation as a man skilled in affairs, and thoroughly devoted to whatever work he has in hand, with a special faculty for organization. The Board of Managers was carefully selected, representing every section of our great connection, and the several elements of our church life. Thus officered, and launched by the almost unanimous voice of the church, we confidently look for a career of great blessing and prosperity. All the difficulties incident to a new enterprise, of course, are to be expected, but the argument of success can not be resisted. It imposes another collection upon the church, but that is no calamity. No sooner is it well understood than it will rank with the most popular of our connectional enterprises. The Methodist Episcopal Church has written a chapter on this great and valuable department which thrills with the eloquence of grand achievement. The accomplished secretary, Rev. Dr. A. J. Kynet, made the following statement before the Ecumenical Conference: "In the Methodist Episcopal Church of the United States this work was organized by direction of the General Conference of 1864, and the legal incorporation was effected in March, 1865. The first money was received by the treasurer in October of the same year, and the first appropriation was made in the spring of 1866. During the fifteen years of active work ending January 1, 1881, the board has collected and disbursed $1,641,473 66, of which $358,523 28 belong to the loan fund, from which churches are aided only by loans. Of this loan fund $182,893 90 have been returned and reloaned to the churches. The board has aided, in all, 3,068 churches, most of them by donations, many by loans, and some by both donations and loans. The total of our Methodist Episcopal Churches is, in round numbers, 17,300, of which 7,300 have been built within the last ten years, so that more than one-sixth of all our churches, and nearly three-sevenths of all the increase since our work began, have received aid from the board." What a gratifying statement! May a similar history be written of our enterprise, so auspiciously inaugurated.

After Graduation—What?

The commencement season is upon us. Within the next few weeks thousands of young men and women will have forsaken the classic shades of college and university for the stern realities of the wide, wide world. Their orations and graduating essays, eloquent and redolent with ancient lore and poetic illustration, will have been delivered before enthusiastic and applauding audiences, and with diplomas in hand, and warm congratulations from faculty and friends, they will bid a tearful adieu to alma mater. Commencement day is a supreme and thrilling passage in the life of young ambition—a sort of mount of transfiguration, whose glorious epiphany is never again equaled in all subsequent history. There is a charm and radiance about that day, and around those young brows, that belongs to no other passage or period, however thick its honors or grand its achievements. But after the day is gone and the sun is set, when the last word is spoken and the brilliant assembly has dispersed, solemn and practical questions are suggested as to what will be their future—their life-work and history. This is the critical and pivotal period of young life. It often decides destiny. The profession or vocation they then select, the principles they adopt, the purposes they form, and the associations they choose, prophesy the future with almost the accuracy of divine inspiration. The young graduate does not find the world as his imagination had painted it. His attainments and achievements are not recognized and appreciated as he supposed. This chills his enthusiasm, and disappoints his extravagant hopes. Just then manhood is tested in every nerve and fiber. The high resolve that can brave those days of darkness has won the victory of life. But the courage that fails and the heart that quails will never wear the crown of a great and noble success. After graduation two things are most important—a vocation and a location.

One fact is notable, if not alarming—the colleges, technical and literary, are annually crowding the ranks of the liberal professions. There is a mania for professional life. Where all these doctors are to find patients and these lawyers clients, if we are to have health and brotherhood in the land, is a question that admits no satisfactory answer. The old saying of Daniel Webster, that "there is always room at the top," has overcrowded the professions, and spoiled many a good farmer. Each imagines that he is to be the distinguished exception, and will surely climb to the loftiest place amidst immense applause. This has given ill direction to many an aspiring young man, and written down for him a life of disappointment and failure. Pride of titled names and professional place is the bane of our society. A young man with collegiate training considers it a descending to nothingness to be a plain farmer, without title or profession. Our schools and colleges have succeeded admirably in educating even country boys above the farm. The diploma and plow have no fraternal sympathy. In our society thinking they are enemies inveterate and implacable. To go from college to the farm is progressing downward, and their education considered a sad waste of time and money. This is a pernicious sentiment. It retards all moral and industrial progress. We must appreciate the necessity for a higher education in all avocations other than the liberal professions. When that necessity becomes a reality—when that idea is fostered even in college and university—we shall have a better neighborhood life in the rural districts, and with it, greater agricultural prosperity, a more intelligent, patriotic citizenship, stronger churches, and a higher type of Christianity.

The next consideration is where will this multitude of young collegians locate or emigrate? Alas! too many of them emigrate. Their fortunes must be sought away from home. To "go to a new country" is among the first lessons of childhood, which grows with his growth, and strengthens with his strength. There is constant and chronic mourning over our deadness and restless longing for a "new country" with a more vigorous life and brighter future. This, in our judgment, is a fatal mistake and heresy against the patriotism and vast possibilities of our section, and has been a curse and irubus upon our great Southwest. If the thousands of strong, educated, aspiring, splendid young men that have gone out from us, and swelled the tide of emigration to distant States and Territories within the past fifteen years, had remained at home, we would be far in advance of our present prosperity, and in three-fourths of the instances they would have achieved greater success. The nomadic spirit of our young men is a Southwestern calamity. The increase and education of our native population alone would soon make us a great people. But this constant drain upon the truest and purest sources of our wealth, patriotism and prosperity keeps us poor when we should be rich, weak when we should be the mightiest of the mighty. We want to call a halt, and stay these wanderings to and fro. There is no fairer or more favored land than ours. Young ambition has nowhere a more inviting future for enlarged usefulness and honor. The capabilities of our section are well-nigh immeasurable. So, to our young friends now going out with the honors of alma mater we have two suggestions of friendly counsel: Consult conscience in the selection of a vocation, and patriotism in the choice of a location.

Death of Gen. Garabaldi.

The death at his island home, Caprera, near the coast of Italy, of Gen. Garabaldi has closed one of the most remarkable and eventful careers of modern times. He had attained a ripe old age, and few lives have ever been as crowded with abrupt and thrilling incidents. His entire history fascinates like a tale of chivalry. The transition from poverty to power, and alternately from chief command to homeless exile, seemed to require but a day. But, amid all these strange and sometimes tragic experiences, the heroic man never lost faith in the cause he espoused or courage to grandly maintain it. He was trained in the Sardinian navy, but his liberal opinions forced him into exile in South America. Here his restless spirit found vent as a soldier in several minor wars. In one battle he received a wound that came near ending his life. A part of his exile was spent in the United States. In 1859 he returned to Italy, and at once took prominent part in public affairs. The very next year, in command of a force, which had been equipped abroad, he succeeded in recovering the Island of Sicily, thereby winning for himself the loftiest fame, and writing one of the most brilliant chapters in the history of his beloved Italy. He has resisted the encroachments of papal power with a courage and endurance that would have failed a man of less iron nerve. In every liberty-loving land the name of this eccentric but heroic patriot, soldier and statesman will be spoken with grateful reverence. He had his faults, and they were unconcealed. He had rare virtues, and they will shine resplendent as the beams of the morning. The emancipation of Italy from the thralldom of years is largely due to his robust patriotism and unyielding purpose.

Vanderbilt Items.

The following interesting items have been gleaned from a private source. The commencement exercises were in all respects equal to any former year. The sermons by Bishop Granberry at eleven A. M. and Bishop Wilson at four P. M. were masterpieces of spiritual power and sacred eloquence. It was a fitting and graceful fact that the commencement sermon should have been preached by the retiring professor of practical theology, now Bishop Granberry.

Some changes were made in faculty by the Board of Trustees. Rev. A. M. Shipp, D. D., becomes Dean of the theological faculty in place of Dr. Summers deceased. The chair of systematic theology also left vacant by the death of Dr. Summers, is to be filled before the next session by the executive committee. It is understood that Dr. T. J. Dodd will occupy the chair of practical theology, while Dr. Shipp assumes the duties of the school of moral philosophy which two positions were held by Dr. Granberry. Rev. J. J. Tigert remains as assistant instructor in this department and will probably have charge of the class in ecclesiastical history. The Fellowship in this department is given to Rev. W. R. Sims, of Brandon, Miss. Dr. Baskerville is promoted to a full professorship of English, and Dr. Smith who was elected last year to the chair of modern languages, but declined, was re-elected and has accepted.

Mr. Elliott T. Shepard, of New York city, delivered the university address. We notice among those students who received honor certificates is Miss Conwell, a granddaughter of the late Bishop Soule, who won distinction in English, French and German.

Floating Christians.

BY REV. DR. DEEMS.

Perhaps there is no country in the world where there is so much traveling as in the United States. There are very few fixed family seats and no entailed property. Our people go from place to place seeking to improve their fortune. Men rush from the country to the cities to find positions. People in the cities fail, and go to the country. It is a wide land. There are diverse attractions in different places, and there is a great West to be filled up.

Even in our cities the people are migratory. Change of fashions and fortunes move high and low from one part of a city to the other.

This state of affairs produces a trouble in churches. Of a large majority of pastors it may probably be said of each that he does not know every member of his own flock. Men move off, providing for everything but their church membership. They pay all their debts, inform their business correspondents of their new residence, tell their postmaster where to forward their letters, write to the publishers to change their newspaper address, but take not the least pains to inform the pastor, or any officer of the church, that they have removed.

Such a course is both unmannerly and immoral. No Christian man has a right to devolve upon his pastor and the officers of his church any anxiety on account of his unexplained absence. Sometimes, after months, or perhaps years, of absence, such a parishioner finds himself in such a condition that a church letter would be serviceable to him. Then he writes back to the pastor. What does he expect the pastor to do? The applicant may have been living a life of sin in the distant town during the years of absence from his church. How can the pastor know?

But if there has been nothing else in the applicant's conduct to forfeit church membership, his very behavior to the church he has left renders him unworthy of a letter. When a member has been so unfaithful to one church can a pastor recommend him to another?

In point of sacredness among his voluntary associations, next to that of his relation to his wife, is a man's relation to his church. If he walk off from his church without one word of explanation we need not be much surprised if we find him next deserting his wife.

There is one class of wanderers to whom special attention should be called, namely: those who take their church letters upon leaving home, and do not deposit them in some church at their new residence. They are careful to go well recommended from the home parish. They can not tell how much service a church letter may do them in their new place of residence. But, plunging into business, they postpone from time to time the settlement of their church relations by the presentation of their church letters until the letters themselves become too old for use, or the person in whose favor they were written become careless, and perhaps enter on courses of sin.

We have heard it estimated that there are now in New York, from other places, having unpresented letters, persons enough to constitute two churches, each with a membership as large as any one now existing. Think of all these unorganized troops! Who can discover some cure for this evil? How can we reach the eyes and ears of these negligent Christians? How can we make them feel that they ought, in justice, to write to their pastors at least every three months until they have determined with whom to cast in their lots in their new homes?

Our experience in the pastorate has discovered to us the fact that through this carelessness many members have been lost to the church, and not a few have fallen away from religion and morality.

Will not each pastor insist, not in general terms, but specifically, that all letters shall be taken to some church, and insist that the sheep who goes from his fold shall early report to him into what fold he has entered? And let all the sheep remember that, though the distance between the folds may be short, it is a transit of peril, increasing the opportunities of the wolf and the danger of the sheep.

Christian Neighbor.

But to the Sisters in White—where are they? They are they who have little or none of the advantages of colleges, academies or high schools in the country, whose lot is poverty, whose calling is drudgery, who have no hope for help or deliverance this side the grave. Many of these sisters have large and dependent families; thousands are widows, and many of them who have husbands are worse off than if they were widows. When the late war gave titles, offices and money to undeserving mid-women men and gave freedom to the fighters in Black and all their kin, it gave to the country at the same time the alarming increase of widows, orphans and disabled husbands and fathers. And a large per cent. of the husbands, fathers, brothers and sons who are not physically disabled by the war were so demoralized that they were and are yet, more of a hindrance than a help to the Sisters in White. The most oppressive and bitter curse which the late war entailed on a large class of the people was that which fell on, and, in no small measure continues, on these Sisters in White—the Brother in Black not excepted—we will venture to say.

How many "gush" speeches have been made in behalf of these women slaves and sufferers? How many articles have been printed in the secular or religious papers in their interest? Who has written a book showing their needs and calling for help? And who would dare to write such a book if it were written? How many thousands of dollars have been donated by the rich and liberal hearted in the North or in the South for those Sisters in White who breathe in the sunny South? When will heed the injunction, "Mind not high things"—e. g., Brother in Black on two high stilts, one from the North and the other from the South, condescend to men [or women] of low estate"—e. g., our Sister in White, with the soles of their feet on the ground?

"FIVE LOAVES AND TWO FISHES." Yes, only a loaf to a thousand and a fish for twenty-five thousand, but the Lord's hand touched the loaf and they were all fed, and twelve baskets of fragments were collected and saved. And the Lord is doing that every day by his providence and Spirit. Hundreds of grains are in every good ear of corn. Had we to plant the ear, it would soon exhaust our cribs, and we should have patches but no big fields. Each grain in the ear, and each grain soon has millions of offspring. In a few years every grain has more children and grandchildren than Methuselah. So in spiritual things. Many of our greatest blessings come in fragments. A fragment of Scripture is remembered just at a critical moment, and temptation is resisted. Fragments of conversation, of reading, of experience recur to us, and we are instantly helped. Of late years, the miracle of five and two has been gloriously repeated in the gifts of the children to missions, and in manifold other ways. Have a Galilean basket in every home, and there will be many times twelve in each church.

Standard.

Be on the watch, now, for demoralizing literature! The death of the arch desperado, Jesse James, will probably be the signal for flooding the country with books devoted to the records of knavery and vice. Such works can not be read with impunity. Beware of them! Anthony Comstock, who has studied more than any other man in the country the distressing subject of juvenile criminality, attributes by far the largest measure of evil influence among the young to the vicious literature which is in circulation. And there are some respectable corporations which assist in this pernicious distribution. Riding on the cars we have been again and again shocked at the depravity of the books and pamphlets placed at our side. Amounts often to a positive insult, and we have with difficulty restrained ourselves from slinging the vile stuff out of the window. We may not challenge the man who places in our hands, or those of our neighbors, an appeal to the evil nature. Many such deserves to be knocked down by the arm of the law, he does.

Central Christian Advocate.

The assurance of the gamblers in the West, especially in St. Louis and Chicago, is something that needs to be studied on the spot to be appreciated. They resent any effort to interfere with their business, as the call it, as an infringement on their natural and civil rights. To hear some of them talk over their grievances one might be led to suspect that they were more greatly sinned against than any other persons in the community. Their practice has been to buy up the police and so secure themselves from ordinary arrests. The case of an indictment by the grand jury is not so easily managed; but generally by the aid of a certain class of lawyers and judges they manage to evade the law and carry on their infamous business. They are having considerable trouble just now in St. Louis and have so far lost their temper as to threaten to institute proceedings against the foreman of the grand jury and the prosecuting attorney. The accusation is persecution—and they are not without sympathy from some persons who think they are good citizens.

Centennial of American Methodism.

In view of the action taken by the General Conference at Nashville on the above subject, the following appointments by the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church are of interest:

In accordance with the request of a Joint Committee which met in New York May 3, 1882, to promote the holding of an American Methodist Centennial Conference in the year 1884, the Bishops of the Methodist Episcopal Church, in semi-annual meeting at Detroit, May 11, 1882, appointed the following persons to be a committee to co-operate with similar committees of other Methodist Churches in making arrangements for the proposed Conference:

Bishops—Simpson, Wiley, Andrews and Hurst.

Ministers—Luke Hitchcock, C. N. Sims, Andrew Longacre, E. W. Joyce, C. H. Fowler, J. E. Goucher, Daniel Dorchester, Sr., M. D'C. Crawford, Sandford Hunt, D. A. Goodsell, Joseph Horner.

Laymen—C. L. Seney, J. B. Cornell, G. J. Ferry, A. V. Stout, Charles Scott, J. A. Wright, Wm. Claflin, Theodore Runyon, D. H. Wheeler, John Owen, Amos Shinkle.

By order and in behalf of the Bishops.

E. G. ANDREWS, Secretary.

WASHINGTON, D. C., May 2, 1882.

Bishop Harris, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was present at the anniversary of the Metropolitan Chapel Fund in London recently, and made a speech. The passage quoted below deserves repetition and furnishes an example worthy of all praise:

In the city of New York there is a society that combines in itself the purpose, and action of both a Church, Extension and a Missionary Society. There were two brothers in New York, poor boys; they learned to be blacksmiths, and one of them hired himself as a journeyman, and managed to lay up in the savings bank $100, $200. He went to a missionary meeting in the Old Greene street church, his heart got touched, and he gave every time he had. That man lived to establish the New York Church Extension and Missionary Society, and for years before he was called to his rest on high he gave from $10,000 to $30,000 a year to the society, "applause" and the more he gave the more he had. "Applause." Now his brother, also a wealthy man, is president of that society, which has scattered chapels and churches all over the City of New York, in places where there would be no churches, but for the liberality of these men and those they got to help them. The brother is giving from $20,000 to $30,000 a year to that society, and still is one of the largest contributors to the Connectional Missionary Society.

The Rev. Luman W. Cooper, writing from Greensburg, La., under date May 31, 1882, sends the following very gratifying intelligence:

We have had a gracious revival in this place. The Holy Spirit descended on the people. Fifteen accessions, several conversions and nearly every member of the church blessed of God. Every one interested. The pastor and people rejoice together. We have an excellent Sabbath school and I think the revival commenced in the Sabbath-school. We were assisted by Revs. D. A. Little, C. A. Powell, J. I. Parker, R. T. Davis and R. F. Flowers. We have a good assessment, a neat and comfortable parsonage. Two kind brethren sent to us two good cows. Hardly a day passes but what some one sends to the parsonage some expression of remembrance. I never served a kinder people. Religion makes the church interested in their pastor.

A Mistake Corrected.

MR. EDITOR: The New York Methodist makes a mistake in supposing that the eight delegates among two hundred and thirty three who left the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union in Washington would have a large following. On the contrary, they have but two societies out of three thousand local auxiliaries of the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union. Not a single member of the Southern delegation went with them. Mrs. Sallie F. Chapin, of Charleston, Mrs. William C. Sibley, of Augusta, Mrs. Georgia Hulse McLeod, of Baltimore, and their sister delegates from nearly every Southern State, stood loyal to the Northern society. They could hardly do less since its doctrine is that of the right of each State to select its own methods of work. The National Woman's Christian Temperance Union has never worked for woman's ballot, even on the sole question of temperance, but many of its auxiliaries have done so, and in Arkansas the new law, which has wrought such a beneficent change by closing three-quarters of the dram-shops, was proposed by the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Arkansas, in petitions to the Legislature, asking for women to "vote by signature" to a petition on the question of license. It would be most disastrous to our inspiring work in the South if a misapprehension should prevail as to the National Woman's Christian Temperance Union and its policy on this important subject. We have over thirty distinct lines of work under the heads Evangelistic, Educational, Social and Legal, the latter having received as yet less than its true share of attention in the National Union, though quite prominent in many of its State auxiliaries.

A FRIEND OF THE W. C. T. U.

The Rev. D. C. Langford, of Lauderdale, Miss., writes the editor a kind personal letter from which we extract the following: "I am doing well on my circuit with a very fine prospect before us. The people of Lauderdale are exceedingly generous and kind. I have never been better received. My circuit is long and irksome to travel, but I have fine health and a willing mind. I shall redouble my efforts to help circulate the dear old ADVOCATE."

—Samuel J. Jones and Alvin V. Lane, both New Orleans boys, received the degree of Ph. D. at the recent commencement of Vanderbilt University.

—The Rev. Wm. Hayne Leavell, pastor of the First Baptist Church in Manchester, N. H., has withdrawn from that denomination. Mr. Leavell was pastor of the Baptist Church in Jackson, Miss., in 1874-75, and is a son-in-law of Senator George, of Mississippi. It is reported that he will unite with the Congregationalists.

—Rev. A. E. Watkins, son of the late Dr. W. H. Watkins, and for two years a student at Vanderbilt University, will spend the vacation in this city, and have pastoral charge of Louisiana-Avenue Church. Bro. Watkins entered upon his work last Sabbath, preaching morning and evening to good congregations. He was fortunate enough to secure a scholarship in the Vanderbilt for the next term.

—Bishop McTyeire was requested by resolution of the General Conference to prepare a biography of Bishop Joshua Soule; or should he fail to find suitable and sufficient material for a book worthy of the distinguished dead, he was asked to prepare one or more articles on the subject for the Quarterly Review. We hope the volume may be forthcoming. Bishop Soule was prominently connected with some of the most memorable and critical passages in the history of American Methodism and deserves a conspicuous place in our biographical literature.

—The Rev. W. R. Sims, of Brandon, Miss., has been elected to the Fellowship in the biblical department of Vanderbilt University. Bro. Sims graduated from the University in the class of 1881 with great distinction. He was Founder's medallist in the biblical department and graduating representative chosen by the faculty to deliver the commencement oration. This is a well-deserved compliment to our gifted young friend, and we heartily congratulate all concerned. We regret to lose him from the active pastorate, but approve and applaud the motive of his acceptance.

POSTOFFICE ADDRESS.—My address is 871 Carondelet street, corner Constantinople street, New Orleans; or to the care of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, 112 Camp street, New Orleans.

LINUS PARKER.

The Colorado Methodist of May 15 says:—Stuart I Noble received license to preach, from the last Quarterly Conference of Colorado Springs. The following Sunday night he preached in the church to a good congregation, whose number and attention attested their love and confidence toward him. We can ill spare him from the work here. We cordially commend him to the Wet Mountain Valley people, to whom he goes under appointment of the presiding elder. We are fully persuaded of his fitness to serve them as a useful pastor.

This is the second "native" young man which the Denver Conference in the last six months, has licensed and taken into its work. Is not our church in this Conference in the apostolical succession? Souls are converted and her young men are receiving the "call" of the Master.

The Sabbath, as a rest, a blessing, and a period for spiritual refreshment, was baptized into the Christian dispensation by Jesus permitting his hungry disciples to pluck and eat the ears of corn, and by restoring the withered hand on that day. The observance of the Sabbath with a strictness involving discomfort and fasting until it becomes a burden, belong to the old dispensation, and not the new.

The liberty of the Sabbath is not a license to self-indulgence, nor should we seek worldly advantage by deferring even a work of charity to that day.

The Sabbath is ours as a heavenly benediction.

"HEART STOCK IN IT."—A country woman was recently called to leave a home, in the building and beautifying of which she had expended much time and thought, as well as money. As she turned away from it, with tearful eyes, she said to a friend—"Ah, I have a good deal of heart stock in that house!"

This is just what is wanted for all our churches and church enterprises—more heart stock. We never feel a very deep interest in that which costs us little or nothing.

The captive Israelite by the river of Babylon, "wept" when he "remembered Zion," and all the holy service he had enjoyed there. Hear his passionate outburst, when asked to sing a song of Zion for his masters:

"How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?"

"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget her cunning. If I do not remember thee, let my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth; if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy."

Let every one who would value God's cause more highly put into it a good deal of heart stock.—The Baptist Teacher.

BOARD OF CHURCH EXTENSION.—The Board of Church Extension has been called to meet at the preacher's office of the Walnut Street Church in Louisville, Ky., June 24, 1882, at nine o'clock A. M. Notices have been sent to all the members, including the Bishops, and a full attendance is very much desired.

DAVID MORTON, Sec.

LOUISVILLE, KY., June 1, 1882.

Important Notice

To the Secretary of each Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South:

The interest on the Colvin fund up to July 1, 1882, is to be divided and paid according to the order of the General Conference in following words, viz.:

On the first day of July, 1882, and annually thereafter, the book agent shall apportion to the several Annual Conferences the interest on said fund on the basis of the number of the widows and orphans of deceased traveling preachers, to be ascertained by certified returns from the secretaries of the several Annual Conferences, which sum so apportioned shall be placed in the hands of the chairman of the Board of Finance of the Annual Conferences, who shall receipt for the same, and a certificate of the amount thereof shall also be sent by the book agent to the secretary of each Annual Conference. The amounts so apportioned shall be by the boards of finance aforesaid divided among the beneficiaries. The first apportionment shall include all arrears of interest to the date of it.

Now, then, the secretary of each Annual Conference of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, will send to me forthwith a certified statement of the number of widows and orphan children of deceased itinerant preachers within the bounds of his Conference.

Let there be no delay, as the distribution can not be made without a knowledge of the number and locality of the claimants.

J. B. M'FERRIN, Book Agent.

JUNE 1, 1882.

"I saw an old colonial cent, the other day. It bore date 1787, and I was much impressed with the superscription on it. On one side were thirteen rings, representing thirteen States, all interlinked and ranged around in the form of a circle, while in the center of the circle was the motto, 'We are One.' On the other side stood forth in bold characters, 'Mind your own business.' This would make a good Christmas present for every church in the land. We are one, one in the Lord, one in faith, one in baptism, but underlying this unity is the cardinal tenet: 'Mind your own business,' and only as each church minds its own affairs and attends to its own specific work, can harmony and unity be preserved.

CONVERSION.—We learn, from an English paper, that the Bishop of Hereford has ordained 5 dissenting preachers to the ministry of the church; the Bishop of Chester has ordained two, who have been followed into the church by their Congregations; and the Bishop of Litchfield has received nearly 60 applications from dissenting or Wesleyan preachers to be ordained ministers of the Church of England. In our country the same thing is going on in a proportionate degree. How frequent the paragraphs stating that some denominational minister has applied to be admitted a candidate for orders in the church.—Calendar.

Note from Publishing Committee.

Mr. Lathrop, in retiring from the business management of the ADVOCATE, carries with him the best wishes of the Publishing Committee, and, we may safely say, of the agents and subscribers also. During his connection with the paper the accounts have been kept with accuracy, and the paper has been issued promptly and in good style. The Publishing Committee, from the time of Mr. Lathrop's retirement, April 25, assume the business control and all financial responsibility. The Publishing Committee have employed Mr. T. J. Carver as their business manager. All communications on business should be addressed to no individual name, but "To the New Orleans Christian Advocate, 112 Camp street, New Orleans."

FELIX R. HILL,
LINUS PARKER,
CHRISTIAN KEENER,
Sub-Committee.

Business Manager's Notice.

As will be seen in the above, the undersigned has taken the business management of the ADVOCATE. This will in no wise interfere with my commission business conducted at 60 Carondelet street, this city. I shall have ample time to give all needed assistance to the Publishing Committee. The late publisher, Mr. Lathrop, has so systematized the business department of the paper that no changes will be needed. Everything will go on as if no change in the management had been made. As stated above, all communications must be addressed to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Books and Periodicals.

MARTIN'S HISTORY OF LOUISIANA. New edition. James A. Gresham, publisher and bookseller, 26 Camp street, 1882.

A copy has been laid on our table. The original work, a well-known standard, has been faithfully reprolined, with additional matter, consisting of a memoir of the distinguished author: The Act of Purchase of Louisiana from the French; Brief Annals of the Leading events in the History of the State, from 1815 to the beginning of our civil war, with other information of interest to the general reader. The mechanical work is most excellent, equal to similar publications anywhere. The paper is good, the type large and clear, and the binding durable. The history of Louisiana will ever be an interesting chapter in the history of the world. Without a knowledge of it we must be ignorant of many things that have entered into the governmental policy and history of our nation. Honored names connected with her earlier days will never die. Their memories will remain fragrant as the flowers of their adopted State. We commend the valuable work to our readers and hope that the publisher may find many purchasers. Such a volume deserves to be carefully studied.

WORTH LIVING; OR, THE OLD FINCHLEY PLACE. By Lillian F. Wells. 12mo., cloth pp 272, illustrated $1.25. Published by the American Sunday-School Union.

This book can be cordially commended, not only for the interest of the plot, but for its sound sense and its religious teachings. The only life "worth living" is portrayed in winning guise for young readers.

SONGS OF THE MASTER; Select Poems. By the late Frances Ridley Havergal. Philadelphia: American Sunday-School Union.

A Texas paper says: "Previous good character counts for something in this State. A man who was on trial for arson brought forward witnesses to prove that he had neglected two good chances to steal horses; and the jury, decided that 'no such man as that could be guilty of burning a barn.'"

Chronic constipation, chronic dyspepsia, chronic diarrhœa, promptly cured by using Brown's Iron Bitters. It is a complete strengthener of the digestive organs.

This is not bad of an English gentleman, somewhat bald, who entered a hairdresser's shop in Paris to be operated upon, and was thunderstruck to find himself charged ten francs. "Ten francs!" he exclaimed, "for cutting my hair!" "Oh, no, monsieur; not for cutting your hair, but for finding de hair in de soup."

A maiden said to her little nephew, "Now, Johnny, you go to bed early, and always do so, and you'll be rosy cheeked and handsome when you grow up." Johnny thought over this a few minutes and observed, "Well, aunt, you must have set up a good deal when you were young."

"What did you say the conductor's name was?" "Glaser—Mr. Glass." "Oh no; impossible." "Impossible—I say it is." "And why not, pray?" "Because, sir, Glass is a non-conductor." Deafening applause from the scientific passengers.

"Have you," asked the judge of a recently convicted man, "anything to offer the Court before sentence is passed?" "No, your Honor," replied the prisoner, "my lawyer took my last cent."

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

A PEACH ORCHARD EXPERIENCE.—A correspondent ("J. V.," Oakland county, Mich.) who has now over three hundred peach trees gives an account of his first orchard. We give this essentially as written for two reasons; first, as an encouragement to others, as Oakland county is far from the peach localities of the State, and it shows that even under adverse circumstances his land gave him fair returns. Second, for the purpose of suggesting some points in which the management might have been improved. Mr. V. writes: "Four years ago last spring I planted three hundred peach trees on poor, sandy land, setting them sixteen feet apart each way; all the trees lived. For the first two years I planted corn in the orchard, which gave a fair crop for such land. The third year I planted beans, which was a failure, but that year I had twenty bushels of peaches, which I sold for $2 50 per bushel. This year, the third, I discovered that the borer was injuring the trees, and I dug out of the three hundred trees about seven hundred borers. Last year, the fourth, I did not plant any crop in the orchard, but cultivated the soil and kept it perfectly clean and hunted the curculio. I picked and sold five hundred bushels of choice fruit, which returned me $300 clear, after paying freight and commissions. I made use of about one thousand props, besides several balls of hemp twine, to keep the trees from breaking down. The injury by the borers the third year, the heavy crop of the fourth, followed by the severe winter which we had in Michigan, together caused the death of about half of the three hundred trees." This experience is interesting, and it may be instructive to analyze it, and see what our correspondent made by the operation. Three hundred trees, at sixteen feet apart, occupy less than two acres which would hold three hundred and forty-two trees, but we call the land two acres. We are not told what the returns from the corn were, but it is fair to assume that the two crops and the $40, for the first crop of fruit the third year paid for the trees, their planting and all the cultivation, so that at the beginning of the fourth year the orchard had paid all its expenses. Supposing that all the trees instead of one-half had been killed, the firewood would pay for the clearing the land and give a profit besides. The $60 received for the fourth year's crop gives the handsome showing of a yearly return of $75 per acre for each of the four years, which is probably much more than the land originally cost and much more than what is regarded as an average return in the celebrated peach districts of Delaware and Maryland. This report is a particularly unfavorable one, for it is rare that a peach orchard does not give more than one full crop—yet what could J. V. have done with two acres that would have paid him better? In what respect could our correspondent have done better with his first orchard? He says that the soil was "poor and sandy"—"sandy," so far as it means light, is well for a peach orchard; "poor" is not. While the peach tree should never be put upon low, wet lands, they should have what is considered good corn land. The growing of corn between the rows until the orchard comes into bearing, is regarded as good practice in the great "peninsula" peach district. The second drawback was in neglecting the borer until the third year. Every tree, before planting, should have been carefully examined to see that none had already made an entrance, and every fall and spring thereafter, each tree should have been examined. The excessive crop of the fourth year, and the many props and the stays of twine indicate that the young trees had been allowed to grow at will, without any shortening of the branches to form a compact head. While peach growers differ as to whether it pays to do any "cutting in," as it is called, after the trees fairly come into bearing, all agree that it is desirable to do this upon the younger trees, and cut back in fall or early spring one-half, more or less, of the growth of the previous season. There is another point for peach growers to consider; much time was expended in cutting and adjusting the 1,000 props, and several balls of hemp twine cost something, and time was consumed in applying it. Suppose that these items of expense in time and money had been directed to thinning the fruit when small, would it not have been more profitable? We feel quite sure that it would have been, so far as the future of the trees was concerned. How it would have been in money returns for the fruit we can not say. Of course the winter-killing, which was in many localities very disastrous that winter, could not have been avoided, though it might not have been so extensive had not the trees been exhausted by overbearing. We consider the experience of J. V. encouraging to those who, outside what are regarded as peach districts, would like to experiment in peach culture.—American Agriculturist.

LARGE VS. SMALL POTATOES FOR SEED.—The Elmira Farmers' Club discussed this subject at its late meeting, and the Husbandman says: "In response to the question, What is the difference, except in size, between large potatoes and small ones grown in the same hill, all well matured, of good quality and equal vigor in the eyes? W. A. Armstrong answered: 'There is no difference, except as the large potatoes give more sustenance, and therefore may give greater support to shoots in the early stages of growth. We speak of potatoes for planting as seed, but they are not. In planting we employ root propagation, exactly as if we plant joints of roots to propagate quack grass. In either cases it is only necessary to use a piece of root strong enough to support the shoot until it begins to make roots for itself. A potato as large as a walnut with the shuck off, if well ripened and sound, is, in suitable ground and a favorable season, just as good as a larger one and will give as full yield. By continual collection of small potatoes one would inevitably gather many imperfectly ripened, and from other causes there would be others imperfectly developed, not sound, and therefore not fit for planting. In field culture it is very common to get large crops of large potatoes from small ones planted. Nobody expects a small sound potato to bear all small ones, or even a large proportion of small ones. I remember a year when I had not enough potatoes of full size for planting, and I used, to finish the field, very small potatoes; I dare say the average was scarcely larger than a hickory nut. Fancy varieties were planted in a portion of the field, the seed cut to about three eyes, common market varieties in a large portion, the potatoes cut in halves or quarters and in the remainder the very small potatoes. The crop was good, and there was no perceptible difference in quality or yield in that part where small potatoes had been planted. As a rule, it is better to plant potatoes of a large size simply because there is less risk of getting imperfect seed. The main requirement is a strong, vigorous shoot. Get that, and, if there is no potato at the end of it there may be a good crop from the planting."

VEGETABLE SEEDS.—The following is from the Connecticut Farmer: "As the season has arrived when the selection of seeds should be made an the numerous seed houses, through their catalogues, give ample and explicit instructions of the various varieties of vegetables which go to make a perfect garden, and the treatment and cultivation of the same, no one can make the excuse of being ignorant as to management of the vegetable garden. But many farmers, I am afraid, are apt to neglect the cultivation of the numerous varieties of vegetables with the plea that they have not the time to attend to it, at any rate give it but little thought or attention as to place or size. It should have the best place on the farm, taking in of course its handy proximity to the house, also give it plenty of room; and as I begin to enumerate the different varieties of vegetables that should be found in the vegetable garden, I take it for granted that all the readers of the Farmer have that delicious and toothsome vegetable that gives us the earliest spring supply when our appetites crave and long for a change for something green and refreshing from the garden. I refer to the asparagus bed. Lettuce is one of our earliest vegetable and is very palatable and refreshing; may be sown very early in the open ground, or if one has a cold frame it can be sown in the fall, and thus have a supply the latter part of winter. Radishes may be sown quite early, and by sowing at intervals they can be had for a number of weeks. For early peas, early Philadelphia and little gems; for late, Champion of England. Sweet corn, early Minnesota; second early Crosbys; for late, Evergreen. I find the Savoys the best of all cabbages: for early use the Early Ruhl Savoy, and for Winter Drumhead Savoy. For beans, pole, plant the Cranberry and Dreer improved Lima; bush, Low Limas and Pink Eyes. For tomatoes, Acme and Blount's Champion. Squashes, Summer, Crookneck; Winter, Hubbard and Marble-head. Cauliflower, Henderson's Early Snow-Ball. For parsnips, Long Smooth or Hollow Crown. Peppers, Sweet Mountain. Parsley, Champion Moss curled. Celery, Henderson's Half Dwarf and Boston Market.

BRAHMAS AND PLYMOUTH ROCKS.—A subscriber sends us the following account of his success in crossing Plymouth Rocks with a light Brahmas: Since first subscribing for your paper, nearly two years ago, I have received many valuable hints from its agricultural column, and for the benefit of its other readers would like to give you a little of my experience in "poultry raising." I crossed the Plymouth Rock with light Brahmas and am well satisfied with results, in size of birds and delicacy of flesh. The Brahmas are heavy eaters and will not stray off to hunt their own living as the Leghorns do; but their weight and clumsiness prevents their flying over even board fences, so our gardens are safe. They are such faithful sitters and run with their chicks so long that I mean to use them for turkey hatching next spring. One objection to the Brahma chicks in the very early spring or late fall is their slowness in feathering out after shedding the down. Their bare skins cause them to chill easy, but in the warm weather their rapid growth is surprising. I believe the more the breed is known the more popular it will become, unless among those who merely desire eggs and no flesh; they will no doubt cling to the tiny, but industrious Leghorn.—New York Herald.

James Vick, the well-known florist of Rochester, N. Y., died of pneumonia, in his sixty-fourth year. He was born at Portsmouth, England, but came to this country with his parents in his fifteenth year. During boyhood he was a playmate of Charles Dickens. He was a type-setter by trade, and worked at the case by the side of Horace Greely. At an early period he assumed the managing editorship of the Albany Cultivator, and subsequently of various other rural journals. In 1850 Mr. Vick became engaged in the cultivation of choice flowers, which occupied his attention to the day of his death. He was very widely known throughout the United States and Europe, and was said to be the largest dealer in flower-seeds in the world.

CHOOSING A COW.—The crumply horn is a good indication; a full eye another. He head should be small and short. Avoid the Roman nose; this indicates thin milk, and but little of it. See that she is dished in the face, sunk between the eyes. Notice that she is what stock men call a good handler—soft skin, and loose like the skin of a dog—deep from the loin to the udder, and a very small tail. A cow with these marks never fails to be a good milker. There is more difference in cows than is usually supposed, and but few really good cows are offered in our markets. If a farmer has a "No. one article," he will not sell her unless obliged to do so.

ASPARAGUS.—Mr. Marshall P. Wilder, of Boston (most excellent authority,) says that nobody doubts the importance of manure and pulverization of the soil, or of deep trenching for some crops, but others want breadth rather than depth. Formerly it was thought that asparagus needed a deeply trenched soil, but now a foot of soil, with the manure near the surface, is deemed sufficient, but the roots are set farther apart—say four feet. Mr. Wilder spoke of a farmer near Boston who raises 75,000 cauliflowers a year, and does not believe in chemical fertilizers, but he keeps a stock of 200 animals.

WASHING FRUIT TREES.—The following home-made implement for washing fruit trees will be found excellent. It is not patented: Take a stick (a broken rake handle will do) run a saw cut nine or ten inches down one end, put on a ring to keep it from slipping too far, cut some woolen rags or cloth six inches long, till in your saw cut tight (full as you can), put it in a bench screw or some place to press tight, tie the end fast, then take your bucket, with soap and water, and scrub to your heart's content.

BREEDS OF HOGS.—The Berkshires, imported from England, and the Poland China, an American breed, are thought to be best. But the Chester Whites, Essex, Suffolk, and Durocks or Red Berkshires, are highly esteemed, as of quick growth and good size, according to the Western Agriculturist.

SALT FOR THE THROAT.—In these days when diseases of the throat are so universally prevalent, and in so many cases fatal, we feel it our duty to say a word in behalf of a most effectual, if not positive, cure for sore throat.

For many years past, indeed we may say during the whole of a life of more than forty years, we have been subject to sore throat, and more particularly to a dry hacking cough, which is not only distressing to ourselves, but to our friends and those with whom we are brought into business contact.

Last fall we were induced to try what virtue there was in common salt. We commenced by using it three times a day—morning, noon and night. We dissolved a large tablespoonful of pure table salt in about a half small tumbler full of water. With this we gargle the throat more thoroughly just before meal time. The result has been that during the entire winter we were not only free from coughs and colds, but the dry hacking cough has entirely disappeared.

We attribute these satisfactory results solely to the use of salt gargle, and most cordially recommend a trial of it to those who are subject to diseases of the throat.

Many persons who have never tried the salt gargle have the impression that it is unpleasant. Such is not the case. On the contrary, it is pleasant, and after a few day's use no person who loves a nice clean mouth and a first-rate sharpener of the appetite will abandon it.

CARE OF CHILDREN.—Every mother should know that very young children often suffer for the want of fresh, cold water. This they should have every two hours, and more frequently if they become restless and fretful. Fretfulness is generally caused by great thirst. We have recently received a communication from a correspondent, who says: "While making a voyage at sea some years ago, I was greatly disturbed by the incessant crying, or moaning, of a child during the first few days of the journey. The child was about one year old, and very delicate. I suggested to the mother that it wanted water. She said that it never, to her knowledge, tasted water, as she thought it dangerous to give it to children so young. I assured her that she need have no fear, and recommended that it should have water every hour, a little at a time, until it became accustomed to it. This was given it, and during the rest of the voyage (of five or six days) I never saw a better or happier child. I believe the child's health was permanently impaired by the constant thirst that during its short life had been consuming it."—Housekeeper.

LOCKJAW.—A correspondent of the Scientific American says: "Let any one who has an attack of lockjaw take a quantity of turpentine, warm it and pour it on the wound, no matter where the wound is, and relief will follow in less than a minute. Nothing better can be applied to a severe cut or bruise than cold turpentine. It will give certain relief almost instantly. Turpentine is also a sovereign remedy for croup. Saturate and place the flannel on the throat and chest, and in every case three or four drops on a lump of sugar may be taken inwardly.

ITALIAN APRON.—The fashionable Italian apron is easily made. Take a handsome, heavily fringed towel, with deep and bright border; turn one edge down over the other, so that the front is nearly all ornamental work, and put a cord and tassel around the top, or a band of ribbon, only joining the apron to the band for about a quarter of a yard, and buttoning the towel or apron at the back where the sides drop down. Take a towel and fold one end down over another and you'll readily catch the idea.

TO RESTORE BLACK MERINO.—Soak the goods in strong soft soap suds two hours. Then, having dissolved one ounce of extract logwood (which is the amount required for one dress) in a bowl of warm water, add sufficient warm—not hot—water to cover the goods, which are to be taken from the suds without wringing. Allow the goods to stand in the logwood water over night. In the last water, add one pint of sweet milk, which stiffens the goods a little. Iron while quite damp. They will not crock, but will look like new.

Potato flour, or the dried pulp of the potato, is attaining considerable importance in the arts—so much so, in fact, that in Lancashire, England, some 20,000 tons of it are sold annually, and its market value is stated to be much greater than that of wheat flour. The article is extensively used for sizing and other manufacturing purposes; and on being precipitated with acid is converted into starch. After having been calcined it is used with advantage as a dressing for silk.

COLORED STOCKINGS.—When striped stockings are washed and are ready to hang up to dry, turn them wrong side out; this will prevent the color from running on the right side and spoiling the stockings.

IRON RUST.—The common garden sheep's sorrel will remove iron rust. Rub the spot with the juice of the plant, and lay in the sun. Repeat the operation until no stain is seen.

TO TAKE OUT SCORCH.—If a shirt-bosom, or any other article, has been scorched in ironing, lay it where bright sunshine will fall directly on it. It will take it entirely out.—Buckeye Cookery.

Obituaries.

NORWOOD—PROF. S. S. NORWOOD has fallen asleep in Jesus. His life and influence still live to bless us. The influence of the righteous never die, but gathers power in coming years. No one who knew Bro. Norwood can say the influence he left this side of the grave is not for good. His friends were counted by the thousand. So refined in manners, so polished in intellect, so considerate of every one's feelings, how could any one help loving him? Very, very sad that this life so fraught with hope and usefulness should end untimely. He died in the prime of life and usefulness. His friendship was of the highest type. One thought himself happy to know Sellers Norwood was his friend. He was a true Methodist. He loved the church of his choice. He was a model steward—ever looking after the interest of his pastor. He was, I believe, several times a delegate to the Annual Conference, and very often to the District Conference. He was a most efficient officer.

He was a Christian educator. In this field he achieved his greatest success. He was loved by his pupils. He was a loving son, father and companion. His disease was consumption, and for three years he has been gradually sinking. He was conscious of his change, but he did not dread it, for his faith was in God. He died on the Mississippi river en route to Texas to see his mother. In his last hours his heart turned to his mother, and though his loved ones and friends knew he could not live long, they made an effort to gratify his wish to see his mother. Thank God, there is a place of meeting beyond the grave! In the city of God son and mother can meet. His death was peaceful. He went to sleep, and awoke in the beautiful home of the soul. He suffered much, but he bore his sufferings with patience, Christian education, the church, his family and his State have sustained a great loss. When I die I trust Sellers Norwood will be among the first to greet me on the eternal shore of life divine. We cherish his memory. Gone, dear brother, to live with Christ! But you are not forgotten! If you speak of us in heaven, as often as we do of you on earth, our names will be familiar in that bright world! "He is not dead, but sleepeth!"

INMAN W. COOPER.

SWEETMAN—NOAH SWEETMAN'S mortal life ceased in Handsboro, Miss., March, 1882.

While working in a sawmill he was caught in one of the belts and fearfully mangled, only his head and face remaining unharmed. How sad the thought of his being taken away while so young, and so unexpectedly to himself, his relations and friends. From this dispensation of God's providence we should take warning and "be also ready, for in such a time we think not the Son of Man cometh."

Noah was about sixteen years of age, and the joy of his mother's heart. His Father having died several years ago, the support of a widow and other children depended to some extent upon the exertions of Noah. He loved his mother, and, as a consequence, was ready to make any sacrifice for her comfort and happiness. Sister Sweetman is a member of the Methodist Church, and, if the writer remembers well, on one occasion she said to him, that in infancy Noah was dedicated to the Lord in holy baptism. Though he had never been received formally into the church, nor made a public profession of Christianity, yet he was a good boy, and we trust, in his heart, a Christian.

Noah attended Sabbath-school regularly, took quite an interest in the lessons, and was much loved by his teacher and classmates who mourn that he no more occupies his place among them. On last Christmas he received in the Christmas tree a Bible, which, from then to the day of his death, he read most diligently, and we trust the precious word of truth sunk deep into his heart, dispelled the gloom therefrom, and lighted up his soul for heaven. May God comfort those who mourn his death.

M. C. CALLAWAY.

MARKHAM—BRO. GEORGE MARKHAM was born in Goochland county, Va., on the fifth day of March, 1807, and died at his home, near Buckland, Warren county, Miss., on the fourteenth day of March, 1882, aged seventy-five years and nine days.

Bro. Markham came from his native State to Mississippi in 1837, where he lived and died. On the ninth day of November, 1843, he was united in wedlock to Miss A. J. Billingslea, who with three children still survive him—five having preceded him to the home "not made with hands eternal in the heavens."

In 1853 he took upon himself the vows of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, under the ministry of Rev. Henry J. Harris. Shortly after uniting with the church he was happily and soundly converted to God—the evidences of which were exhibited in a well-defined Christian character, and a life of devotion to the cause of Christ. As a Christian he was exemplary and urbanous; as a husband, affectionate and devoted; as a father, kind, gentle and loving; as a friend and neighbor, warm and genial in his attachments; and as a benefactor, the poor always realized that he was humane and benevolent, and his benefactions were never withheld from the indigent and needy. He was a man of honesty, sobriety and integrity, and in these relations of life he was ever held in the highest esteem by all who knew him. His attachment to the church of his choice was ardent and unselfish, and the door of his house was ever open to the weary itinerant, and his pastor always found a welcome and a home under his hospitable roof.

In his business relations he was honest in that which was least, and so manipulated the transactions of life as to render them subservient to the great end of all human achievement—the salvation of the soul. Even the business transaction of his life were so many acts of religious devotion.

In the life and character of George Markham we have the type of a robust, moral manhood, worthy of emulation, and an evidence of the high sense of honor and integrity which marked the progress of our good old ante bellum days. As a man he was a model Christian gentleman, and in his death the church has lost one of its strong supports; but our loss is his eternal gain, and though dead, he yet speaketh. "Mark the perfect man, and behold the upright; for the end of that man is peace."

W. W. HURST.

LYONS—PRISCILLA LYONS, daughter of W. W. and Sarah A. Burton, and affectionate wife of James M. Lyons, was born in St. Landry parish, La., November 3, 1863, and departed this life, May 8, 1882, in the nineteenth year of her age. She united with the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, when only twelve years old, and was happily converted during a protracted meeting held by Rev. R. S. Isbell, the last year of his ministry on this circuit, and was one of the sweetest-spirited Christians in this community. She appreciated the means of grace afforded by the church of her choice. She was cheerful and happy the day before her death, reading the Bible in which she took great delight, and praising God by singing quite a number of the sweet songs of Zion. She was suddenly taken on Monday, the eighth ultimo; gave birth to a sweet little boy about four P. M., and at half-past ten o'clock the same evening, after much suffering, her happy spirit took its departure to that Saviour whom she so dearly loved. She was conscious to the last, warned unconverted loved ones of their danger, and said to her friends, who were weeping around her, "Why do you cry for me?" A short time before her death, after suffering untold agonies, she prayed, "Oh, blessed Jesus, let me die easy," and in a few moments, without a struggle or a groan, and with a sweet smile on her radiant face, she fell asleep in the arms of Jesus.

May husband and other loved ones comply with her dying request, and meet her in the better world.

J. F. WYNN.

RAYBURN—Died in Vernon parish, La., January 27, 1882, MOTHER ELIZABETH RAYBURN. She was born in South Carolina, May 31, 1802, making her at her death seventy-nine years, seven months and twenty-one days old. She was married in the year 1820 to Howell Adams Rayburn, in Monroe county, Miss.; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church in early life, and at her death held her membership at Holly Grove Church. Her husband was a soldier in the war of 1812, and died in the year 1855, leaving her with ten children, five only of which survive. Mother Rayburn was stricken down with paralysis, April 1, 1880, and during all her sickness she seemed to be calm, waiting with patience the hour of death. From the best information the writer can get, with his own personal knowledge, she was a devoted Christian mother in Israel. As a mother she was loving, kind and affectionate; she tried to teach her children to love God, his cause and his people; she was a regular attendant at church as long as she was able to get there, and it seemed to do her soul good to commune with God's people; and with this love for God and the church she was prompted to aid in the same, and notwithstanding she was unable, financially speaking, to do much, she was ever ready to throw in the widow's mite. Well might we expect such a one to die in peace, and get home to heaven!

JOHN FRANKLIN.

GASQUE—LOVE GASQUE was born near Marion Courthouse, S. C., August 12, 1820. He married Miss Susan Rogers in 1843, emigrated to Clark county, Miss., in 1850, and then to Smith county where he has lived ever since. He was one term in the Legislature as representative from Smith county. He joined the Methodist Church about thirty-five years ago, and was especially for the last seventeen years of his life a devoted Christian. He kept up his family altar, and raised religious children. Some three years ago he became paralyzed in his tongue, and at last was paralyzed almost throughout the system, except the arms. For a year or two he could not talk, so as to be understood. He was an intelligent man, and wielded a ready pen, and he thus made known his wants and wishes to others. For months before he died he could take no solid food. He anticipated the end, was ready and willing to depart and to be with Christ; had made every needed arrangement for his wife's future comfort; had even left the more important dates of his life written by his own hand on paper just a few minutes before he died. The last act at the dying moment was to stretch out his hand and bid his faithful wife a last adieu. He died on the seventh of April, 1882, in the sixty-second year of his age.

C. M'DONALD.

DENHAM—Mr. JOSEPH DENHAM was for many years prior to his death a most excellent citizen of the parish of East Baton Rouge, and member of the church of East Baton Rouge circuit at Bethel. His name and memory will long be held in esteem by his brother-members of that church, for he was a character of so much liberality, so generous—though poor—and so gentle withal, that I never heard a single word of reproach attached to his name.

He was born August 14, 1806, and died December 8, 1881. Was a member of the church for thirty years. His brother writes me that when short of means he would lay aside his church money, and remark: "I must not touch that." The preacher, and every church enterprise within his reach, found a ready and hearty supporter in "Uncle Joe Denham," as he was affectionately called. One of the peculiarities of his long illness was that he never suffered any pain, which he attributed directly to the mercy of God. Bro. Denham went "into the valley" and "over the river" sustained by the same Spirit which had been his "ever-present help" since his conversion.

"He has entered into rest, and his works follow him."

H. BRADFORD.

OZLEY—MRS. MARY LOUISA OZLEY was born March 5, 1820, and died in Union parish, La., October 4, 1881. She was the daughter of Washington and Rebecca Harper. She was first married to James P. Crump in 1837, with whom she lived thirteen years, and he died leaving two children, one of whom still lives to mourn her loss. In 1845 she was married to Seborn Ozley, with whom she lived thirty-five years. She was pious from a child up to old age, and was a zealous and useful member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South. As mother and wife she cheered and comforted her home. She was a Christian given to hospitality. I was her pastor for several years, and found she was missed from her tent at camp meeting by the neighborhood and all the church. She bore her extreme sufferings with Christian fortitude, and was perfectly resigned to the will of the good Lord.

DANIEL PRATT IMPROVED
"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873,
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons, and several improvements have been added. It obviates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work within the same time, while economizing steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton, on this account, of a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every 100 bales ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

SELF-FEEDERS and CONDENSERS with latest improvements also made by the Daniel Pratt Gin Company to work with these Gins. Send for descriptive circulars. JOS. B. WOLFE & CO.,

SCIENTIFIC
THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European scientists, and the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:
1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain their polish. Dust or rain will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cool, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, without distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS—NONE GENUINE UNLESS STAMPED.
The MEDICATED GLASSES are all stamped on the frame H. HOUSAH, MEDICATED.

Mr. Walter Mc Pharson, Springfield, Mass., writes: "I have been peculiarly unfortunate in life. My guardian robbed me of the fortune left me by my father, and at the age of 21 I found myself poor in purse and poor in health. I married a young girl whose health soon broke down from overwork and household cares. Our six children gave her great trouble, and were very puny and sickly. My doctor bills were larger than both grocery and dry goods bills together. Last year I brought home a bottle of Brown's Iron Bitters for my wife. She used it and gave it to the children—I also used it myself. Never did I imagine such a miraculous change from ill-health to perfect health possible."

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

VICKSBURG, May 31.—Capt. E. C. Carroll, of this city, is prominently mentioned as the successor of Capt. Eads on the Mississippi River Commission. His appointment would meet with great favor in this valley, where he is well known in connection with river interests.

LOUISVILLE, Miss., May 31.—The army worm has appeared in great numbers in this vicinity and is destroying growing grain.

HELENA, Ark., June 1.—The matters which excite most interest in this section now are the overflowed bottoms, and the condition of the cotton out of the bottoms; which, by the cold weather, has suffered much, the cold weather of the past 36 hours is without precedent in the history of this country, and if all other things were most favorable, and that alone continued, a good crop would be impossible. Relief Commissioner Mangum will receive 5000 rations soon, which will be distributed among the sufferers in the "Old Town" country, beginning four miles below Helena and extending thirty miles south in the country around Laconia, where untold suffering took place by the first flood.

TOMBSTONE, Arizona, June 1.—The bodies of two wood-choppers, Seymour Dey and Harry Curry, were brought here to-day from Dragon mountains, where they were killed yesterday by Indians. An eye-witness states that the men were on a load of hay and were unarmed. The Indians rode up behind and shot them dead, unharnessed the horses and drove them off. There were eight Indians in the party, and they were heading for Sonora, Mexico. They were doubtless from the San Carlos Agency.

VIRGINIA CITY, Nev., June 1.—Yesterday morning a pump column in Alta mine broke, and soon after the bulkhead in the east drift gave way, letting in a heavy rush of water. Six men working in the west drift were cut off. Air was forced into the drift and pumps set to work, but the water has risen in the mine to a height indicating that the men must be drowned.

DONALDSONVILLE, June 4.—Seventy converts were admitted to the Colored Methodist Church this morning. Forty were baptized by sprinkling and thirty in the bayou opposite this town.

BATON ROUGE, June 3.—Mr. John A. Grant, vice president of the Mississippi Valley railroad, left here this evening for New Orleans, accompanied by Mr. Wm. Johnson, of New York. He states that work on the line between here and New Orleans will commence immediately, as a large number of cross-ties are now being cut in the cypress swamps in the vicinity of Manchac. Mr. Grant is loud in his praise of the country through which the new road passes, and says that the road will be completed to this point in less than eighteen months. Surveying parties are now in the field locating a line northward from this parish to Memphis.

DENVER, June 3.—The Tribune's Santa Fe correspondent says advices from Chihuahua report that Gen. Genro, with four hundred Mexican cavalry, surprised a band of renegade Apaches near Bosque de Santiago, May 25, and whipped them unmercifully, killing thirty-seven and capturing ten bucks and the entire camp outfit, including fifty cattle. The Mexicans had nine killed and fourteen wounded. The hostiles are now too badly demoralized to raid again for some time to come.

WASHINGTON, June 4.—Chief Justice Carter and Judges James and Hayner, constituting the Court in banc, to-day rendered a decision upon the last motion filed by Mr. Reed in Guiteau's behalf. The Chief Justice delivered the opinion, which was as follows: In the case of Guiteau.—The judges who listened to argument in that case have come to the conclusion that they have exhausted their powers upon it; that they have heard it patiently, fully and fairly, and that a re-argument would bring them to no other conclusion than that which they have already arrived at; and they decline to re-open the case for argument.

BATON ROUGE, June 5.—House bill No. 65, requiring all stores, shops, groceries, saloons and places of public business, which are or may be licensed, to close on Sunday. The provisions of the act do not apply to drug stores, undertakers, markets, bakeries, livery stables, railroads, steamboats, restaurants, and telegraph office, barber shops and to stores open for the purpose of selling burial material. Section 4 of the bill provides that no alcoholic, vinous or malt liquors shall be given, sold, bartered or traded on Sunday. Mr. Dudenhefer moved to indefinitely postpone the bill. The motion was lost. Mr. Heidenhain said that the bill was infringing on the rights of citizens throughout the State. He would oppose the bill. Mr. Dudenhefer said that if the bill was passed it would break up the Democratic party. Mr. Feazel replied that if such a bill would break up the Democratic party, "let her bust." Mr. Lucke moved to strike out the enacting clause. The motion was lost. Two amendments reported by the committee were then adopted. Mr. Aiklus, of Claiborne, offered an amendment allowing provisions for travelers to be sold. The amendment was lost. Mr. St. Clair offered an amendment requiring all plantation stores to be closed. In order to make the law general the amendment was accepted. Mr. Heidenhain offered as a substitute for the whole bill, a resolution instructing the committee on parochial affairs to prepare an act and allow the citizens of every parish to vote for or against local options, if they wished. Judge Seay in speaking on the substitute said, that the Sunday law was not consistent with the sentiments of the age, and that it would split any party that attempted to force it upon the people. Judge Seay said that his sentiments would doubtless offend his pious constituents but he could not help it. Mr. Heidenhain's substitute was then voted upon, and lost.

PETERSBURG, June 5.—Intelligence was received to-night that a storm in Northampton county, N. C., yesterday, completely ruined cotton, wheat, and corn crops. In many instances the hail stones weighed a pound and a quarter. Potters Academy and many other large buildings were completely demolished by the wind. Telegraph poles on the Seaboard and Roanoke road were blown down for a distance of two miles. Two other persons were reported killed in addition to those already published.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, May 31.—London papers print a story that both Mr. Gladstone and Sir Wm. Harcourt have been warned that at the recent Irish meeting in London the hope was expressed that Mr. Gladstone would be assassinated next, and that this expression was received with loud and significant applause.

LONDON, June 1.—The Daily News says: The Plymouth channel squadron has been ordered to leave the Sound at ten o'clock this morning for Gibraltar. This squadron will carry large crews, and will prove a valuable addition to the fleet under command of Vice Admiral F. P. H. Seymour.

A Paris dispatch says: The French Cabinet met yesterday and approved M. Defreycinet's policy as to the necessity of at once forwarding to the English Foreign Office a proposal for the holding of a diplomatic conference at Constantinople, to settle the Egyptian crisis.

ALEXANDRIA, May 31.—Five additional war vessels ordered to Alexandria by the British government left Suda Monday night, with sealed orders, and are expected to arrive here to-morrow.

LONDON, June 1.—A dispatch to the Times from Constantinople says: Representatives of Germany, Austria, Italy and Russia went, on Wednesday, to the Porte and supported the demands made by the English and French ambassadors, advising Turkey to support the Khedive and to summon the disturbers of order in Egypt to Constantinople. A dispatch to the Standard from Alexandria says that publication of this information has had good effect; it is felt that Arabi Pacha can not long withstand the pressure of the powers.

Mr. Forwood, late Mayor of Liverpool, writes to the Times that his experience during the recent Fenian activity convinces him that outrages in Ireland are perpetrated by the hirelings of a small knot of Fenians in America. To suppress these, he says, American co-operation is indispensable. This can only be secured by showing that American conspirators are a distinct organization from Irish Nationalists, and can be dealt with without interfering with the Irish vote. England has a right to ask America to strangle Fenianism in the place of its birth.

BERLIN, May 31.—A telegram received here states that the exclusively Jewish town of Gorki, in the government of Mohelev, Russia, has been almost entirely destroyed by fire.

VIENNA, June 1.—An invitation to the conference at Constantinople to consider the Egyptian question reached the Austrian Cabinet to-day.

STOCKHOLM, Sweden, June 1.—The poor house, in the town of Oesthammer, has been destroyed by fire. Twenty persons were burned to death. The fire was caused by lightning.

MADDALENA, June 3.—During an attack of bronchitis, to which Garibaldi succumbed, he several times inquired if the steamer conveying Dr. Albanesi to Caprera had been sighted, and on being answered in the negative, he seemed disturbed. He also asked for news for his son Manlio, and shortly afterward quietly expired, his features as in sleep. The death chamber is arranged as a mortuary chapel. The body of the deceased general is dressed in a white poncho and the embroidered cap he habitually wore. A body of marines is posted in the chamber as a guard of honor. Garibaldi's will orders that his body be cremated, and the ashes preserved in a porphyry urn, near the tomb of his dead child, at Caprera. The will is dated September 17, 1881, and entrusts the execution of his wishes to his wife. Dr. Albanesi arrived only this morning, the steamer having been delayed owing to a dense fog.

LONDON, June 3.—Brennan, secretary of the Land League, after his release from prison yesterday, addressed a large assemblage in Kilkenny. He said his real jailers were Mr. Gladstone, Mr. Bright, Mr. Chamberlain, and the whole crowd of pseudo humanitarians and renegade Republicans who composed the British Cabinet. He hoped if the eight hundred suspects were called upon for real sacrifices they would be ready, if necessary, to die for their country. They had seen the government acknowledge Michael Davitt as conqueror. Much remained to be done; they must tear up the very roots of landlordism. The Irish residents of Liverpool are arranging for a demonstration in honor of Davitt, to take place on Tuesday next. Davitt and Dillon will sail for New York on the steamer Germanic.

ROME, June 4.—All Liberal journals appear in mourning and publish eulogies of Gen. Garibaldi. The action of the French Chamber of Deputies in adjourning yesterday as a sign of mourning for the deceased general has produced an excellent impression. Recciotti, Garibaldi and Major Canzio have arrived at Caprera. Preparations for the cremation of the remains have been suspended. The doctors are expected to arrive this evening.

MADRID, June 5.—At a meeting of the Society for the Abolition of Slavery a resolution was passed denouncing outrages and cruelties inflicted upon slaves in Cuba, and a Republican deputy said the government was unworthy of support since it has failed to fulfill the promise it made when in opposition.

LONDON, June 5.—A dispatch to the Standard from Rome says: "On hearing of the death of Garibaldi the Pope remained silent awhile, then raising his eyes to heaven he said: "There has gone another figure of revolution; oh, God, be merciful to him."

ORIGIN OF BIBLE SOCIETY.—A young Welsh girl, in 1802, was wont to walk a distance of seven miles weekly for an opportunity of reading the Bible. In one of those weekly journeys she was met by Mr Charles, of Bala, who, on learning the fact, went up to London to ask for Welsh Bibles for distribution. When in conversation with some friends on the subject, one—Joseph Hughes—exclaimed, Why not establish a society for sending Bibles to Wales? But if to Wales, why not to England? If to England why not to Europe? If to Europe, why not to the whole world? This small mustard seed has spread into the British and Foreign Bible Society as it now is; and the simple fact of that little girl's going seven miles a week for a Bible, has led to the wonderful distribution of seventy-six million copies of the word of God, in whole or in part throughout the length and breadth of the world.

ENJOY HEALTH AND BE HAPPY.

For depression of spirits, general debility and ill-health, also as a certain strengthener of every part of the system, nothing equals Brown's Iron Bitters.

The Commencement of the Alabama Conference Female College will open with the Baccalaureate sermon by Rev. Hardie Brown, D. D. of Florence, Ala., to continued through Monday, Tuesday, and close Wednesday, June 21, with the graduating exercises. Our friends are cordially invited to attend these exercises.

DISTRICT CONFERENCES.

The Seashore District Conference will meet at Pearlington, Miss., June 23, 1882. It will be best for those who come on the L. and N. R. R. to take an early morning train to Lookout Station, which is 30 miles from New Orleans. These trains pass the station at about 7:40 to 8:50, A. M., one from New Orleans, and two from East Coast. The mail boat Rice Farmer connects with those trains and leaves for Pearlington after the last one passes. The boat returns to Lookout and connects with a train from New Orleans, about 5 P. M., then leaves again for Pearlington. It would be well for all to be here at the opening of the Conference.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an imported piano because their mothers and grandmothers used to have one of the same make. What was considered a fine piano a hundred years ago, would be called a tin pan now; what suited our ancestors would not suit our daughters. Music more than all other arts is progressive, and the difference between the spinnet on which Mozart, and even Beethoven, played is, in comparison with the concert piano, say the 1 hickering of to-day as great as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European makers adhere to their old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. American pianos alone have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The Americans obtain durability by their iron plates and bass volume of tone by overstringing, light touch by improved mechanism of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board. If a European piano has a valuable feature, American makers adopt it. There is no patent or copy right on them. Take for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago; this progress is very clearly illustrated, so have the MATHUSHEK pianos patentist features which no other pianos possess. Their pin block is of iron, the holes are bushed with maple, and the pins are inserted into the maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as many other pianos. Therefore it is not advisable for people to buy French pianos on which the government receives about $100.00 in duties, if a better toned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for $100.00 less. I have no prejudice against foreign manufacture, and sold my last large consignment of imported pianos, but that was at a time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since I am in business, I have always striven to keep good, reliable at the first class pianos and sell them as low as possible. By this policy, and fair dealing, I have built up my business, retaining with pride to the thousand families I have supplied with music.

BROTHER BARTHOLOMEW.

Bartholomew, working-time,
Struck his musing and dropt his tools
Empty-handed—cared for rhyme
As for theses of the schools,
Cared or losing, for weal or woe,
Such a poet, long ago.

Sat, his book on his knees,
Thoughts were wandering far, I wis
Beyond chantry, beyond
Beyond cloister, beyond
Beyond ruined rich stained windows high
That sailed o'er the morning sky.

Hear in the chapel-aisle,
Still and knelt with the rest
Wings of the evening hymn
Soar and float off to the night's fair breast,
Quiet to kiss the starry host
Bright as the tongue of Pentecost.

Scrivener, and nothing more;
Fellow a cell can hold!
Worthy to shore,
Open to Nicholas old,
Below, with dispassionate content,
Of the culprit's banishment.

Bartholomew went his way,
Quietly wrote in his sunny cell,
Traveled from day to day,
Pages covered, the walls as well,
Better and better monk instead
Glass-dweller," the prior said.

How died (as mortals must?)
Went free from the rocket through
They took from the dark and dust
And counters many a song,
Poet born Britain to far Cathay
Hard hard cases—and passed away.

Verses full and fine,
Old Greek-loveliness
Like vision, half divine
Bedtherefrom in excess,
Every metal stanza told
And labor manifold.

Came out and stood beside
Shrew's taper-lighted cider,
Gone his lords haughty-dyed;
Time and weather doth he appear—
Scrivener now he's dead!"
Monk's worker!" the prior said.

(Seventh Letter.)

Dear Young Friends: I promised to tell you something more of the Buddhists and Taourts in their worship of idols and demons. These seem to know of but two worlds; the world of light, which is Heaven, and the world of darkness, where the spirits of men dwell. By reason of idolatry and gross superstition their minds and hearts are developed in darkness, doubt and fear, and knowing no way of escape. They think the world of spirits is like this world in which they live, according to their views the spirits of the dead must have money with which to purchase the necessaries of life, and this money must be furnished to them by their friends in this world. Small square pieces of paper are prepared and formed in the shape and size of their lumps of silver called "cycee," and covered over with tin-foil or an imitation of gold leaf. This they burn before the idol, at the grave, and in the temple, and they believe it is transmuted into pure silver which passes through the smoke into the next world, and in such a form as to be used by the spirits of the dead. They also provide clothes and other articles made of paper, which when burned is transferred to their friends in the unseen world. Houses, bridges, cooking utensils and servants, all made of paper and straw, with the name of the party for whom they are intended stamped upon them as well as the name of the donor, and while the donor is bowing and prostrating himself before these articles, fire is applied and all consumed. Before sending their offerings are drawn up and signed, in the presence of witnesses, stipulating that this property, on its arrival in Hades, shall be duly made over to the individuals specified in the agreement. Thus the poor heathen in their blindness "make a covenant with the grave." Provisions of rice, fruit and vegetables are provided, and the vessels tempting them appear to be overflowing; but, when examined closely, the bottom of each vessel is found filled with paper, leaves or straw.

As soon as the spirits of the departed have taken all they wish, the rabble, who have been spectators, rush in and take what is left. In this way the heathen feed, pay and devote the spirits of their departed friends and relations. These people, who are supposed to be civilized and learned, often display absurdity in their religious practices which children in our own Christian land would not be guilty of. There is nothing vile nor cruel in their religious observances such as is found in India; but a childishness which we would hardly have looked for among the Chinese who, in all the daily battles of life, manifest such shrewdness and intelligence. How true that passage of God's word is: "The world by wisdom knew not God."

One of the favorite doctrines of Buddha is, that all things originated in nothing and must revert to nothing. Hewn with the worshippers of Buddha annihilation is the summit of bliss, and nirvana and nonentity the grand ultimate aim of all who worship Buddha. Those who are devoted to the worship of Buddha are not supposed to have any joys or sorrows, hopes or fears, sense or emotion, and are to live without speaking, looking, hearing or feeling, until they enter this state of annihilation. Buddha is represented as nothing, and in order to rise to a perfect state of happiness, those who worship him must be gradually absorbed into nothing. One of the emperors of the present dynasty styled Buddhist priests "the drones of society," and I am sure he could not have given them a more appropriate name. They are from the lowest grade of society, and are hated by the educated class. Their degraded state, and the dilapidated state of the temples, would naturally lead us to conclude the speedy destruction of the whole system, and this should encourage all Christians to make every effort to send them the gospel of Christ.

As I have before said, the religious ceremonies of Buddhists are very much like those of the Roman Catholics. The celibacy, the shorn head, professed poverty, seclusion in temples, and their peculiar style of dress. The use of relics in their worship; their belief in purgatory, with the possibility of praying souls out of its fires; the offering up of prayers in a strange language, with their incessant repetitions; their pretending to work miracles; the similarity of their altar pieces, and the very title of some of their gods and goddesses. The Buddhists talk about the retributions of a future life, and they profess to exercise great compassion both toward man and beast. Yet, in denying a first principle and a last end; in contradicting the existence of an ever-living God, and denying eternal retribution; in deriving all things from nothing, and again making all things revert to nothing, and thus by these means obtain perfect happiness; by such reasoning the people of China have been deluded, and have been left in total spiritual darkness and utter confusion, without any hope of escape.

Confucianism is a system of morality, Laouism is a system of materialism, and Buddhism a system of metaphysics. These three religions resemble each other in their atheism. The Confucianists derive their diagrams or mystical numbers from the extreme point or nullity. The Laouists talk of myriads of concentrations producing emptiness, and the Buddhist system is founded on nonentity. No first cause characterizes either of these sects, and a supreme or self-existent God is not recognized by either. "Gods many and lords many" are adopted by all. The heathen discovers a god in everything, and yet none are eternal. Their temples, houses, streets, roads, hills, rivers, boats, carriages and ships are all full of these imaginary gods, and many of them are visible. Every room, niche, corner, door and window is covered with charms, amulets, and emblems of idolatry; so that while they acknowledge no good, their gods are innumerable, and they find it their greatest burthen to support and worship them.

As I said before, the followers of Laontze are very superstitious. They are supposed to have intercourse with and control over demons. The high priest is thought to be immortal and ruler over hades. In the absence of his handwriting, others of the fraternity issue charms, and large sums of money are realized by the sale of these strange looking scratchings upon small bits of yellow paper. They persuade the people that evil spirits are not to be terrified by the charms issued last year, and that new ones must be made each year. They look upon death as peculiary unclean, and that it brings with it many evil influences which can only be expelled by sacrifices and the prayers of the priests. Very often people will expel a sick person from their house, lest they die there and bring misfortune into the family. Death is also attended with great expense, for the priests will not expel a ghost from any house without being well paid for it. On the third day of the third moon the priests of this sect pass over burning charcoal with bare feet, for by this action they think they please their gods and receive power to overcome all evil spirits. Many are injured by the fire, but they pretend not to be harmed. They believe in persons being possessed with evil spirits, and that through them they can communicate with the spirits of the dead. A priest, in order to induce the spirit to take possession of the body of a man, will go through various motions, occasionally striking the floor with a sword. He then approaches a person who is sitting in a very thoughtful mood, blows a horn over his head, rings a bell, and goes through many strange motions of the body, until the man begins to move his fingers, head and arms, then his knees, legs and whole body is set in motion until worked into a great excitement, and he becomes like a madman. Just as he is about to fall he is caught by those standing near, and they listen attentively to what he has to say. They do this when one is ill, and they wish to procure some infallible remedy. On one occasion three skeins of thread and half an ounce of carpenter's chips were to be boiled down in a pint of water, and a tea-cup full given occasionally. After making this known, the man sank down in a swoon and was carried out.

They worship many imaginary incarnations of eternal reason and rulers in the invisible world. Among them are the "three pure ones," the "pearly emperor and supreme ruler," the god of the north, and the god of fire, with genii and inferior gods without number.

Will write again in a few days and tell you something about the introduction of Christianity into China.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, April 12, 1882.

Greeting.

BY JOSEPH B. FOOTRELL, D. D.

MR. EDITOR: Bishop Keener was with me at Bowling Green after the General Conference, having come up on Saturday, and having gone out ten miles over one of the roughest roads in Kentucky to fill an engagement with my presiding elder in the presidency of our District Conference. The Bishop came into town on Sunday afternoon, and at night, to a full house, preached on "The light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ," as "God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness, hath shined into our hearts, to give it." Weary and fagged out, physically, as was the Bishop, his sentences were like pile-driving, sending down deeper and deeper the protective doctrines, precepts, and maxims of revelation into conviction of the soul. Emerson said Tom Carlyle's conversation reminded him of the strokes of a trip-hammer with an eolian attachment. The poetical in the nature of Bishop Keener, in attachment with a marvelous philosophical and logical blending of mind, is similar to this. The day and two nights we had him as guest at the parsonage was largely made up, or filled up, with talk that indemnifies for a great deal of the dodge off from perpendicular talk by others who seem to substitute caution for prudence. Commend me to the man who confronts me, and who fears not to be confronted—the man who fully invests himself in his word, and, by his impulsive utterance, invites me to a partnership. It is only thus we experience reciprocal abatements and pass into qualified assurance of what is to us truth and life. How delightful would it be for this home to be smitten by each of our Bishops in turn. The Bishop told me you would likely be chosen to edit the ADVOCATE, and these lines are to welcome you, most heartily, to the honored tripod from which three have been taken down. Is this treason? Well, make the least, not the most of it. The election of Dr. Granberry to the work of Bishop, as compared to what he was doing in his ministry at Vanderbilt, seems to me to be as if one were to pull up an apple-tree from an orchard and transplant it among the oaks and chestnut trees of the forest. I observed when I made this criticism at Nashville a shadow passed athwart some brows, as though there was a lurking element of treason therein. But it may be yet discovered that some things are exaggerated in this world, and that others are minified or parvified, proportionately, if this latter be the better word. Parvens. We must take blessings with encumbrances ever. Our episcopacy is a blessing. But in order to its integrity, in order to its symmetry, that which renders it mechanical and automatic in its working hath need to be eliminated. I mean the pastoral limitation law, from operation of which a sufficient number of the brotherhood is exempt, so that at capital points they take root and grow to the measure requisite for episcopal placement finally. What an emasculation of ministerial manhood by operation of the arbitrary limitation, by which there is invited and fostered an endless twaddle of personal criticism of the ministers of the Lord Jesus. But it is as well to endeavor by whistling to have a milepost dance a hornpipe as to get an average churchman to hear you in opposition to the fetish of his people, however hungry his ear may be to catch the slightest criticism of the grotesque absurdities of other orders. Such as have honored the itinerant law by the observance, more than by a breach thereof, are clearest in their views of the mighty hindrance of arbitrary displacement to the solidarity and solidification of our beloved Methodism. With our genial theology we ought to have swept Calvinistic obstructions from the land. But it is God's world, and we will not fret. Possibly there is developing in the matrix of our Methodist Zion the church of the future that will sweep past us, despite all the ugly words we may hurl at it, quite as far as Methodism passed to the van despite the rocks thrown at Wesley by "the church." Rotten eggs at "cranky" heads then. Rotten words at the names of "cranks" now and in the near future? The ear of the public is quick to catch the notes of the bird of paradise. The moles, and bats, and owls prefer a concert of frogs. Puddles are quite as prolific of tadpoles, on their way to the dignity of reverent frogships, as running streams are with fishes to make alive the wave! No, not quite! Yet are they more easily taken, and are more available to statistics. God has wonderfully typed all things. There may be actual uses, for aught I know, that instilles the making of ticks and fleas, of tadpoles and frogs, yea, and of snakes also. But one thing we do not know: the real value of all these is found in their typical significence. They enable us in discourse of philosophical thought to flash light all along the line by varied simile, type and comparison. Leave it to one of us, and we would say that there are many people who ought never to have been. But here they are, almost in the likeness of human beings, and we have no right to call them owls, or frogs or asses, be their solemn dignity what it may. Grace enables us to cultivate our respectfulness, and it is "amazing grace" that qualifies us to "honor all men." I find it easy to "love the brotherhood." That is abstract. A brother is in the concrete! One is food: Another is fertilizer. Bury the thought of him at the root of purposed, perfect patience, and it will be as the dead rat at the root of my cherry tree just out there. That is the way to eat dead rats: pass them through the economy of nature into cherries, grapes and peaches. Hath not grace an economy as perfect as is that of motherly nature? What vile thing may she not, does she not, work up into flowers whose fragrance and odor are triumphs? It may, after all, transpire that God hath a method of love more ample, more comprehending, and more attestive of sufficiency than the philosophy of any of us can in time allow; and it were well for the wisest and the most authoritative to allow for a widening and a sweetening, ever by means of much (that we would have otherwise), rather than despite therof.

It was painful to meet some one who had not grown an ounce or an inch in twenty years. Some people seem to be well pickled; others well preserved. Then, there is a kind of odorless dry-rot. And will you please to tell me just what there is not? It may be that in the universe there is the embodiment of every possible conception of the Divine mind—phenomenal expression thereof. A frown upon the brow of nature, or upon human brow, hath honest expression. A smile hath its own sweet power. But that hybrid!—that cross between a frown and a smile! A grin! Why was it possible for the human face even to be susceptible of that distortion?—for the human soul ever to realize that whereof the grin is exponential? Is there not a beyond wherein all these are to disappear? And may not our experiences through all of these be qualification for the fruition of life and beauty and communion? "The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain." "The creature was made subject to vanity by reason of One who knoweth well what he doeth."

BOWLING GREEN, KY.

Brother Lafferty at the General Conference.

The following excerpts from the editorial correspondence of the Richmond Christian Advocate will spice our General Conference reading:

The hospitality of Nashville was without stint. The entertainment of three hundred delegates for nearly a month at tables that resembled a daily banquet cost a large sum. This session taxed the generous Methodists in that city from twenty to forty thousand dollars. The General Conference will never receive a more profuse and hearty welcome. I have suffered many things in the way of initial gout at certain festal displays on mahogony in Virginia; but a week at Fite's, in Nashville, would have developed calcareous formations in every joint. Haygood had to dine at an interior tavern occasionally to assuage himself. Judge Whitworth's dishes would have been his death. That ex- (extraordinary) Bishop, after a chief meal at Judge East's, was more than ever bent on escape from that winding sheet to usefulness—a banquet cloth. It was said that a dinner at Dr. Young's was like a visit to the land of the Lotus—a wish to linger there forever.

There was a strong vote to hold the next session of the Conference in Nashville—in fact, for evermore.

There came to me a good fortune. I attended the Conference during the day. In the afternoon I took my siesta from the Vanderbilt grounds, looking down on the city from this breezy and leavy plateau. "Galus, my host," was a familiar of other days—Mr. Leech, the Secretary of the Faculty. There is a certain and "eternal fitness" that the same person who held confidential relations to Gen. Robert E. Lee at Lexington should serve in a kindred office to the Bismarck of the Church at Nashville. The great bishop and the captain had much in common. The church and the army had like and mighty spirits.

I had witnessed one afternoon the excitement and fever of an election for Bishops. I knew no better time, when dusk came on, to turn to something beyond and better. Prof. Humphreys, of the Vanderbilt, accompanied me to the observatory, and turned the glass towards the heavens. The stars were calm and unruffled by the count of tellers. The great spaces seemed room enough for us all without jostling. The clapping of hands as the candidates reached the goal sounded so strangely now when the eye was scanning the measureless distances where the eternal silences reign, and the vast spheres that never knew there was an earth. How those majestic orbs and their mute grandeur rebuke our little ambitions!

There were surprises when the vote for Bishops and the great offices was called out. The face of one man, who had fixed his heart upon a "connectional" honor, I shall never forget. It was the image of despair. The crack of doom could not have so stunned him. At the White Sulphur I once saw twenty toy-balloons let go together, and when they were bounding upward towards the empyrean a fellow fired both barrels of a shot-gun at them. The collapse was sudden and complete. I sat at dinner and heard one of the wilted men attempt to explain why he bursted so soon in his flight. It was pitiful. How greater and higher was Haygood obeying a superior duty!

There was absence of the usual fraternal and oratorical demonstrations. Letters were sent in place of delegates. This was well. The subject has been worn to a frazzle. Surely Methodists ought to love and respect each other without these periodical platitudes on brotherliness. It is high time we begin to work together.

While the Conference was sitting in the lecture-room the members of the Woman's Missionary Society were in session in the auditorium. I ventured a few moments among these blessed bonnets. I have had some experience with deliberate bodies. Business men in council are the smoothest assembly in the world. The old politicians come next preachers next, and women last. The saints in ribbons, now and then, would get into a tangle and trouble. Dr. Young was a sort of extempore chaplain, and went up to lead in prayer, till the sisters were in composure. It was clear that legislation is not the forte of the gentler sex. I must say that the company of devout women, day by day, in McKendree, was the most beautiful vision I had at the General Conference. There were many faces there that shone with the mellow radiance of life-long piety and good works. I thank God I saw them.

The Methodist Church is not careful of "days and new moons." Dr. Kelley, in announcing Dr. Summers's death, said it was on Ascension Day. Bishop Keener proceeded, as "an appropriate subject," to preach on the Ascension. It was not even the week of Ascension!

A Sunday-school teacher was endeavoring to impress upon her class the minuteness with which Providence watches over us, and quoted the text which says that the very hairs of our heads are numbered. 'Did you say, teacher, that the hairs of my head were all numbered?' asked a sharp little fellow in the class. 'Yes, my dear,' she replied. 'Well, then,' said he, pulling out a hair and presenting it, 'what's the number of that one?'"

"A little boy who had committed a fault was punished, and then sent to his room to ask forgiveness of God. His offense was that he had got into a passion. Anxious to hear what his prayer would be, his mother followed him to the door of his room, where she heard him in lisping accents asking the Lord to make him a better boy, so that he would never be angry again; and then, with child-like simplicity, he added: 'And, Lord, make ma's temper better, too.'"

"'Papa, can I eat a little currant tart?' said a little girl one day at dinner. 'No, my child,' he replied, 'I have already said you have had enough.' 'Well, then, papa, why do we so often sing that favorite hymn of yours, where it is said, 'Feed me till I want no more?' inquired she."

"A little fellow wanted his parents to take him to church with them. They said he must wait until he was older. 'Well' was the shrewd suggestion, in response, 'you'd better take me now; for when I get bigger I may not want to go.'"

"'Look here, my boy,' said a stern parent, 'you are telling me a falsehood. I can read it in your face.' 'Why, pa, you can't read a line without your spectacles,' was the matter of fact rejoinder."

"A little girl having been reproached with disobedience, and breaking the commandments of God, sighed, and said to her mother, 'O, mamma, those commandments break awfully easy.'"

Good Words.

The love of Christ is deep as well as bright
He leaned down so low to raise so high.
None lie so low, save those who will not heed,
But in the darkness they may find his hand,
And hear the calm, profound, pathetic voice,
Come unto me. Deep was Gethsemane,
And Calvary dark; did I not love thee? Come.

CHARLES KINGSLEY ON PRAYER. Knowing and believing a great deal of the advanced physical science of Darwin's school, I still can say I do not believe in the existence of law. "Laws of nature," "laws impressed," or "properties impressed on matter," are to me, after analysis of their meaning, mere jargon. Nothing exists but will. All physical laws and phenomena are but the manifestations of that will—one orderly, utterly wise, utterly benevolent. In Him, "the Father," I can trust, in spite of the horrible things I see, in spite of the fact that my own prayers are not answered. I believe that he makes all things work together for the good of the human race, and of me, among the rest, as long as I obey his will. I believe that he will answer my prayer, not according to the letter, but according to the spirit of it; that if I desire good, I shall find good, though not the good which I long for. And "law," and "necessity" I look upon as phantoms of my own imagination, always ready to reappear, but always certain, likewise, to vanish again before one sound blow of careful logic or of practical life.

—How is it going to happen that ministers shall be found preaching a more vital kind of sermon? By the removal of the causes which lead them to prepare the less vital kind. And those causes may be summed up in this: a lack of nearness to Christ and to their brother, and of spiritual contact with their Lord and with their neighbor. Give either of these, and it will help the other. Give both, and the sermons will be vital.

—Dr. Guthrie, the famous Scotch preacher, remarked, in advanced life: "They say I am growing old because my hair is silvered and there are crow's feet on my forehead, and my step is not so firm and elastic as of yore. But they are mistaken. That is not I. The brow is wrinkled, but the brow is not I. This is the house in which I live. But I am young, younger than ever I was before."

—"There is no greater mistake," said Dr. Bushnell, "than to suppose that Christians can impress the world by agreeing with it. No; it is not conformity that we want; it is not being able to beat the world in its own way; but it is to stand apart and above it, and to produce the impression of a holy and separate life—this only can give a true Christian power."

—Religion is as necessary to reason as reason is to religion; the one can not exist without the other. A reasoning being would lose his reason in attempting to account for the phenomena of nature, had he not a Supreme Being to refer to. If there had been no God, mankind would have been obliged to imagine one.—Washington.

—Like flakes of snow that fall seemingly unperceived upon the earth, the seemingly unimportant events of life succeed one another. As the snow gathers together, so are our habits formed. No single flake that is added to the pile produces a sensible change: no single action creates, however it may exhibit a man's character.—Jeremy Taylor.

—Endeavor to be always patient of the faults and imperfections of others; for thou hast many faults and imperfections of thy own, that require a reciprocation of forbearance. If thou art not able to make thyself that which thou wishest to be, how canst thou expect to mold another in conformity to thy will?—Thomas a Kempis.

—As the ice upon the mountains, when the warm breath of the summer sun breathes upon it, melts, and divides into drops, each of which reflects an image of the sun; so life, on the smile of God's love, divides itself into separate forms, each bearing in it and reflecting an image of God's love.—H. W. Longfellow.

—Thus a certain wise man replied to one, who said, "Such and such thoughts have come into my mind," by saying, "Let them go again." And another wise oracle said, "Thou canst not prevent the birds from flying above thy head, but thou canst prevent their building their nests in thy hair."—Martin Luther.

—No man truly prays against sin who does not pray against temptation. No man truly hates sin who does not hate temptation, when known as temptation. To guard against temptation is the supreme wisdom; and Christ puts that wisdom into the prayer he framed for his people.—Christian Index.

—It is possible to be too submissive. Submissiveness may degenerate into spinelessness. We ought to be unmeasurably sure that the ills that threaten us are coming upon us by the will of God before we submit to them.—Washington Gladden.

—The best name by which we can think of God is Father. It is a loving, deep, sweet, heart-touching name; for the name of father, is in its nature, full of inborn sweetness and comfort.—Martin Luther.

THOMAS O. SUMMERS, D. D., LL. D.

BY C. G. M.

"Let us talk about heaven."

Now fit the subject and the place,
To talk of heaven and God's free grace,
To prize the Scriptures true,
I've lived my threescore years and ten,
I've preached the gospel unto men,
The things that made me new.

I feel the power of saving grace
While sinking now in death's embrace
My task on earth is done.
I'll talk of heaven, oh! glorious place,
Where I shall see my Saviour's face,
And worship at his throne.

Even now I see his grand throne shine!
What glorious prospects, bathed in light,
Stand out on every hand!
Could I tell you, dear Fitzgerald,
What splendid things I now behold,
You could not understand.

Eye hath not heard, nor ear beheld,
What now I hear and now behold,
For us God hath in store.
I stand upon Mount Pisgah, where
I see the landscapes "over there,"
Upon the other shore.

Oh! Doctor Summers, grand old man!
When shall we see thy like again,
To wear thy mantle here?
To take the place thou best filled,
And from them all such work distilled—
Oh! may the new appear.

The church is poorer far to-day,
Since Doctor Summers past away,
To make still richer heaven?
To take his place at God's right hand,
And with the blood-washed there to stand,
Who've had their sins forgiven.

ATLANTA, ALA., June 1, 1882.

Notes and Incidents from Rambles About London.

These Exeter Hall May meetings are held on a large scale, and all large societies try to secure at least one of their meetings in that vast and equally celebrated audience-room. But as all can not be thus accommodated, many of these are held in April and in other places. The Wesleyans held their first opening meeting, April 27, in the Wesleyan Centenary Mission Hall. Another on Saturday, in Exeter Hall, with a breakfast; but the greatest day of all was May 1, in Exeter Hall. The president of the Conference, Mr. Osborne, was to preach the missionary sermon at the opening meeting on Thursday, at eleven. Here was a query. I had promised to go to Mr. Parker's, at the temple, at twelve. I went to the Mission Hall, and remained forty-five minutes, and expected to hear the text at least, and allow myself ten minutes to reach the temple. But, alas! this long-drawn litany, liturgy, or what they call it, had to be gone through with—a dry, unwelcomed performance certainly. Although I waited patiently, or perhaps otherwise, the long forty-five minutes, but no text yet and no telling when there would be. So I escaped further penalty, and heard a grand sermon from that truly great man at the temple. The Methodist papers are dealing out some hard and heavy blows against this almost intolerable burlesque liturgy doings as it is used in the London Methodist Chapels. It seems to kill all spirituality wherever it is used, and how can it be otherwise. One of these writers calls it the scratches of Methodism. Wesley has said that no one can read and pray at the same time. A great many will not come until this dried up, formal ceremony is over. It makes a great division in London Methodism. The eager, hungering multitude, that desire the simple truth, have no sympathy or use for it, as may be seen by the pressing thousands that every Sunday go to hear Spurgeon and crowd the Salvation Army rooms. I went to hear Newman Hall, and I must say I was very much disappointed. I thought it strange at first that the church was not near full, and the architect who planned the building must certainly have studied to make it one of the worst sounding places in the world, and succeeded to perfection. The inside finish is very much after the same order of Dr. Clapp's Church, corner St. Charles and Julia streets, which, for sound, is well known to be beyond all patient endurance. Here, too, the long-drawn Sing Sing litany torture is performed. I can not conceive what sort of a spiritual sermon can be expected from a preacher who has to go into three pulpits to say his prayers, and then quite a ceremony over changing his light summer dress for a black one, and his sermon written and mostly read. His name as a popular preacher does not rank very high in London.

Exeter Hall, on Monday, May 1, was crowded long before the appointed hour for the anniversary of the Wesleyan Missionary Society, where everyone is admitted by free tickets, obtained at the Centenary Mission Rooms. I had secured one some days before, and was there an hour before the time, but it was difficult to get admittance. There were many returned missionary speakers present from many distant fields. The meeting continued from eleven till near five. There were some fine telling speeches. How strangely this sort of wild hand-clapping sounds to a visitor, among a gathering of thousands, and is but too evidently often started by one or two inconsiderate ones, and then followed up by the crowd, as if it were a sort of side-way exercise that must be put through, while very many are greatly puzzled to see what was said to bring it forth. It looks very much, at some meetings I have attended, as if the speaker could make a convenient pause at times, and look for it, and there is always some ready to begin it. There are times when a proper demonstration may be very proper, but otherwise it is a great annoyance. The speakers report good progress in many places. They have at last, after years of severe trial, found an open door among the Coreans. I shall say but little of the many able speeches, as you will read them in the London Methodist papers. Particular mention was made of Ceylon as a glorious result of Dr. Coke's first mission to India in 1813. Although he died on the way, yet the work went on. The speaker said that the native churches of Ceylon were beautiful examples of successful planting. They have become rooted in the soil. They grow and flourish without foreign support, and bring forth much fruit unto God. They have a vigorous membership and a faithful native ministry, and carry out an enthusiastic principle of self-extension. They have 3,800 members and probationers, and 16,000 children in their various mission schools.

The missionary collections for the present year is on a very extensive scale, while it appears the appropriations have been much more extensive by going $100,000 in debt. This is to be regretted; but the ever-expanding field and the increasing demand seemed to make it a necessity. Mr. McArthur, ex-Lord Mayor, is a very active, zealous worker, and liberal withal. He said I hold a paper in my hand with the written statement that many would far more willingly give for aggressive work than for the payment of the debt, and that there is $100,000 ready for aggressive purposes, but is only available when the debt is paid. Mr. Wm. Arthur, the tongue of fire man, then spoke, and he certainly can say more in a few words than any other man I have seen. Some one said just now he would rather pay for aggressive work than pay for the debt. That is what we have been telling the committee. I hold that the business of a committee is not to incur debt, but to properly lay out the money intrusted to them. But still, after all, this debt is only aggression anticipated. They have been aggressing, and they did aggressive work before the time; that is all. It was every bit of it aggressive work; the whole debt was incurred through aggression. The proposed amount was quickly raised, and the audience was called upon to sing the doxology. The next most important gathering at Exeter Hall was the British and Foreign Bible Society. It would seem a pity that public buildings were not made large enough to contain all who wish to attend, without this admittance by free tickets. But they are not, and, if they were, they could not hear the speakers. So I suppose there is no help for it. Lord Shaftsbury presided; wonderful man. How many long years he has been full of all good works! It is not too much to say that no other name in London stands so high as that of Lord Shaftsbury; first and foremost in everything for the advancement of true Christianity. He seems ready for every call, for every cause, and for every denomination, and has or is to preside over thirteen of these Exeter Hall meetings, and, although quite advanced in years, his head is not much gray, and bids fair to live and work for many years to lead on the conquering host to greater conquest. I have often been accompanied in my London rambles by a Methodist friend; yea, more; a nephew, who very much in place just now happens to be a Methodist, and in passing old Marylebone Church, which has not been used since 1815, and in looking through the iron railings, among many ancient tombs, there stood an obelisk monument over Charles Wesley's grave, in which is buried his wife and one son, with their names, dates and ages, also some beautiful verses of his own poetic genius. Charles Wesley, that almost angelic man, would not consent to be buried at City Road Chapel, because it had not been consecrated; and yet who shall say that it is not the most consecrated spot on earth. The monument is in good preservation, and kept so by the preachers of the British Conference. My photo friend proposed to come up some day and take a picture of the monument, and also the front of City Road Chapel. I, of course, quickly agreed to this. It has been done, and a nice package made up for New Orleans. Charles Wesley lived near this place for many years, in Cavendish street. He was so much respected in the neighborhood that when the authorities made some changes and improvements in the streets they, in respect for him, called it Wesley street, and the name is marked very plain on the wall on both sides of the street. But on our way up here from the city, in passing up a narrow street, I saw Moravian Chapel marked on the entrance of an alley about eight feet wide. I looked about for the name of the street which we had come, and, without thinking of such a thing, here we were close to Wesley's little Moravian Chapel, 33 Fetter Lane.

After being admitted through a sort of private entrance, and then through a long passage, a door opened into the chapel, very small, but kept in nice order, and used for regular worship, just as it was when Wesley preached in it, and met good old Peter Bohler there, one hundred and forty years ago. A gentleman directed me through the long passage, and said he was engaged just then, and I could look around as long as I desired; but after awhile he came and gave me many items about the Moravian brethren. He said they were not a greater number now than in Wesley's time, and perhaps not so many. They had extended mission fields abroad years ago, but not so much now. Peter Bohler, Wesley's great spiritual instructor, preached his last sermon in this little chapel forty years after his first acquaintance with Wesley, who was at that time struggling through the darkness into the light, and of whom Bohler wrote: John Wesley is a good-natured man; he knew he did not properly believe in the Saviour, and was willing to be taught. His brother, Charles, is at present very much distressed in his mind, but does not know how he shall begin to be acquainted with the Saviour. Our way of believing in a present Saviour looks so easy to Englishmen that they can not reconcile themselves to it. If it were more intricate they would sooner find their way into it. Forty years later Bohler returned from America, and preached again in his little chapel; but seven days after he died suddenly, while sitting in his chair, and was buried at Chelsad. An unpretending stone reads: "Peter Bohler, a Bishop of the United Fratrum, departed April 27, 1775, aged sixty-two."

Last Sunday morning, while on my way to Spurgeon's Chapel, having an hour to spare, and passing along Lombard street, I went into All Hallow's Church. I asked an old lady present if John Wesley ever preached there. Yes; it was in that pulpit he preached his first extempore sermon, and I can show it to you as a preserved record of the church. I went into the pulpit, and stood on the same spot where that matchless man seemed to put a veto forever on all sermon reading. She took me to another part, and there, hanging on the wall in a glass frame, it reads that Mr. John Wesley preached in this church on the last Sunday in 1783, and, while putting on his gown in the vestry, said to one present: I remember preaching here fifty years ago, and as I was going up the pulpit stairs I discovered I had come without a sermon. I returned to the vestry under much confusion and agitation. A woman standing near noticed my concern, and said: Pray, sir, what is the matter? I said: I have not brought a sermon with me. She put her hand on my shoulder and said: Is that all? Can not you trust God for one sermon. It had such an effect on me that I went into the pulpit and preached extempore, with great freedom to myself and acceptance to the people, and have never since taken a written sermon into the pulpit. Near the altar are two old English Bibles, bearing date of 1618, spread open and kept in a glass case. They were torn away from the pillar where they were chained while the old church was on fire, it being one of the eighty-nine that was burned in the great fire of 1666, and the same chain is still fastened to the Bible, and hangs down over the open leaf; and near to this is the tomb of Miles Coverdale, the first translator of the whole Bible into English, in 1535.

Colportage Sketches—No. 28.

BY A. M. JONES.

THE MAN DANCE.

It was a July day, 1881, and excessively warm. While Charley, hot and tired from hours of severe travel over rocks, hills, and through small fertile valleys, stood in a beautiful, limpid, mountain stream, quenching his thirst, faint, feeble strains of music were heard in the distance. Ascending the bank, making a turn in the road, and passing a cluster of undergrowth, the enigma was explained, and a scene for an artist spread out before me. Wagons, buggies, oxen, mules, horses, colts, dogs, and people, old and young, were arrayed in the style of a grand modern pic-nic. The first thing that attracted my attention was the dance, which seemed to be in full blast. The drive, of a hundred yards, gave a little time for reflection, and I resolved, if not repulsed, to say something to the thoughtless multitude of the God whom I serve, and exhibit before them a few copies of the Bible. Stopping just before coming to the crowd, I asked a young man the privilege of an introduction to the leaders of the occasion. Soon a gentleman in middle life and an old man of at least seventy summers approached my buggy, and expressed themselves as being glad to see me. After a few pleasant, commonplace remarks, I explained the nature of my work, and asked the favor of making a Bible speech of ten minutes, and showing my books. To this they readily consented, and returned to publish what was going to take place. By this time every eye, except those of the dancers, was turned upon me. I rested and waited for the set to close, but the mind and the eyes were by no means unemployed. It was a bran dance, and the first I ever had the misfortune to witness. Where the appellation came from, whether appropriate or not, when and by whom first applied to the violent exercise of dancing in the woods, I do not know. By considerable labor the plot of ground had been made smooth and level, freed from rocks and roots, but was destitute of either sawdust or bran. The dancers danced upon the naked dirt, without anything to protect their delicate feet and snow-white skirts from the dust, which, so very dry, rose at the least movement, and mounted higher and still higher at every jump. While looking upon that scene, disgusting to the extreme, men and women laboring together in the performance of such violent gesticulations, amidst a fog of dust, and under heat to the pressure of ninety-nine degrees, the thought occurred to my mind that the washer-women, for purifying those clothes the next week, ought to have double wages. It was, I suppose, a square dance, or at least the dancers, the men and women, danced square up to each other, face to face, joined hands, turned, backed, wheeled, and made for each other again. All these various movements, especially on the part of some, were accompanied by the most violent exertions. When the music ceased, and they began to apply both handkerchiefs and fans, their red faces, profusely covered with perspiration and dust, presented more of a sad than laughable picture. What complete nonsense and folly! Having been formally introduced, I occupied ten minutes of their precious time in explaining my mission, exhibiting the Bibles, urging upon them the necessity of each one owning a copy, and the importance of daily reading the sacred Scriptures. I have before me to-day the youth and beauty, the age and wisdom of this community, engaged in a scene of revelry and mirth. The Bible, the word of God, the book of books, which I hold in my hand, will teach you a more excellent way. It will impart to you a higher, holier, nobler, purer and more lasting pleasure than that of dancing between these two hills in an atmosphere so still that there is not a leaf moving in the forest, and heat so intense that the thermometer, at this hour, is not less than ninety-nine degrees. I am a Methodist preacher, and you never saw one who was not opposed to dancing. If you will dance, however, in this terrible heat, dance on, but in my opinion the young man who has no Bible is not even a fit dancing companion. If I were a marrying man that lady who does not appreciate the Bible high enough to have a copy of her own would never be led to the hymenial altar by me. A word to young ladies, and I have done. I have found almost four thousand homes destitute of the word of life. My advice is never marry a man, if twenty-two years old, who does not have a Bible. He may be good-looking, clever and industrious, but the very fact of having no Bible indicates some deficiency of character. Such a man may keep you in some little hut for twenty years, and never brighten your home by bringing into it a copy of the sacred Scriptures. Then to wed such a one, you had better be an old maid, and preserve the state of "single blessedness" all your life. Having concluded my speech, and disposed of a half dozen or more copies, I bid them adieu. Before out of sight the music began again, and another set was on the dirt. Some good may have been accomplished by that day's work. I must not fail to inform the reader that the fiddler was a woman, and the young men made up a purse and presented her a Bible worth thirty cents.

Having related the above adventure to a young gentleman, some weeks afterward, he said:

"I dance, but would not, under any circumstances, engage in an indecent scene like that."

"Why not? Dancing is done up."

"It does not look well to dance in the woods, and the best class of young ladies wont do it. Besides that, the ground is not suitable for the round dance, and I have but little use for the square dance any way."

"Why don't you like the square dance?"

"It is so lame and tasteless."

"I have often heard of the round dance, but never saw it performed. Will you explain the difference?"

"In the square dance you never touch the lady at all, except her hand occasionally, but in the round dance you are in close contact with her all the time. A man having once danced the round dance will never take pleasure in the square dance again. I sometimes dance the square dance now, but it is always dull and without animation. I would not give a cent for it."

"Do you like the round dance?"

"Yes; could dance it all night."

"I mean no harm by the question, but will you be so kind as to tell me the position of the parties while engaged in this pleasant exercise?"

"I have no objection to doing so, but I know what you will say. You preachers all think such as that a great sin. I place my arm around the lady's waist, she her's around mine, and with her head, or the side of her face, against my bosom, we, keeping time to the music, go round and round. This is about the best description I can give."

"It seems to me that is more of a hug than a dance."

"No, sir, there's no hug about it."

"See here; tell me the truth. When a young man has a lady in that position is he not tempted to give her a slight pressure?"

"That is altogether owing to his partner. If she is fully initiated, and an old hand at it, she will not object. But if she is just learning the round dance he had better be prudent. When ladies become accustomed to the round dance they enjoy it as much as men."

"Honestly, do you think it proper for men and women to dance together in such style?"

"I don't know as to that, but you will never break it up. Men will dance the round dance as long as they can get ladies to dance with them."

"In all candor, if you have told me the truth, and I suppose you have, this abominable dance ought to be stopped. It ought to be frowned upon by all good people, and discarded from every class of society. While human nature remains as it is now, if such dancing is practiced at all, it should be confined to married men and married women, and that every man should be strictly required to dance with his own wife. Old Simon was right. The revival meeting in the colored church had been going on for some time, and the excitement was intense. While Simon was shouting in one part of the room he glanced toward the altar, and saw Peter, the pastor of the church, in an ecstasy of joy, throw his arms around his wife, and heard him exclaim: 'Bless de Lord; ligion makes us so happy.' Seeing his life companion in the arms of another, he made his way, as best he could, through the promiscuous crowd, and, with some little energy, placed his hand upon the pastor's shoulder, and rather sharply said: 'Brudder Peter, Brudder Peter, in dis meetin' let ebry man hug his own wife.' If people will dance such dances let every man dance with his own wife."

Of course I intended no offense by alluding to the colored revival, yet my young friend became excited, and with animation affirmed that there was no similarity whatever between the round dance and a set of ignorant, shouting negroes. I advised him to read "The Dance of Death."

Entire Consecration.

MR. EDITOR: That "man can not serve God and mammon" is an affirmation of Christ verified in the lives of a host of individuals who are members of his church—individuals who, for a season, ran well in the Christian race, but finally suffered the deceitfulness of riches to choke the good word of God in the heart, so that it brought no fruit to perfection. The mind was not in them which was in Christ Jesus, who walked not after the flesh, but after the spirit. Nor were they like-minded as the first Christians at Jerusalem, who fully consecrated themselves and their substance to Christ and his blessed cause. These Christians sold their possessions, and brought the price thereof and laid it at the apostles' feet, and distribution was made, according to their several necessities, so that no man lacked any thing. I do not say we should imitate the example of the early Christians, so far as the community of goods is concerned; yet it is obvious from this text, as well as other texts of Scripture, that our obligation to do good of every possible sort, and as far as possible to all men, is not a whit less than was theirs. "The poor," said Christ, "ye have with you always;" and as long as there is one poor son of Adam's race who actually needs our help, and we have it in our power to do him good, we are duty bound as Christians to minister unto his necessities. If we should fail in the performance of this plain scriptural duty, as a natural consequence, we suffer loss in our souls. There can be no wrong in gaining wealth, if in so doing we violate neither our conscience nor the word of God; yea, rather it is our duty to gain all we can in an honest way. Nor is it in saving what we have gained that we are found guilty before God; but rather in "laying up treasure." "Gain all you can, save all you can, and give all you can," is the direction of Mr. Wesley, which, if followed by those who profess to love Christ, would result in a more rapid spread of scriptural holiness over these lands.

"He who hath this world's good, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him?" Hence, we see, it is not the possession of this world's good that drives out the love of God from the soul; but a lack of compassion for the poor and needy, manifested in a failure on our part to contribute to their necessities when in our power to do so. Not only should we consecrate our substance, but also our time, talents and labors; yea, we should "present our bodies a living sacrifice to God." For this is indeed our reasonable service, since "we are not our own, but bought with a price," and it is our duty to "glorify God in our bodies and spirits which are his." I know there are many opposers of the doctrine of entire consecration, even in the church of God. The worldly-minded, the avaricious, the unself-denying church members would forever obliterate that important truth: "Without holiness no man shall see the Lord;" but it can not be done. Firm as a rock doth God's truth stand. "Heaven and earth shall pass away, but the word of the Lord endureth forever." This blessed doctrine, though opposed by many who possess very little either of the form or power of godliness, will meet with the hearty approval of all the pure in heart—"those who love the Lord Jesus Christ in sincerity." Our missionaries to foreign lands are now much more encouraged than ever before in their work and labor of love for the heathen. "The light of the glorious gospel of the Son of God" is penetrating the dark abodes of heathenism, and, from the "signs of the times," it would seem that this is indeed the "set time to favor Zion—the acceptable year of the Lord." The fields are now white unto harvest. The laborers are not in abundance, and the means wherewith to carry on this "good-begun work" are scant. If the church of God possessed the zeal which should characterize her under such circumstances, the lovers of Christ would rally around the cross of Calvary and pour into the Lord's treasury so much of the wealth which is now corrupting in the coffers of the rich, as would be adequate to the demands of the occasion. The church must possess such a zeal and devotion before the kingdoms of this world will become the kingdoms of our God and his Christ. The church that first comes up to this standard of entire consecration to Christ and his cause will be a "Goshen in the land of darkness." The great design of Christianity is to unite man to his neighbor, and all to God. Until this design is accomplished, there will be "wasting, violence and destruction within our borders." But when the love of God shall have been shed abroad in the hearts of all the members of his church, and they shall have consecrated themselves fully, with all they have and are, to him and his service, then shall appear the dawn of a new day upon a people whom the Lord delighteth to honor, "whose sun shall not go down, neither shall their moon withdraw itself; for the Lord shall be their everlasting light, and the days of their mourning shall be ended."

M. CLAYTON CALLAWAY.

BYRAM, MISS., May 19, 1882.

Visiting Committee.

The commencement exercises of the East Mississippi Female College, located at Meridian, began on the twenty-fourth, and closed on the night of the thirty-first ultimo.

In the absence of the chairman of the visiting committee, Rev. C. B. Galloway, we deem it our duty, as members of the committee, to report that, in our judgment, the entire exercises gave almost universal satisfaction. Without entering into details we would state, the gratification of the members of the Conference, and all who are interested in the prosperity of the college, that the examination of the classes gave evidence of thorough teaching, worthy of the arts of special cramming for such an occasion. And we are pleased to say that the scholars, especially the graduating class, gave evidence of severe training and unusual proficiency. The impromptu compositions of the class were exceedingly happy and gratifying.

We feel disposed to congratulate President Adkisson and professors on the proud distinction which they have attained; the high grade of excellence and the solid standard of learning which they have brought this Conference institution, and which will, ought to, attract a largely-increased patronage.

The commencement sermon by Rev. R. S. Woodward, presiding elder of the Vicksburg district, received the highest encomiums, and abounded in superior flights of eloquence.

The address before the literary societies by Maj. J. J. Hood, of Forrest, Miss., was pronounced by the best judges, as to thought and matter, to be vastly superior to addresses on such occasions.

The address before the alumnæ by the Rev. J. W. Harmon on "The beggars and beggaries of human life," showing up the foibles, as well as the mock power of woman for good, gave birth to comments pro and con.

The address of the Rev. Dr. E. Starr, of Selma, Ala., and member of the Alabama Conference, before the graduates won golden opinions from all classes, and, from the congratulations the eloquent speaker received, we should suppose that he was highly gratified with his reception among strangers.

The following degrees were conferred on the young ladies of the class of 1882:

Proficiency in the schools of grammar and belles lettres: Misses Mattie Massingale and Callie Morris, Lyman, Miss.

Proficiency in the degree of English literature: Misses Julia Rothwell and Nettie Collins, Meridian, Miss.; Misses Addie Miller and Clara Rushing, Walnut Grove, Miss.; Miss Allie Williams, Waynesboro, Miss.; Miss Sallie Lyle, Selma, Ala.

The Board of Trustees elected Rev. J. A. Godfrey, presiding elder of the Meridian district, to fill the vacancy in the board caused by the death of Rev. Dr. W. E. M. Linfield.

In conclusion, we congratulate the members of the Mississippi Annual Conference in having the supervision of a female college of such high grade, from whence may issue the daughters of preachers, laymen, and citizens generally with diplomas in hand, which are not only marks of distinction, but true standards of learning. An education that compasses both head and heart.

J. W. HARMON, for Committee.

FINDING ONE'S PLACE.—A good many people spend all their life hunting for the place in this world which they were intended to fill. They never settle down to anything with any sort of restful or contented feeling. What they are doing now is not by any means the work that is suited to their abilities. They have a sunny idea of a very noble life which they would like to reach, in which their powers would find free scope, and where they could make a very bright subject. But in their present position they cannot be much of anything, and there is little use to try. Their life is a humdrum and cross routine, and they can accomplish nothing really worthy and beautiful. So they go on discontented with their own lot and sighing for another; and while they sigh the years glide away and soon they will come to an end, to find they have missed every opportunity of doing anything worthy of an immortal being in the passage to eternity. The truth is, one's vocation is never some far-off possibility. It is always the simple round of duties that the passing hour brings. No day is commonplace if we only had eyes to see its splendor. There is no duty that comes to our hand but that brings to us the possibility of kingly service.—S. S. Times.

"O, REAPER OF LIFE'S HARVEST!"

O! reapers of life's harvest,
Why stand with rusted blade
Until the night draws round thee,
And day begins to fade?
Why stand ye idle, waiting
For reapers more to come?
The golden morn is passing—
Why sit ye idle, dumb?

Thrust in your sharpened sickle
And gather in the grain:
The night is fast approaching,
And soon will come again.
The Master calls for reapers,
And shall he call in vain?
Shall sheaves lie there ungathered?
And waste upon the plain?

Mount up the heights of wisdom
And crush each error low;
Keep back no words of knowledge
That human hearts shall know.
Be faithful to thy mission,
In service of thy Lord,
And then a golden chaplet
Shall be thy just reward.

Christians for the World—Not of it.

BY THEODORE L. CUYLER, D. D.

There was a prodigious significance in that intercessory prayer of our Lord on the eve of his sufferings: "I pray not that thou shouldest take them out of the world, but that thou shouldest keep them from the evil." The preservation of the world from moral ruin depended on the preservation of the church of God. "Ye are my witnesses," said the Master. The followers of Christ were to be his representatives: the visibility of Christ on earth was to be in the persons, in the acts and lives of those whom he had redeemed to be a peculiar people, zealous in good works. They were to be a wholesome leaven, penetrating the whole mass of humanity; they were to be the salt of the earth, preserving society from putrefaction by the savor of pure godliness. "Let your lights shine!" To "shine" means something more than the possession of a renewed heart or the enjoyment of an inward peace. It signifies the luminous reflection of Christ in character and conduct.

This world can not afford to have Christians degenerate or become demoralized. No city can afford to have its gas apparatus so damaged as to leave its streets in darkness; or its sanitary system so neglected as to leave it a prey to typhoid fevers or cholera. Divine grace is imparted in order to purify its possessor; and he, in turn, is to do his part to purify the community. If he fails, the community is the loser. We, who profess to call ourselves Christians, ought to know that the world expects us to stand for righteousness, and never to compromise; to act as disinfectants and to maintain our savor; to hold them up, and not to be dragged down by them. If all the Christianity in existence were to become bankrupt in character, even the scoffers themselves would be frightened. Sneer as they may, they expect us to stand by our colors. Our desertion of God and of the right would not only disgrace us, it would alarm even the ungodly. "If this world is so laden with the Christian religion," said the shrewd Franklin, "what would it be without it."

A personal incident will illustrate this secret reliance which the people of the world have upon the people of God. A young man, who was a professed Christian, was seeking to win the heart and hand of a young lady of wealth and fashion. His suit did not prosper, and one day she said to him: "you know that you are a church member, and I am a gay girl, very fond of what you call the pleasures of the world." This led him to suspect that his religion was the obstacle to his success in winning her consent to marry him. He accordingly applied to the officers of his church which must have been very loose in its joints for a release from his membership. They granted it. "Now," said he to her, when he met her again, "the barrier is removed. I have withdrawn from my church and I do not make any profession to be a Christian." The honest-hearted girl turned on him with disgust and horror, and said to him: "Mr——, you know that I have led a frivolous life, and I feel too weak to resist temptations. I determined that I never would marry any man who was not strong enough to stand firm himself and to hold me up also. I said what I did just to try you, and, if you have not principle enough to stick to your faith, you have not principle enough to be my husband. Let me never see you again."

Whether this incident be actual or not, the lesson it teaches is beyond dispute. The world expects Christians to stand by their colors; when we desert them, we not only dishonor our Master and ourselves, but we disappoint the world. Christ's followers never will save the world by secularizing itself or surrendering its strict principles of loyalty to whatever is right and pure and holy. Conformity to the world will never convert it. "Come out and be ye separate," saith the Lord, "and I touch no unclean thing." Even if the world could succeed in bringing the church down to its own standard of opinion and practice, it would only work its own moral destruction. It would extinguish the lighthouses which illuminate its own channels; it would destroy the spiritual heaven which Christ has ordained and prepared to save human society from corruption.

The demand of this time is not to lower the claims of God, but to elevate them; not to weaken the authority of divine inspiration, but to reinforce it; not to unloose obligations to Bible creeds, but to tighten; not to accommodate Christianity to the thought and fashion of the times, but to keep it stoutly and steadily up to its primitive standards. Not only must we stand fast to the faith once delivered to the saints, but to the practices enjoined in God's word. The church of this day is in no danger of excessive Puritanism. The peril is in the opposite direction. Conformity to the world is weakening the backbone of the church, thus far diminishing its power to lift the world up toward God. "If thou wouldst pull a man out of a pit," said quaint old Philip Henry, "thou must have a good foothold, or else he will pull thee in."

In no direction should Christians make their testimony more emphatic than in the line of righteous living. The sin of modern civilization has been well described as "making more of condition than it does of character." The very essence of Bible religion is to make character everything and conduct the test and evidence of character. By their fruits ye shall know them; make the tree good and the fruits shall be like it. This is the core of Christ's practical teachings. He "gave himself for us that he might redeem us from all iniquity and purify unto himself a peculiar people." The Revised Version has it that he might purify unto himself a people for his own possession." The gist of this is that Christ owns us, and not the world. Our first duty is to him and really this is the most effectual way of serving them. Our loyalty to Christ is to be the world's salvation. The moment we betray him we betray them and empty ourselves of all reforming and regenerating power. When the salt has lost its savor, it is thenceforth good for nothing, but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men. When a Christian so conducts himself as to be despised by his unconverted neighbors, he inflicts upon them an incalculable injury. He confirms them in unbelief. He brings Christianity into contempt. He poisons the well from which they ought to draw good influences. "Ye are my witnesses," said our loving Lord and Master; but what if the witnesses speak falsely?

In whatever direction we apply it the fact remains clear that society needs a strict, pure, honest, self-denying, godly-minded church. Our politics need a chloride of lime; and Christian citizens ought to engage in civil affairs not to become tainted themselves, but to purify civil life. To a right-minded Christian a ballot is a trust, and public office is a stewardship for God. The most grevious calamity that could happen to this country would be a divorce of practical Christianity from its politics. Conscience is more to this republic than all its army, or navy, or millions of Government bonds.

In commerce and trade Christianity has its indispensable place, and God's people their sphere of usefulness. The Golden Rule is the true Christian's yardstick; commerce becomes a cheat if it is disused or broken. When a church member defaults or runs swindler, he repeats the sin of Judas. Christ is betrayed, and men's faith in Bible integrity is so far shattered. A Christian merchant, manufacturer, or mechanic has a call to serve Christ and save his fellow-men as much as any gospel minister. Every office of heaven has its place.

Social life with increase of wealth has a trend toward demoralization. Luxury enervates. Popular amusements become sensualized and offer their temptations to the church. Be ye not conformed to the world applies to the stage, the ball-room, the wine cup, and to everything that would turn God's world into a "vanity fair." Conformity to the world amounts in the end to more than the corruption of Christ's church. It puts out the light which Christ kindled; it destroys the very leaven which he has prepared to purify and sweeten, and save a "world lying in wickedness."—Independent.

The Altar in the Home.

We have regarded it as deserving of comment that those converted from heathenism promptly establish family worship in their homes. Whether it is universally so we cannot affirm; yet from facts that have come to our notice we are safe in inferring that it is. The circumstances that naturally render it certain, or even probable in some cases seem to obtain in all, and hence there is likely to be the same result in all. Chief of these circumstances is the habit of worship. Idol worship, in some form, we understand to be universal among the heathen; and, being dictated by superstition it takes possession of the minds, and hearts, and is as scrupulously maintained as anything they do. Regeneration alone can dissolve the bonds of superstition's worship; and, as the Christian religion also requires worship, it might be expected that the result would be a turning from the false to the one living and true God. The habit is continued. The worshiping element in human nature remains, and under the new condition of allegiance to God it is simply corrected and properly directed. The following illustrates the statement made above, and we have in mind another instance of the same kind.

"Cannibalism is declared to be now extinct in the Fiji Islands. Within the last fifteen years not less than 65,000 cannibals have been won to a nominal Christian faith, and not less than 2000 have professed faith in Christ. Scarcely a house in Fiji, it is said, is without religious worship. It would be difficult to find a parallel to this in the history of modern missions.

"Now, while it is a misfortune to have begun a heathen, we can not but regard with peculiar interest the advantage that a habit of worship gives those of them that are converted. They are made ready by it for obedience to the commandment to worship God, and through which obedience many and great blessings are assured to them. They have something to learn concerning true worship, but have not the habit of worship to acquire, which it is difficult both to establish and to sustain. The latter is thoroughly wrought into their lives and fixed in their homes so that the young would scarcely recognize a home as complete without it.

What shall we say of Christian lands and nominally Christian homes that are without a recognition of God corresponding to the above? It is an evidence of Christian civilization, or what? Does it come through fear of superstition or imitation of the heathen? Or is it an evidence of prevailing godlessness? Paul speaks with apparent sorrow of those that are "without God"—atheists strictly rendered—those who are not within his loving recognition and do not have him as an object of supreme devotion. And one of the prophets utters this imprecation: "Pour out thy fury upon the heathen, and upon the families that call not on thy name." Notice the association, as also the seeming reference of the non-worshiping habit to families that are not heathen.

We believe that a neglect of family worship is not only a sin, but is such a sad dereliction of duty as results in domestic loss and real demoralization. Such worship, if in the morning, properly opens the day and fits us to carry its burdens, and escape its snares; while without it we go to our toils without the Great Supporter's assurance of aid, and expose ourselves to the world's and temptations without conscious guardianship from him whose perogative it is to succor us. And alas, for the children who grow up without being able to refer with gratitude to the delightful associations of family worship and parents who gave them example, precept, benediction and the benefit of invocation of the Divine favor, in the dear old home!—Journal and Messenger.

MISSIONARY.

—The one hundred and eighty-first meeting of the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Foreign Parts, took place at St. James' Hall, April 28, the Archbishop of Canterbury in the chair. Its receipts for the year were 134,978*l*. The number of ordained missionaries on their list was 594; of these 163 were laboring in Asia, 130 in Africa, 48 in Australasia, 252 in America and the West Indies and 1 in Europe. There were also, in the various missions, mostly natives, 183 catechists and lay teachers and about 300 students in colleges abroad. It was hoped that during the year 1882 an English bishop would be sent to Japan, whose sphere of work would be defined so as to avoid interference with the Bishop of the American church and his clergy. The principle on which the sister churches should work in heathen countries had been clearly laid down by the Lambeth Conference of 1878, and by this the society desired to abide. It had proposed that a Bishop for Japan should be selected by the Archbishop of Canterbury, and that his stipend should all be provided by the two great missionary societies. To this proposal the Church Missionary Society had consented.

—The Methodist Episcopal Church, South, has established a mission in China, and founded high schools, with a college in contemplation to consummate their plans. Dr. Allen, the President, writes of the wonderful success of this institution in the following terms: "We have been forced to accept 400 pupils, and yet there are very many applicants for whom we can find no place. But the truly marvelous part of the whole is the class of boys and young men who apply and their eagerness to get in, the crowning marvel being that while no tuition, as such, is charged, the subscriptions of the pupils for every one subscribes, and the friends of the enterprise, already suffice for two years. There never was anything like this ever seen or heard of in China before. I had expected to open two high school with some 150 boys to each the first year, but in less than four months from the first announcement of our plans we are compelled to accept 200 each, with full 100 more on the reserve or expectant list."

—At the instance of the Bombay Missionary Conference, a petition to Parliament has been signed by 338 missionaries in India protesting against the opium traffic. The petition declares that the Indian Government "is responsible for the increased consumption of the drug in India itself and the disastrous results in Burmah and China; that all attempts to justify the traffic in opium, on the ground of its being necessary as a means of raising revenue for the Indian Government, seem to imply the setting aside of moral obligation and the adoption of the degrading principle that everything is legitimate which appears to promote self-interest; and that China's pretense by the existing treaty with England from showing the sincerity of its declared desire to abolish the opium trade and this treaty can no longer be justified." Parliament is asked to take steps to reduce the area of the opium-producing district.

—Missionaries Milne and Correa, of the Methodist Mission in Montevideo, South America, have ascended the River Parana to Cuyaba, in the heart of Brazil, a distance of 2,072 miles from Montevideo. Superintendent Wood writes: "In some places they encountered hindrances and hardships, but in most places found great facilities for evangelizing those interior regions. They set at work in Paraguay a native of that country, who was converted in Uruguay and now returns full of zeal to labor for the conversion of his countrymen. He hopes to reach the illiterate aboriginal Indians, as their language the Guarani is his vernacular and he knows their mode of life and habits of thought. He is to live on what he can get, together with a small allowance from the American Bible Society in connection with the sale of books.

—One of the most interesting and encouraging facts stated by Dr. Christlieb, in his work on "Foreign Missions" is that of the existence of foreign Missionary Societies formed among the churches gathered out of Paganism. He speaks of them as "certain self-supporting, newly established native Christian societies, which are sending out missionaries, daughter-societies of England and America; like the native Missionary Society in Madagascar, a daughter of the London Society aided by the Palace congregation; the Hawaiian Evangelical Society, a daughter of the American Board in Boston; and lately, a grand-daughter of the same, the Missionary Society in Ponape in the Caroline Archipelago." That is the Divine way, and every real Christian will follow in it.

—Five probationers were received at the Methodist Episcopal Church in Peking, China, by Rev. G. R. Davis, on Sunday, Jan. 15. Among the number was the teacher of our Boys' School who seems likely to become a very useful man in the Mission. One person was at the same time taken into full membership in the Church. Bro. Davis finds on return to his old field that the work has been enlarged on every hand. The schools are larger and more efficient the chapels well attended and the work in our country stations rapidly growing.

—Catholic missionaries have been trying to proselyte the Christians of Krishnagar district, India, who are attached to the Church Missionary Society. When asked by these Christians why they did not go to the perishing heathen, the priests replied: "We do not go to the heathen, for we think they may possibly be saved by the light of reason; but we are sure that you, as Protestants, must perish, and so we come to you."

—At the Southern Baptist Convention the receipts for home missions were reported at about $100,000; those for foreign missions at $89,011. A resolution was adopted providing for the appointment of a committee to confer with other Baptists, with the sole purpose of cumbining and co-operating for the production of a new translation of the Bible in different languages.

—On May 2, the Church Missionary Society held its anniversary meeting, the Earl of Chichester in the chair. Its total contributions were £242,919. This society has its missionaries in West, East and Central Africa, in Palestine, Persia, India, Ceylon, China, Japan, Northwest America and North Pacific.

—The General Executive Association of the Woman's Missionary Society made the following appropriations: For China, $16,745; for Brazil, $12,500; for Mexican Border, $6,000; for Central Mexico, $1,200; for contingencies, $2,-000.

—Rev. N. J. Plumb, who is again established at Foochow, takes charge of the Biblical Institute. This and the Boys' High School and the Preparatory Course at present constitute the working department of the college, all in harmonious operation.

—Rev. E. H. Bickersteth, Vicar of Christ Church, Hampstead, England, has given the Church Missionary Society £1,000 to begin a mission among the Bheels, a hill tribe in Central India.

—In the last four years the number of baptized native Christians connected with the Church of England in the Diocese of Madras, India, has risen from 79,917 to 101,216. There are, besides, 38,000 catechumens. The increase is 27 per cent.

—According to the latest statistics on the subject, there are at the present time 310 Protestant missionary agents in China. Reckoning the population of China at 350,000,000, a ratio is found of one missionary agent for a population of 1,129,032.

—The Lucknow Witness says: "The debts of the Methodist Churches in Shahjehanpore, Lucknow and Cawnpore have been recently cleared off. We are always glad to record such pleasant incidents."

—In Western Africa, within the last forty years, 120 missionaries have fallen at their posts; but the value of their labors is seen in the 30,000 converts to Christianity in that region.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The familiar formula, in quorumdam infidelium, is no longer to be used in connection with ecclesiastical titles in Christian countries. It has been objected to by the "populations of certain Christian cities which may be schismatic but not infidel." The decree issued from the Vatican says:

"Where it be requisite or desirable to distinguish by some common appellative Bishops or sees, non-residential, from those Bishops or sees which are residential, in lieu of denominating such in partibus infidelium, they may be styled, in general, as has been hitherto frequently the usage: Episcopi seu Ecclesiæ Titulares."

—Roman Catholic missionaries have been trying to proselyte the Christians of Krishnagar district, India, who are attached to the Church Missionary Society. When asked why they did not go to the perishing heathen, the priests replied: "We do not go to the heathen, for we think they may possibly be saved by the light of reason; but we are sure that you, as Protestants, must perish, and so we come to you."

—The British and Foreign Bible Society continues to be remarkably prosperous. Since its organization it has circulated 91,000,000 copies of the Scriptures in 216 languages and dialects. The Earl of Shaftesbury, who is in great demand as chairman in May anniversaries, is president of the society.

—A committee has been appointed by the Welsh Bishops, to consider the expediency of revising the Welsh New Testament according to the Greek text adopted in the English revision. The present Welsh version was not translated from the original, but from the English version, and, therefore, is not regarded as sufficiently idiomatic.

—The Vicar of North Allerton has an admiration for the Salvation Army. By special invitation, fifty members of the Army attended holy communion at the parish church Sunday morning. They walked through the town, singing their hymns, and were preceded by the standard-bearer, with the colors.

—The Reformed Episcopal Church has been in existence eight years, beginning with nine clergymen, including Bishop Cummins, and twenty laymen. It now has 110 clergymen and about 7,000 communicants. It has church property valued at $945,000, exclusive of incumbrances.

—It is suggested that an itinerant ministry will use bicycles in the future. A bicycle manufacturer writes to the Western Christian Advocate: "At this very moment I hear in the riding school above me, the rumbling of eight bicycles, each bearing pupillary propellant Methodist minister."

—Christ Church Cathedral, Canterbury, New Zealand, has been consecrated, four Bishops and many other clergymen assisting. The corner-stone was laid in 1864. The cost of the building is about $300,000. The nave is 110 feet long and the width of nave and aisle 68 feet.

—The General Synod of the French Protestant Church, at its recent session, appointed a commission to consider all the existing French translations of the Bible, with a view either to the adoption of one or the recommendation that an entirely new version be undertaken.

—In Russia Sunday is the favorite shopping day of all classes. Although the evil of this has been pointed out by most foreign writers in Russia, and by many native ones, it is only of late years that public feeling has been awakened to the matter.

—Of the $51,728.71 received from the sale of Bibles during the month of March by the American Bible Society, $11,378.01 came from New York, $3,800 from Massachusetts, $3,640.45 from Japan, and $8,206.19 from Turkey.

—Dr. Thomas M. Maguire has become professor of moral philosophy in Dublin University. He is the first Roman Catholic to hold this post. Religious tests formerly barred positions in the University to all but Episcopalians.

—A sect called the "New Israel" has risen among the Jews of Russia. It abandons circumcision, abstinence from certain viands, changes the Sabbath from the seventh to the first day, and abolishes usury.

—Pastor John Bost, the eminent Protestant philanthropist, is dead. In Laforce, where he lived, he had originated nine benevolent institutions now containing three hundred and ninety-two inmates.

—Of the population (1,677,478) of Greece, according to the census of 1879, the Orthodox Church has 1,625,689. Christians of other denominations number only 14,677 and there are 3,392 non-Christians.

—Rev. G. Huberi, a Baptist minister in Norway, has been sentenced to pay a heavy fine for having baptized a young person, both of whose parents were already members of the Baptist Church.

—The subscription list opened in this country for an American memorial window in honor of Dean Stanley at Westminster has been filled up, more than $5,000 having been subscribed.

—Nearly one-third of the whole number of Nez Perces Indians are church members belonging to churches located in Kamiah and Lapwai, in the presbytery of Idaho.

—There are 324 Baptist Churches, with about 20,000 members, in Florida, connected with which are 600 Sabbath-schools, with 5,000 teachers and scholars.

—The Reformed Episcopalian, of Chicago, has been consolidated with the Episcopal Recorder and Covenant published in Philadelphia.

—The first Welsh Church in Ohio was founded in 1803. At present there are in the state forty churches with 3,000 members.

—The sale of Bibles has recently been very large in Bulgaria, and there are signs, it is said, of deep religious interest.

A MOTTO FOR LIFE.

Without haste! without rest!
Bind the motto to thy breast.
Bear it with thee as a spell.
Storm and sunshine guard it well.
Heed not flowers that round thee bloom,
Bear it onward to the tomb.

Haste not! let no thoughtless deed
Mar for aye the spirit's speed!
Ponder well, and know the right
Onward, then, with all thy might.
Haste not, years can ne'er atone
For one reckless action done.

Rest not! life is sweeping by
Go and dare before you die.
Something mighty and sublime
Leave behind to conquer time.
Glorious 'tis to live for aye,
When these forms have passed away.

Haste not! Rest not! Calmly wait!
Meekly bear the storms of fate!
Duty be thy polar guide;
Do the right, whate'er betide!
Haste not! Rest not! Conflicts past
God shall crown thy work at last.

MR. EDITOR: I have never seen anything from the young people at this place, and I thought I would tell the little folks how we raised money to buy books for our Sabbath-school. Our pastor, Bro. L. Carley, appointed a number of little children, myself being one of the number, to take up collections for that purpose; in one week we succeeded in getting the required amount. Our pastor is teaching a daily school at this place, and we are well pleased with him.

BERNELLA J. DEARMAN.

Grandpa's Mistake.

Tessie was learning to add. Dreadful work she made of it sometimes, and, when she was all mixed up, she would declare that she hated numbers with all her might.

Grandpa made a great pet of Tessie, and was always trying to help her out of her troubles.

One night he heard Tessie wailing—not over the addition table this time, but over the fact that she had so little money. Her church subscription was due—she gave two cents a week to the building fund of the new church. She belonged to the Children's Band of Foreign Missions, and gave ten cents a month to that. She belonged to the Home Mission Band, and gave ten cents a month to that; altogether, her hands were full. Just now was a new call.

A birthday present to Miss Keith, our own missionary—that was the way all the children of the band spoke of the lady out in New Mexico, who sent them letters. Tessie wanted to give it, but some bright-colored dolls had been too much for her, and her money was all gone? No wonder Tessie wailed:

"What's all this?" said grandpa, looking over his glasses. Tessie, with the tears still shining on her lashes, explained. Grandpa never could endure tears in her eyes. His hand went into his pocket.

"See here," he said, "seems to me I wasn't to give you any more money for a week; but there is no law against your earning some. We'll make a bargain. If you count what I've got in my hand, and get it right the first time, you may have it for your dear Miss Keith."

Joyfully Tessie agreed to this. So the small handful of pennies was passed over from grandpa's hand to hers, and she commenced her task.

"Only one count, remember," said grandpa. So her lips moved slowly and carefully. At last she looked up.

"Grandpa, there's $5 19!"

"What! what!" said grandpa. "Why, Tessie, how could you make such a blunder as that? Let me see."

"It is true," said Tessie, with a laugh.

"Look, grandpa! There's five cents, and five cents, that makes ten cents."

"Ay," said grandpa.

"And there's nine bright pennies, and they make nineteen cents."

"Just so," said grandpa.

"And then there is this very bright penny, made of gold, and it says 'five dollars' on it, and that makes $5 19."

"O ho!" said grandpa, "I've caught you now; it's a new cent, and nothing more."

But Tessie declared that it was made of gold; it was exactly like one that papa showed her only yesterday, and had just the same letters on it, and papa told her it was $5.

"Let me see," said grandpa, and he took the shining penny in his hand, and turned it over, and looked at it through his glasses, and said, "Bless my heart! Well, well; grandpa is caught this time, sure enough! It can't be helped; I'll stick to my bargain. You counted right, Tessie; the money is yours."

Thus it happened that Tessie Warren gave $5 19 toward Miss Keith's birthday present.—The Pansy.

Roy's Mistake.

Roy's papa bought a live duck. He carried it home in the evening. He was afraid the duck would go away, so he put it in a box. Roy called the duck his own.

When Roy opened his bright eyes next morning and looked out of the window, he saw snow on the ground. He clapped his hands and shouted, "Oh jolly, aint I glad!" He dressed himself and hurried to ask his mamma for his new sled and mittens.

His papa had just bought him a new sled for a birthday present. It was blue, with silver stripes all around it, and in the middle "Roy" was printed in large gilt letters.

His mamma told him he could not go out until he had eaten his breakfast. He was not hungry at all, and he could not eat much breakfast.

Then his mamma told him he might go out with his sled for an hour. She gave him his new mittens to wear. His grandmamma knit them for him.

Then Roy went and asked his little friend Eva to go with him. Eva's mamma said she might go. Roy drew Eva on his sled. They heard a duck crying, "Quack, quack, quack!"

Then Roy remembered his duck. He had been so pleased at seeing the snow that he had not thought of it before. Eva told him he must give his duck water to drink, or it would die. Roy took a long string from his pocket, and tied one end around one of the duck's legs, holding the other end in his hand. He led ducky towards the river near by.

She saw the big water and was in a great hurry to reach it. She waddled very fast, and the children laughed to see. Not stopping to drink, but gliding into the water, the duck swam gaily away.

Roy had not expected this, and before he thought of it the string was pulled out of his hand. His own duck was gone on the water.

"Quack, quack, quack!" said the duck. "good-by." Her acquaintance with Roy had been so short that she felt no sorrow at parting. But, Roy, how he cried! How he ran to tell his papa what had happened!

Roy's papa came to look for the pet duck. By-and-by she was found among some bushes leaning over the river bank. The string had become tangled, and it held her fast. She would have starved there if the cord had not been cut.

How glad Roy was now. Eva was glad, too. "Quack, quack!" said the duck. "Who so glad as I!"

Then Roy's papa explained to him that leading a duck to water was not just the thing—that it was a mistake. Roy saw that it was, indeed. He would not do it again. It had nearly spoiled his first day with his sled and playmate. But it was all right now for Roy and his duck and his playmate and their play.—The Watchman.

Among the Rifle-Pits.

Fifty yards in front of the abatis the pickets were stationed. When first the siege began, picketing was dangerous business. Both armies were bent on fight, and picketing meant simply sharp-shooting. As a consequence, at first the pickets were posted only at night, so that from midnight to midnight the poor fellows lay in their rifle-pits under a broiling July sun, with no protection from the intolerable heat, excepting the scrimpy shade of a little pine-brush erected overhead, or in front of the pit as a screen. There the picket lay, flat on his face, picking off the enemy's men whenever he could catch sight of a head or even so much as a hand; and right glad would he be of it, when the long-awaited relief came at length, if he had no wounds to show.

But later on, as the siege progressed, this murderous state of affairs gradually disappeared. Neither side found it pleasant, nor profitable, and nothing was gained by it. It decided nothing, and only wasted powder and ball. And so, gradually, the pickets on both sides began to be on quite friendly terms. It was no unusual thing to see a Johnny picket—who would be posted scarcely a hundred yards away, so near were the lines—lay down his gun, wave a piece of white paper as a signal of truce, walk out, into the neutral ground between the picket-lines, and meet one of our own pickets, who, also dropping his gun, would go out to inquire what Johnny might want to-day.

"Well, Yank, I want some coffee, and I'll trade tobacco for it."

"Has any of you fellows back there some coffee to trade for tobacco? 'Johnny Picket,' here, wants some coffee."

"Or, maybe he wanted to trade papers, a Richmond Enquirer for a New York Herald or Tribune," even up and no odds. Or, he only wanted to talk about the news of the day, how "we'uns whipped you'uns up the valley the other day;" or how, "it we had Stonewall Jackson yet, we'd be in Washington before winter;" or maybe heavily wished to have a friendly game of cards!

There was a certain chivalrous etiquette developed through this social intercourse of deadly enemy, and it was really admirable. Seldom was there breach of confidence on either side. It would have gone hard with the comrade who should have ventured to shoot down a man in gray who had left his gun and come out of his pit under the sacred protection of a piece of white paper. If disagreement ever occurred in bartering, or high words arose in discussion, shots were never fired until the notice had been given. And I find mentioned in one of my old army letters that a general fire along our entire front grew out of some ill-agreement on the picket-line, about trading coffee for tobacco. The two pickets couldn't agree, jumped into their pits, and began firing, the one calling out: "Look out, Yank, here comes your tobacco." Bang!

Scent of Dogs.

Dogs not only smell odors in an occasional way, but they likewise extract a recognizable odor from almost everything, as Prof. Croom Robertson also suggests. Anacharsis knows me, when I am dressed in clothes he never saw before, by his nose alone. Let me get myself up in a theatrical costume, and cover my face with a mask, yet he will recognize me at once by some, to us, undiscoverable perfume. Moreover, he will recognize the same odor as clinging to my clothes after they have been taken off. If I shy a pebble on the beach, he can pick out that identical pebble by scent amongst a thousand others. Even the very ground on which I have trodden retains for him some faint memento of my presence for hours afterwards. The bloodhound can track a human scent a week old, which argues a delicacy of nose almost incredible to human nostrils. Similarly, too, if you watch Anacharsis at this moment, you will see that he runs up and down the path, sniffing away at every stick, stone, and plant, as though he got a separate and distinguished scent out of every one of them. And so he must, no doubt; for if even the earth keeps a perfume of the person who has walked over it hours before, surely every object about us must have some faint smell or other, either of itself or of objects which have touched it. When we remember that a single grain of musk will scent hundreds of handkerchiefs so as to be recognizable even by our defective organs of smell, there is nothing extravagant in the idea that passing creatures may leave traces, discoverable by keener senses, on all the pebbles or straws which lie across the road. Thus the smells which make up half of the dog's picture of the universe are probably just as continuous and distinct as the sights which make up the whole picture in our own case, which will doubtless coalesce with the other half in the canine mind. The keen instinct which dogs possess in this direction is akin to our reasoning faculties.

GOOD COMPANY.

"I'll Try" is a soldier,
"I Will" is a king;
Be sure they are near
When the school-bells ring.

When school-days are over,
And boys are men,
"I'll Try" and "I Will"
Are good friends then.

The Texas Advocate has a talented correspondent, who spells the lub after this fashion: "Gnashville." Is it irony or ignorance?

The parish of Cameron, in this State, has not a single liquor saloon. They have low taxes, cash in the treasury, an empty jail and a pure Sabbath. See the law of cause and effect.

Methodist Episcopal Church Junior is the name suggested for us by the Northern Christian Advocate. Junior to whom or what? Bro. Warren had better wipe his spectacles, and read again the report of the Cape May Commission, received by the Northern and Southern General Conferences.

President Arthur, ex-Senator Conkling and other friends went on a Sunday afternoon fishing excursion to the trout ponds of Long Island recently. Rather an ugly example of Sabbath breaking for our Chief Magistrate to set the youth of the land. It deserves public and universal condemnation.

Rev. Dr. Fitzgerald, the accomplished editor of the Nashville Advocate, has been confined to his bed since the adjournment of the General Conference. We know something of his trials and labors on that Daily Advocate, and was not surprised that his overtaxed strength at length gave way. We pray for his speedy restoration to health and to the columns his genius adorns.

At the recent Baptist anniversaries in New York a California brother presented, for the use of the presiding officer, a magnificent gavel, made of oak from Florida, holly from Mississippi, granite from Maine, mahogany from Nevada, cedar from Alaska, laurel, maple and redwood from California. It was ornamented with silver from California and Nevada. Quite a timely and tasteful symbol.

The General Conference adopted, with great enthusiasm, the committees report on Centenary of American Methodism, proposing to raise during the year 1884 a thanksgiving fund of two millions of dollars, to be applied equally to the cause of education, foreign missions and church extension. What a noble and fitting thank-offering that would be! And if gifts approximate blessings and ability the amount will be easily raised.

There is an educational "boom" in Texas. The State Board of Education propose the establishment of sixteen normal schools. The Lone Star is an empire in herself, and does things on a grand scale, but just why sixteen schools of this class should be established in a single State we fail to see. A smaller number, well officered and largely attended, will do better work. Skilled teachers for sixteen normal schools would skim the colleges of as many States.

Our missionary treasury needs help, and brethren would render timely relief by forwarding their collections immediately. Three young men have been accepted by the Board for the foreign field, but can not go for want of means. God has called them to go, and us to send. Will we do it? Shall His cause be stayed on our account? We pray not. Considering the present emergency, let the foreign mission collection take precedence. These waiting soldiers must be hurried to the front. Dr. Kelley will be rejoiced to acknowledge all remittances. He is sitting by an empty treasury with a heavy, waiting heart.

These Arctic expeditions ought to stop. They have wasted precious life and immense treasure for no appreciable good. Further sacrifices are not now demanded. If discovered, the North Pole would not be a very valuable piece of property, nor contribute ought to scientific progress. We rather relish Jules Verne's satirizing the Arctic craze. Since the first expedition, there has been in it more sentiment than science any way. The return of Lieut. Danenhower and three other survivors of the Jeanette expedition to New York, some days ago, closes another, and we hope the final, chapter of American Polar exploits. The reunion with friends and relatives was very affecting. One brave man was brought back in a crazed condition, and carried immediately to an asylum of safety. It is said Mr. James Gordon Bennet will care for the families of the deceased.

Presbyterian Fraternity.

Our Presbyterian brethren, North and South, have been shaking hands by telegraph for several years. But now closer relations have been established, and fraternal salutations are to be exchanged through accredited representatives. Since 1870 efforts have been periodically made to effect this desired result, but heretofore have failed. In the meantime, a sentiment in favor has constantly grown on both sides the line. The reconciliation of all differences between two great churches will rejoice the heart of evangelical Christianity. But in the discussion and negotiations which preceded, and the final action had by the two assemblies, we must admit that our Southern neighbor conceded a great deal to his Northern brother. And this necessitates our epitomizing a short chapter of Presbyterian history. At the beginning of the war the Northern Assembly adopted resolutions of extreme loyalty, denouncing most vigorously the rebellion, and bringing grave accusations against the Southern church, using such words as "heresy," "blasphemy," "schismatical sect," and the "sinful revilings of that church." They further said the church had no alternative, consistent with duty, but to accept the renunciation of these sinful men, testify against them, and keep her skirts clear of her sinful doings." These certainly were very peppery words. After the war, up to 1870, there were no communications between the churches. In that year the Northern Assembly telegraphed overtures for the establishment of fraternal relations. This the Southern Assembly declined, until they had retracted the language which impeached their principles and character, and strongly charged their Northern brethren with political complications. In 1876 the Northern Assembly made another attempt to effect a reconciliation, with a like result. In 1878 greetings were exchanged by telegraph, and similar messages in that way have been annually sent. This year the Southern Assembly, at Atlanta, took the initative, and, after several days' earnest debate, passed the following, which was telegraphed immediately to the Northern Assembly at Springfield, Ill.:

In order to remove all difficulties in the way of that full, formal, and fraternal correspondence, which on our part, we are prepared to accept we adopt the following minutes, viz:

That while receding from no principle we do hereby declare our regret for, and withdrawal of all expressions of our Assembly which may be regarded as reflecting upon, or offensive to, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States of America.

Resolved, That a copy of this paper be sent by telegraph to the General Assembly, now in session at Springfield, Illinois, for their prayerful consideration, and mutatis mutandis, for their reciprocal concurrence, as affording a basis for the exchange of delegates forthwith.

To this the Northern Assembly replied as follows:

While receding from no principle, we do hereby declare our regret for, and withdrawal of, all expressions of our Assembly which may be regarded as reflecting upon, offensive to, the General Assembly of the Presbyterian church in the United States, and we renew the expressions of our warm fraternal regard for all who compose its communion, and our readiness to exchange delegates forthwith.

But before that minute was adopted, the following resolution was passed, not to be included in the message, but to define the Assembly's position:

Resolved, That, in the action now to be taken, we disclaim any reference to the acts of preceding Assemblies concerning loyalty and rebellion, but we refer only to those of schism, heresy, and blasphemy.

Now we have the history of the case. The Northern brethren made no specific retraction of anything, but adopted an explanatory resolution, which may involve an immense reservation. We do not say our brethren of the Southern Assembly should have acted otherwise. They have exercised a large charity, creditable to their high Christian character. Though they may have lost somewhat in the mere strife of words, they have gained in broad catholicity. The following were appointed fraternal delegates to attend the respective Assemblies next year. From the Southern Church: Rev. William Brown, D. D., Rev. T. A. Hoyt, D. D., and Hon. B. M. Esler. From the Northern Assembly: Rev. S. J. Niccolls, D. D., Rev. Edwin F. Hatfield, D. D.; and Hon. S. M. Moore.

Perils of Young Converts.

We are entering the protracted and camp meeting season. Special services will be held in the churches, special agencies and methods employed, and an unusual solicitude manifested for the conversion of sinners. These occasions, memorable in our history, do not indicate a spasmodic concern for souls, but rather a spiritual strategy that concentrates all available forces for a decisive battle. Though some have made them an apology for a year's lethargy, they have wrought grand results in our Methodism, and are not to be lightly esteemed. In country places, especially, they are a useful if not a necessary agency. Already many ingatherings are reported, and a large increase is expected. To see so many turning to Christ thrills the church with a great joy. Her doxologies are sung with fuller voice and louder chorus. But when the meeting is over, and the strain and temptations of every-day life ensue, lamentations often succeed hallelujahs. It is a grand thing to see souls converted, but grander still for them to continue in the right way. The latter requires constant prayer and sleepless watching and ceaseless struggle. Scarcely has the young Christian confessed his Lord before the bitter struggle begins, which ends only when this warfare is accomplished at the grave. It requires more wisdom and pastoral care to hold and rightly train these converts, than tact and eloquence and zeal in convincing and shepherding them. Some of the perils to which young converts are exposed will be indicated, hoping thereby to assist the anxious pastor in his delicate and difficult ministry.

1. Spiritual reaction. This is sure to follow the physical and mental strain of a meeting. The first hour of conversion is eventful and exceptional—resplendent with the aurora of a new life. Everything wears a transfigured glory. Praise is its normal expression and Hermon its supernal throne. Of that ecstatic hour many have sung with Charles Wesley:

> "I rode upon the sky, freely justified I,
> Nor did envy Elijah his seat"

But the soul does not abide continually in that altitude, nor do songs perpetually dwell on human tongues. From those heights we descend. There comes a reaction, and with it depression. Then faith is put upon trial, and principle tested in a furnace heated seven times hot—the devil's desperate chance. And the young Christian who comes safely through this trial, without the smell of fire on his garments, has gained a great victory, and made a long step forward. But just here he needs brotherly counsel and sympathy. An hour of prayer spent with him at this time is better far than weeks in after life.

2. Former associations. The friends of other days are a temptation to the young Christian. With his new life they have no sympathy; for his professions, ridicule and sneer. To ignore these associations entirely is impossible, while to mingle with them unharmed demands strength and spiritual wisdom beyond his years and experience. Here is opportunity for church nurture. This babe in Christ must be nursed and fed. Every older member should feel a special interest in the new convert, and manifest it. Indifference and coldness in the church often chills the zeal and freezes the very life of young faith. How many children have forsaken or been spiritually buried from their church homes for lack of sympathy and nurture! This work the pastor can not do. It rests upon the conscience and care of the church.

3. Having nothing to do. The young convert must be put to work. His first few months in the church will fix his status and promise as a Christian. The early Methodists required the young brother "to take up his cross" at once. He was asked to lead in prayer, and undertake all proper service. That was a good rule. Doubtless it saved many to years of great usefulness and honor who otherwise would have lapsed into sin and death. Work is a necessary expression of life. We must work these new recruits if they are to be developed into true greatness of soul. An inactive army loses by desertion. So the church. We need an improved social life, and some unaccomplished enterprise, always before us, to tax the time and zeal of every member. If all the warm, glowing, vigorous young hearts that shall be brought into the church within the next few months can be wisely trained, we will have an accretion of power that will shake the empires of sin for a full generation. Our effort, therefore, should be to gather in and carefully train.

The Sabbath.

Mark ii, 27. The Sabbath is one-seventh of our lives, nearly one-sixth of each year. It is a divine institution, as old as the creation, and a commemorative proof of it. There are Scriptural indications of its existence and observance from Adam to Moses. The fourth command of the first table of the Decalogue commands us to remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy. Under the Mosaic system it was commemorative of the deliverance of Israel from Egyptian bondage. "Remember that thou wast a servant in the land of Egypt, and that the Lord, thy God, brought thee out thence through a mighty hand and an outstretched arm; therefore the Lord, thy God, commanded thee to keep the Sabbath day." Under the Christian dispensation the Sabbath is commemorative of the resurrection of Christ from the dead on the first day of the week, and therefore called the "Lord's day." The example of Christ, of the inspired apostles, and the usage of the early church under their ministry, is deemed, among Christians, as sufficient for this change of the Sabbath from the last to the first day of the week.

We regard the obligation to keep the Sabbath as perpetually binding, because it, in common with each of the ten commandments, is essential to the maintenance of the highest ideal of civil and social order, because this command, like all the ten, was engraven on stone, not written on parchment, as the ceremonial laws and civil laws, peculiar to the Jewish civil state. This engraving on stone was, no doubt, intended to symbolize the everlasting perpetuity of this command, and because Christ came "not to destroy, but to fulfill the law."

The Sabbath was made for man. It is God's gracious gift to a working and weary world, a bright reminiscence of the peace and rest of Eden, and a sample and pledge of the blessed eternal Sabbath above. It is for "man"—all nationalities and all conditions. It divides the periods of labor and rest into proper divisions. The French, during the insane reign of infidelity, substituted the tenth for the seventh as a day of rest, but it was found, on testing, that nine consecutive days' labor was too great a strain upon the attention and the muscles. The advantage of a fixed Sabbath is obvious. All can work and all rest together; this prevents confusion and loss. The Sabbath promotes cleanliness by putting off the toil-stained clothes of the working days. It promotes health, elevates the character, and cheers the heart with repose and domestic joys. It is meant to be a protection of the laboring poor against the greed of covetousness, remorseless capital, and the oppression of soulless corporations, who, without such a restraint, would work the poor laborer to exhaustion and premature death.

There is no loss by Sunday rest. For example: All draught animals last longer, do more and better work who have a weekly rest. Cattle driven to market get there in better condition, and command more money when rested a seventh part of their time. Operatives in factories where fine goods are produced, and close attention and nice handling are required, do better work in the first part of the week, before the muscles weary or the attention flags. Clerks who rest on Sunday do more and better work than those who take no rest. Physiologists say that the rest of the night does not quite restore the balance of the disturbed circulation of the laboring man; he needs the rest of Sunday.

Our present civilization is doing great wrong to vast classes of laborers. Steam, which has enabled us to travel with the speed of wings, and enables a man in the six working days to reach Mexico, California or Canada, and the electric wire to send and receive messages from the ends of the earth in two or three days, have done away, for the most part, with the excuse for Sunday inland travel. But the strange perversity of human nature has turned this boon into a tyrannical master, which compels millions to toil seven days in the week, and to make a reluctant and compulsory gift of nearly two months' labor to rich and soulless corporations.

A vast deal of oppression and wrong is inflicted on multitudes whose lot in life compels them to accept the hard conditions we impose. There is no need that one of the thousands of the retail groceries should be kept open on Sundays. In other cities these are closed, and these people live as well as we, and the grocers sell as much as ours, and yet have one day in seven for rest, for home-life, and, if they wish, for worship. Our unwillingness to go to market on Saturday evening, our unwillingness to put ourselves to the slightest trouble to avoid Sunday marketing, keeps all the market people in fourteen public markets, and many private markets, at work three hundred and sixty-five days in each year—no let up, no holiday, but the veriest slaves to our cruel and inexorable demands. These victimized people sell no more nor make a cent more by all this additional fifty-two days' labor.

We must be amused, but at the cost of other people's liberty, rest and health. All railroad employees, theatrical and operatic people and musicians must all be at work for us. We must flock to Sunday resorts, must be waited on and served by those we deprive of rest. We must have grand and fashionable Sunday dinners, and the mistress of the house and the servants must have the most laborious and anxious day of the week. We must have Monday morning papers, although no legislative bodies or courts are at work on Sunday, no banks open, and no great transactions in any kind of values; in short, no need of such a paper; but poor men, Sunday evening and night, must be getting ready this paper for our entertainment.

Our mode of keeping the Sabbath in all kinds of revelry and amusements makes it a day of special temptations to the young and weak, makes parental authority difficult to exercise, and keeps capital, and the best people, from coming to invest, and settle among us.

Man, as a moral and immortal being, needs the respite of Sunday from care and toil, for instruction, meditation and worship. No better rest for a toil and care-worn mind can be imagined than the spiritual and elevating exercises of the house of God. It is as great a transition and change as we can make—a blessed rest to the mind from the materialities of life.

The Sunday rest is the only day in which thousands can have any home-life. The imperative conditions of their lot allow no other day for the repose and sweet association of home. What a joy to them is the weekly rest, and what a beautiful prophecy of the endless rest and glorified associations of heaven. Will we not, as a people, do all we can, as far as may be possible, to relieve all classes of laborers from Sunday work.

W.

Centenary College.

The commencement exercises of this institution were opened on Sunday, June 4, by a sermon from Rev. C. W. Carter, and were closed on Wednesday, the seventh. The exercises, from beginning to end, were highly interesting. The recitations, on Monday evening, of pupils selected from the preparatory department were creditable to themselves, and reflected the skill and patience of Prof. Norsworthy. The Alumni Association held its annual meeting on Tuesday, elected officers for the year, and resolved that each member would endeavor to raise the sum of $100 by the time of the next meeting, which sum should go toward endowing a professorship in the college, to be called the "Alumni Professorship." Charles Kilbourn, Esq., Waterproof, La., son of Judge J. G. Kilbourn, of Clinton, La., read before the association a poem of considerable merit.

On Tuesday evening the exhibition of the literary societies, followed by an address from Judge Kilbourne, gave the large audience as much as it could well take in. The speeches of the young gentlemen evinced the advantages derived from a careful training in literary debates, and Judge Kilbourne's anatomy of "the schoolmaster and his work" was simply inimitable. Wednesday was given exclusively to the graduating class, five in number. Of these two received the degree of B. A., and three the degree of B. S. Their names are: R. H. McGimsey, Alexandria, La.; R. B. Paine, Jackson, La.; S. J. Davies, J. M. Davies, St. Mary, La.; J. H. Fore, Texas, La. The speeches of these graduates were on interesting topics, were well conceived, and expressed in forcible and climate language. On account of the illness of President Andrews, the graduates and the audience were deprived of the usual baccalaureate address. The music for the whole occasion was furnished by young gentlemen from Woodville, Miss., and was more than good. They delighted the audience with an artistic rendition of some of those old popular melodies which will never die. The benediction was pronounced by Rev. C. Keener, and thus closed another successful commencement of Centenary College.

During the past session good and true and faithful work has been done at this institution. The classes are all moving along in regular succession and proper order. This writer affirms—and he knows what he says—that the grade of scholarship in Centenary College is very much higher than it was in ante bellum times. There is a thoroughness of work which was never known before. I quote from the report of the "Committee on the State of the College," made to the Board of Trustees: "The administration of the affairs of the college during the past year has been characterized by wisdom, and the work performed by the faculty bears marks of great fidelity and skill. Your committee record with pleasure the encouraging increase in the number of graduates. We have been shown the examination papers of the several classes, and have carefully looked into the methods of instruction and discipline, and believe that the work done in this institution compares favorably in quality with that done in any other institution in the land. Your committee feel that too great a meed of praise can not be awarded the faculty who have, during so many years of financial depression, stood at the post of duty, ever holding aloft the banner of liberal culture and high Christian training. It is with deep regret that we are again forced to record the miserable pittance with which an ungenerous patronage has met the rare and truly excellent labors of these accomplished men."

From all that was seen and heard, this writer records the fact that, notwithstanding so many discouragements, he believes this college has at last begun to go up. Doubt and despair will yet end in a complete success. A shade of sadness was cast upon the college and the town by the resignation of President Andrews. The Board of Trustees adopted the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the Board of Trustees of Centenary College have received with deep regret the resignation of President Andrews; that in looking back upon the administration thus brought to a close, and in recalling the adverse circumstances under which the work of the college has been done, we feel that to have maintained, under such conditions, even the form of college organization would have been well. But when we consider that the college has not only maintained its existence, but has done active and aggressive Christian work in the cause of education, and has, to a pre-eminent degree, exemplified the true character of the work of Christian educators, we feel justified in pronouncing the administration a great success."

The Board of Trustees, in order to gain time to meet the emergency thus suddenly brought before them, elected Prof. D. M. Rush president pro tem., and directed its chairman to call a meeting of the board for Wednesday, July 5 next, in their room in the college building. The purpose of this meeting is to elect a permanent president for the college, and it is hoped that every member will be on hand.

No Choice as to the Manner of Dying.

BY REV. DR. DEEMS.

According to a man's temperament will be his preferences in all things, even in the matter of dying, as to the place and method. Generally there seems to be a desire that death might not be instant. Thousands have repeated the petition of the Episcopal prayer book, "From sudden death, good Lord, deliver us." Is it a good prayer? To a Christian is sudden death a thing so undesirable that it should be classed with pestilence, famine, battle and murder, as it is in the litany? Is it more desirable to feel one's powers wasting through long years, the old ties loosening office by office vacated, one association after another dissolved, until our life becomes a weariness to ourselves and a burden to others?

For my own part I have long thought and often said that I should prefer to live fully in perfect play of all my powers, and busier than ever ready to go, but quite as ready to stay and then, in a moment, leap the narrow dividing stream from the banks of this island of mortal life to the banks of the continent of the life everlasting. To a Christian in full power it must be glorious to have the lighting flash fling the doors of immortality open. And yet it is not becoming that any of us should be fondly dwelling on such pictures.

It may be that God intends us to long racking pain that we may be made perfect through suffering, that we may be monumental of that divine grace which is sufficient for us. He may assemble about our bed crowds of great and small, because there is some lesson which our death shall have special power to teach. Perhaps He will cut us off so that none of our most intimate friends shall know anything about our latter end, as when men fall in the melee of battle and are hurriedly buried in trenches crowded with unrecognized corpses, or drop overboard at sea, or are lost in Arctic explorations, in which cases the lives of the departed stand out sharply cut and without the shadow of death. Of friends who have so gone, we have recollections simply of their lives when those friends were in the usual business of their position, jocund and gay, or strong and full. There is no memory of weakness connected with such a life.

But the choice, thank God! is not with us. "Whether we live, we live unto the Lord; or whether we die, we die unto the Lord." We have this assurance, that the very moment in which any Christian's life shall close will be that which shall give his whole earthly existence its greatest capability of benefiting the race and promoting among men the knowledge of the Lord our Saviour. No Christian can desire more. Every Christian is sure that he shall not have less. "No man dieth unto himself." Not by himself, not for himself, not to himself. The Christian dies "unto the Lord." His death consecrates his whole life with all its influence to the Lord whom he has served. He leaves that life and that influence to work for his Lord when he has gone, and then he goes to be "forever with the Lord," enjoying the double immortality of perpetual influence on earth and everlasting work and happiness in heaven.

Divine assistance will be withheld when it becomes a nurse for pride.

Richmond Christian Advocate.

What did the Lord Jesus commend in the poor widow? She did her best, she did it thoughtfully and heartily, she did it of her own accord, and she did it in the fear and love of God. These were the qualities of the act which promoted Christ to express his gratification. The spirit of genuine self-sacrifice was in the gift. Only two mites, a very small amount by commercial reckoning, and the least which could be legally received in such offerings, but these two mites were relatively to her a costly contribution. Likely enough, it was her day's subsistence, and, if so, it was that much blood taken from her heart and given to God. Whether this were the fact or not, it is obvious that there was a great soul in the gift. The two mites did not contain much money, and yet they had room, and very ample room, for a large soul. It was this self-denying soul that the Lord saw and honored with an emphasis instant and divine. Heavy with grief, worn and well-nigh exhausted by the sharp collisions of the day, he was yet too human not to feel such an act of heroic fidelity to duty, and too godlike not to accent it by a specialty of approbation. It was like him to do this thing. For the moment, the gathering shadow of death passed from his brow. Ingratitude, persecution, obloquy, rejection, crucifixion, were all forgotten. A poor widow turned his darkened tide of thought towards the sunshine that struggled through the gloom settling down on Jerusalem. A single beam in that dismal hour, but a true beam of heavenly light, and most welcome just then under the pressure of loneliness and sorrow.

Texas Christian Advocate.

We were conversing with one of that class of stewards who never fail to be in their place at Quarterly Conference, and who feels as deep an interest in the success of the church as the pastor himself, when he remarked: "It is a strange thing that a member of the church worth thirty or forty thousand dollars thinks he has done his duty after he has given five or ten dollars to support the ministry, when he has boys growing up exposed to all the perils and temptations which threaten young men the present day."—He then spoke of the influence of the gospel in restraining crime, and in so elevating society and developing moral sentiment, that property and life is safer in a religious community than anywhere else. He referred to the safeguards which it gathers around boys and young men, shielding them from lives of vice and crime; and yet, he said, men who live under its benefits often refuse to give it their support. He mentioned one case of a man of property who had refused to support the ministry. The result was that the appointment was abandoned in his neighborhood, and his sons had grown up without the moral and restraining influences of the gospel. Already that father has spent more than half of his fortune in the effort to keep his sons out of the penitentiary. Our friend, the steward, thought it would have been wiser for that father to have sustained the gospel and raised his sons under its gracious influence.

Dr. Ross Before the Cumberland Assembly.

The General Assembly of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church has lately closed an interesting and harmonious session at Huntsville, Ala. The most important work before them was the revision of their Confession of Faith which was satisfactorily accomplished. An episode of unusual interest occurred during the session. Dr. F. A. Ross, a resident of Huntsville, and for many years pastor, and possibly now emeritus pastor of the Presbyterian Church in that place, was introduced to the Assembly and made a speech, an account of which we publish below from the St. Louis Observer. The venerable doctor is quite old—having passed his fourscore years—but is still active with voice and pen. He has been a Titan in theological controversy, nor has his right hand yet lost its cunning. But his words to the Cumberland brethren strike us as rather singular from a true blue Presbyterian, whether New or Old:

Upon invitation, Dr. F. A. Ross, of the place, addressed the house. After congratulating the assembly upon its harmony and fine spirit as well as the good preaching and the fraternal feeling shown him, he proceeded to talk in a humorous way of some of the relations between the old and New Schools. The Old School held that election and reprobation were logically one, while the New School held them to be two doctrines. The tie which bound the two schools he called "alkaline," used in order to mix the Old School water with the New School oil. He had never adopted the doctrine of reprobation, and congratulated the Cumberland Presbyterian Church upon the rejection of the doctrine of predestination, whereby it struck the center of the theological target, and placed itself in the advanced thought of the age. He spoke upon the work of revision in progress, saying that when done ours would be the best confession of faith in the world. A vote of thanks was tendered Dr. Ross.

We are always glad to publish such intelligence as the following from Rev. W. R. Sims, Brandon, Miss. Parsonage building has been at a premium for several years in Mississippi:

The cap-stone of our parsonage enterprise was laid, so to speak, on last Sunday morning in church Conference. A statement of the entire matter being laid before the church, it was ascertained that there was a balance due of about $80. Upon a call by the pastor, this amount was promptly raised, in subscriptions which will all be paid on presentation.

We have also done more than one hundred dollars worth of fencing on the place since purchasing, besides various other improvements, all of which are paid for.

So we sit down to-day in comfortable occupation of our parsonage home, a house with six rooms, in good repair, surrounded by the conveniences of an excellent orchard, a fine garden, a spacious lawn, neat out-buildings, and an inexhaustible supply of cold spring water at our door.

Thanking God for his goodness to us on this wise, the church is also grateful to Sister S. P. Gunn, who first gave us one hundred dollars, and whose liberality has abounded yet more and more; to Sister E. W. Purnell for her generous contribution of one hundred dollars; to a young man (who is not, but ought to be, a member of the church) for his noble gift of a handsome $25 cooking stove and kitchen outfit; and to divers others—all of whom may the Lord bless and richly reward.

June 6, 1882.

—Rev. Dr. C. K. Marshall, of Vicksburg, will preach the commencement sermon at the University of Mississippi.

—The commencement exercises of the Louisiana State University at Baton Rouge, will begin July 2, with a sermon by Rev. W. C. Black, of Natchez.

—Rev. Dr. W. M. Patterson and family, with Rev. Mr. Freeman, a new missionary recruit, left on Sunday afternoon last for Mexico on the City of Merida. Bro. Freeman preached at the Carondelet Street Church on Sunday morning at eleven o'clock. Dr. Patterson addressed the Sunday-school in words that will not soon be forgotten. May our missionary friends have a prosperous journey back to their loved employ.

A Snake Story.

We clip this from the Texas Messenger, and think it best to append the editor's note:

BRO. WELLS:—One of my stewards (R. J. Pearce) has just returned from Granbury, Hood county, where he saw a snake twenty-one inches long that a man vomited from his stomach. The snake was alive when he threw it up. It was pulled from his mouth and killed by his wife. The man is a drinking character, and is supposed to have swallowed it while drinking from a branch or tank, when under the influence of liquor. This is a real snake and a true story. The snake is preserved in alcohol and kept on exhibition at a drug store in Granbury. We have often heard of snakes getting into men's boots but never before into a man's stomach. Let the drunkard take warning. J. J. DAVIS.

[Bro. Davis will be believed in Texas, but for distant readers we may say, he is a member of the Northwest Texas Annual Conference in good standing. His reputation for veracity is unquestioned.—Editor.]

The Rev. H. Urquhart, sending his Quarterly Conference appointments, writes as follows under date of June 9, concerning a faithful man called to his reward:

Have just heard of the death of Rev. J. E. Foust, in charge of Livingston and Eutaw. It is said he died suddenly on the seventh instant at home, and have heard none of the particulars. He has been much troubled of late of pain in the chest and left arm, but he had been told it was muscular rheumatism. It turned out to be, as many of his friends suspected, heart disease. I can not say much just now. He was a good man, an able and fearless preacher, and much beloved by those best acquainted with him. He is the fifth who has fallen in our Conference this year.

In the seven States of Georgia, Alabama, Tennessee, Mississippi, Louisiana and the two Carolina's, there has been an increase of three hundred and sixty-one thousand in the number of cotton-spindles during the past year, representing a capital of nearly ten million dollars. On this fact the New York Herald remarks:

If the South is wise there can be little doubt that the great cotton factories of the country will, in less than a quarter of a century, be on the other side of Mason and Dixon's line.

FIRST APPEAL.—We have this day taken charge of the Mission Rooms. Our first line to the public is an appeal—an earnest appeal to all preachers in charge. Please lift your collections for Foreign Missions at once, and send the money to the Treasurer at Nashville. Drafts are coming in every day, and we have no money to meet them. Our appropriations to the various mission fields were made in good faith, but we are unable to pay unless collections are forthcoming. Next Sunday will be a good time to make an appeal to your congregations.

R. A. YOUNG, Sec.
O. C. KELLEY, Treas.

Mr. T. H. Smithies, of London, the excellent editor of the "British Workman," in a recent address on "The duty of Christians toward the makers and sellers of drink," stated that a son of a wealthy brewer told him that among the twelve or fourteen brewers in the city where he was brought up, without one exception, either a partner, a son, a daughter, a son-in-law or a daughter-in-law had been cut down by gambling or by drink. "Next to the drunkards, who suffered fearfully," said Mr. Smithies, "I firmly believe that those who make and sell the drink suffer most."

MALICE.—When I say one "ought not to bear malice," and then do all manners of evils to mine adversary, how shall I be able by words to win him, while by my deeds I am frightening him away! Let us catch them then by our mode of life; and by their souls let us build up the church, and of these let us amass our wealth. There is nothing to weigh against a soul, not even the whole world.—Chrysostom.

Books and Periodicals.

THE CREATION AND THE SCRIPTURE. By Gilbert Chichester Morrell, M. D. G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York.

We are indebted to Eyrich, 150 Canal street, New Orleans, for this volume. The author, Dr. Morrell, was a resident of Omaha and died there September 29, 1881. After his death this book was found in manuscript among his papers, and is now given to the world in its present form. Our appreciation of its contents is evidenced by the fact that we read it quite half through at the first sitting. The style is polished and vigorous, sometimes reaching the highest eloquence. We commenced marking the most striking passages, but soon discovered our copy would be defaced on every page. With the doctrine we do not agree. The author belongs to the advanced school of liberal thinkers. He rejects the verbal inspiration of the Old and New Testaments and sets aside all the creeds of christendom, orthodox and heterodox. He asserts without proving, antagonism between the sacred writers and exalts the facts of science above the statements of Scripture. He scouts the idea of a special providence or the virtue of prayer for physical and temporal blessings. A few extracts will give our readers a clearer idea of its style and teaching.

"Men organized as a church may show more religion than the unorganized masses outside of such bodies, but this gives the church no authority to adopt a shibboleth of membership and forbid all access to Christ except by its use of a password."

"The broken law exacts the penalty, and there is no vicarious atonement in this life, whatever a trusting faith may hope for in a life to come."

The book may be valuable to many students of the Bible, and will be read with eagerness by all who appreciate fine writing.

WANDERING IN SOUTH AMERICA. By Charles Waterton, with one hundred illustrations. Edited by Rev. J. G. Wood. London: MacMillan & Co.

A vast deal of information, historical, geographical and miscellaneous is given in this volume. Incidents are graphically related and illustrations are profuse and excellent.

—We have received the Proceedings of the National Association for the Protection of the Insane and the Prevention of Insanity. Published by G. P. Putnam's Sons, New York. The papers read by eminent specialists are of great value even to laymen. The statistics of insanity in the United States make a sad revelation. This is our greatest charity and demands most liberal support.

—The Vanderbilt Observer, for June, is on our table. This number is of special interest as it contains full reports of the commencement exercises. The Observer does credit to the young journalists.

—The Southern Methodist Publishing House has our thanks for a bound copy of the General Conference Daily Advocate.

Personal and Other.

—The widow of President Tyler, who has recently been voted a pension of $5,000, has been for some time living quietly at Sherwood Forest, her Virginia home, on the James River; but will probably live in Washington after this. She was thought until late years to be in good circumstances; but her property in New York depreciated astonishingly and melted away; until this pension became a necessity to her. Her only living daughter is a lovely young girl, having been still in her babyhood when her father died, twenty years ago. Mrs. Tyler is a wonderfully preserved woman. Her vigor and sprightliness are unimpaired. She is remarkably handsome and her teeth are as white and faultless as thirty years ago.—New York Independent.

—Victor Hugo's capacity for persistent daily work is unimpaired. He gets up before six every morning, and every day adds to the number of his unfinished verses. "I have more to do than I have done," he said to a friend, not long ago. "It might be thought that age weakens the intellect; my intellect, on the contrary, seems to grow stronger and does not rest. It seems to me that as I advance my horizon grows wider, and so I shall pass away without having finished my task. I should require several lives still to write all that my mind conceives. I shall never finish. I am resigned on that point."

—Mr. Longfellow's titles were: Master of Arts, from Bowdoin; Doctor of Laws, Harvard, 1859; Cambridge, England, 1868, and Bowdoin, 1874; Doctor of Common Law, Oxford, 1869. He was professor of French, Spanish, Italian, and German, as well as librarian in Bowdoin; in Harvard he was professor of French, Spanish, and Belles Lettres. He was a member of the American Antiquarian and of the Maine and Massachusetts historical societies; a member of the Historical and Geographical Society of Brazil; a member of the Royal Spanish Academy at Madrid; and a member of the Academy of Sciences at St. Petersburg.—New York Independent.

—Joseph Cook is making a sensation in Bombay. In five lectures he has drawn the whole native city around him until the largest hall could be filled ten times over. The Free Church Monthly (Scotland) says: "Our Bombay brethren, writing independently, declare that no such effect has ever been produced by a public speaker in India, and anticipate much good fruit from this noble defense and exposition of Christ's teaching in the face of the false philosophies and faiths of the East."

—John P. Howard, who gave $50,000 to the University of Vermont, has signified his intention of erecting in University Park a colossal bronze statue of Lafayette, who laid the corner-stone of the old university building on the occasion of his visit to Burlington, Vt., in June, 1825.

—A full-blooded negro was among the Chinamen who lately arrived in Denver; but he wore the clothes, spoke only the language, and had all the ways of his Chinese companions. He had lived twenty-seven years in China, having been captured in youth by pirates.

—Prince Bismarck has founded two patrimonies for his sons. One, with which the title of prince is connected, is to go to Count Herbert; the other, consisting of the Pomeranian domains, with the office of Chief Master of the Hunts attached to it, will fall to Count Wilhelm.

—Dr. Schliemann has now free scope for his explorations. The firman which he lately obtained permits him to search the whole Troas. He intends to investigate closely the environs of Balli-Dagh, where ancient Troy was situated, according to Le Chevalier's theory.

—The Khedive of Egypt has lately conferred an honor upon Dr. Warren Bey, an American physician practicing in Paris, by making him a commander of the Order of Osmanie. This is in recognition of Dr. Bey's professional services in Cairo.

—Mrs. Ida Greeley Smith, the elder surviving daughter of Horace Greeley, died at her home in Chappaqua, N. Y., April 11, aged thirty years. Her three young children and her sister Gabrielle are the only descendants of Mr. Greeley remaining alive.

—The Hon. Alexander H. Stephens was invited a few months ago to visit the Senate Chamber, in Washington, and declined, saying that he had never crossed the threshold, and never intended to until he had official business in that room.

—Mrs. Johnson, of Baltimore, is mentioned among the visitors at Nice this season. She was the niece and heiress of the late President Buchanan and, as Miss Harriet Lane, did the honors at the White House during his Presidency.

—One of the most munificent of modern bequests to hospitals has fallen to the Royal National Hospital for consumption, at Ventnor, Isle of Wight. By the will of the late Mr. John Jones, of Piccadilly, London, it will receive nearly $1,000,000.

—A daughter of the late President Johnson is managing a farm near Albany, Texas. She is very successful with her undertaking and is comfortable future is already assured the two grandchildren of Lincoln's successor.

—Mr. Yulee, of Florida, and Mr. Cilley, of New Hampshire, are the two oldest ex-United States Senators now living. The latter is in his ninety-second year and is reported to be dangerously ill.

—Seventeen hundred dollars is about the sum that was spent in liquors for the use of Senators and Representatives on the road from Washington to Cleveland to bury the dead Garfield and charged to the treasury.

—On Longfellow's seventy-fifth birthday it was estimated that 325,550 volumes of his poetical works had been sold. Not less than 30,000 copies of his books are sold annually in Great Britain and Ireland.

Manager's Department.

We shall do our best to exclude fraudulent advertisements of every description from the ADVOCATE, and trust our friends, in ordering goods from the leading merchants of New Orleans and elsewhere, as represented in our columns, will mention having seen the advertisement in the ADVOCATE. We will also take pleasure in attending personally to any commissions for our friends in the country with which we may be favored, while endorsing our advertisers as being worthy of their patronage.

"Hearts like doors can open with ease
To very tiny keys.
And don't forget that some are these—
"I thank you sir" and—"If you please."

"Then let us watch these little things,
And so respect each other;
That not a word or look or tone
May wound a friend or brother."

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructible. Mason and Hamlin's organs, the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

Spilkins has hit upon a happy expedient for popularizing science in the family circle. For instance, at the breakfast table he remarks: "Mrs. Spilkins, will you be kind enough to regulate by steam with the embodiments of solar influences shed upon the surface of Chinese soil, also, if you please, two spoonfuls of crystallized sunshine from Jamaica, or, "Herodotus, my son, pass me the solid form of sunshine absorbed by the pastures of Orange County." With a dictionary and geography at each plate the idea works to a charm.

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sherar has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assure the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. W. A. Noyes, 149 Power's Block, Rochester, N. Y.

Two sparks from London once encountered upon a decent looking shepherd in Argyleshire, and accosted him with: "You have a fine view here—you can see a great way." "Yu aye, yu-aye, a ferry great way." "Ah, you can see America here, I suppose?" "Farrar than that." "How is that?" "Gu list wab tule the mists gang away, and you'll see the ocean."

Send the ADVOCATE to your friend for the next year and you will not regret it.

A priest chanced once to hear, unperceived, a fierce verbal onslaught by one market-woman on another, in the course of which every effort of rhetoric was made to provoke retaliation, but without effect. "Go on, go on," at last said the matron attacked; "ye know I'll not answer ye, because I've been to confession this morning, and I'm in a state of grace. But wait till I get out of it!"

THE GREAT JACKSON ROUTE.—Is the favorite to all summer resorts. It has been relaid with steel rails; has adopted the standard gauge with a well ballasted track, and increased speed. They offer the advantages of fast time, through cars, sure connections, and accommodating officers.

"That bed is not long enough for me," said a very tall, grim old Englishman, upon being ushered into his bedroom by an Irish waiter at one of our hotels. "Faith, sir, you'll find it is plenty long, sir, when you get into it," was the reply, "for then there'll be two feet more added to it."

Esthetics is the science of the beautiful. The need of specific for promoting personal aesthetics is due to J. C. Ayer & Co., whose incomparable Hair Vigor is a universal beautifier of the hair. Harmless, effective, agreeable, it has taken rank among the indispensable articles of the toilet. To scanty locks it gives luxuriance; and withered hair it clothes with the hue of youth.

A traveler, being at a coffee-house with some gentlemen, was largely drawing on the credulity of the company. "Where did you say all these wonders happened, sir?" asked a gentleman present. "I really can't exactly say," replied the traveler, "but it was somewhere in Europe—Russia I think." "Rabbish father think Italy," retorted his opponent.

Nervous debility, melancholy, catarrh of the bladder, leucorrhœa, etc., are quickly cured by Brown's Iron Bitters.

A polite philosopher thanked a lady who had been singing to a party for an hour by saying, "Madame, you have wasted your time charmingly."

Its interests are constantly increasing, and the business has been conducted with general satisfaction. All consignments of cotton, and all products of the soil, will have faithful attention. All orders filled with judgment and care. Thos. J. Carver, Manager.

"He took two drops of thought and bear them into a bushel of bubbles," was the description given of a speaker whose rhetoric ran ahead of his logic. Rowland Hill said of some in his day, that "they had a river of words, with only a spoonful of thought."

FORTY YEARS EXPERIENCE OF AN OLD NURSE.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the prescription of one of the best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and has been used for forty years with never failing success by millions of mothers for their children. It relieves the child from pain, cures dysentery and diarrhœa, griping in the bowels, and wind-colic. By giving health to the child it rests the mother. Price twenty-five cents a bottle.

We would call special attention to the card of W. W. Carre. The cabins or cottages they are manufacturing, are specially adapted, to the wants of those who are contemplating putting up houses, tents, etc., at the Seasmore Camp Grounds. Do not delay, until the last moment, but send in your orders early, so that everything will be completed before the meeting.

RUNNING IN DEBT.—I dwell on this point, for I would deter others from entering that place of torment. Half the young men in this country, with many old enough to know better, would go into business—that is into debt—to-morrow, if they could. Most poor men are so ignorant as to envy the merchant or manufacturer, whose life is an incessant struggle with pecuniary difficulties, who is driven to constant "shining," and who from month to month, barely evades the insolvency which sooner or later overtakes most men in business; so that it has been computed that but one in twenty of them achieves a pecuniary success. For my own part I would rather be a convict in the State prison, a slave in a rice swamp, than to pass through life under the harrow of debt. Let no man misjudge himself unfortunate, or truly poor, so long as he has the full use of his limbs and faculties, and is substantially free from debt. Hunger, cold, rags, hard work, contempt, suspicion, unjust reproach, are disagreeable, but debt is infinitely worse than them all. And if it had pleased God to spare either or all my sons to be the support of my declining years, the lesson which I should most earnestly seek to impress upon them is, "Never run in debt." Avoid pecuniary obligations as you would pestilence or famine. If you have but fifty cents, and can get no more for a week, buy a peck of corn, parch it, and live on it, rather than owe a dollar. Of course, I know that some men must do business that involves a risk and must give notes or other obligations; and I do not consider him in debt who can lay his hands directly on the means of paying, at some little sacrifice, all he owes. I speak of real debt—that which involves risk or sacrifice on one side, obligation and dependence on the other—and I say from all such, let every youth humbly pray God to preserve him evermore.—Horace Greely.

THE CATTLE OF HOLLAND.—The Dutch farmers have long been famous as butter and cheese makers, and the dairy cattle of Holland—especially of North Holland and Friesland—have been regarded on the continent of Europe as the best dairy cattle of the world. They have been carefully bred according to practical rules—not according to our English or Anglo-American ideas together—but so that we have a remarkable result before us in the best breed of Dutch cattle of the present day. The cows are black and white, of the largest size, "big as short horns," and admirably well formed as milk producers. The Dutch cow usually has a capacious paunch, a large udder and teats, great, branching, tortuous milk veins, an "escutcheon" of the most favorable promise, and a general preponderance of the digestive and lactiferous parts over the other portions of the body. Their milk is moderately rich, yielding excellent butter; but, while this has not so positive and delicious a flavor nor such good color as that of the Channel Island cows, yet it is firm and has the reputation of keeping better than any other of the pure breeds. For cheese making, however, the milk has no superior. This is supposed to be owing to the fact that the butter globules are not large, of very uniform size and are easily mixed thoroughly with the milk before and at the time of coagulation or curd forming. This gives the cheese a uniformity of richness in all its parts, which is inherent in the intimate texture of the curd and which does not depend upon the subsequent mixture. Like other large breeds, these cows require abundant feed, gently rolling or level land, and do best on rich, alluvial meadows, like those of its native "hollowland," as Waring calls it. In this respect they are like the short horns, with which noted race one has a natural inclination to compare them.—American Agriculturist.

CLOVER.—N. Griffin, at the Elmira Farmers' Club, said: "There is no substitute for clover, so far as I know—nothing to take its place. It is better, in its effect on land than any other forage plant. It is said that a good crop of clover—say such a crop as will yield two tons of cured hay from an acre—will leave an equal weight of roots for the soil. That is like a coat of manure. I am sorry to hear that clover is falling into disrepute, for its renovating power is greater than that of any other plant. Lately clover does better than in a few years past, so I hope we shall soon have all the old measure of success. Many years ago the farms in Dutchess county used to give large crops of timothy and they were taken away and sold. Those farms are now exhausted—ruined because the crops were taken off. But clover is never all taken off when the roots are left. Forty-five years ago a great deal of timothy was raised in Tompkins county and the land that produced it ran down under its prolifetion and the occupants had to turn their attention to clover. At first it was difficult to get it established, but little by little under its influence the lands grew better. Farmers had to ditch their lands as the first condition, then they used plaster, and at last got full crops of clover and better crops of grain, for their lands improved through clover. Hungarian grass has been tried, but, like timothy, when the crop is taken off nothing is left and the soil becomes poor. The best crop is that which leaves most to the soil, and that is what clover does. I hope it will not lose its place in our farming, for there is no other plant so beneficial in its effect."

WHEN TO CUT GRASS.—Some of the correspondents of the New England Homestead are going for Superintendent Sanborn of the College Farm for claiming that grass should not be cut until it is in bloom in a very sharp way. One of them says: "After reading Prof. Sanborn's writings I must say that I am very much astonished that any practical farmer, and certainly a professor in a State college, should advocate the cutting of grass in bloom or a few days subsequently. I have had fifty years' experience in cutting and feeding hay. Many seasons much of it was cut too late. Our present crop gives the best satisfaction of any I ever fed, and four-fifths of it was cut in June. From my experience I am satisfied that 1,500 pounds of timothy cut one week previous to bloom will make more butter, beef or mutton than 2,000 pounds one week subsequent to bloom. Nine tons are cut too late where one is cut too early. There was an article in the Homestead, I think two years ago last summer, purporting to be the experiments of a German chemist with grass, claiming that if cut while green eighty-eight per cent. was nutriment; when in blossom, sixty-two per cent.; and when seed is fully formed, or ripe, thirty-one per cent. nutriment. I am no chemist, but think that article worth more than any other I ever read. If that is near a fair representation of the value of grass in the different stages Prof. Sanborn is advocating the waste of millions in the Middle and Eastern States, I hope he will repent and be converted from the error of his ways.

FAST AND SLOW WALKING.—The National Live-Stock Journal makes some suggestions with respect to the walking gait of the horse which are well worth thinking over. A careful calculation of the time spent on a walk by the farm horse, it says, as compared with the time used at other gaits, would show that the walk is nearly the constant gait. All the work of the farm is done on a walk. It is only when returning with the empty wagon, or when, occasionally, a team is hitched to the family carry-all, that another gait is employed. A horse that under the saddle will walk nearly or quite five miles an hour, will, at his work, make, say three and a half miles an hour, while a slow walker would not come within a mile of this speed, taking the day through. This would cause a loss of nearly two days in a week—or, at a low estimate, a week out of every month—which, in money value, would probably amount to not less than twelve dollars, counting the wages and board of the man and the time and feed of the horse, to say nothing of the additional loss on account of the delay in the work—always, as every thoughtful farmer knows, an important item, especially in some seasons. These are points of interest to every farmer. Let "horsemen" give time and thought to developing a race of fast trotters, if they will; farmers should aim to breed a race of fast walkers, as by far the more useful animal.

LEARN TO LABOR.—The Emperor of Germany sets an excellent example in the education of his own household. Every Prince of the royal family of Prussia, when in youth, is taught some useful trade. Such experience is supposed to sober the mind and bring it face to face with the material," says a correct writer. It does far more than this. It keeps the royal youth from gadding about, and learning, as other less favored flesh and blood does, the lessons of the club, the green-room, or the corner grocery. Face to face with the world's material, with a plane or a hand-saw in hand, man is made better, and, if he is honest, work is improved and its results made cheaper. Men or women without trades or an occupation are as weak in this world—where humanity not only makes mortals mourn but compels them to work for a living—as the infant in swaddling clothes, and have not half their claim to protection and care. A healthy man should work or starve. Rich and poor should perform some manual labor every day. Wealth and wisdom are of no effect if not properly worked. The Emperor of Germany shows exceeding cleverness in compelling his household to learn trades.—New York Commercial.

A CONVENIENT LAND MEASURE.—To aid farmers in arriving at accuracy in estimating the amount of land in different fields, under cultivation, the following table is given:

Five yards wide by 968 long contains one acre.

Ten yards wide by 484 long contains one acre.

Twenty yards wide by 242 long contains one acre.

Forty yards wide by 121 long contains one acre.

Seventy yards wide by 69 1-2 long contains one acre.

Eighty yards wide by 60 1-2 long contains one acre.

Sixty feet wide by 726 long contains one acre.

One hundred and ten feet wide by 396 long contains one acre.

One hundred and thirty feet wide by 335 long contains one acre.

Two hundred and twenty feet wide by 181 1-2 long contains one acre.

FRUIT TREES.—Fruit trees affected by fungi, either on the limbs or roots, may be effectually cured by close pruning the roots, and by adding small quantities of well-rotted manure around the roots. This treatment for the roots when all the diseased parts of roots are cut off and the head of the tree pruned pretty severely—always to be careful when cutting off a branch not to leave a snag of three or four inches. In cutting off branches they should be cut close to the main stem or branch. These cuts should be neatly smoothed with a sharp knife. Clean culture is one of the great secrets in fruit culture; and from several years' observation in various localities in the South, fungus has only affected diseased and uncultivated trees.—Rural Messenger.

TREATMENT OF ORCHARDS.—Those who own orchards over twelve years or more of age will find a great advantage in applying a moderate top-dressing of old or fresh manure. It seems to have an almost magical effect upon the fruit. The trees will be more likely to bear every year; they will give heavier crops, and the fruit will be finer. It will do as well nearly, if not quite, to draw the manure out in the winter, and spread over the ground, such manure as accumulates from the animals in the stables and barn-yards. On the first thaw or rain the earth will absorb all the soluble washed portions. The mistake should be avoided of placing the manure in heaps at the foot of the tree-trunks or in small circles about the trees. Trees only twelve years old have already covered the whole ground with their network of their roots beneath the surface. Wood ashes are always useful.—Dirigo Rural.

ASHES FOR FERTILIZING.—Unleached wood ashes contain all the constituents of plant food that the ordinary or worn out soil needs, except nitrogen. By their chemical action they render much of the inert nitrogen in soils available, and in that way may be said to furnish nitrogen. This is true of lime, and on this power of making nitrogen available the greatest value of lime, when applied as a fertilizer, depends. Ashes also have a good mechanical effect upon the soil, especially heavy clay soils, which are made lighter and more porous, so that air and water circulate more freely. Ashes do not suffer waste by being washed out, to the extent that is true of the more soluble and concentrated fertilizers sold in the markets. Their effects are therefore more lasting.

GUINEA FOWLS.—On the extensive seed farm of Messrs. Landreth & Sons not a chicken is to be found, but a large number of guinea fowls are allowed the freedom of the grounds, which destroy insects of every kind and are considered invaluable in this respect.

Household.

QUEER DISHES.—What marvelous variety of tastes, of likes and dislikes, with regard to special forms of food, from cannibalism to current-cake, we find among people physically constituted alike in every respect. This person eats his meat burned to a cinder; that will touch only what is really undone. George III. preferred fish when it was semi-putrid; his successor's weakness was hot plum bread crumbled up in a quart of cream. Lord Bacon is said to have lived whole weeks at intervals on nothing but oranges; while the elder Pitt could not endure the sight of fruit, and never suffered any to be brought into the room where he was.

It seems an extraordinary thing to speak of eating a skunk, and that, too, in a part of the world where beef and mutton are infinitely more plentiful than bread; yet it is a fact that the Gnachos of the Banda Oriental are in the habit of hunting this creature for the sake of its flesh; nor is this incomprehensible to any one who is acquainted with the true nature of the skunk. The disgusting liquid which it ejects is contained in a gland on the back, and constitutes its weapon of defence. Certainly, the effluvium is the most horrible and enduring that may be conceived, and man and beast will fly from it; but if it be surprised and killed before it has time to use this, and the gland be afterward extirpated with care, the rest of the body is destitute of all offence. Skunk skins are largely used by furriers, and beautiful skins they are; and the animal is capable of being domesticated, as it never omits the secretion except when in danger or alarmed. I never ate a skunk, but I have handled a tame one without any olfactory disturbance.

Rats, I firmly believe, would be not only wholesome, but very nice, if properly prepared—not common sewer rats, but such as I ate, corn-fed animals, snared in the hop garden. The flesh, though perfectly white, was dry and tasteless; but, then, they were only skinned, cleaned and submitted to the fire without any of the et ceteras which make other meats savory. Dr. Kane, Rear-Admiral Beaufort, Capt. Inglefield, and other Arctic explorers, speak highly of rats as a welcome addition to their supply of food in those dreary latitudes.—Chambers' Journal.

LEMON CHEESE CAKES.—Pare two lemons round and round as you would an apple, and soak the peels in half a pint of cold water for an hour or two. Squeeze out the juice of the lemons upon one pound of granulated sugar, and stir into it six ounces of fresh butter. Beat up four eggs to a light froth, stir into the sugar and butter, and mix them together with the water the peels have soaked in. Simmer in a saucepan slowly until the mixture is of the thickness of honey. Bake some tarts out of the puff paste, and fill in with the lemon cheese. Beat the white of an egg to a froth; add a tablespoonful of sugar, and put it in small points around the tarts in four places on the outside edge. Brown five minutes in the oven. The egg and sugar can be put on the tarts and browned after they have been baked, and before the lemon has been put in.

A CUP OF TEA.—Take a clean kettle never used for anything else, fill with fresh water, the harder the better, boil quickly over a very hot fire, and pour as soon as it boils upon the tea leaves fresh from the canister. When more liquid or a stronger infusion is desired put the additional tea in a cup and pour fresh boiling water on it; after it has stood a few minutes it may then be put in the pot to good advantage. Tea water will not dissolve the thein from the dry leaves of fresh tea; only pure fresh water will do that. The addition of tea to the nearly empty teapot will increase the color but it will not make the tea stronger in its exhilerating quality.

DUCHESS POTATOES.—Mash one quart of hot boiled potatoes through a fine colander with a potato-masher, mix them with one ounce of butter, one level teaspoonful of salt, half a teaspoonful of white pepper, quarter of a teaspoonful of grated nutmeg; and the yolks of two raw eggs; pour the potato out on a plate, and then form with a knife into small cakes, two inches long and one inch wide; lay them on a buttered tin, brush them over the top with an egg beaten up with a teaspoonful of cold water, and color them golden brown in a moderate oven.

BAKED OX TONGUE.—Put the tongue into an earthan pan, and lay on the top of it a few slices of butter; then cover the pan with a flour-and-water crust, and bake according to size, in a moderately hot oven. When done take off the skin, and straighten the tongue on a board, by means of skewers at the tip and root. When cold glaze it, ornament it with a frill of paper, vegetables, cut into shapes, and curled parsley.

DELICIOUS BREAKFAST DISH. For any family of six take three cups of mashed potatoes, one half of a cup of flour, and half a tea cup of milk, two well beaten eggs, and a little salt; mix well together, shape them small and drop into hot lard, or roll them into little balls and fry them in a wire basket in boiling lard.

CREAM TEA CAKE.—One large tablespoonful of butter and one and one half cups of batter beaten to a cream; add to this two well-beaten eggs, one cup of milk, a teaspoonful of vanilla or lemon flavoring, and last, three cups of flour, in which mix two teaspoonfuls of baking-powder.

DELICIOUS PINEAPPLE CUSTARD.—On the day before you wish to use the custard, peel and pick to pieces with two forks a nice pineapple. Put plenty of sugar over it and set it away. Next day make a custard, and when cool mix with the pineapple, which will have become soft and luscious, and thoroughly sweetened.

BAKED APPLE PUDDING.—Pare and core six apples, stew in a sauce-pan with a little water till soft, then add two tablespoonfuls of bread crumbs, sugar to taste, the chopped rind of a lemon and the juice, two ounces butter, and four eggs, yolks only; bake in a dish previously prepared with puff paste round it.

LEMON PIE.—One cup sugar, one tablespoonful flour, yoke one egg, one cup luke-warm water, one lemon; grate the rind and squeeze the juice in a bowl, put a little butter on the top; beat the white to a froth with white sugar for the top of the pie.—Western Christian Advocate.

ARTIFICIAL MILK.—Although milk is not a mere emulsion of fat and alkali, inasmuch as it contains albuminoids, salts, and sugar, Schischkoff nevertheless found that he could prepare emulsions very similar to milk by closely imitating its natural components; i. e., by first preparing a liquid similar to the more fluid part of milk, and then, mixing withit fats of analogus composition to those in real milk. As other chemists had done before him, he found in whey a third albuminoid substance different from either Albumen or Caseine; and he observed from his experiments that while caseine without albumen would not yield cream but only milk, and that while the two albuminoids together gave both milk and cream the presence of the third new albuminoid was necessary in order that the cream should be in a condition similar to natural cream. Schischkoff describes a "good" emulsion as one that, smears glass strongly, rises slowly, and forms a decidedly deeper layer on standing than would be formed by the fat which is contained in it; it should be white and lustrous. Under the microscope it appears to be composed of small globules of tolerably equal size. It is seen plainly that the act of emulsifying consists in dividing the fat into little globules, and fixing these globules in position by the adhesion of the emulsifying liquid to their surfaces. It was noticed that the globules in the emulsions were apt to be smaller in proportion as the molecular attraction of the liquid for any one of the constituents of the fat was greater, and that in proportion as the globules were smaller the emulsions were less permanent. Shaking promotes the sub-division of the globules, and may consequently hasten the destruction of an emulsion. By long continued shaking the emulsions were, in fact, completely decomposed into fat and soap, which would not again act on one another. The emulsions were destroyed also by cooling, by diluting them with much water, by allowing them to stand for a sufficient length of time, and by manipulations which promote the formation or separation of soap, such as warming or the addition of strong lye, or the like.—Prof. F. H. Storer, in American Agriculturist.

THE MAKING OF PAPER.—That "the consumption of paper is the measure of a people's culture" is an admitted truism; it is therefore cause for much congratulation that the manufacture and consumption of this indispensable article are considerably increasing in this country. Statistics prove that the average quantity used per head of population in Great Britian is greater than in any other country; and it has always been so. The natural result of this is that the supply of raw material necessary to manufacture the increasing quantity of paper has become almost inadequate for present demand, and we can not much longer rely on our old resources only. The ancient staple material, "rags," although theoretically supposed to be the correct thing, actually enters very little when at all into the composition of modern paper; for the very simple reason that it would be impossible to obtain sufficient rags now to give the public the quantity of paper required—to say nothing of price. Rags have thus been, perforce, greatly superseded by raw fibres and waste materials; yet these huge supplementary supplies must soon fail to maintain consumption at necessary reasonable rates and quantity; for probably paper was never so cheap, or such good value, as at the present time. It is refreshing to know that the pressing requirements of the paper trade are now almost universally recognized as of public importance, and numerous "new" fibres, etc., are constantly being suggested from all sources. Considering, however, how often we read of "new" materials introduced as suitable for the manufacture of paper, the fact remains that comparatively few articles are actually offered or procurable in the market yet. For the manufacture of good white paper the only raw fibres available by the English paper makers may be said to be esparto, grass, straw, wool; for these materials must be added, rags, of course, and also the waste products from the treatment of flax, jute, cotton, and other similar industries.—Chamber's Journal.

PARASITES IN FOOD AND DRINK.—M. Milne Edwards has recently expressed some interesting views suggested by the discussions concerning trichinæ, respecting the hygienic questions which are connected with the establishment of colonies of intestinal worms, or microbes, within human bodies. He believes that certain religious precepts and certain established usages, among people whose civilization is very ancient, are based upon acquaintance with the inconveniences that may result from the alimentary use of particular meats or waters. He thus deduces, from the aptitude of the hog to transmit his parasites to men, the reason for the prohibition of pork among the Israelites and Mohammedans, and for the Biblical distinction between pure and impure animals. He also attributes to the very ancient recognition of analogus facts the general use of hot drinks, like tea in China and other countries of the extreme East, where the natural waters are often charged with noxious animalcules or polluted by the dejections animals. As bearing on this point, he cites the ravages caused in Cochin-China by a microscopic eel, which produces a persistent endemic diarrhœa. Those animals have a facility of multiplication in the human intestine, that is illustrated by the fact that a single patient is said to have evacuated more than a hundred thousand of them in twenty-four hours! The simplest prudence should suggest the expediency of boiling the drinking water wherever they abound. What Milne-Edwards would make of Peter's vision we do not know.

CINCINNATI MUSEUM.—The Cincinnati people were delighted a few days ago with the announcement that Judge Hoadley had purchased in Europe, for the Art Museum, some 500 objects of art, at a cost of $28,000. It appears that there are in London a firm of galvanic or electric producers—the Messrs. Elkington—whose speciality it is to reproduce the precious works of the ages in silver, gold and bronze which are held in temples, churches, palaces and museums. By the advice and direction of Sir Philip Reso, Judge Hoadley has ordered for the Cincinnati Museum reproduction by the Messrs. Elkington of three classes of work. First, from Amsterdam, thirty-seven pieces, at £303 0s.; second, from the South Kensington Museum, 146 pieces, at £1,260; third, from Russian museums, 295 pieces at £3,800. These are the most valuable and important. It will require over two years to complete the work, provided the artisans set to work without delay. The expenditure of from £250 to £350 has also been authorized for the purchase of colored photographs of objects that can not be reproduced, such as faience and furniture. These photographs are colored by hand. There are no new developments regarding the museum building.

Obituaries.

BILL.—ABNER BILL was born, near Beaufort, N. C., March 30, 1798, and departed this life, near Mt. Sterling, Chickasaw county, Ala., October 19, 1881, aged eighty-three years, six months, and nineteen days.

Bro. Bill embraced religion, in his native State, in early life, and joined the Methodist Church, in whose communion he lived a worthy and useful member till death released him from the labors and suffering of earth, and called him to his reward in heaven.

To me he was a brother, beloved in the Lord, not only for his kindness when I first went to Butler circuit, twenty-six years ago—a stranger among strangers—when he took me both to his heart and home; but also, and chiefly, for the fidelity he always exhibited to the cause of Christianity and its propagators. He loved the church and its ministers. His religious life was irreproachable. He was a plain, candid, honest Christian gentleman.

George Bill, his youngest son, and with whom he had been living for some time, was stricken down with typhoid fever, and died August 21, 1881, aged thirty-two years—just one month and twenty-five days before his father. This was a heavy affliction to the aged Brother. He now seemed anxious to cross the river of death, and get rest with the loved ones gone before him. Talking to me about the death of his son George, who was also a true Christian, he said: "It is a glorious thing to die, for the soul then goes to God, who gave it." We believe our brother has made safe the heavenly land.

He was thrice married, and in each case his married life was agreeable, pleasant and happy. He was a kind husband, a good father and stepfather, an obliging neighbor, and a true and faithful friend. He outlived most of his family. Only one son and a daughter, out of seven children, remain.

He was made a mason in North Carolina before 1825, the date of his removal to Alabama, and, for nearly fifty years, loved and adorned the principles of that ancient and noble order. His return of the masonic fraternity honored him with a special memorial service at Mt. Sterling, Ala., on the fourth Sabbath of April last, at which his funeral was preached by the writer to a large congregation of relatives and friends; after which the masons marched in procession to the grave of Abner Bill, and around the sleeping dust of our brother performed the solemn ceremonies of the order.

G. HAWKINS.

BEARD.—Died at his residence in Morehouse parish, La., on Wednesday, May 3, 1882, A. D., GEORGE F. BEARD, aged fifty-seven years.

He was born and raised in Fairfield district, S. C., and received a liberal education. In the fall of 1818, he and the writer of this notice, both young men, having been intimately associated from their boyhood, moved to Morehouse parish, La., and settled in the same neighborhood, since which time they have lived near each other as neighbors; and as friends their friendly and social relationships have never been disturbed. Being his most intimate friend, none knew him better, none loved him more.

He was married twice, and at his death was living alone with his motherless children. He leaves an interesting family of five children. He was in every respect a good man, of spotless integrity, a devoted husband, an affectionate father, a faithful friend, and a kind neighbor. Bro. Beard was never known to endorse a falsehood or sanction a wrong. Possessed of a smooth and patient disposition, he was ever kind and forgiving, and commanded the respect of all who knew him.

Five or six years ago he attached himself to the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and has ever since discharged faithfully his duties as a Christian, as was characteristic of him in all the relations of his life.

In his last illness, possessed of all his faculties, and conscious that his end was approaching and his mission winding to its close, he gave full assurance to his friends that all was well, and that death had no terrors for him. His cheerful resignation is a comfort to his friends, and the influence of his example will be felt in this community; and may those who mourn his loss be as ready and willing when the Master calls to exchange this mortality for immortality, is the prayer of his true friend.

COSBY.—MARY BELLE, only daughter of Mrs. M. E. Cosby, and granddaughter of Dr. D. B. Hamilton, died in Minden, La., May 1, 1882, aged eleven years and six months.

The little angel of the household has come and gone. She came for a few brief years with her bright face to gladden grandfather's home; to entwine herself into every fiber of a mother's loving heart; to shed the sweet fragrance of the budding flower upon uncles and aunts, and dear grandmother, and then she was ready to "take wings and fly away."

How we will miss the silvery sweetness of her voice; with what anguish we fold away the garments she wore; how longingly and lovingly we look at and then lay aside her music, her sketch with the books she studied, for the little school-girl will need them no more.

The home that was flooded with her sunshine is darkened. We are wandering in the shadows, and reach out gropingly for the "strength and refuge" that is promised us when the storms of life sweep over and almost overwhelm us.

"I am going home, mamma, going home," she would tenderly say as she stood on the threshold and looked through "the valley of the shadow," into the open portals of the bright world beyond.

The veil that hid the beautiful visions of the unseen world was lifted to her eyes before her pure spirit took its flight. She could see the flowers of a bright eternal May that were blooming for her; she could see the out-reaching arms of a heavenly Father to bear her gently "over the river" to a land of light.

She has gone home, mamma—gone home.

ELLIS.—Whereas, It has pleased God to remove from among us our dear friend and sister, MRS. E. M. ELLIS; therefore, as a tribute of respect to her memory and a token of our love, it is

Resolved, That, as an association, we have sustained a great loss in the death of this consistent and faithful member of the Fayette Financial Association—she having been a member since its first organization in 1857.

Resolved, That we deeply sympathize with her husband and children in their bereavement, and hope that these resolutions may be preserved by them as an encouragement to walk in the footsteps of their Christian mother.

Resolved, That we wish these resolutions spread upon the records of the Fayette Financial Association, and a copy of the same furnished to the sorrowing family, also a copy sent to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication.

MRS. M. T. HALL, for Committee.

MOULTON.—SISTER M. C. MOULTON was born in Tunbridge, Orange county, Vermont, in 1804; professed religion and joined the Methodist Church before 1820; came to Bastrop in the fall of 1836, and connected herself with our church here, and closed her earthly career on Saturday, May 13, 1882, at eight o'clock P. M. She had been a long while afflicted, but seemed patient, resigned and prepared. She was, so far as I know, a true and faithful member of the church, had the confidence of the people, and did many deeds of charity for her blessed Lord's sake. Of course she must rest well after such a Christian life. She leaves a brother here, a brother, two sisters and a daughter in Vermont, besides many friends here to mourn her decease.

J. L. CRADDOCK.

WIMBERLY.—MRS. MARY ANN WIMBERLY was born in Davidson county, Tenn., April 12, 1820; was married March 30, 1852 to George H. Wimberly; joined the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, in Ashley county, Arkansas; 1861, and died April 27, 1882.

Sister Wimberly, if all reports be true, lived the life of the righteous; therefore, she died the death of such. She called up her children and gave them a mother's faithful words of love, expressed herself as being ready, and thus, doubtless, entered into rest. She leaves behind a sorrowing husband and four boys, besides a host of friends.

J. W. BRADLEY.

SKINNER.—EUGENE ELI SKINNER, son of Pr. Henry S. and Kate Skinner, was born near Belleville, Ala., on the second of March, 1878, and died May 4, 1882. He was an interesting affectionate and dear little boy for one so young. He was the idol of the family circle. How dearly we loved him, and how will he be missed. His little chair is vacant now. No more will we hear that sweet little voice lisp: "Tiss me mamma;" "Papa's tuppin." Nor is it now employed in praising the Saviour, who has taken him to himself, away from sin and sorrow. Farewell, my sweet boy, till we meet on that "beautiful shore."

A. E. S.

THAMES.—Died in Perry county, Ala., May 6, 1882, MRS. REBECCA A. THAMES, in the forty-seventh year of her age. She lived a consistent life, and was a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church for thirty-four years.

How Long We Are to Live.

It is not everyone who asks himself this question, because strangely enough it is the belief of many persons that their lives will be exceptionally lengthy. However, life assurance companies are aware of the credulous weaknesses of those whose lives they assure, and have therefore compiled numerous tables of expectancy of life for their own guidance, which are carefully referred to before a policy is granted. The following is one of these well-authenticated tables, in use among London assurance companies, showing the length of life at various ages. In the first column we have the present ages of persons of average health, and in the second column we are enabled to peep, as it were, behind the scenes of an assurance office, and gather from their table the number of years they will give us to live. This table has been the result of careful calculation, and seldom proves misleading. Of course, sudden and premature deaths, as well as lives unusually extended, occasionally occur, but this is a table of average expectancy of life of an ordinary man or woman:

Age.	More years to live.
1	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	11
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
50	21
[illegible]	[illegible]
[illegible]	[illegible]
70	7

Our readers will easily gather from the above tabulated statement the number of years by which their lives, according to the law of averages, may reasonably be expected to extend.—Harper's Bazar.

Of Avoiding Many Words.

Fly the tumult of the world as much as thou canst; for the treating of worldly affairs is a great hindrance, although it be done with sincere affection.

For we are quickly defiled, and enthralled by vanity.

Oftentimes I could wish that I had held my peace when I have spoken, and that I had not been in company.

Why do we so willingly speak and talk one with another, when notwithstanding we seldom enjoy our converse before we have hurt our conscience?

The cause why we so willingly talk, is for that by discoursing one with another, we seek to receive comfort one of another, and desire to ease our mind wearied with many thoughts.

And we very willingly talk and think of those things which we most love or desire; or of those things which we feel to be against us.

But alas, oftentimes in vain, and to no end: for this outward comfort is the cause of no small loss of inward and divine consolation.

Therefore we must watch and pray, less our time pass away idly.

If it be lawful and expedient for thee to speak, speak those things that may edify.

Evil habit and neglect of our own growth in grace do give too much liberty to inconsiderate speech.

Yet discourse of spiritual things doth greatly further our spiritual growth, especially when persons of one mind and spirit associate together in God.—Thomas A. Kempis.

DANIEL PRATT IMPROVED
"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JUNE 13, 1873.
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past two seasons, and several improvements have been added, by which all friction at the ends of the cotton box prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a perfect lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft, and causes the Gin to run easy with less fishing power, thus doing a great deal more work with the same time, while consuming much less power, than any other Gin. The saws fit the ribs very close, the length of the cylinder is used producing cotton, on this account, of greater market value. This improvement is given at a length of staple, without preparation of the cotton, which is increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every bale it ginns. THE BEST REMEDY
FOR
Diseases of the Throat and Lungs.

Diseases of the pulmonary organs are so prevalent and fatal, that a safe and reliable remedy for them is invaluable to every community. AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL is such a remedy, and no other so eminently merits the confidence of the public. It is a scientific combination of the medicinal principles and curative virtues of the finest drugs, chemically united, to insure the greatest possible efficiency and uniformity of results, which enables physicians as well as invalids to use it with confidence. It is the most reliable remedy for diseases of the throat and lungs that science has produced. It strikes at the foundation of all pulmonary diseases, affording prompt and certain relief, and is adapted to patients of any age or either sex. Being very palatable, the youngest children take it without difficulty. In the treatment of ordinary Coughs, Colds, Sore Throat, Bronchitis, Influenza, Clergyman's Sore Throat, Asthma, Croup, and Catarrh, the effects of AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL are magical, and multitudes are annually preserved from serious illness by its timely and faithful use. It should be kept at hand in every household, for the protection it affords in sudden attacks. In Whooping-cough and Consumption there is no other remedy so efficacious, soothing, and helpful.

The marvellous cures which AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL has effected all over the world are a sufficient guaranty that it will continue to produce the best results. An impartial trial will convince the most sceptical of its wonderful curative powers, as well as of its superiority over all other preparations for pulmonary complaints.

Eminent physicians in all parts of the country, knowing its composition, recommend AYER'S CHERRY PECTORAL to invalids, and prescribe it in their practice. The test of half a century has proved its absolute certainty to cure all pulmonary complaints not already beyond the reach of human aid.

LIVE LONG AND BE HAPPY.

For all diseases affecting the pulmonary, digestive and urinary organs, brain and nervous system, nothing is so strengthening in its effect as Brown's Iron Bitters. It assists nature in every instance, and complete cures rapidly follow.

Dynamite has been used in the Bernese Oberland during the past winter to loosen the soil in church-yards to facilitate grave-digging. Formerly great fires were made to remove the frost, but last winter the heat could not penetrate sufficiently far, hence the employment of dynamite.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

KANSAS CITY, June 8.—The following are the particulars of the bank robbery at Brookfield, Mo., yesterday: Six armed men rode into the town of Brookfield, just as the bank was closing for the day, dismounted and covering the clerks with their revolvers robbed the safe of about $5000. They kept up a rapid fusillade with their firearms as they rode through the place, overawing the town people. The men were all masked. The County Sheriff and Marshal organized a posse as speedily as possible and started after the robbers.

NEW YORK, June 8.—Five children, three girls and two boys, sons and daughters of Mr. John Lockwood, of Coscob, Ct., are reported to have been killed last evening while walking on the track of the New York and New Haven railroad, near that village. They heard the train approaching and crossed over to the adjoining track, when they were run over and crushed to death by the train, which came upon them from the opposite direction.

CINCINNATI, June 9.—President Jarret, of the Amalgamated Union Iron and Steel Workers, met with the striking workmen of this vicinity at Covington, to-night, and after a patient hearing of the case as presented by the men, delivered and opinion that their strike was not justifiable and that they were bound to continue at work under the terms of their contract of last October with manufacturers. To-morrow he will confer with mill owners and it is confidently expected that the mills will be running again on Monday.

ATLANTA, June 9.—Senator Hill arrived from Eureka Springs to-day at forty-five minutes past one o'clock. He was met at the train by an immense throng of people. There was no demonstration, owing to the Senator's critical condition. He was placed in a carriage and conveyed to his home. As the carriage passed through the crowd heads were uncovered as a mark of respect.

CHICAGO, June 9.—It is stated that the Irondale strikers are quarrelling among themselves, the poorer paid class of workmen complaining that those who get larger wages are using them in an effort to get a big advance. They are tired of a strike being conducted on such principles.

WASHINGTON, June 10.—William A. Wheeler, of New York, has declined to serve upon the tariff commission.

Charles H. Reed, in company with a notary public visited the jail yesterday, to secure Guiteau's signature to a petition for a writ of habeas corpus, returnable before a Justice of the United States Supreme Court. It is believed that Justice Miller will be asked to pass upon the writ, as he is expected to arrive in this city next week, and will be the only member of the Supreme Court then in Washington. After an attentive reading of the petition, Guiteau signed it, remarking that it would be of no service as the case was closed in his opinion, and he added that his only hope lay in the President's intercession. Mr. Reed explained that it was necessary to first exhaust every legal resource. These proceedings will probably be begun in the early part of next week. Yielding to Gen. Crocker's solicitations Guiteau has finally consented to see a clergyman, and he was attended yesterday by Rev. Dr. Hicks, of Tabernacle Church, of this city. The interview lasted an hour, and the prisoner was much affected and earnestly joined in the prayers offered by the minister in his behalf.

PORTLAND, Oregon, June 10.—The average Republican majority on the State ticket is 1800. M. C. George, for Congress, will have nearly 3600 in the State, which is the largest majority ever given to any candidate. Moody, for Governor, will have about 100 less than George. The Republicans have the Legislature by a certain majority of ten, which may be increased to thirteen.

LYNCHBURG, Va., June 10.—A negro woman named Belle Lipscombe, finding that her child had small-pox, threw it in a well in the city suburbs several days since and escaped to the woods, three miles from Lynchburg. The dead body of the child was found Thursday, and the authorities of Campbell county captured the mother last night. She had contracted the small-pox from the child. If she survives, she will be brought here and tried for murder.

PHILADELPHIA, June 10.—The brig Henry T. Wing, from Havana, with molasses, arrived at quarantine to-day with two cases of yellow fever on board.

SAN FRANCISCO, June 9.—Advices from Honolulu state that the Cabinet resigned May 19. On the same day the King gave Hon. Walter M. Gibson the charge of forming a new ministry. The following gentlemen accepted portfolios: W. M. Gibson, Minister of Foreign Affairs and Premier; S. K. Kaai, Minister of the Interior; J. E. Bush, Minister of Finance, and Edward Preston, Attorney General.

SHREVEPORT, La., June 10.—The first bale of new cotton crop was received to-day from E. B. Herndon's place, a few miles above here, in Caddo parish. It presents a healthy appearance. Crops generally are reported as doing well.

CHICAGO, June 12.—A special from Danville, Va., says: Reports from Patrick county are to the effect that 5000 persons are starving. The drouth last year greatly curtailed crops. A load of corn was received at the court-house a few days ago. Hundreds of starving women and children crowded around the vehicle imploring to be given a quart or peck of corn. The court-house is crowded with men, women and children begging bread; 300 had not tasted food for two days. Several wagons with relief have been sent from Danville.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, June 7.—Mr. Davitt, in his speech at Liverpool last night, said that he was in favor of the land becoming national property. He considered that the soil of Ireland could be purchased for tenants for £140,000,000 in government bonds, repayable in fifty years. He denounced the Dublin Castle rule as a ministrous failure.

A dispatch to the Times from Cairo says: Efforts are being made to excite the population by stating that the Khedive has turned Christian and sold the country to the English. Well informed persons believe that if the attempts of Dervisch Pacha at conciliation fail, Arabi Pacha will cut the telegraph connections, take hostages and openly defy the Porte.

CONSTANTINOPLE, June 7.—Lord Dufferin and Marquis De Noailles, English and French ambassadors, have informed the Porte that their governments do not consider that the mission of Dervisch Pasha to Egypt has rendered the holding of the conference less necessary.

ALEXANDRIA, June 7.—The Turkish Commission has arrived here.

All foreign Consuls have visited Dervisch Pasha. The Khedive's master of ceremonies prevented Yacoub Pasha, who had been sent by the military party to receive Dervisch Pasha, from going aboard the Imperial yacht. Yacoub Pasha was subsequently presented to Dervisch Pasha with the other Egyptian officers.

VIENNA, June 7.—A dispatch to the Presse from St. Petersburg states that the Czar has approved the detailed plan of the coronation festivities, which remain fixed for September 7 or within a week of that date.

MADDALENA, June 8.—The remains of Garibaldi were interred in the cemetery at Caprera this afternoon. The funeral ceremonies began at forty-five minutes past three o'clock and closed at five o'clock. A storm of wind and rain raged the whole time. The coffin was covered with garlands and flowers, and was borne by some of the survivors of the "Thousand of Marsala," and was followed by the Duke of Genoa, Signor Zanardella, Gen. Ferriro, representatives of both chambers, and delegates of three hundred associations. Speeches were delivered at the grave by the Vice President of the Senate, the President of the Chamber of Deputies, the two Cabinet Ministers present and Signor Crispi. All applauded the deeds of the deceased. As the coffin was lowered into the grave salutes were fired by the Italian men-of-war Washington and Garibaldi.

The following is the telegram of condolence to Garibaldi's family sent by King Humbert: "From my youth up my father taught me admiration for Garibaldi. Later, I witnessed his heroic acts, and in my family admiration and gratitude grew greater. Accept my condolence, which is shared by the whole Italian nation."

BERLIN, June 9.—The customs amendments bill passed its third reading in the Reichstag, to-day. The government clauses proposing an increase of import duties on candles, honey, tallow, hewn and cut stones, slates, etc., were rejected.

CITY OF MEXICO, June 9.—The late heavy rains have done considerable damage to railways here. On the Vera Cruz and Central railways four bridges have been damaged, and an iron bridge on the National railway has been destroyed.

MADDALENA, June 9.—The family of Garibaldi will leave Caprera shortly to reside on the mainland.

HAVANA, June 10.—Thirty-five deaths from yellow fever occurred here during the week ending last night.

MADRID, June 10.—A bill has been introduced in the Chamber of Deputies, providing for the immediate abolition of slavery in Cuba and granting slaves civil rights.

CONSTANTINOPLE, June 12.—Much disappointment is felt at the occurrence of riots in Alexandria, as it tends to interfere with the mission of Dervisch Pasha and may lead to a renewal of the demand for a conference. The English and French ambassadors visited the Porte together to-day, for the purpose, it is believed, of asking for an explanation.

LONDON, June 12.—The correspondent of Reuter's Telegram Company at Cairo telegraphs that at a meeting of military leaders it was decided to petition the Khedive to abdicate. It was declared that if he did not he would be massacred. It is rumored that the cavalry and artillery will not join any conspiracy against the Khedive.

The Standard's dispatch from Alexandria reports that 4500 troops have arrived there from Cairo.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 12.—A decree published announcing that Gen. Ignatieff, at his own request, has been relieved of the post of Minister of the Interior on the ground of ill-health, and has been appointed to the Academy and member of the Senate. He retains his membership of Council of the Empire, and his adjutancy. Count Tolstoi, who was formerly president of the Academy, has been appointed Minister of the Interior.

Mr. F. P. Bonner, of Meadville, Pa., writes: "I feel like a new-born creature. Transformed from a crabby dyspeptic and nervous sufferer to a robust strong, healthy man, it all seems like a dream, yet Brown's Iron Bitters did it. I feel kindly toward everybody, especially to the inventors of so good a medicine."

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an imported piano because their mothers and grandmothers used to have one of the same make. What was considered a fine piano a hundred years ago, would be called a tin pan now; what suited our ancestors would not suit our daughters. Music more than all other arts, is progressive, and the difference between the spinette on which Mozart, and even Beethoven, played is, in comparison with the concert piano, say the Chickering of to day, as great as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European makers adhere to their old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. American pianos alone have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The Americans obtain durability by their iron plates and bars, volume of tone by over stringing, light touch by improved mechanism of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board. If a European piano has a valuable feature, American makers adopt it. There is no patent or copy-right on them. Take, for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago; this progress is very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which no other pianos possess. Their pin block (cut from the locks are bisked with maple, and the pins are inserted into the maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as many other pianos. Therefore it is not advisable for people to buy French pianos on which the government receives about $100,00 in duties, if a better toned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for less. I have no prejudice against foreign manufacture, and sold myself large numbers of imported pianos, but that was at a time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since I am in business, I have always striven to keep good, reliable and first-class pianos, and sell them as low as possible. By this policy, and fair dealing, I have built up my business, referring with pride to the thousand families I have supplied with music.

BEARER THE CROSS.

[illegible] the cross, the heart heaved
[illegible] without, no God within;
[illegible] from the heart, are driven
[illegible] the world's false glare and din.

[illegible] with all his loss,
[illegible] God hath set beneath the cross.

[illegible] the cross, the better Christian
[illegible] touchstone God applies,
[illegible] a garden within he washing
[illegible] power's flowers springing eyes
[illegible] be purified;
[illegible] diamonds by trouble tried.

[illegible] the cross, the stronger faith,
[illegible] faint patience takes deeper root
[illegible] more surely cleaveth
Where love hath pressed the clustered fruit
And courage grows where darkness rose,
Like pearl beneath the salt sea foam.

[illegible] the cross, the heavier grows
[illegible] Ever a most fragrant air,
[illegible] sky and wind were always fair
[illegible] savior wound not watch the story
And David's Psalms had never been sung
If on his heart had never writhed;

[illegible] the cross, the more uplifting;
[illegible] vales were little to mountain crest
[illegible] night, or the desert thrilling,
[illegible] for the Canaan of bliss at rest,
[illegible] dove hath no rest in field,
And to the ark she wings her flight.

[illegible] the cross, the easier dying;
Death is a friend or peace to see
[illegible] gladly one bids weekly cry,
Come unto Me, ye weary, and I will give you rest.
Faint I, and sick, and full of fear,
Lord, on Thy cross I love to rest,
And in the shadow of Thy cross
Oh, let me hide my weary head.

[illegible] the cross, the crowning year,
[illegible] for One cross my crown I wear.

China and Her People.

BY REV. J. W. LAMBUTH.

(Eighth Letter.)

My Dear Young Friends: I want to tell you something about the early introduction of Christianity into China, and of the great necessity for the spread of the gospel of Christ in this land of spiritual darkness.

It has been said the apostle Thomas was the first to introduce the Christian religion into China. The Buddhists speak of a man by the name of Tamosas having come from India by sea to China. There are other accounts of his having preached the gospel here, and then returned to India and died at Malabar. The Roman Catholics think this must have been the apostle Thomas. The name spoken of by the Chinese is nearly the same as that used in our present New Testament. We call his name in Chinese, Tamo.

Jews came into China some five or six centuries before the Christian era, and we know the Nestorians came into China in the seventh and eight centuries of the Christian era. Persia was the headquarters of this mission, and from there Bishops and Archbishops were sent to this land to spread the gospel among these people. Syrian missionaries first taught Christianity to the Mongolians, and from them they learned to write, and the present Mongolian alphabet is simply a modification of the Syrian. Prester John, the Tartar prince, was one of their converts. The Nestorians from some cause gradually lost their faith and enthusiasm and they soon ceased to visit China, and their converts gradually went back into heathenism; or were incorporated into the Roman Catholic Church. About the twelfth or thirteenth century the Nestorian Church ceased to exist in China, and only a stone tablet remains to tell of their former existence. In the fifteenth century Roman Catholics introduced Christianity, but everywhere they taught the worship of the Virgin Mary, and to-day their converts pray to her and trust in her for salvation. Many of their converts are ignorant of the vital doctrines of the Christian religion. They have been now three hundred years in China, and yet have not given the people the Bible.

The first Protestant missionary to enter China was the Rev. Robert Morrison from England. He met with much opposition from English merchants. Before entering upon this great work, his prayer to God was that he might be directed to the most difficult mission field in the world. The Lord directed his steps to China. He failed to procure passage in any of the East India merchant vessels on account of his profession, lest he might injure their trade in opium. He sailed from his own country for America, and took passage in one of our American vessels for China. When he reached Canton he found the doors closed against him and against Christianity. He labored under great difficulties, and was not allowed to preach the gospel at all. These difficulties continued for thirty-five long years, and he could do but little else than study the difficult language. Gutzlaff, Medhurst, Bridgeman and others followed him. They found the Chinese as determined as in the beginning to exclude Christianity from the country. They were watched as spies, and some natives were appointed by government who were to be responsible for their good conduct. Native merchants were instructed to observe the habits of the foreigners while they traded with them, and they were to teach them what their duty was and see that they performed it. The government officials were willing to tolerate the foreign merchant, but they could not bear the sight of a missionary, for they were looked upon as the spies of foreign governments, and were called "story-telling devils." Had Mr. Morrison at that time made known his intention to convert the Chinese to Christianity, he would have been expelled at once from the country. At first he was not allowed to have a teacher to aid him in the study of the language, and for this reason Mr. Morrison and other missionaries found it necessary to study the language on some of the Chalayan islands. The printing of books by foreigners was strictly forbidden, and this was another great difficulty in the way of the spread of the gospel in China.

It was not until 1842 that five ports were opened to foreign trades and the various missionary societies of England, America and Germany immediately sent men to occupy these open doors, and the entire Christian world hailed the occasion as a great blessing from God.

Our branch of the church selected Shanghai for future missionary operations, and in 1847 appointed Rev. Drs. Taylor and Jenkins, of the South Carolina Conference, to that work. These two brethren were among the first missionaries to occupy this important field. We now occupy a part of the province of Kiangsu, where we have access to at least ten or twelve millions of immortal souls in utter spiritual darkness.

When I reached China in 1854 there were not more than three hundred native Christians in all China. Now there are more than eighteen thousand, and the number is rapidly increasing. From the north and from the south and from the interior of China we hear of hundreds, yea, whole villages, are forsaking idolatry and are embracing Christianity.

The heathen need the enlightening and sanctifying influences of the Holy Spirit, and they need the joy and hope which the gospel can bring them, and without which they must perish. Never, in any past period of the history of the church, has there been so wide a door of usefulness opened, neither has there ever been so great a demand upon the efforts and resources of the church. Never has there been so large a mission field, and none of such vastness and grandeur as the great empire of China. Her doors are opened wide, and Christians are invited to come and take part in establishing the kingdom of Christ.

When we see the vast spiritual destitution which is spread all over this land, we can not help exclaiming: "How urgent the claims of this vast empire upon the Christian world!" The demon of idolatry has debased and brutalized the minds of the millions of China. Everywhere Satan reigns in the hearts of men who are without God in the world.

My dear young friends, think of the teeming millions in China who are without the gospel of Christ. No nation has been left for so many long centuries in total darkness, and this is sufficient proof that no people can raise themselves from such degradation without divine revelation. Pray for these heathen that they may soon receive the gospel and accept of Christ. Do what you can to help send the glad news of salvation to them, and may the Lord bless you in this work is my earnest prayer. I will write again soon and tell you more about the people.

Pray for us in China.

SHANGHAI, CHINA, April 22, 1882.

"He Calleth His Own Sheep by Name."

BY REV. J. M. WEEMS.

We may be perfectly assured that the Great Shepherd has a personal acquaintance with each of us; and that we each bear a name, significant of one or more accidents in life, that makes our individual history as distinctive as if we were alone in the world. And while it is the duty of the Christian to contribute the fullness of his life to the aggregated forces of the whole body; yet God sees the endeavor and measures the effectiveness of each person in the completion of the entire work. If great good is accomplished in a church, or a community of churches, its aggregated effects will be acknowledged and blessed of God; but there will also be the reward of the individual according to the contribution of his ability to the success. Would that this truth might be impressed upon those who are little, if any more than idle spectators of the church's efforts to save a lost world. Those of us who, if we feel any obligation to the cause lie smeared by the humiliation, the blood and the death of the Son of God, neither confess it to ourselves nor to him who holds the exclusive right to our affections and to dispose of our time. And the more is this impression of duty and danger necessary since Christ hath said: "Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast; that no man take thy crown." Are they not those in every congregation of worshipers, whose indifference to the duties of the Christian life may well lead us to fear that in the day when each shall be called to give an account of himself to the Great Judge, the exclamation of the whole church will be: Alas! my brother! And if the consciousness that the Lord knows us as individuals increases the sense of responsibility, it also gives hope, in that it reveals our personal possibilities. How sublimely beautiful and encouraging are these words: "But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord." They are so carefully placed between the threatened and executed vengeance of God, so as to heaven time with new hope, and give to the mercy of Heaven a channel in which to flow and fructify the withered flowers of Eden. Another instance, not less impressive and beautiful, is given in the words of Abraham when the Lord told him his resolve to destroy the cities of the plain: "That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked; and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee: shall not the Judge of all the earth do right?" And as he gave evidence to Abraham then, so are we assured now, that he will do right. If wickedness is wrought, the innocent will not be held responsible with the guilty. The Lord knows each person by name. "And needeth not that any should testify of man; for he knew what was in man." Seeing then, beloved, our individual responsibility, and opportunity, let us go boldly in the way of duty to God and to man, that we may be approved as worthy servants of the great King.

MOSS POINT, MISS., June 12, 1882.

From Keatchie, La.

MR. EDITOR: We have had many good things to talk about, but, owing to the press of business, we have deferred from time to time until now; and, perhaps, we would not speak now, but we have just been overwhelmed by the good works of our dear ladies; so we will commence at omega and tell you all about what the Lord has done for our soul and our circuit. Last month the ladies of Bell Bower and Keatchie organized an Auxiliary Woman's Missionary Society at this place. They met the first time yesterday; the secretary reported fifty members, and the treasurer reported nearly nine dollars for first month's collections. Last Sunday eve the ladies of Friendship Church organized another Auxiliary Woman's Missionary Society, and it would have done your soul good to have been there. Every lady and every little girl that were members of our church, (and many of other denominations) joined. The ladies of Friendship Church have arranged for a Sunday-school missionary celebration, to get up a Sunday school boom, and a general interest in the Woman's Missionary Society. The general outlook for the church is good. We have been very graciously received and amply provided for; and, from the kindly manner in which they speak of our predecessor (Bro. Elverman, and their dealings with him), we feel assured that the future will even be better than the past. The good ladies, immediately upon our arrival, procured and furnished very cosily (with everything needful) a nice little office for us; and daily they reiterate their kindness by sending us so many nice things, from flowers and fruits up to the substantials and realities of life. Indeed, we have been very pleasantly disappointed in this village, for we rather expected to find something of a Texas frontier town with a race-course, three groceries and one union school-house church; on the contrary, we have found an elegant little villa, with educated, cultivated church going people. I have heard only one oath in the place, and I am sure the party did not know I was near. There is no regular grocery doggerel here, but quite a number of fine public buildings. There is an immense Baptist institute of learning with eleven chimneys kissing the sky, a nice Methodist and a nice Presbyterian Church complete, besides a Baptist Church in process, worth about twenty-five hundred dollars each; in addition to this is a public school of about forty pupils. This community has spent about six thousand dollars for public buildings in the past twenty odd months. We have been carrying on a regular weekly prayer meeting here, which is growing in interest, number and spirituality. When the door of the church was opened a few weeks since, nine came up and gave us their hands. There is a good current going through the entire congregation. We are hoping, praying and believing that we shall have a gracious revival here. In all our experience we have never seen young people so polite, quiet, attentive, and regular at church. Bro. Pipes, as usual, is saying very little, and doing a great deal; he is always in time and in tune. We have organized several class meetings and itinerant prayer meetings on our work, and we have been to regions beyond helping Bro. Minick, at Logansport, where we have organized a church and have taken in several members, with circumstances propitious, prospect encouraging and people attentive. We found two Sunday-schools at work on this circuit. We have organized six others, all with about an average attendance of twenty-five pupils each, and improving in interest and numbers. Especially is this so with our Winter Grove school near Friendship; there we have about forty members with a superabundant supply of the very best teachers, and teachers and pupils are all working in the Spirit. Nor is Bell Bower behind. The very eldest with sixty-nine members, a superintendent who is never dry, and music that breathes with words that burn our hearts within us, and Keatchie, though distanced numerically, at least has a superintendent full of love. Man-field commencement is the all absorbing topic here at present. Bro. Borden is about to close one of the most successful terms of that institute—eight graduates, all taking the first honors. We think with the railroad facilities, and other fortuitous circumstances, Mansfield will have next fall the largest and best school in the State—perhaps, two hundred pupils; but lest this communication should get long enough to reach the waste basket, we will conclude by telling you what Bro. Pipes and I are working, praying and looking for this year: First, a general revival in every house, and at every appointment with one thousand new converts; next, we want the subscriptions of the ADVOCATE trebled; then we want our missionary collections to equal the preachers' receipts. These things are not only in the possibilities, but in the probabilities. We have promises; pray for us. We are making arrangements for a very gracious camp meeting at Cypress Loop Ground, which will embrace the second Sabbath in August. If you will send Bishop Parker up to help us, we will pledge you one hundred new subscribers, if Bro. Pipes and I have to pay for half of them. With earnest prayers and hearty congratulations for Bishop Parker in his new office, and hoping that when he comes he may find many walking in love; with a heart brimful of good wishes for the ADVOCATE, and a prayer that the Holy Shekinah may come down on all this year, with grace upon all them that love our Lord Jesus in sincerity, I am,

Yours in truth,

NON.

North-Alabama Notes.

MR. EDITOR: I had the pleasure of serving with Bishop Parker on the Committee on Itinerancy, and he requested that I should send him notes from North Alabama. I promised, and, in fulfillment of that promise, I send these lines. If their continuance is not desired, you can let me know.

The Huntsville Female College has just closed a very prosperous and successful year. The commencement was a brilliant one. That good and gifted man from Nashville, the Rev. R. K. Brown, preached the sermon. Though the day was inclement a large congregation assembled to hear him, as is always the case when he visits Huntsville. He was the loved and honored pastor of this church for years. The sermon was what might have been expected—a strong, pure gospel sermon, replete with instruction, delivered in a clear, forcible style. Bro. J. J. Ransom, of Brazil, delivered an address and preached one sermon during the occasion, both of which captivated our people and fully sustained the enviable reputation of this consecrated young man. The Rev. S. A. Steel, of the North Mississippi Conference, delivered the commencement address. The effort was equal to the occasion and the man. Bro. Steel is a finished scholar and an accomplished orator, and always instructs and delights his audience.

We are fortunate in having the Rev. A. B. Jones, A. M., as our president. Born and bred in a college, he understands the conduct of such an institution. The college, under his administration, has taken a sudden bound forward, and the future prospects are most flattering. He is not only a good college president, but is one of the most efficient Sunday-school superintendents in my knowledge. Everywhere you place him he moves with energy and works successfully. His moral training is emphasized upon the pupils, and during a protracted meeting in our church many of his boarding pupils were converted.

I know of no school which offers better advantages than the Huntsville Female College. Located in the midst of a healthful, refined community, presided over by a most estimable Christian gentleman, assisted by a learned and competent faculty, he comes before the public with every assurance of success.

Bishop Hargrove is to hold our District Conference, which meets on Thursday before the fifth Sunday in July.

The Alabama and North Alabama delegations were especially delighted at the election of this excellent man to the office of Bishop. He is one of us, and we hope he may locate in our State.

Methodism in North Alabama is strong, the dominant church, and since the organization of the North Alabama Conference has rapidly developed. In 1870, at Gadsden, Ala., Bishop Paine organized our Conference, and our statistics then showed 23,000 members. The last session held in Huntsville, Ala., shows a membership of 35,000, and in material prosperity our growth has kept pace with the increase of membership.

Our section has vastly improved owing to the iron industry. All people have heard of Birmingham, and the almost exhaustless iron and coal in that region. Immense capital has been invested, and still capitalists are seeking investments in that favored region.

Birmingham is called the Magic City, for in a few years it has advanced from a village to city-like proportions and pretensions. House rent is scarcely obtainable, and brings almost fabulous prices. In our own beautiful city, Huntsville, in the last twelve months, three establishments have been erected and are now in successful operation. 1. A cotton seed oil mill, which has been run to its utmost capacity since its erection, and pays handsomely. We have also a cotton factory, and the stock holders are so well pleased with the outlook that the capital has been doubled and additional building are in course of erection. And last, we have a cotton chopper factory. This machine is an invention of Capt. Curry, of our county, and seems to meet a desideratum in cotton culture. Every farmer knows that the critical time with cotton is the first chopping out. This machine, with one hand and one pair of mules, will chop ten acres per day, and do it well, besides cultivating the ground while at work. One will have to see it at work to appreciate it. Our wheat crop, according to the amount sown, is most abundant and of good quality, so of oats, and corn is promising; but the weather is too cold for cotton.

JOHN A. THOMPSON.

HUNTSVILLE, ALA., June 9, 1882.

Your Colors are There!

There is an authentic story of a regiment in the Crimean war, which had failed in some critical hour and in consequence had been deprived of its colors. After a period of degradation, they requested to have their regimental standards restored. It was at a time when some strong position of the enemy on a fortified hill was to be captured, involving extraordinary hazard and heroism. The commander's reply was—pointing to the very summit of the hostile entrenchment: "Yours colors are there!" In an instant, alike, stung by the reproach and stimulated by the hope set before them, the men went up with a shout; and, reckless of all losses, stayed not their hands till their old humbled flag was flouting proudly on the hill-top.

So it seems to us did the Lord's commissioned army, which he laid under solemn and immediate orders to go into all the world and evangelize all nations, falter in the very crisis of the movement. It soon lost the apostolic spirit of the first century, and began to live for its own sake and strengthening. As a consequence its glory departed, and its morale was lost amid wordly aims and divided counsels; and it has done little since but to be prone and dislodged on the heaving tide of human history. "In dim eclipse, shielding" it—at best, a poor "twilight over half the nations."

But as the conflict deepens and the last days draw nigh, there are many signs that this delinquent regiment of Christ has begun to awake to its own disgrace and betrayal of its Lord. At the beginning of the century there was an evident stir in the camp, and their loud voices were heard calling on the sluggards; and soon a rubbing of the eyes to look over the vast unconquered world, and a furbishing up of armor; and now the steady and gathering tramp of detachments on their way to the field. The whole army is once more mobilized, and, before this generation passes away, will be moving. And those who shall take no part, or have no heart for the work, will be thereby mustered out of the Lord's host.

A generation! Dr. W. P. Mackay, preaching one day to some British soldiers, put the question: "If Queen Victoria were to issue a proclamation, and placing it in the hands of her army and navy should say, 'Go into all the world and proclaim it to every creature,' how long do you think it would take to do it?" One of these men, accustomed to obeying orders without questioning or delay and at the peril of their lives, replied, (he was a grave and intelligent officer): "I think we could manage it in about eighteen months." And who can doubt it? Or what shall hinder the church, in this day of almost miraculous facilities, from taking its King's proclamation to every creature in very nearly, if not quite, the same time?

At least, till she does she will remain a humbled, fragmentary and demoralized force. Her colors are there,—on the furthest hill-top, up the steepest ascent, where Satan's seat is! They are not to be mistaken for "standards" of theology, however orthodox, nor offset by ecclesiastical statistics however "gratifying." They are not floating from church spires, however lofty, nor consist in decoration however gorgeous. They are not won even by polishing the "Sword of the spirit" through new revisions nor yet in fighting infidelity at home, all the preaching and the expositions of Christian scientists could not make Charles Darwin bow to the claims and power of the gospel, as the humble missionaries in Patagonia did. No, her colors are there, on that farthest verge of the "hill of darkness," where the last neglected creature stands in suspicions reproachfulness. When the last waiting tribe shall behold the feet of them that bring the glad tidings, then and not till then, her light shall have come and the glory of the Lord have risen upon her,—the glory and power and joy, which attend the visible standard and the shout of a king in the camp.—Christian Intelligencer.

Good Words.

All this world is God's own field
Fruit unto His praise to yield.
Wheat and tares therein are sown,
Seed of joy or sorrow grown.
Ripening with a wondrous power
Till the final harvest hour.
Grant, O Lord of life, that we
Holy grain and pure may be.

—Horatius Bonar.

I see what rhetoric does, and what it seems to do, and I thoroughly despise it. I think it makes men worse instead of better; exposes the feelings to tonsion, like the pulling constantly back of a spring, until the spring loses its elasticity, becomes weak or breaks; and yet, perhaps, I do it injustice with unmanwordly, noble love to give it reality, what might it not do?—F. W. Robertson.

—An every-day religion—one that loves the duties of our common walk; one that makes an honest man; one that accomplishes an intellectual and moral growth in the subject; one that works in all weather, and improves all opportunities, will best and most healthily promote the growth of a Church and the power of the Gospel.—Bushnell.

—Try to save one—lead one wanderer to the fold of Christ. What a work is that, and if successful, what results for the highest interest of Christ's kingdom may follow through eternal ages! You may not plan successfully for the evangelization of a city, but you may save a soul from death. Don't fail to do it.

—Many times when our friend would honestly help us, and strive to do it, yet will he never bring himself to understand what we really need, and so to forward us on our path; but insist more simply on our taking his path, and leaves us as incorrigible because we will not and can not.—Carlyle.

—The finer the nature, the more flaws will it show through the clearness of it. The best things are seldomest seen in their best form. The wild grass grows well and strongly one year with another: but the wheat is, by reason of its greater noldeness, liable to a bitterer blight.—Ruskin.

—If it be asked, "How can God be influenced by our prayers?" it is a sufficient answer to reply, that he says he is so influenced. If asked again, "How can God answer a particular prayer in a world of general laws?" it is a sufficient reply that he is God.—J. P. Thompson.

—"I have a surprising facility in writing my verses," said Racine to Boileau, ingeniously. "I want to teach you to write them with difficulty," answered Boileau, "and you have talent enough to learn before long."

—The fact that no death bed has witnessed a repentance for a Christian life, no regrets over time wasted in the pursuit of a deceptive phantom, seems the strongest of motives for a reasonable man's faith in Christ.

—If not for that of conscience, yet at least for ambition's sake, let us reject ambition; let us dishonor that thirst of honor and renown so low and inordinate that it makes us beg it of all sorts of people.—Montaigne.

COURAGE, FAINT HEART.

Dear God, I am so weary of it all,
I fain would rest me for a little space,
Is there no great rock where the shadows fall,
That I may cast me down and hide my face?

I work and strive, sore burdened and afraid,
The road is dusty and the way is long,
And the weak staff, whereby my steps are stayed,
Bends like a reed when bitter winds are strong.

I shrink in terror from the cruel task,
I look with horror on the barren land,
And ask, as only hopeless hearts can ask,
The meaning of my days to understand?

"Weary?" And who is not,
That bears life's burdens faithfully? Trudge on
A little longer. When your sun has set
You will have reached the spot
Where you may rest.

"Afraid? Afraid of what?
What does earth hold that can compare
With God's omnipotence? Trust to his care,
Make faith in him your staff—
It will not bend.

Poor soul! And don't you know
Without the work and strife and weary days
You would not long for rest? These are God's ways,
That win you from the life below
Up to his rest.

Your "shrink?" O coward heart!
You've but a day's work in a day to do,
The meaning of the days you'll some time know.
Your task lies with each part—
To do it well.

"Hopeless?" And heaven remains?
I see. You are not willing to be led,
You would know why and where you go, and dread
The trackless, barren plains
That lie beyond.

Your weariness shows just
The measure of the help you need. The way
That's hidden, the point at which your steps longest stay,
God's care begin. So trust,
And he will lead.

RULE ON DRESS.

The evils resulting from a passion for fashionable attire, apart from religious influences, are not unknown to wise men, many of whom have written of the drain on overtaxed minds and physical powers, of stinted home comforts, broken fortunes, suicides, and a train of evils too numerous to mention, consequent on the desire of wives and daughters to keep up with the latest demand of fashion.

To these evils may be added, that the cultivation of the intellect, and correct sensibilities of heart, are superceded by frivolous thoughts and employments. Well may Christians say, this is no time to encourage superfluity of dress. A suggestion has several times been made, through your columns, as to the propriety of expunging the rule on dress, because of the inconsistency of its being held and read in the congregation, while palpably contradicted by the acts of our own members. Was the remedy for disobedience according to the Divine or Mosaic code to repeal law? Were this principle carried out in civil or family government, can not the most simple-minded see to what a level human beings would be reduced?

One of your correspondents said: "If Mr. Wesley was wrong in inserting the rule it should not be retained." Were Mr. Wesley unsatisfied by Scripture it would make a difference. But hear the words of inspiration by St. Peter. Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair supposed to mean ornamenting with plates of gold or silver, wearing of gold or putting on of apparel, but let it be the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit. The objector says this only means to inculcate the latter. Is not the heart influenced by externals, and is there not the tendency to conform our feelings to them, or express our feelings by them? Hear also St. Paul on this subject: In like manner also that women adorn themselves in modest apparel, with shame-facedness and sobriety, Not with broidered hair, or gold or pearls or costly array, but which becometh women professing godliness with good works. It is assumed that this is only figurative. Proof is more cogent than assertion. What mean the significant not, and the no less emphatic but, as if to signify that both do not flourish on the same soil. Many say these things do not affect me; I never think of them. Can it be possible that the time and anxious zeal necessary for conforming to fashion, and the reaction from without, do not encourage vanity and many roots of the old Adam, which should be buried, that grace may abound? Where our understanding of Scripture is doubtful, it is better to err on the safe side than on that to which our desires incline us. Few evils suddenly develop their fruits. Ever since the old serpent deluded our first parent by his insidious subtlety it has been his device to disguise sin in its most attractive colors, and leading the young, step by step, to blind their minds to future results. It is not necessary to enter the ball-room for confirmation of disobedience to St. Paul's injunction. The social evening party will furnish sufficient evidence of its violation, even by church members, and such deviations are indispensible preparatory steps for, and adjuncts of, the fascinating round dance. Watchmen of Zion! have none of you contributed to these things? Let judgment begin at the house of God. It is inconsistent in some of you to read the rule on dress, while gold sparkles on your own persons and those of your wives and daughters. Particularly that most objectionable of ornaments—weights in the ears. They furnished convenient material for Aaron's molten calf, and since that time it may have been said of many: Ephraim is joined to his idols; let him alone. It was lately written by a pious lady that as she continued to consecrate herself she found that she must give up many articles of dress she had not previously thought wrong. This has been the testimony of the most eminent saints of all ages and churches. So far has Methodism declined in this and other things that not only may it be said of them what do ye more than others? but some of them are surprised that such obsolete nonsense should be suggested. By all means let the rule be retained and the instructions of our Discipline be followed. The minister who does his duty has need of more than an ordinary amount of moral courage and wisdom, as many of our amiable, influential members, and even church dignitaries, might be unfavorable to the rule. Let him do his duty, and leave the event with God. Much may be done by kind exhortation and instruction, and by explaining our rules to applicants for membership. May the Lord revive our spirituality, grant unction to his ministers, and to members of the church the hearing ear and the understanding heart.

Letter from Rev. T. Y. Ramsey, Sr.

MR. EDITOR: We have recently been made to feel sad by the announcement of the death of two of the oldest members of the Alabama Conference—the Conference in which I have spent the most of my ministerial life—Rev. Thomas S. Abernathy and Rev. Thomas O. Summers, D. D., LL. D. In my boyhood my father settled in Marengo county, Ala., in the neighborhood in which Bro. Abernathy lived a worthy and acceptable local preacher. He sustained that relation until I had been received into the Conference several years, when he was readmitted. He had gone to that State some years before as a missionary from the Tennessee Conference. As a local preacher he was popular and useful. A good man, true to the church, and died beloved and respected by a large circle of friends. This is the testimony of one who knew him long and well to his great worth as a Christian minister.

I first met Dr. Summers in 1843 at a camp meeting, near the residence of the late L. Q. C. DeYampert, in Perry county, Ala. Mr. DeYampert got up the camp meeting for the purpose of having his old Georgia friend, Dr. L. Pierce, with him once more, who was then in charge of Franklin Street Church, Mobile. Dr. Pierce came to Demopolis by steamer, where I was then living. Learning that he wanted a conveyance to the camp ground, I got a horse and buggy and drove him out. It is with great pleasure that I often revert to that day's ride. I was seriously contemplating entering the ministry, and the wise counsel and instruction I received from that eminent man of God have been of inestimable value to me. It had great influence in giving shape to my future life.

There I met Dr. Summers, who was then a missionary in Texas, and was making a tour of the States soliciting contributions to aid in building a church in Houston. I subsequently met him several times, during that summer and fall at different places, laboring efficiently in the protracted meetings—that being the most remarkable year for revivals of religion ever known in that section of country. Though he was then a young man; yet, by his varied attainments, his excellent preaching, and happy, genial disposition, he won all hearts, and formed friendships which lasted to the day of his departure from among us. Dr. Summers was a learned and wise man; one of the most remarkable men Methodism has ever produced. We missed him very much at the late Vanderbilt commencement. He always performed a conspicuous part on those occasions, and added very much to their interest. The question is frequently asked: Who shall fill his place? "God buries workmen, but carries his work on."

I congratulate you, Mr. Editor, upon your recent transfer to the editorial tripod. I shall miss the weekly visits of the familiar hand of your honored predecessor, but feel that the dear old ADVOCATE will lose nothing by the change. You are right in the line of succession. The ADVOCATE is popular in this part of our Conference, which once belonged to the Mississippi Conference.

I have entered upon the third round on the Wanona district. It has, in some respects, been a year of great discouragement; yet we have much to encourage us. The preachers in the district are a corps of as faithful men as we have in our Conference, and we have strong hope that their labors will not be in vain. The spiritual condition is variable: some parts good, others low down. So of the financial state. While some charges are paying as well as usual, others are doing almost nothing. But we hope to wind up all right in the end.

DURANT, Miss., June 8, 1882.

By Invalid.

Every day Nature unfolds from her treasury some new and beautiful wonder of God's own creation; every day the grass and trees grow greener, the birds sing more and in gladder, sweeter notes; every day some new flower opens for the adorning of Spring's garments of beauty, snow-white, creamy, pink, crimson, violet, blue, gold and emerald—rarest gems in Nature's floral crown—gemmed with pearly dew, and dazzling with the Creator's glorious sunshine that falls in showers of gold—

"Filling the earth with its golden haze."

Emblems of resurrection greet the eye wherever it may wander, and all seems active life and labor. All save these feeble trembling hands that can not obey the will. In vain I try to resume my unfinished work! Alas! that all my life-work should be marked "unfinished."

Impotent, lying at the gate,
I can no longer work, but wait.
The years roll o'er me like the waves,
While others hasten to their graves.
I linger on "the borderland,"
Upon the brink I seem to stand.
So useless, it is "passing strange"
So weary, waiting for the change.
On "earthly things" I shut my eyes
And view the promised land that lies,
Just over the waters that divide
This land from where the saints abide;
And oh! that land is not so far—
It seems its gates are now "ajar,"
And from the radiant throne and crown
There beams a "golden glory" down
Upon me as I "watch and wait;"
Where through the "pearly" open gate
I see "the place prepared" for me,
Where soon with Jesus I shall be!

Often during the past two weeks, while passing through more than usual agonies, with eyes closed upon all earthly beauties, such "visions of peace," a "mirage," as it were, of the holy city—"the new Jerusalem coming down from God out of heaven"—have passed before me in such panoramic beauty that I was so enraptured that I thought as the blind bard hail expressed himself when "seeing by faith" alone when he "had naught to fear:"

"O! I's 'a-to call
Trembling, where foot of mortal ne'er hath been,
Whipped in the radiance of thy sinless land
Which eye hath never seen.
Visions come and go!
Shapes of resplendent beauty round me throng:
From angel lips I seem to hear the flow
Of soft and holy song."

But oh! these sweet dreams of heaven are often rudely broken when Pain with ruthless, nay, with merciless hand, I often think, causes me to realize that I am still "in the body," and I know that I must yet bear "a little more rough tossing." Well, what is that to me if he bid me "tarry till he come?" "Even so, Lord Jesus;" "only let me walk with thee."

"Not for ease or worldly pleasure,
Nor for fame my prayer shall be;
Gladly will I toil and suffer,
Only let me walk with thee."

In the long and painful "night watches," through the days of restless, ceaseless agony, there comes not "a breath of wrath" to me from over the waves; but the Master says:

"All thy eyes are watching by thy bed,
All thy arms are underneath thy head
My blessing is around thee stored,
'Tis I, be not afraid!"

Oh, "the blessing" of the precious promises! How they sustain me, when tempted to "think it strange concerning this fiery trial!" Hush your voices

"Impatient soul and murmuring heart,
Your murmuring cease, and bear your part,
Of pain and labor on life's road,
For soon 'twill lead thee to thy God."

Yes, this "pain and labor on life's road" will soon be "finished;" for "by-and-by will soon be now," and I care not what I "suffer in the flesh," so that I am made "perfect through sufferings."

Rest.

MR. EDITOR: Every man, whether farmer, teacher, lawyer, physician, merchant, editor or minister, if he works faithfully for eight or ten months, needs a period of rest. The busy housewife, perplexed with the cares of life, also needs some cessation of the tension upon the nervous system. There is a large class of teachers, editors and preachers in the South who greatly need this rest in the summer.

Last summer, on the twenty-fifth of June, we (myself and wife,) closed our school in the academy at this place. We were almost completely broken down from overwork. We decided that mountain air was better than "doctor's pills." Consequently we procured round-trip tickets, good till September, and went to the mountains of East Tennessee and Virginia. Our route was via Montgomery, Calera, Rome, Dalton, etc., the agent of which route is John M. Wyly, Montgomery, Ala. We spent our time mostly in the country, where the best fare, at moderate prices, can be had.

We met the family of ex-Gov. Nicholls, of Louisiana, while in East Tennessee, and found them very pleasant and delighted with the climate.

We returned about the first of September, feeling that we had almost entered a "new life," and fresh and ready for another session's work. Others who went with us experienced a like result. I know that many of your readers will desire to know where they can get more information in reference to this matter. There is a "Guide" published every summer, containing complete information, and perfectly reliable, a copy of which can be had by writing to John M. Wyly, Montgomery, Ala., or James R. Ogden, Knoxville, East Tennessee. I offer the above as an effort to benefit our people who desire and need rest. We have just completed and painted a parsonage here. Our pastor, Rev. John Saunders, is doing a good work. He is now at Clayton, assisting in a meeting there.

SEASHORE DISTRICT.

At the last session of the Mississippi Conference Bishop Keener placed as fine a corps of preachers in the pastorate of this district as in any district in our Conference. We have with us one of the oldest effective men in the Conference. He is very acceptable in his charge. He is punctual, always there and begins at the time, preaches well, seems to hold a small opinion of himself. His brethren esteem him highly. He goes where the church sends him; drops no remarks that make the impression that the insignificant work is not in keeping with his ability and availability as a preacher.

We have another man in some respects his opposite; first, he is a young man; then he duly credits himself for what ability he possesses, and he possesses some. I think he will make a useful man in the church if he does not fall into the baneful idea that he is not appreciated. The man that claims for himself more than the world concedes to him, gives himself credit for more discernment than he allows to the world. The modest man that is really unappreciated, is about the last man to discover it. The world makes more mistakes in accrediting merit where it is not, than failing to acknowledge it where it is. These last remarks have a general and not a special application.

No. 3, is a man unknown in the Conference. His mental powers are far above the average; he handles difficult questions with apparent ease; his manners are elegant; while very companionable, he is modest almost to diffidence. He lacks somewhat in that indescribable something we call tact to achieve the fullest success as a Methodist preacher. Determined effort on his part will bring him to prominence among his brethren.

No. 4, is a good, smooth, quiet, earnest preacher. In him the quick and deliberate are strangely mingled. Sometimes he thinks he is not as big a man as he ought to be, and he certainly is not what more time among his books would have made him.

No. 5, is strong almost at every point, has a fine analytical mind, is deeply pious, zealous, a splendid preacher; he is ready to enter every open door, and will not wait long for somebody else to open the door. He hails from Sinai, sprinkles brimstone. More experience will make him a man.

No. 6, is a sensible, prudent, cautious brother, not much disposed to "beard the lion in his den." He has read the motto: "Prudence is the better part of valor." He bears with the infirmities of the weak, and persuades men to be reconciled to God.

No. 7, is not regarded as a special Solomon by anybody, but he runs with a good deal of steam. He "casts his net on the right side of the ship," and always appears "to find." He does a good work wherever he goes; is drawing a load that many a larger engine could not move.

No. 8, I think, is not regarded as a man of great mental caliber, but he is great in using what he has. He uses his capital to fine advantage. He is a close student and a good pastor—two excellent, but somewhat rarely combined qualities. He does every part of his work well. He has strong intuitive faculties, seems to take in the situation at a glance. It is thought he would make a good presiding elder.

No. 9, is a young man of fine natural powers, cultured in some degree, has a popular turn, intends to do his best, and is not too wise to be instructed. I predict success for him in the ministry, if some admiring friend does not put it in his head that he certainly ought to be sent to Vicksburg or Jackson in a year or two.

No. 10, would be called a good preacher almost anywhere, deeply pious, but a lazy bone in him, talks to the children, punctilious in every part of his work. He is more apt to overdo than underdo. A slight acidity in his disposition tides him back from much greater popularity and usefulness. I have two others yet undescribed, a margin you see.

MANSFIELD FEMALE COLLEGE.

The examination of the graduating class began on Wednesday, May 31, and closed on Friday last. The examination was thorough. The eight young ladies who compose the class showed extraordinary proficiency. Their answers were ready and pertinent, given in a clear and accurate style. They richly deserve the honors they will receive.

At night a reception was given by the young ladies of the senior class. Many of the young people from the town and country were present, and the occasion was most enjoyable. The examination of undergraduates will commence on June 9.

Bro. Gardenshire shows the effects of the strain under which he has labored during the year. The times have been distressingly hard, yet the college was never more prosperous. Diligent in business, fervent in spirit, serving the Lord. These three noble qualities are fully met with in him, and he well deserves the hearty sympathy and co-operation of the brethren everywhere. COLPORTEUR'S REPORT.

It is with gratitude to God, and pleasurable emotions of the soul, that we locate this report of our work in Cameron parish. No people ever tried harder to make our stay among them not only comfortable, but pleasant; and it does fill our hearts with delight when we think of their generosity, hospitality and liberality, for they are all these. They are a church-going people, and know how to appreciate a good sermon, and care for the temporal wants of a minister. Our stay among them was short, but very pleasant. Our home was at John M. McCall's. Though not a professor of religion, yet he has many good qualities and examples that official church members would do well to imitate. He had family devotion night and morning during my stay, and gave liberally of his means to the cause. Their preacher is a most estimable young man, and I do hope he will do much good among so noble a people. I can not forget the good people of Johnson's Bayou, among whom are Rev. Jos. Berwick, Rev. W. H. Eddleman and his father, and our special friend, Mr. Donahee, with Bro. and Sister Peveto, who know well how to honor God in caring for his servants. Many will be the pleasant reflections about the good people of Cameron. We can not close this report without special mention of our French friends, who received us most kindly, and supplied themselves with Bibles, and among them was a young man, twenty-three years of age, who closed the religious exercises with prayer for us at preaching, an example worthy of imitation by our Protestant young men. I can say truthfully that I never want to meet a more hospitable people than those of Cameron. Forty-four days worked; visited 352 families, 182 found destitute, 157 supplied, 105 individuals supplied. Traveled 770 miles, preached 15 sermons, sold 336 books, worth $111 70, donated 41 books, worth $8 15. Total books, 380, worth $119 85; collected for Bible cause, $11 50.

M. P. BURGESS, Colporteur.

LINTON, LA.

MR. EDITOR: We have just dedicated a new church. Rev. T. W. Brown preached the sermon. Rejoice with us. We organized with twelve members, one of whom joined this year, and was received into full connection on the day of dedication. We call our church "Beulah." The attendance was large. The dinner was as excellent for the body as the sermon preceding was for the soul.

We are indebted to the untiring efforts of Bro. and Sister Gerhard Huff for this new house of worship. Others helped to the full of their ability. We hope, by the blessing of God, to dedicate one more church this year. Our people seem to have caught the spirit of church extension. North Wilkinson circuit still lives, and the prospects are good for a wide-spread increase of spirituality. May God bless you and the ADVOCATE.

The Creed of Penitence.

There are many able men in our country at this day, "who profess and call themselves Christians," and who take a busy part in all the higher activities and movements of our times, who simply smile at the experience of a sin-burdened sinner; who, if you speak to them of the witness of the human conscience to God's righteousness and holiness as demanding an atonement—of the impossibility of peace, except on the conditions which God has laid down in his word—of the unrest and misery of a spirit which, conscious not of transgression only, but of a fatal proneness to transgress, not of sins only, but of sin, has never been brought by faith into the peace of God—will tell you that it is a mere delusion, a morbid moral state, to be treated seriously and even reverently as a solemn reality to the sufferer, but having no other reality, no ground in the mind of God toward the sinner, and the way of God in the forgiveness of souls. They tell us that if a man can but feel that all this care and pain is foolish, and useless, throw himself on the simple goodness of God to forget the past, and strive to do better for the future, that is all that God requires—then all is well, all is peace.

It is not the creed of the penitent; and while the world lasts the penitent's creed will express the conviction and feeling of mankind. "For all have sinned and come short of the glory of God." "There is no man that doeth good, and sinneth not." "Enter not into judgment with thy servants, O Lord God, for in thy sight shall no man living be justified." "Father, I have sinned against heaven and thee, and I am no more worthy to be called thy son." At the root of this creed lies the conviction which I am considering. Right and wrong, good and evil, are fixed and absolute opposites. Opinions of men may vary, the good of one country may be the evil of another, the right of one age may be the wrong of the next, but the things themselves do not vary; they abide immutable, because there is one who knows them and before whom they are real, who abides immutable; and they, receiving not sanctions or judgments from men, are the judges of men, and settle it absolutely for men whether it shall be well for them or no. A Malay may believe that it is good to be a thief, so that the thieving be done cleverly. An Englishman may believe that it is good to be honest. It is not a matter of indifference to the Inger as well as to the outer life of the one and of the other whether they change convictions or no, so that they adopt them thoroughly. The one stands so far square with the law which rules the great universe, in time with all things around him, and in the way of blessings; while the other is in contempt of that law, in collision with all the realities around him, seen and unseen, and in the way of their curse. The devil may try to persuade us it is all one. It is two, and two forever. There is a right which is God's rule in the soul, and in the universe; there is a wrong which is the devil's counterfeit of God's rule. All the force of heaven, were it put forth, could not make the wrong beautiful and blessed; all the force of hell could not make the right foul and accursed. The one remains the principle of order and the fountain of blessing to all intelligent creatures, the other the source of sorrow and the principal of discord. For them to change their essential natures is as impossible as for God to change. Equally impossible is it for man to escape their judgments. He that doeth righteously shall be blessed, he that doeth unrighteously shall be cursed; in any age, in any country, in any world. —J. Baldwin Brown.

Who was to Blame.

BY MRS. A. E. C. MASKELL.

A very worthy and estimable widow of Elmdale Church was sick, and had not a particle of coal in the house. Some member of the church found it out and reported to the next business meeting.

The next day poor Widow Eldredge and her three little shivering children were made glad by the appearance of a whole ton of coal. One of the deacons brought the load, and the widow retired that night to her couch with tender feelings towards her brothers and sisters in the church.

But, sad to relate, there are almost always some busy-bodies in the church. They knew Mrs. Eldredge to be not only a very worthy woman, but a proud one. And for her to become the recipient of charity, even through the church was something for their tongues to wag about.

One good sister in every other respect but that her tongue was a "ruling evil," went about from house to house and whispered to those who were not present at the meeting, "Did you know the church had to send Mrs. Eldridge some coal? Would you ever thought she would have come to that? Would you not think it would be a death blow to her pride? Don't you remember what a high-spirited woman her mother was?" etc., etc. Nor was this sister one bit careful who overheard her remarks. It might be people in the church, or out of the church—little children, or old gray-haired sinners; and soon the whole neighborhood were talking about Mrs. Eldridge and a ton of coal. At last it came to the ears of the widow herself.

Her children were peeping through a neighbor's fence when a child came up and said: "Ha! the church had to help your mother, didn't it? You are almost poor enough to go to the poor-house. Everybody is talking about it, and I ain't going to play with you any more."

The children with wounded hearts went and repeated to their mother every word.

"Everybody was talking about it." Such a simple easy thing as the gift of a ton of coal. Why, she had given more herself in the days of prosperity, and hardly thought of it since.

Was that the way the church helped its own? With a bitter heart she arose from her bed sooner than she was able, and bent herself closely down to sewing.

No food but mush and milk and bread and molasses passed her own or children's lips until she had accumulated enough to pay for the ton of coal.

Then she walked proudly into a business meeting, and when an opportunity offered, arose and said:

"Here is the money to pay for the coal, thanking you ever so much for the loan."

The deacons coughed and a-hemmed and then one said,—

"We intended the coal as a gift, Sister Eldridge, and not as a loan."

She thanked them, "but was not willing to be the recipient of charity, especially when there were so many tongues to spread it. She only hoped the brothers and sisters would be as good at telling that she had paid for the coal as they were that they had given it to her; that was all."

No more was said, and the church proceeded to other business—and if the affair had ended here, it would not have been so bad.

But Mrs. Eldridge was taken sick again, and made every effort to hide the fact from the church.

Unable to pay the rent, she removed to a remote part of the city in a garret, where no inquisitive ones could find her.

It was an unusually long, cold winter and before spring Mrs. Eldridge was found in her bed, dead, while her children were hovering over the one little bucket of coal that was left.

"It was lack of medicine and proper food in time of sickness," the coroner said: and when it came to the ears of the church they were loud in their denunciations of the woman's pride. Some went so far as to say "she deserved to die for being too proud to let her wants be known." But was the church none to blame? Did they deal forth their charity in the right spirit? Do they not in their church covenant agree to keep all transactions in their business meetings to themselves? Does not Christ say, "Let not your left hand know what your right hand doeth." Even as we would that others should do unto us, let us do unto them.—The Watchman.

POISONOUS READING.—One of the greatest perils of our times is the peril that threatens our youth from pernicious literature.

The present danger to the community is from public indifference to licentious literature, rather than from public excitement against it.

An appeal to the publishers of vicious literature is as idle as an appeal to a boa-constrictor. There must be a power to strangle the snake; he is not amenable to reason.

Our teachers would understand better the secret source of a great deal that worries and disgusts them in the character and deportment of their pupils, if they could know on what vile meat they feed in their hours of leisure.

Nothing can be more pernicious in its effects on an immature brain than the flash novels, and burlesque nastiness of the lower class of theatres. But there is an active agent in promoting crime which no newspaper has yet named, and that is the newspapers themselves; not the vile sheets which never penetrate into a pure household, but many prominent American journals which men find on their breakfast tables, and hand over to their wives and innocent children. As long as the daily paper is filled with every minute detail of the trials for divorce and murder, our sons and daughters will not long remain innocent.

NEGLECTED LONELINESS.—On this the Christian Union Remarks: We have observed that when death occurs in a family, the friends call in numbers for a few days or week, but in a month or two cease their attentions. But experience proves that it is then that the loneliness becomes almost insupportable. Visiting the widow and the fatherless in their affliction does not mean attending the funeral, nor making a formal call, but the continued manifestation of Christian sympathy and friendship. There are many aged widows and children in the Christian church, who were honored in the days when the husband or father was a deacon, local preacher, or active member of the church, now left with hardly a smile of recognition from pastor or people. But they must never, though thus neglected, allow a feeling of bitterness to arise for that would be adding gall to vinegar.

CALLING THE ANGELS IN.

We mean to do it. Some day, some day,
We mean to slacken this fevered rush
That is wearing our very souls away,
And grant to our goaded hearts a hush
That is holy enough to let them hear
The minstrels of angels drawing near.

We mean to do it. "Oh, never doubt,"
When the burden of day time droll is o'er,
We'll sit and muse, while the stars come out,
As the patriarch sat at the open door
Of his tent, with a heavenward gazing eye,
To watch for the angels passing by.

We see them afar at high noontide,
When fiercely the world's hot flashings beat;
Yet never have bidden them turn aside,
And tarry awhile in converse sweet
Nor prayed them to hallow the cheer we spread,
To drink our wine and break our bread.

We promised our hearts that when the stress
Of the life-work reaches the longed-for close,
When the weight that we groan with hinders less,
We'll loose our thoughts to such repose,
As banishes care's disturbing din,
And then—we'll call the angels in.

The day that we dreamed of comes at length,
When tired of every mocking quest;
And braked in spirit and shorn of strength,
We drop, faint-set, at the door of rest,
And wait and watch as the day wanes on—
Till the angels we meant to call are gone.

Notes of Life.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

The Sunday following I entered regularly upon the arduous task allotted by preaching in Tuscaloosa, "What shall a man give in exchange for his soul?" and as Revisers had not then amended the text or context, I was not troubled with an exegesis which might have required apologies and explications. The church stood near the hotel; its frame was of poles taken from the spot, inserted in the ground about four feet apart, with boards nailed to the posts, and a roof of common split boards. Several lawyers and a judge from Huntsville being in the hotel, came into the church, and having formed their acquaintance the year before, spoke to me after service and introduced me to their friends; among others to Dr. Robert H. Kennon, Dr. Samuel Meek, Dr. John Owen, and others.

Having last winter published in this paper an account of the principle incidents of last year's work, in my memorial of John Hersey, I need not repeat them, except in summary manner. All the three just mentioned were Methodist local preachers, practitioners of Medicine, late immigrants from Georgia, and justly held in high esteem. I was not a little surprised in the general character of the citizens. In all that characterizes a refined and agreeable society the new and apparently back-woods village was exceptionally moral and excellent. The dwelling houses were rustic and humble. The only frame-house with a shingled roof was the tinner's shop. The United States had reserved the right to the location at the sale of the lands in its vicinity, probably with the view of making it the site of some national establishment. It occupied a high bluff at the foot of the falls of the Black Warrior River, at the head of navigation, and where the rich and extensive coal-fields crop out at their southern extremity. Protected on the north by the lofty range of mountains and broad belts of high woodlands from southern blasts in winter, and fanned by sea breezes in the summer, it had every guarantee for healthy and pleasant homes. The variety and abundance of its agricultural products, and its short and direct access to the sea-coast, combined to attract emigrants in large numbers from older and less productive States.

The citizens of Tuscaloosa were fair representatives of the most intelligent, enterprising, and orderly communities of the Southern people. Having already alluded by name to many of these people it is not necessary to repeat them; but having been requested by an "old Alabamian" to explain my reference to the Perkins family, I may add Major Nicholas Perkins, I understood, was the officer who detected Aaron Burr, the last of February, 1807, to whose care and custody that mysterious, bold, and bad man was intrusted, and who carried him to be tried for treason in Richmond, Va. The selection by General Gaines of Major Nicholas Perkins to take a fugitive for prosecution for treason of Mr. Burr's known desperate character so great a distance and through such a country on horseback, was a compliment which his success proved he richly deserved. Colonel Constantine Perkins, who had recently married and settled there in the practice of law, had been distinguished in the late Indian war for his courage in some emergencies of sudden and great danger, and had received from Gen. Jackson the highest commendation, was then a resident. The Marrs—G. W. and William—kinsmen of the Perkins,' and I think nephews of my grandmother, were large planters, who lived in the town. While a little boy I had often seen them at my grandfather's. They recognized me and treated me with marked kindness, although much surprised in finding me a Methodist preacher. I understood that Col. Perkins was a near relative of the Constantine Perkins who was first husband to my grandmother, and for whom my only brother of full blood was named; but can not tell the relation. Nicholas P. Sneed was a young man a kin to the Perkins family, who had been educated at Nashville, and was in charge of a large school in Tuscaloosa. He had become a member of the Baptist Church. Upon a careful examination of the doctrines and usages of his church, and preparatory to becoming a preacher, he revised his creed, and at the end of the year withdrew his membership and entered the Methodist itinerancy. He became eminent for his piety and usefulness, and after a few years died, and his remains were interred between Selma and Summerfield, near an old camp-meeting ground. We corresponded until his death, and I have rarely, if ever, known a purer and better young minister. He professed, and I doubt not he enjoyed, the blessing of the sanctification, or Christian holiness, or perfect love, call it which you please. Would God we were all like him. John Hersey, then acting agent of the United States and the Choctaw Nation, was another deeply pious minister, whose acquaintance I formed this year, but having lately given a sketch of this eccentric and very devoted man I need not repeat it. I may be allowed to say, however, that I do not believe that I have ever known two more scrupulously conscientious men than they were, and how different! Sneed had no singularities; Hersey was full of eccentricities. Both were good, and both are in paradise.

My field of labor presented some serious discouragement during the first half of the year. I was not only without acquaintances, but my circuit was very large, deficient in roads and bridges; accomodations and ordinary comforts greatly needed, as usual in new settlements, while I had twenty-eight appointments to fill monthly, from fifteen to twenty-five miles apart. During the winter of 1819-20 and early spring, I was much exposed to the weather, and near being drowned on several occasions while swimming streams to reach my preaching-places. For all this I felt amply compensated by the warm-hearted hospitality of the people, and by the consciousness of trying to do my duty. Yet I now think that in some of these hazardous exposures I was mistaken as to duty. Before the year had half expired my finances were exhausted, and it flashed upon me while crossing a little prairie between Erie and Greensboro, skirted by trees draped in long moss, that I was a penniless stranger hundreds of miles from home, too proud to beg and unable to dig. The fact is, I thought I had left my father's with money enough to pay my way for more than a year; but my traveling expenses, clothing, horse-shoeing, and other things, had cost a good deal more than in Tennessee, and having neglected to write home in time, I had been suddenly startled with the discovery of my bankruptcy. I have a distinct recollection of my feelings. I stopped, looked through my collapsed pocket-book to find it innocent of concealing a single cent. What now? Shall I go on, getting farther away from home, try to get back to Tuscaloosa, borrow money there to get home on, and then return to my circuit? If so, all my appointments fail, and I have to go round to make new ones. Besides, friend and foes will say I deserted my post; and then I remembered that a bold, bad man, living on north fork of the Warrior, had sent me word that if I preached there again he would certainly beat me badly. I confess this threat determined me. I would not go thereby under a threat. I turned away to trust Providence for the money and do my work. The stewards had neglected their duty, but without begging it got the means from an unexpected source the next day, and saved. I am glad I did. The money came on this wise: About sunset on the day just alluded to I rode up to a cabin having only one room, and upon asking the name of the owner was confronted by a very large lady who gave the name where Bro. E. Hearn had informed me he had made an appointment for me to preach on the next day. I asked the lady if there was such an appointment. She did not know—had heard the old man say something about it; but he and the boys were off on a bear-hunt—might be home some time that night, or might not. She looked somewhat bewildered and I felt a good deal so. The only house I saw was the one; it was unfinished; a half a dozen children crowded the door. The boys, and the old man, with those present must fill it. It looked like downright imposition to obtrude; but what could I do? Night was upon me. I was a stranger, did not know the roads or the neighbors, if there were any. Could she tell were I could go? But she was a newcomer—did not know. Still sitting upon my tired horse and looking around for a road, she said I was welcome to stay if I could make out to do so; but there was no place nor any food for my horse, except a little corn which was used for bread after being pounded in a wooden mortar by a wooden pestle or beater. How gratefully I accepted the conditions! blistered my shoulders carrying heavy rails to make a pound for my horse; and how long I belabored those flinty grains of corn into meal and how soundly I slept, the deponent saith not. Next day a dozen, more or less, came out. The old man had got home before midnight and fixed seats; and as I began service a tall and elegant lady came in, and, after preaching had closed, introduced herself, and invited me in the name of her husband to spend the night with them, and that of my next round I should preach at their house. My host and his wife consenting, I promised to do so. When leaving there next morning to cross Alabama River at Calabee a five dollar gold piece was left in my hand by Mrs. Matthew Garey. That was enough: it would pay my way across the river and until my stewards would awake to the fact that they had forgotten their duty.

Soochow, China.

The following is taken from the Daily News, Shanghai, China, of February 27, contributed by Rev. C. F. Reid:

I enclose herewith translation of a proclamation issued by the magistrate of the Yuen Ho district, Soochow, December 31, 1881, establishing the right of missionaries under treaty to purchase land and erect buildings in this city for the purpose of propagating the Christian religion. This is the first recognition of our treaty rights that the officials of Soochow have ever given us. You will at once recognize, I trust, that this indicates a very decided change in public sentiment from what existed in that city only a few years since, and, second, that, under the administration of well-disposed magistrates the probabilities of conflict between the people and the missionaries are reduced to a minimum.

The Southern Methodist Mission, United States of America, now have in Soochow property worth some fifteen thousand dollars, comprising

First. A lot, missionary's residence, and boys' boarding school.

Second. A lot, missionary's residence, and church.

Third. A large lot for hospital, and residence of female medical missionaries, and girls' boarding school, and residence for lady teachers.

All of this is situated on the Tien-sz Chiang, in compounds contiguous to one another, and constituting a most imposing headquarters to the work of the Southern Methodist Mission in this city. Besides the above, the mission also owns a valuable property elsewhere in the city, which is to be occupied by a chapel, native parsonage, and a day school. It is to this property the proclamation refers, and it is now hoped that the missionary occupation of this great city has been recognized, and that there will not soon occur any event to mar the prospect of future good-will and prosperity of the missionary work. To the respective missionaries engaged in the transactions involved in the purchase of the above land and the erection of houses thereon great credit is due for their patience and tact in accomplishing results so satisfactory.

PROCLAMATION.

This proclamation is issued at the request of C. F. Reid, an American missionary, who states that he has purchased of Messrs. Tsiang and Chang two plots of land situated on Heaven-bestowed Market street, and on the boundary of the Dzih San and De San blocks.

He also states that the said plots of land were purchased with funds contributed by the church, and for the purpose of erecting a church and free school buildings.

He also states that the roofs, walls, and doors of said buildings will correspond with those of native houses, and that the buildings will be so located as in no wise to interfere with the homes of the people.

But lest rowdies and unprincipled persons should interfere and hinder the work he asks that a record be made of this affair, and that the higher officials be notified, and that a suitable proclamation be issued in reference to it.

This office having been duly notified of the above, and whereas Tsa Voong-tsaing, a native, states that said land was purchased for the erection of said buildings for the common use, and to be held as the common property of the Christian church; and

Whereas, Tsiang King-teh and Chang Chensan, with their middle men, certify that they have sold the said two plots of lands, of which they were in possession by inheritance, said land being in fee simple, to the said Tsa Voong-tsang to be given to the Christian church; and

Whereas, Said land is in a retired locality, has been unoccupied since the rebellion, and in no way interferes with the residences of the people; and

Whereas, The Minister Superintendent of Trade, and the higher officials, upon being notified of all the above, signified their approval of the same, all of which is a matter of record in this office.

We accordingly issue this proclamation, and hereby instruct the constables of that place, together with all the people of every class, to bear in mind that the renting or purchasing of land by foreign missionaries, or the building of houses in which to preach the doctrines of Christianity, is in accordance with treaty stipulations; and henceforth should any rowdies or unprincipled persons take advantage of any cause to create disturbances in that vicinity, the constable is hereby permitted to give notice of the names of such persons to this office that they may be arrested and rigorously dealt with.

Let every one tremblingly heed and not disobey.

A special proclamation.

—Lake Ngami lies midway between the eastern and western coasts of Africa, just north of the Kalahari Desert. It was discovered in 1849 by Dr. Livingstone. In 1877 the Rev. J. D. Hepburn, of the London Society's Mission at Shoshong, visited the Lake, at the repeated invitation of the chief, Moremi. As the result of this visit, a church of forty members has sprung up. Last year Mr. Hepburn, accompanied by four of the leading members of the Bamangwato Church, again visited the church, and was received by Moremi and his people very cordially. The teachers who had been left in charge of the church had worked faithfully. One of the encouraging signs is that the dominant tribe, the Batauana, were teaching their slaves, the Masarwa, and some of the latter were in turn teaching the Batauana. Slavery is a terrible evil here, as well as elsewhere in Africa; but Mr. Hepburn believes that ere long the system will be broken up in Moremi's country. A change is coming over the Batauana respecting the treatment of slaves and much indignation was expressed against a man who most cruelly beat his slave on the night of Mr. Hepburn's arrival. N. Y. CHURCH OF ENGLAND, ZENANA MISSION. The meeting of this society was presided over by the Archbishop of York. The report showed the total income for the year to be over $90,000, and the expenditure somewhat more. The number of stations occupied by the mission is twenty-four, in North and South India, the Punjab, and Scinde. There were fifty two missionaries, with twenty-four assistants and 121 Bible women and native teachers. Several new stations had been occupied, and 114 new associations had been formed, bringing up the total number to 152. Sir Bartle Frere, in his address, said India was, at the present time, in a transition state, the changes going on in the education of the women of the country were truly remarkable, especially as to Christian education. No greater help could be rendered to their sisters in India than to send amongst them ladies whose hearts had been touched by the truths of Christianity.

The gospel is achieving wonders and its triumphs are beginning to be seen and acknowledged. Nations are being brought to Christ. The West Indies but a little time since was regarded as a dead mission field, but such has been the success of the gospel there, that it has become thoroughly Christianized. Of its million of inhabitants, the Moravians claim over 30,000 converts. The Wesleyans exceed this number by five or six thousand, and the whole number of communicants is about 80,000, with about 2,000 catechists at worship. Let the church look at such glorious results of the gospel and take courage.

The missionary cause is the greatest, grandest of all our Christian enterprises. It is worthy the attention and support of the church it has never received. Says the London Watchman: "We must place the missionary enterprise in the forefront of all our philanthropies. Christ has not changed his mind in reference to the world's salvation; neither has he yet laid aside the Methodist people as built to win the world to him. While he determines to save men, and to save them by us, we must not withhold one atom of strength, one mite of money, or one deed prompted by a generous enthusiasm.

The Board of Missions appropriated for the ensuing year $233,000, and the Executive Association of the Woman's Foreign Mission Society appropriated $60,000. This means progress in the foreign field and conservative faith at home. It is not the largest measure of possibility. The work of the noble women outgrows that of the church.

Last year the income of the Presbyterian Board of Foreign Missions was $380,050 19; of the Southern Presbyterian Church, $59,215 39; of the United Presbyterian Church, $65,107 97; of the Reformed Presbyterian Church, $12,296 77; Associated Synod of the South, 2,012 55. Total, $719,556 17.

The pagan priests of a Japan village have posted the following notice, which is signed by all the inhabitants: "Therefore, we agree that if any native of this village becomes a Christian, we will cease to have any intercourse with him, and if any person dwelling here, not being a native, embraces the foreign creed, we will send him back to his birthplace."

—The General Executive Association of the Woman's Missionary Society, Methodist Episcopal Church, South, at their last meeting, made the following appropriations: For China, $16,715; Brazil, $12,500; Mexican Border, $6,-000; Central Mexico, $1,200; and for contingencies, $2,000.

—A deep and growing religious interest is reported by the missionaries at Coimbatore in India. One of the missionaries writes that the methods of the inquiry-room and the experience meeting have been adopted among the natives with a great deal of success.

—In the great work of foreign missions, the Moravian Church is the pioneer of the Protestant Churches. It sent its first missionary to St. Thomas, in the West Indies, in 1732. The one hundred and fiftieth anniversary of this event is to be celebrated on August 21.

—The Church Missionary Society is about to send out a strong reinforcement to its Uganda (Central African) mission. The party will include five ministers and four teachers, artisans, etc. They were to sail, May 17th, from Zanzibar.

—The Bible in the Basuto language has been issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society, at a cost of $20,000. This is the ninth completed Bible in the native languages of Africa.

—The London Missionary Society recently held a valedictory service in honor of twenty Missionaries about to depart for Central Africa and Madagascar.

—At Jalna, the home of Rev. Narayan Shishadri, the converted Brahmin who visited this country a few years ago, between sixty and seventy people were baptized on a recent Sabbath.

—Twenty-nine students in the various Presbyterian Theological Seminaries of the country have asked to be sent out to foreign mission fields.

—There are seventy thousand Christians gathered into the churches of Madagascar. Polynesia is almost entirely Christian.

—The Primitive Methodist Church of England contributed last year $35,225 for the cause of Missions.

MISCELLANEOUS.

—The Congregational summary is as follows: Number of churches, 3,891; of these only 877 have settled pastors, 1,981 are supplied by acting pastors, 157 by licentiates, etc., and 789 are not supplied. Of ministers there are 3,712. Of these 856 are pastors, 1,594 are acting pastors, and 1,263 are not in pastoral work. It is an interesting question whence the 1,981 churches supplied with acting pastors have procured them, in view of the fact that only 1,594 Congregational ministers are acting pastors. Total of church members is 351,697; absent, 54,122. Last year added by confession, 11,311; by letter, 11,235; total, 22,546. Last year, lost by death, 7,664; by dismission, 9,451; by discipline, 2,060; total, 17,175. There was a net gain of 59 churches. Total benevolent contributions reported, $1,227,108.

—The Columbus (Ohio) Journal says the Republican party never had two better principles on which to contest an election than these: "1. The saloons shall bear their proportionate and just share of taxation; 2. They shall conform to the rules applied to other business as to Sunday traffic." Mr. Richard Smith, when questioned a few days ago in Cleveland as to what the feeling throughout the State was on the liquor laws, and their effect upon the Republican party, replied that the news was most encouraging. "I tell you," he said, "the old Republican party is waking up. It always fought best when it had for its incentive a moral issue. It was founded on such an issue, and it will marshal again to the contest in the struggle for a great moral principle."

—The New York Tribune says: "The prohibitory amendment to the State constitution in Iowa will probably be carried, but it is meeting with unexpected opposition in the Republican party. Some of the strongest papers are working to defeat it. If the Democratic party should vote solidly against the amendment it would doubtless be lost, but that party can not be rallied on this issue. The anti-amendment people are believed to be making a still hunt. One paper says of them: 'They are not hunting ducks with a brass band, and their heavy campaign fund is being carefully hoarded for a short, quick, decisive campaign just before election.'"

—Boston has 221 churches. Of this number the Baptists have 27; the Catholic Apostolics (Irvingites) have 1; the Christians (Garfield's faith,) 1; the Congregationalists, 32; the Unitarians, 26; other Congregationalists, 3; the Episcopalians, 23; the Israelites, 7; Lutherans, 5; Methodist Episcopal, 26; other Methodists, 3; the Presbyterians, 7; the Reformed German, 1; the Roman Catholics, 28; the Second Adventists, 2; Swedenborgians, 2; Union, 3; and Universalists, 10.

—At the Chambers Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia, a prayer meeting has been held every Friday evening without a single failure for more than fifty years. One rule which has helped to secure this long life interest is that no prayer shall exceed five minutes and no address ten minutes.

—The Colorado Methodist says: "Rev. Moses U. Payne, of Hamburg, Iowa, sends through our hands a check for $50 for the Church Extension Society of our Conference. This is practical sympathy—the best sort, and worth a great deal."

—The Wesleyan Methodist Conference in New Zealand reports for the past year a net increase of 305 lay members, 3,500 attendants upon public worship, 417 Sunday-school scholars, and a gratifying advance in all other departments of church work.

—Rev. Thomas Harrison is laboring with his usual remarkable success at St. Paul, Minn. The house where he preaches is crowded every night, and hundreds go away unable to find room. At the last report 150 had been at the altar.

—It is said that of the 626 ministers in the Presbyterian Church of Ireland only one can now preach in Irish, but there are a number of Bible readers who can use the old tongue very well.

—The Kentucky Presbyterian Synod-ical evangelists report nearly 400 additions to the church in the various places where they have been laboring during the last four months.

—The whole number of white Baptists in the fifteen Southern States is 974,100, and of colored 741,494, the total 1,715,794. There are 566 associations, 13,527 churches and 6,096 ministers.

Our Young People.

PATIENCE.

BY MARGARET VASHON.

A little girl addresses the mother of her pet kitten.

You need not be looking around at me so;
She's my kitten, as much as your kitten, you know,
And I'll take her wherever I wish her to go.

You know very well that the day she was found,
If I hadn't cried, she'd have surely been drowned,
And you ought to be thankful she's alive safe and sound.

She is only just crying because she's a goose;
I'm not squeezing her—look, now!—my hands are quite loose;
And she may as well hush, for it's not any use.

And you may as well get right down and go 'way;
You're not in the thing we are going to play.
And, remember, it isn't your half of the day.

You're forgetting the bargain we made—and so soon!
In the morning she's mine, and yours all after noon,
And you couldn't teach her to eat with a spoon.

So don't let me hear you give one single mew.
Do you know what will happen, right off, if you do?
She'll be my kitten mornings and afternoons too!

—St. Nicholas.

A Word from the Editor.

We are anxious to make this department pleasing and instructive to our little friends. Send us short letters—not long—about your Sunday-schools, missionary societies, or any matters of interest. Children like to read the letters of children. And through this medium you will get acquainted and learn to love each other in a common cause.

DEAR LITTLE FOLKS: I wonder if the rest of you were so sorry when the General Conference elected Dr. Parker Bishop as I was. It was very selfish in me, perhaps, but I was just as sorry as I could be; and what is more I have not got to feeling just right about it yet. And now I want to tell you my idea. It is that we name our missionary society the Linnis Parker Society. Let us in this way show him that we, the little readers of the paper of which he has so long been editor, still have, and intend to keep him in remembrance. And then, too, although Shakspeare would have us believe there is nothing in a name I believe this name will influence many of the children who read the ADVOCATE to join the society. What say you Annie Secrest? If I remember aright, Dr. Patterson said, name it anything, and merely mentioned the name Magnolia among other names. As you were the originator of this society idea, the rest will be willing for you to decide it. But there is one thing we should think of. Much will be expected of a society bearing the name of one of our Bishops. Hence the responsibility of the members will be increased. But if we will, I do believe we can make it worthy the name. If there is anything the girls and boys of the present day can not accomplish when they resolutely determine to, I don't know what it is. Come then, children, and help us in our efforts to make this a permanent society, having many active, working members. Let those of us who have already joined do as Henry Lewis of Crystal Springs said he would do—get all of our friends to unite with us that we can. That, Loula is a work you can engage in until you see your way clear to make some money.

Mr. Editor, as we considered your predecessor our president and treasurer, we, of course expect, and would respectfully request you to act in the same capacity.

Jesus at Nazareth.

If I were to ask my little readers what great danger the child Jesus was delivered from, most of you could tell me that Herod wished to kill him, but that he escaped out of Herod's hands. You could tell me, too, how he escaped—that God warned Joseph in a dream to take the Virgin Mary and her infant Son into Egypt, and that Joseph did as God directed him. Joseph and Mary and the Holy Child stayed in Egypt till Herod died, and then they returned to their own country.

Joseph perhaps intended to live at Bethlehem, where Jesus Christ was born. But he found that a cruel son of Herod was king over Judea, and God warned him by a dream not to stay there. So he took Mary and Jesus to Nazareth, where he had lived before. It was very natural that he should wish to live where he was known, and would find people ready to help him in his trade. But while Joseph was doing what he thought best, God was doing what, many years before Joseph was born, he had said he would do. The Jews despised the people that lived at Nazareth; possibly most of them were low, bad people. If Jesus went there, he was sure to be despised. And when he grew up and began to teach and preach, men did look down on him and call him contemptuously a "Nazarene."

Ages before that happened, the prophets had foretold that Jesus would be despised. And we see that their words came true. But only God could have foreseen so long before what would happen, so we know that God spake by the prophets. And this is one reason why we believe that the Bible, which contains the words of the prophets, is the word of God.

It is well for us to remember that Jesus Christ lived for many years at Nazareth among a poor and bad people. Jesus was poor as they were, but he was not bad like them. He was poor when a boy, and poor all his life. I think this teaches us that we should not despise the poor, but be kind and courteous to them. I have known children who would be quite respectful to rich people, and very rude to poor people. I have known persons almost too proud to even speak to a working man. Of course this is very silly, and it is very wrong as well.

Jesus lived for many years among bad people, but he was always pure and holy himself. If you are unfortunately in bad company, you need not follow the bad example. I know it is hard not to be led away by those who are always near us, and are going wrong themselves. But we may be sure Jesus will help us, and that he knows how to help us, for he has been in bad company himself.

I have read of a boy who was compelled to live among thieves; they tried to coax him to steal, they promised him all sorts of good things if he would steal; they threatened him with all manner of evil if he would not do as they did; they beat and starved him and ill-used him in every possible manner. But he stood firm, and would not do what he know to be wrong; and God cared for him, and by and by took him out of the thieves' hands.

I knew a boy at school who was in a class where nearly all the boys copied their exercises and cheated in their sums, and those who did not—except himself—pretended that they did, to save themselves from being persecuted. But this lad said boldly that it was wrong to copy and cheat, and he would not do it. The other boys would rub out his sums when he had done them, and teased him in all kinds of ways; but I am sure he was happier than the other lads, because he had an approving conscience, and because he was trying his best to be like the boy Jesus.—Early Days.

Kindness to Animals.

There is a story told by one of our great poets of a sailor, who was shipwrecked on a lonely island, where the animals were too wild to be afraid of him. They had never been hunted or teased by man, and used to clamber round him much as they may have done round Adam and Eve in the garden of Eden.

No doubt there was a time when the animals walked peacefully by the side of man, and the birds sang close to him; but, by-and-by, he began to be cruel to the poor dumb animals, and now we find that they often run away from us. Still, if we are always kind to them they seem to know it, and we can tame them easily.

One day when I was sitting in my study a little squirrel jumped through the open window, and sitting on the top of my desk, gazed up into my face, as if he would say, "Here I am; please draw my likeness."

I kept very quiet for fear of frightening my little visitor, and sketched him just as he stood. When the operation was over the squirrel turned about, and ran off to his home in the trees.

I should like to have heard the account he gave his friends of the "human" who had not caught him to put him in one of those horrible whirligig cages, or take the soft fur off his back, and had not even clapped his hands to frighten him away.

I once picked up a chaffinch with a broken leg. Tying up the tiny limb I kept the bird in a cage until it had healed. When I opened the door for him to fly away, he took a turn round the room and went back contented to his cage.

Finding he did not care to leave me I made a great pet of him. Half his days were spent in flying about the room, perching on my shoulder or catching flies on the window. He knew my desk as well as I did, and the moment I sat down to write he would hop out of his cage and amuse himself by pecking at the keys as they hung from the lock.

For years he was my constant companion, and when, at last, I found him lying on his back with his poor little toes turned up, I felt as if I had lost a dear friend.

When I was quite a little child I met some boys who had been robbing a nest. I gave them all the money I had for the young thrush and took it home. We did all we could to make the poor little thing eat, but we only choked it. The next day was Sunday, and it looked so ill, and wretched that my father wanted to kill it at once. But mother thought the warm sun might do it good, so we put the cage outside the window and went to church. When we came back the baby looked decidedly better. We noticed a bird flying backwards and forwards with something in its mouth, and beginning to guess what it wanted, we drew back out of sight and watched through the curtains.

Presently the bird gained courage and came near. The little youngster made a tremendous commotion, got close to the wires and opened its beak till it looked all mouth, then the mother dropped a delicate worm down its throat.

By the time this was disposed of, the father was at hand with another. They fed their little one like this for some time, and grew quite tame. Then, when they thought he was old enough to feed himself, they dropped the worms into the cage and kept bobbing up and down, tapping their beaks on the window-sill and swallowing imaginary worms, till the little one took to imitating their actions. When he could feed himself I opened the door and he flew off to his parents.

And now I want to give you a motto: "Never take away what you cannot give." With all the trying in the world, you cannot give life to even little things, then do not take it away. Be kind to the poor dumb animals, and plead for their wise control for themselves, for remembering, "The Lord God made them all."—Child's Companion.

NEP AND THE BABY.—Neptune lives next door to our house. I mean Doctor Lane's dog. He is half Bernard, and is eight years old. Some one gave him to the doctor a few months ago, and he soon made himself at home. The butcher comes three times a week with meat, and Nep found out about this in a very few days. When meat day comes he drops down to the corner of the road and waits for the butcher. Other days he stays at home.

He is very fond of the doctor's baby, who is two years old. He takes care of him almost as well as a nurse. One day Mrs. Lane was roasting oysters in the kitchen. The baby was playing about the floor, and Nep was looking on. Just for sport, Mrs. Lane snapped the tongs at the baby. Nep sprang up at once, with a deep growl, and showed all his teeth to Mrs. Lane. He seemed to say, "You shall not harm this baby, if he is yours." The baby's mamma feels sure now that her pet is safe when he is in Nep's care.

But the strangest thing is that Nep is fond of picture books. He will stand up, with his fore-feet upon the table, and paw open the leaves of Mother Goose, or some other little book. When he finds the picture of a dog, he will wag his tail and say, "Bow-wow!" Sometimes he pulls the book upon the floor. Then he lies down, and turns over the leaves, and he and the baby look at the pictures together. It would make you laugh to see them.—Our Little Ones.

THURSDAY, JUNE 22, 1882.

One honored and faithful friend of the ADVOCATE sends in this week a long list of subscribers with seventy-two dollars in cash. His kind note accompanying makes glad this new administration.

"A regular Bishop factory" is what the Central Methodist calls this ADVOCATE office. The "factory" has done well in the past, but timber is exhausted, and that department is closed.

The increase in our episcopacy made a reassessment on the Conferences for the support of the Bishops necessary. It would be well, therefore, for district stewards at once to rearrange assessments on the several pastoral charges accordingly, or there will be a deficit.

We are profoundly grateful for the warm fraternal greeting extended us. Bishops and other clergy, honored laymen and devout women not a few, have written words of generous welcome. If the ADVOCATE's career only approximates their sanguine prophecies and prayerful well-wishes we shall have abundant satisfaction.

Drs. Talmage, of New York, and Lafferty, of Richmond, were the stars at Trinity College commencement, North Carolina. Dr. Talmage made an eloquent appeal to young men to read the Bible, in the course of which he said: "A person on board a vessel with rudder broken, without chart or compass, drawing sixty gallons of water per minute, and fifteen hundred miles from land, is in a better condition than a young man without a Bible." That certainly is a desperate state.

On Tuesday next, the twenty-seventh, the people of Iowa will vote on an amendment to the constitution prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. The contest has been waged with great vigor on both sides. While they are struggling, friends at a distance are praying. The temperance workers in England have appointed a day of fasting and prayer that the Iowa amendment may be carried. Let all unite in that prayer. Each State redeemed brings nearer the day of our triumph.

Read the article entitled, Rule on Dress, on the second page. It is from a worthy source, and demands respectful consideration. The evil indicated is growing, and a danger-signal was needed. How much of the Lord's money is wasted in useless adorning! We heard of an elegant church woman, most elaborately attired—having on an outfit that cost not less than two thousand dollars—casting fifteen cents in the plate for foreign missions. Shame on such selfish pride! Heathen are perishing at the expense of the church's vanity.

Mr. Paul Tulane, of this city, has given two million dollars for the education of the white young men of New Orleans. This is a princely gift; and we trust will be followed by like benefactions from wealthy Southern men. It is far better to leave our generation such a monument than bequeath hoarded treasures to encourage prodigality. We have languishing colleges in the South that only need a small endowment to make them centers of mighty influence. The name of Paul Tulane will never be forgotten in this community. He stands almost alone in our latitude as a liberal benefactor of higher education.

An Arkansas presiding elder, at the Vanderbilt commencement, prayed that "the young preachers might hurry up their Greek and Latin, their hermeneutics and homiletics, and be at work when they are needed." It is well enough for them to hurry up, but not neglect. The old idea of "six months from the pew to the pulpit" has served its generation, and ought to fall on sleep. A call to preach, in our times, means a call to prepare to preach. Our Nashville confrere, in commenting on that prayer, says: "Men are not called of God to hermeneutics and homiletics." Strange doctrine that to come from the "Athens of Southern Methodism." According to our understanding of those terms, every preacher is called of God to their study. Rightly to interpret the Scriptures, and skillfully present the truth, are shining virtues in a gospel preacher.

Methodism's Maxim.

"All at it, and always at it," was the grand maxim of earlier Methodism. Its spirit and practice called forth from Dr. Chalmers that noblest of all tributes to the reformation—"Methodism is Christianity in earnest." It was inscribed upon her banners and engraved upon her doorposts. It was uttered in her prayers and chanted in her litanies. Preachers preached it and congregations sang it. It was the slogan that started Methodism on its march round the world. Every convert had to be a soldier, and every soldier had to fight. That was the secret of a marvellous success. Without patronage or prestige, without means or organization, under the inspiration of that maxim, the little club of Oxford students became an exceeding great army—the cloud, no larger than a man's hand, swept over the heavens, and shed its rain drops on every land and clime. It vitalized sleeping energies, fired cold hearts, strengthened nerveless arms, and made swift and beautiful the feet of the saints. No sooner had a Kingswood collier accepted Christ and washed his face than he was hurried into line and put in the van of battle. Every young brother had "to take up his cross" and exercise his gifts and graces. He was trained for service in the service itself. He learned the use of his weapons in the perilous front of conflict. All, of every age and station, were urged to enlist in active service. Sluggards and cowards they wanted not, though some camp-followers were found among the faithful.

But what to-day is the history and spirit of the church? We very much fear that the old maxim has been forgotten or lost its talismanic power. The apostolic fervor of the fathers does not speed our conquests and pour our treasures at the Master's feet. We have unemployed and unproductive capital hid away from the Lord's use that ought to have multiplied an hundred fold. We have wealth of numbers, but, alas! there has not always been a corresponding increase of spiritual service.

This maxim describes the ideal church. It is the New Testament model—a type of the church triumphant. It is answering the prayer our Lord taught us: "Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." There every angelic spirit is active and always. But such a church we have not seen. Drones and cravens are in all our borders. After the glow of revival has passed, it taxes to the utmost the tact and strategy of pastors to keep their members at work and alive. Think of the thousands who are not even "trifingly employed" in the church. They are mere ornamental appendages that serve to swell statistics and fill us with the pride of numbers. The census returns can not measure the power and prosperity of the church. In our local congregations it is often difficult to find any one to conduct a prayer meeting in the pastor's absence. The weekly prayer meeting in a few of our towns is nothing more than a lecture, sandwiched between two hymns, and prefaced by a prayer. And then how many do absolutely nothing to speed forward the great aggressive movements of the church. One of the missionary secretaries says that "eight thousand Sunday-schools in the Methodist Episcopal Church last year gave not one cent to missions." A proportionate delinquency is the sad history of Southern Methodism. With nearly a million members, we contribute a little over one hundred thousand dollars to foreign missions. This amount comes from a few, while the many have no share in the Lord's promise to the cheerful giver.

"All at it, and always at it!" What mighty results would follow such a blessed reality! Not a member unemployed, not a field untilled, not a prison unvisited, not an energy asleep, not a soul at ease. Old and young alike filling Immanuel's land and singing the harvest song. Dr. Joseph Angus, of London, has said, taking the past as a basis of calculation, if all the nominal Christians in the several evangelical denominations would come up to the full measure of duty but fifty years would suffice to convert the world. Fifty years! And for withholding the service we pledged at God's altar, centuries will elapse before the veil of darkness will be lifted from the heathen millions of earth. Fifty years! And many are standing all the day idle. Missionary enterprises flag, Sunday-schools languish, the pulpit is impoverished, and all church work moves forward with sluggish pace, because our old maxim has been forgotten.

We want to restate it, and have its spirit reincarnated in our Southern Methodism. If so, the next quadrennium will be the grandest in our history. We are no pessimist, but, while rejoicing in all our boasted progress, we must admit our attainments are far below God's promises and our ability. Unemployed talent must be utilized—slumbering energies must be quickened into vigorous exercise. The church in some places is as dry and dead as the valley of dry bones Ezekiel saw. Let the breath of Heaven sweep over it, and these bones will become an invincible, all-conquering army. "All at it, and always at it," for next few years, will work a miracle in our land. The waste places will blossom as a rose, and the mountains will clap their hands for very joy.

Changes in Discipline.

Some important changes were made in the old text of the Discipline by the recent General Conference. But the law will be amended more by additions than by emendations and revision. The list given below will be read with interest, though it may not be complete.

A Board of Church Extension was organized and officered.

The constitution of the Board of Missions was amended as follows: 1. The treasurer was made a salaried officer, and his full time required by the Board. 2. The Board was authorized to co-operate with other Methodist bodies in foreign fields in establishing training schools for native converts and ministers.

The Annual Conference Boards were instructed to provide for special missionary meetings at District Conferences. One day of each Annual Conference session, or so much of it as may be necessary, is to be devoted to the subject of missions.

A constitution for the Woman's Missionary Society was adopted.

Boards of Education are to be organized in each Annual Conference, and educational statistics reported.

The short history of the rise and progress of the United Societies is to be restored to its old place in the Discipline.

The following chapter on temperance was adopted:

Ques. What shall be done for the extirpation of the great evil of intemperance?

Ans. 1. Let all our preachers and members faithfully observe our General Rule, which forbids "drunkenness or drinking spirituous liquors, unless in cases of necessity."

Ans. 2. In cases of drunkenness let the Discipline be administered as in case of immorality; drunkenness being a crime expressly forbidden in the word of God. In cases of drinking, except in cases of necessity, let the Discipline be administered as in case of imprudent and improper conduct.

The Discipline hereafter is to be numbered by paragraphs consecutively, without regard to divisions into chapters and sections.

The church register and the records of church Conferences are to be sent by the secretary of the church Conference to the third Quarterly Conference for inspection.

The records of Quarterly Conferences are to be sent to the District Conference for examination. Each Annual Conference is to examine the records of District Conferences.

The following with reference to the supernumerary and superannuated relation was passed:

"What is a supernumerary preacher?" section 9, chapter 3, page 96, insert the following: "no application for a supernumerary relation shall be granted by an Annual Conference except on the recommendation of a committee on Conference relations to be appointed by the Conference, consisting of not less than seven members, to whom such applications shall have been referred. Nor shall said committee in making up their decision take into consideration anything else than the personal disability of the applicant: provided, however, that in case said committee report adversely, the Conference may by a vote of not less than three-fourths of the members present grant said application." The present question 2 in the foregoing section to be numbered 3. 2. As answer 2 to question "What is a superannuated preacher?" section 10, chapter 3, page 97, insert the following: "No application for a superannuated relation shall be granted by an Annual Conference except on the recommendation of a committee on Conference relations to be appointed by the Conference, consisting of not less than seven members, to whom such application shall have been referred. Nor shall said committee in making up their decision take into consideration anything else than this question, viz.: Is the applicant really worn out in the itinerant service? Provided, however, that in case said committee report adversely, the Conference may by a vote of not less than three-fourths of the members present grant said application."

The College of Bishops, with the concurrence of the Board of Missions, was authorized to organize Annual Conferences in China, Central Mexico, and on the Mexican Border during the next quadrennium.

The chapter on Sunday-schools was rearranged and somewhat modified. Each Annual Conference shall establish a Sunday-School Board composed of one minister and one layman from each presiding elder's district. A Sunday-School Conference is recommended in each District and a Conference Sunday-School Convention within each Conference, the time and place to be designated by the Conference Sunday-School Board.

The preacher's salary is to be fixed by the board of stewards "after consultation with the preacher in charge."

The following on the change of name was adopted:

Resolved, That the matter of changing the name of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, to the Methodist Episcopal Church in America, be referred to the several Annual Conferences by the Bishops during the ensuing four years, and that they report the result of the vote to the General Conferences of 1886 for ratification.

Other resolutions were passed looking to the publication of the Baptismal Service in tract form and a small Hymn Book, etc., but involve no change of Discipline.

Learning by Experience.

Laban said: "I have learned by experience." He recognized the fact that the Lord had blessed him for Jacob's sake. And so the Church of England has learned by experience. The history of Methodism has not been lost in that old communion. Appreciating the mistake of the past they propose to profit by it in the present. They are anxiously considering the Salvation Army and the advisability of its absorption. That organization, already numerically powerful, is increasing with marvellous rapidity. As an evangelical agency it ranks among the most positive and powerful. In their published reports last year they had in England alone one hundred and seventy-two stations, three hundred and sixty-three paid evangelists; six thousand, one hundred and eighty unpaid speakers; one hundred and sixty-six thousand services held during the year, at which seventeen thousand, six hundred and sixty-nine pounds were contributed for the expenses of the work. No wonder that the Church of England looks on with a covetous eye. Such an addition to her evangelical party would be a gain beyond the power of mere figures to reveal. It would warm into a diviner glow her very life, and make her pulse beat quicker than for a full jubilee of years. The convocation of Canterbury has taken up the subject in good earnest. In the address to the Bishops, numerously signed by the clergy, the following was suggested: "That their lordships of the Upper House are respectfully requested to take such steps as they may deem desirable, to ascertain the tenets and practices of this society; and after such examination to consider how far it is practicable to attach it to the church, and generally advise the clergy as to their duty in reference to it." The proposition met a most cordial reception, and a committee was appointed to consider and report. In the discussion the Bishop of Winchester said, the Bishops felt how grave a mistake was made in alienating the Methodists from the church, and he hoped the same error would not be committed in regard to the Salvation Army. Rather a candid, sensible speech from his lordship!

But the spirit and tone of churches change with years. An hundred years ago, when Methodism was spreading over the United Kingdom a pentecostal blessing, the convocation of Canterbury did not consider its work so generously. Her lordships of the Upper House were not so kindly and catholic. Instead of attaching or absorbing the people called Methodists they sought to extirpate the heresy. What a change in the speeches of their lordships then and now! The Bishop of Exeter, in 1749, denounced the Methodists as "a set of pretended reformers—a dangerous and presumptuous sect," a people of "sanctified singularities, low fooleries and high pretensions," and the preachers were "strolling predicants, of affected phrases, fantastical and unintelligible, whimsical strictness, and loud exclamations." In like complimentary phrase, at different times, spoke the Bishops of Bristol, London and other sees. Thus, against the wishes of the Wesleys and their co-laborers, Methodism was driven into dissent. The Bishop of Winchester now says that was "a grave mistake," but a mistake, though bringing sorrow and trial upon our earlier days, that has formed an evangelical organization and wrought out a history little less than miraculous. It is now too late to retrieve that mistake, but the dearly-learned lesson of experience may help in this another opportunity.

Ministerial Support—Some Queer Things.

MR. EDITOR: I have been a member of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, for quite a considerable period, and most of it an official member. I have been in not a few Quarterly Conferences, and stewards' meetings, and have taken note of some things that have struck me as somewhat queer.

For example, the support of the preacher is most generally regarded as quite out of the category of ordinary business transactions. The paying the preacher in our church is purely a voluntary affair (and long may it continue so,) an obligation which any one seems at liberty to disregard, without any discount upon his business integrity. Now, if this rule worked all round it would not be so singular nor so inconvenient, but it does not. The grocer, the dry goods merchant, the house renter, or the boarding-house keeper, though they even be Methodist, refuse to regard their claims on the preachers as affairs of honor, and purely optionary with them whether they settle up or not. He is expected to pay a hundred cents on the dollar for all they have charged against him, and, if he don't, his integrity is at once seriously called in question.

Sometimes the stewards are told by members they "must be just before they are generous;" they have various debts for various supplies which justice requires them to pay, so they can not give the preacher anything this year. This class look upon the preacher no matter how able-bodied or how diligent as an object of charity which one is not bound to help unless there is a surplus to spare after all business claims are met. Of course no sane man would talk so about the claims of those who have rendered him service or furnished supplies.

Sometimes the stewards are told the preacher owns his own house, or that he has from some source a little income, and can support himself, can get along without their helping any at all. Would it not sound funny, and would not one be in danger of being called "a fool, or a knave," who should say of his grocer, who had furnished supplies, or his blacksmith, who had sharpened his plows and mended his vehicles, or his clerk, who had served him for the year, or the doctor, who had visited and prescribed for his sick family, "Oh! he owns his own house, he has some little income, he can live without my paying him anything." People with whom the stewards, as the business representatives of the congregation, have transactions refuse to let their claims be regarded as affairs of "honor," to be cancelled by lapse of time, like the claims of the preacher. So at the official meeting if there is a bill from the gas company, the coal merchant, the sexton or the organist, the stewards feel compelled to "move the bill be paid," and, if anything is left, pay it to the pastor. Queer, is it not?

METHODIST.

North Louisiana Notes.

Just returned from Mansfield, the seat of our female college, I feel it my duty to write of things seen and heard. The New Orleans Pacific and the Mansfield Tap brought us to De Soto's beautiful capital, by noon of Saturday, June 10. At the junction near Shreveport we were joined by Revs. S. H. Werlein, formerly of Louisiana Avenue, in your city, and now pastor of Shearn Church, Houston. Though Paunt LeRoy, on his late visit to Shreveport, had told of his magnificent physical breadth and roundity, yet the actual sight of the handsome brother from over the line more than realized the picture of him that we had drawn in our mind. We were compelled to think of Texas every time we looked at him, and we wondered if the glorious latitude and plentiful elbow-room that State gives a man had not somewhat to do with the matter. It was a real pleasure to meet Werlein, and talk over old friends and scenes, and tell each other the happenings of intervening years since he left us at the Baton Rouge Conference and moved to Texas. Sunday, at eleven, Bro. Werlein preached the commencement sermon. His text—"What is man?" etc.—was handled in a masterly manner, and his strong, fresh, needed thoughts were so presented as to make a profound impression upon his vast audience. He discovered to all that he had given his subject the most careful and thorough study. He knew what he was saying, and he knew how to say it. His sermon will long be remembered for its solid thought, its great beauty of expression and its faultless elocution. There was withal, which to the writer was its chief excellency, a genuine piety running through the discourse like a clear, sparkling stream of living water, refreshing, strengthening, delighting and leading straight to God. The next day Bro. Werlein delivered a well-conceived and eloquent address before the St. Cecelia Musical Society. He exalted woman as to her possibilities, and had she attain to the lofty plane of usefulness and blessing for which God intended her. The histrionic powers of the speaker having full play, his language being chaste and beautiful, and his happy classical allusions adding still other charms to his effort, he pleased all, filling with delight the ladies of the Musical Society.

Tuesday morning Hon. W. Penn Ford delivered an excellent address before the Alumnae Association.

Wednesday, commencement day, witnessed the assembling, in Session Hall, of the largest audience that has been known in Mansfield for many a year. Eight young ladies received diplomas, one of the graduates being Miss Lilian Lyons, of New Orleans, and two of them being from Texas. The essays of the graduates were of high order and well delivered. Col. John S. Young performed, and did it well, the pleasing duty of addressing the young ladies. The graduates, by the gift of a splendid saddle, unmistakably hinted to President Borden that during vacation he must make "headquarters in the saddle." The music, vocal and instrumental, dispensed all through commencement week, reflected great honor upon the high capacity and untiring labors of the accomplished preceptress of music, Mrs. Genie Harding. President Borden is ably assisted in every department, and the very evident advancement made in one year is in proof of it. Though the year has been a hard one as to crops, floods and scarcity of money, and though Bro. Borden was disabled by severe sickness in the winter, yet he has had eighty-seven students as against fifty-nine the session previous. There is every prospect of still larger increase during the session to come. His intelligent zeal and his able corps of teachers have had much to do with this hopeful state of things. The railroad, opening Mansfield to the outside world, has been a benefit to the college. We would not forget to state also that the publication of that sprightly paper, the College News, edited by the Misses Ida Jack Anna Foster and Sallie Moore Fair has served in great measure to make the college and its excellencies known.

Well, what more is there to say? Simply this, that the Mansfield Female College ought to become a very prosperous institution of learning, and that the Methodists of Louisiana have every encouragement to go to work and make it so. Our young ladies need not be sent out of the State to obtain a first-class education. In our college at Mansfield they can receive all needful to fit them for any, even the most elevated, position in life.

Confession with the Mouth.

BY BISHOP HAMLINE.

Some say, "My position in the church testifies." Not so. For to this day "they are not all Israel which are of Israel." The visible church is not mainly composed of Christians. It may be that nineteenth-twentieths of her members know nothing of vital religion; and even her Protestant branches are fields in which the tares and wheat "grow together until the harvest." Membership in such a church will not be received as an explicit avowal of saving faith in Christ. A church is condemned as heartless and Christless, for general silence on the subject of experimental religion; and if an unwitnessing church fall under such reproach, an unwitnessing member of it can surely fare no better. And what if church membership were profession of Christian "hope?" are we not commanded to "give a reason of that hope?"

Others say, "Let your life testify. Testify what? If well ordered it may testify the purity of your motives and the innocence of your social dispositions. It may prove you honest, industrious, and neighborly; but all these you may be without regeneration or the love of God. How shall it be known why you are honest, whether grace or nature, the love of Christ or the love of praise, makes you so? Your life testify! Absurd! As well might the blameless conduct of a witness at the bar be offered in reply to fifty cross questions.

The mode is fixed by God's authority. "With the mouth confession is made unto salvation;" that is, in words spoken or written, for in different circumstances they are equal. This has been the usual mode from the beginning. When Noah built the ark, he mingled his testimony with his daily toil, warning a wicked generation of its impending doom. Those "holy men of old," the patriarchs and prophets, "spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost," some of them enjoying his infallible guidance. The psalmist wished to "declare" what God had done for his soul; he prays, "O Lord! open thou my lips, and my mouth shall show forth thy praise." In harmony with the text which connects faith and confession, he says, "I believed, and therefore have I spoken." The New Testament saints followed this example; for the apostle says, "we also believe, and therefore speak." Stephen testified with his expiring breath; and Paul records his experience in its remarkable details—visions, power, and all—not leaving out his call to preach nor even his visit to the third heavens. It seems he was wont to relate all in his sermons, and that before kings, not standing on his own apostolic dignity nor anxious about the violations of courtly etiquette.

We ought to join the church, else we reject God's sacraments, and choose the world before God's people. Like persons brought into court, we are summoned into church to be qualified as witnesses by sacramental oaths. In the church we should behave with the utmost circumspection, so that, our veracity unquestioned, we may testify with the utmost effect. But all this does not fulfil the demand of the summons. Having the positions and the qualifications of a witness, we must next give our testimony, and not stand in the church like mutes before the court.

But what service does confession render which makes it indispensable? It cherishes and exemplifies our Christian graces. First, it cherishes them, as light and air do the plants, which must perish without their influence. For example:

1. Confession promotes humility. Tracing our pardon and purification to Christ is conceding our own guilt, pollution, and helplessness. To claim Christ as a Saviour is to proclaim self a sinner. This is a cross against which pride rallies, and which, borne, lays pride in the dust. Confession glories in the cross; which is glorying in self abasement, yea in self crucifixion, as Paul did when the pharisee was dead in him: God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom I am crucified to the world;" what he once thought of, and in which his humility now gloried, is familiar to us all. When Peter stood in the judgment hall and warmed himself, confession would not only have humbled but would have saved him.

2. Confession aids self consecration. By dissolving our connection with the world and breaking up our union with the creatures. It says, not of the friends but of the enemies of religion, "Let us break their bonds asunder, and cast away their cords from us." It yields a public pledge to Christ and his church, and fortifies religious purpose by compelling its worst foes, such as earthly policy and the sense of shame, to become its aids and allies. If the Christian would multiply the cords which bind his sacrifice to the altar, let him often proclaim his purpose to keep it there. God will employ our confessions to lead us out of the world into his closer fellowship. What we feebly bind on earth he will be pleased to bind in heaven, writing on our hearts "I will receive you."

3. Confession strengthens faith. Like filial piety, it nourishes its parent. It is to faith like those braces which the juices of the stalk throw out for self support. Its influence may partly depend on the laws of mind; for such is our mental constitution that avowal fortifies and almost creates conviction. In this way scepticism has been wrought into atheism, for men have become confirmed in infidelity by lightly vindicating it in conversation. And if against evidence a man can talk himself into the belief of fatal error, how much more may he deepen the impression of truth, when he has reason and conscience on his side to enforce his own avowals? Doubtless, on natural principles, confession strengthens faith.—The King's Highway.

COMMENCEMENT EXERCISES.

This Institution, under the presidency of Rev. T. A. S. Adams, has taken a deservedly high stand in north Mississippi. The examination of classes in the different branches of study was highly approved by the trustees, and altogether satisfactory to the patrons, and an appreciative audience in attendance. A commendable feature was that not a lesson was lost in preparation. Time was so wisely and judiciously economized that the hours of study were not disturbed by preparation. The course of study of this Institution is complete and full. Tuesday morning, June 6, the exhibition commenced at ten o'clock. The readings, declamations, essays and music were so well arranged that nothing occurred to mar the interest of the occasion.

The whole reminded us of the harmony of music under the hand of a skillful performer. Miss Ruffle Anderson's essay on "Sculptors of life are we, with our unearved life before us," was received with rapturous applause. "The peace makers," the report of the Grace's in their labors of love, were received with marked favor, and called for again in the evening. The programme for the evening was rich and varied, and was much enjoyed by the audience.

"Crowns worn but not won; crowns won but not worn." An essay read by Miss Adi Amason had marks of true genius. She received the degree of M. E. L. from Rev. T. A. S. Adams.

Eligibility and accessibility makes Kosciusko every way desirable for the location of a first class female college in north Mississippi. Larger buildings are much needed. The rural grounds naturally beautiful, sufficiently remote from the business part of town, designate it as a point worthy the attention of Mississippians.

Now, Mr. Editor, may we not inquire through the columns of the Advocate, in its wide range of circulation, if there are not large-hearted men of means with the mind of Vanderbilt, who are casting about for some eligible place to build a female college that will be more lasting than life? Let us ask them to turn their eyes to Kosciusko, and view the grounds "beautiful for situation" and interview the trustees and principal of the school.

GEORGE W. BROWN,
Chairman of Visiting Com.

JUNE 12, 1882.

—Mrs. Hargrove will accompany the Bishop in his Episcopal tour to the Pacific coast.

—Dr. Harrison, the new Book Editor, is in his office and at work on the revised edition of the Discipline.

—Rev. Dr. John Poisal of the Baltimore Conference has been ill for some time, and his friends have dispaired of his recovery.

—Three young preachers are called for to go to New Mexico and it is stated that arrangements are made for their support.

—The Rev. Caleb B. Davis, a member of the Tennessee Conference died at his home McMinnville Tenn., June 3, 1882. His end was peace.

—The Rev. Moses C. Payne of Hamburg, Iowa, has given fifty dollars to the Church Extension Society of the Denver Conference. That is practical fraternity.

—Rev. Wm. Taylor, the independent and indefatigable missionary of the Methodist Episcopal Church, is writing a volume to be entitled, "Self Supporting Missions."

—Rev. Wm. Hicks, a veteran of the Holston Conference, and Rev. Bennett and Blake, a superannuated member of the North Carolina Conference, have died in the faith.

—Bishop Foss of the Methodist Episcopal Church, though somewhat improved, is still in a critical condition. He has warm Southern friends who pray for his recovery.

—John B. Gough of temperance fame, is to deliver the commencement address at Emory College, Ga. It is also reported that Mr. Geo. I. Seney will attend the commencement exercises.

—The Rev. Dr. C. W. Miller, is extremely ill at his home in Lexington Ky. His feebleness was noticeable at the General Conference, and his friends feared he would soon be called from labor to reward.

—Rev. Drs. W. W. Bennett, and John E. Edwards, delegates to the recent General Conference, at Nashville, from Virginia, were entertained by the same family, at the same house, and occupied the same room and bed, as at the General Conference of 1858.

—Rev L. B. Stateler of the Montana Conference has been an itinerant preacher for fifty years, doing pioneer work, travelling all over the great West, and has never received as much as five hundred dollars for any one year's service. He was a delegate to the General Conference and has no idea of superannuating just yet.

—Miss Jessee Green, of this city, on Wednesday the fourteenth, openly renounced Christianity, and espoused Judaism, after which she was married to Mr. Isaac Fietel, the impressive ceremonies, both of conversion and matrimony, performed by Dr. Gutheim. Thus she turns her back upon the sun and looks out into thick darkness.

—The Nashville College for Young Ladies has just closed a prosperous session. Dr Kelley, President of the Board of Trust stated that the second year of the College has shown an increase of 42 per cent in day pupils and 118 per cent in boarding pupils. There were five graduates. The new building will be ready for occupancy by the opening of next term.

—The Rev. R. A. Holland, D. D., now rector of a church in Chicago, the pulpit meteor who cornscated around in our Southern Methodist skies for awhile, has been preaching some rank heresy. Alas! for that brilliant young man. Methodism was too narrow for him and now Evangelical Christianity can't hold him. So, so, when the old faiths are given up, there is no calculating the distances to which the wanderer will drift.

—We deeply sympathize with our dear brother Dr. C. W. Carter and his wife, in the loss of their little son George. After only a few days illness, he passed peacefully away to the better land. He was buried on Thursday last. Rev. J. A. Ivy, officiating at the solemn services, assisted by Bishop Parker and Dr. Ahrens. How changed the home since death has entered there! But thank God, earth has no sorrow, that heaven can not heal. May our Father's benedictions rest upon the stricken home. This earthly life was short, but there is another unmeasured by the flight of years.

—A colored man near Opelousas named Lewis Lowry found himself suddenly rich last week. His plow struck an obstruction, which, upon examination, proved to be a ten-gallon jar filled with Spanish silver coins of the date of 1779, and bearing the imprint of Charles III of Spain. The amount found is estimated at $8000, or $10,000. It is thought that none of the coins are less than a hundred years old.

That was a lucky furrow. We wish him success and satisfaction with his sudden fortune—the purchase of a home, the education of his children, and not a dollar to a low doggery.

—The Southern States have commenced an upward movement to unexampled prosperity. In 1880 the value of the leading productions as compiled from the statistics of the Agricultural Department were: cotton $250,266,242; corn $229,492,618; wheat $58,351,285; rye $2,271,669; oats $21,162,137; potatoes $6,666,534; tobacco $23,916,762; hay $18,212,724; rice $5,560,000; sugar $12,500,000; molasses $8,000,000. The fisheries of the South are so valuable that a member of the United States Fish Commission predicts that the mullet fisheries of Florida will become as important as the cod fisheries of New England. With such resources the South should soon become the most prospering section of the Union, and second to none as a manufacturing center.

The Opelousas Courier of June 10, makes the following notice of a temperance lecture by Rev. T. J. Hough. His earnest words will find an echo in every pulpit of the land. Would that the matchless evil could be extirpated:

On last Sunday night the Rev. T. J. Hough delivered a very able and instructive lecture, at the courthouse, on the subject of total abstinence from the use of alcoholic or spirituous liquors. From the very outset, Mr. Hough treated the subject with a seriousness and thoroughness commensurate to the grave and vital issues involved in the theme. He indulged in no light anecdotes or wordy cartoons to ridicule the unfortunate habit of intemperance, as is usual with most of the professional lecturers on this subject, but addressed himself to its salient points with all of the dignity and decorum of diction and earnestness that he would have employed in a sermon upon any other vice condemned in the Bible. He drew a picture of the fearful spread of intemperance in the United States, and by carefully compiled statistics exhibited the startling records of crime, misery, ruin and death, which yearly emanate from the indulgence in ardent spirits. Every state, city, town nay, every neighborhood, furnish examples to swell the miserable calendar made up from the victims of this dangerous, insidious, and deadly enemy. Mr. Hough traced the growth of the habit back to the first glass of wine, and then delineated its gradual progress until it culminated into a fixed vice of habitual drunkenness. He adjured the young ladies of Opelousas to exclude wine from their entertainments, and refuse the escort and society of all young men who frequented coffee houses and indulged in drinking spirituous liquors in any manner or degree. He said that their influence, and condemnation of the vice of drinking, would do more to save our young men from drunkenness than all other influences combined.

"The Dear Old Advocate."

Such is the appelation given to our paper by scores, if not hundreds, of our correspondents and supporters.

This term is used in a figure as representing the many tender memories connected with its history. It has lived for thirty years. Three of its sponsors are now Bishops. In its columns are contained the best thoughts, the rich experiences of these godly men.

In its many volumes are contained whole bodies of divinity—the finest essays of our best intellects, on religious, scientific and kindred subjects. And what perhaps is the best of all, the mature experiences of our godly men and pious women of several generations. The "dear old Advocate!" The memorials of our sainted dead are embalmed in permanent form in the archives of its history. Eternity alone will reveal the good done to thousands of our dear people who, through blinding tears, have traced their beautiful lives and happy deaths. How illustrious the catalogue! of Bishops, elders and deacons, of distinguished laymen, of sainted women, of children and infants! What rich materials for the future historian lie imbedded in her columns! The "dear old Advocate!" It still lives to send its messages to the thousands of our Israel. For thirty years it has been voyaging steadily along without serious "evil occurrent." Sometimes there have been "adversaries," and occasionally sand-bars ahead.

Our Southern waters are always low in summer. The same may be said of the fonds of the Advocate. The water is scant at the same season of the year, and occasional sand-bars remind us of the spurs that may have to be used.

Let me say to the lovers of our good craft that every two dollars sent us is an additional spar, that may be thrust out to keep her in deep water.

It gives us pleasure to add that all those who write of the "dear old Advocate!" send their money as well. The new administration is receiving hearty congratulations from every quarter.

In conclusion, allow me to request all who read this article to send one or more subscribers, with the money, to help us along during the time of "low water," and when the money can not be sent send along the subscriptions. The paper will be forwarded.

Death of Rev. Corydon Chamberlin.

This honored and excellent minister of Christ passed away to his rest above, from his home at San Jose, Cal., on the evening of June 10. In life the church had no more faithful, self-denying toiler, in his death she mourns no purer, saintlier son. Bro. Chamberlin was raised in Mississippi, and in one of the oldest and best Methodist families. He was educated at Centenary College, taking the second honor of his class. In November, 1861, he entered the Mississippi Conference, and at once took rank among the most effective men in the body. His first appointment was Brookhaven station; in 1863-4 he was stationed at Jackson; in 1866 he went to Woodville, and remained four years. Always delicate, and prosecuting his pastoral labors under great disadvantages, in 1870 he transferred to California, hoping that a change of climate would restore him to health. In the Pacific Conference he was held in high esteem, and served the church with marked efficiency, both in the pastorate and presiding eldership. Last year his health broke down completely. After months of suffering he has gone to the better land, where pain and death are felt and feared no more. He leaves a wife and four children, and leaves them, as many another toil-worn itinerant has before him, without home and income. A few months before, his eldest son, Edwin, named for his dear friend, the Rev. E. H. Mounger, preceded him to the heavenly rest. Humble, scholarly, self denying, industrious, modest and pure, the name of Corydon Chamberlin will be held in precious and honored memory, both in Mississippi and California.

LINUS PARKER.

Nashville and New Orleans Christian Advocates.

We will furnish these two papers in clubs for three dollars and fifty cents net, cash to accompany orders. This affords our friends a fine opportunity to avail themselves of reduced rates, and secure the two leading Methodist journals of the South.

Mr. C. E. Young, of Allegheny City, Pa., writes; "Disease and suffering had completely discouraged me. I took no pleasure in eating. I found no comfort in living. I felt myself a burden, and my mind bodered on insanity. Dyspepsia and urinary disorders troubled me. I tried Browns Iron Bitters, and now, thank God, I feel myself the equal of any man. It has saved my life!"

Manager's Department.

We shall do our best to exclude fraudulent advertisements of every description from the Advocate, and trust our friends, in ordering goods from the leading merchants of New Orleans and elsewhere, as represented in our columns, will mention having seen the advertisement in the Advocate. We will also take pleasure in attending personally to any commissions for our friends in the country with which we may be favored, while endorsing our advertisers as being worthy of their patronage.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 115 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years, but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructable. Mason and Hamlin's organs, the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to Mr. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Still there also is to your music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

A woman forgot to send home some work on Saturday. On Sunday morning she told her little niece to put on her things and take the bundle under her shawl to the lady's house. "So-lady will see it," she said. "But is it not sunday under my shawl, aunt?" asked the child.

Boswell complained to Johnson that the noise of the company the day before had made his head ache. "No, sir, it was not the noise that made your head ache; it was the sense we put into it." "Has sense that effect upon the head?" "Yes, sir, on heads not used to it."

THE SCARE-CROW.

BY CELIA THAXTER.

The farmer looked at his cherry tree,
With thick buds clustered on every bough
I wish I could hear the robins," said he;
It's somebody only would show me how."

"I'll make a terrible scare-crow grim,
With threatening hands and with bristling head,
And up in the tree I'll fasten him
To frighten them half to death," he said.

He fashioned a scare-crow altered and bold,
'Twas a horrible thing to see!
And very early, one summer morn,
He set up in his cherry tree.

The blossoms were white as the light snow-flakes,
The beautiful tree was a lovely sight,
But the scare-crow stood there so much at home
That the birds flew screaming away in fright.

But the robins, watching him day after day,
With heads on one side and eyes so bright,
Surveying the monster, began to say,
Why should this fellow our prospects blight?"

He never moves round for the roughest weather,
He's a harmless, comical, tough old fellow,
Let's all go into the tree together,
For he won't budge till the fruit is mellow."

So up they flew; and the saucicst pair
Mid the shady branches peered and perked,
Selected a spot with the utmost care,
And all day merrily sang and worked.

And where do you think they built their nest
In the scare-crow's pocket, if you please,
That half-concealed on his ragged breast,
Made a charming covert of safety and ease.

By the time the cherries were ruby-red
A thriving family hungry and frisky,
The whole long day on the ripe fruit fed
'Twas so convenient they saw no risk.

Until the children were ready to fly
All undisturbed they lived in the tree.
For nobody thought to look at the Sly
Fat old pope-a-doodle-ing family.

Our farmer-friends can greatly aid us in making this column helpful to our readers generally. We would like to have notes, facts, incidents and experiences of farm life in the Southwest. The progress in agricultural science in the South within the last ten years has been remarkable. Labor-saving implements of all sorts are being used, crops diversified and the method of tillage greatly improved. Along the line of the great Jackson Route the increase in vegetable products, fruits and small grain has added largely to the wealth of that section. Let us hear from you, brethren, and by so doing help to build up our glorious Southland.

PROTECTING SHEEP FROM DOGS.—About six years ago the Legislature of Tennessee passed a dog law, to encourage sheep husbandry, by taxing dogs $1 and bitches $5. I think that I am safe in saying there never was such a fearful howl over the enactment of any law as was set up over this dog law, by admirers of the worthless whelps. The law was in force only a short time before the Supreme Court decided it to be unconstitutional, and again left the sheep breeder of Tennessee without any protection.

For the benefit of sheep breeders, I give my plan of dealing with the worthless curs. My sheep were being killed at night, and I had no means of ascertaining where to find the guilty dog, and was not long in reaching the conclusion that unless something was speedily done my flock of fine South-Downs would all soon be killed. Therefore, I decided to build a pen with rails, commencing at the ground and gradually drawing in each additional course of rails, like a bird-trap, until sufficiently high to prevent a dog from jumping out; leaving the top open. I then put into this a sheep that had been killed. It will readily be seen that a dog could easily get on the top of the pen from the outside and jump in, but it was impossible for him to get out. My pen was a complete success, and so far I have not had a single sheep bitten outside of that pen by a dog. I will not say how many dogs I caught in my pen for fear some of the readers of the Country Gentleman might be inclined to doubt my statement.—H., in Country Gentleman.

BULKY FOOD NECESSARY.—A constant waste and repair of all the bodily tissues, says the American Poultry Yard, belongs to the normal condition of all healthy animal life. Certain portions of the food taken into the stomach are in some way, not yet fully understood, perhaps, absorbed and used for supporting and sustaining the entire system. Other portions seem to have no such office to perform, but pass from the stomach through the alimentary canal and are taken up by the scavangers of the body—the intestines—and discharged as useless, and worse than useless, matter. And we learn from these facts that supplying mere ailment of the most condensed and nourishing sort, and in quantities just sufficient to support health, is not the true way to keep all their bodily functions in their best condition. It is just as necessary that the waste portions of food should be supplied as that the directly life sustaining constituents should not be wanting. Hence, we urge upon poultry keepers the necessity of giving something which, by its mere bulk, may help to fill the almost insatiable crop and the ever-grinding gizzard of the fowl, and while eliminating the needed share for general sustenance, shall also furnish the waste matter, which is equally important to the well being of the flock. For this purpose almost any coarse, bulky article, such as potatoes, chopped apples, turnips, cabbage, or in winter hay or rowen will answer, and their use will make fewer demands on the meal barrel and the other expensive materials needed for the support of the poultry.

AN IMPROVED STONE-BOAT.—A stone boat, for hauling heavy articles which it is inconvenient to elevate far from the ground, is a necessity for every good farmer. A few days ago I saw one of novel construction, and it seemed to me a decided improvement on those in common use. Instead of having the boards composing the "boat" extend under the entire surface, and only slightly turned up at the forward end, this improvement is a stone sled, with runners six to eight inches broad, composed of two, three inch planks, sawed so as to give a rise of six inches or more at the front. On each of these runners is placed a piece of 3x4 inch scantling, and three lengths of the same four and a half feet long connect the two sides of the boat and form the platform on which good inch boards are laid. The whole is then spiked with wooden bolts extending through the bottoms of the runners. Wooden pins are better than iron, because as the boat wears, iron would tear up the soil. There need not be a particle of iron in the boat if wide enough boards are used, though it is better to put in a few nails to hold down the center. This form of boat is very strong and can be used where the ordinary stone-boat would be impracticable. It is decidedly improved by putting in a tongue so as to be more readily guided. With even the slightest fall of snow it is quite as convenient as a sled. The gentleman whom I saw using it says he has made and used three in the last fifteen years, and would not be without it on any consideration. With a tongue it can be held to a tolerably steady motion on a rough road where the common stone-boat would be unmanageable.—Country Gentleman.

ABSORBENTS.—It is pretty well agreed among practical bee-keepers that for safe wintering some provision must be made to get rid of the constant moisture arising from the bees. Hence direct ventilation finds many advocates, who, for proof of the correctness of their theory cite cases of the many colonies which come through severe winters with large vents in the sides or tops of hives. Still we believe the majority of bee keepers think the better plan is to get rid of the dampness in a milder manner. Pieces of lime laid on the cloth directly over the frames have been used with success. One of our neighbors who has been very successful in wintering attributes part of his success to the fact that he keeps a soft dry brick directly over the cluster of bees during the winter. Before putting the bricks on the hives he heats them very hot to thoroughly dry them. This he repeats several times during the winter, exchanging a few at a time. We have thoroughly dried out the inside of a hive in the winter time in this manner, which had become very wet on account of a leaky top. We are constantly trying for some better mode for wintering in hopes that we may strike some plan which will assure safety for our bees. Much has been accomplished in the past few years, and we are confident of success in the not far distant future.—Indiana Farmer.

The climate of Texas, particularly the part known as Middle West Texas, is as near like the climate of Spain as could be desired, so far as the adaptability to sheep raising is concerned. We have a breeze throughout the entire summer to temper the heat of the sun, and at no time in the year does the animal suffer from close, oppressive heat as badly on the prairies of Texas, as it would in the fields of Vermont. Our summers may be long and hot, but they are more than offset by our mild winter. No country in the world is more blessed with an even temperature; and, despite the theories of such men as our Vermont friend, we have demonstrated to the world that Texas is the best part of the United States to make money by sheep raising. The best evidence of success is money, and Texas has more wealth among its sheep owners than any other State. They made it by raising Merino sheep. Texas is destined in the near future to take the lead as a wool producing State, and it will owe it to the fact that the climate and grasses are exactly suited to the welfare of the close wool Merino.—Southern Live Stock Journal.

NEW METHODS OF FARMING.—Concerning the vast improvements that are being made in agriculture by means of new implements adapted to every kind of use, the Farmer's Journal, published at Terry, Miss., happily tells the story and so much better than we can, that we transfer the article to our columns. It says: "We have never seen such evidences as now, of so complete a revolution in farming methods in the South. A few years ago it was indeed a rare sight to see improved implements of any sort, and in many instances when a farmer had mustered courage to purchase one, it was soon laid aside as worthless and impracticable, and for the simple and sole reason that no care had been taken to learn their use and management. Now there is a demand for all kinds of such machines here, and it seems that the good time is coming when every farmer will make his farm self supporting by substituting improved labor-saving implements, for the improvident, careless, and, in many cases, entirely worthless labor he is now dependent on."

FIFTY THOUSAND ACRES OF LAND TO WEALTHY ITALIANS.—The Little Rock Gazette states that Messrs. Antonio Saspari, James Grazino and Lorenzo Vecchiani, distinguished and wealthy Italians, citizens of Tyrol, arrived there, and represent 3,000 families who have made their arrangements to move to our State. The province of Tyrol is almost a sealed book, and it is with the greatest difficulty that people can emigrate. Col. Slack, the Little Rock and Fort Smith Land Commissioner, with able assistance in the Old World, has been working up this move for months past, and is now crowned with success. The visitors who went up to the new town of Orleiville named in honor of Father Orfei of St. Louis,) Falkner county, in charge of Doni Hellmich, have already purchased 50,000 acres of land. The immigrants, who are to arrive in the course of a few months will engage very extensively in grape growing and the manufacture of wine. As a rule, those people have sufficient means to make a fine start, and are very generally successful.

KILL YOUR SHEEP YOUNG.—There are few animals, says an exchange, which, when they are in their prime, pay as well as sheep, and there are very few, if any, others, upon whom old age has such a damaging effect. As the sheep is much shorter lived than any other of our domestic animals, is it not strange that many farmers attempt to keep them too long? At ten years of age the horse is just in his prime, and the cow is as good as ever, with the prospect of remaining so several years longer. But the sheep is very old when it reaches the age of ten, the natural limit of the term of its life. After reaching this age sheep are very likely to be injured by the slight exposures which do younger animals no harm. They are more liable to be attacked by disease, and if they live they will be likely to produce less wool and smaller lambs than they have done previously. We do not think it pays, except perhaps in special instances, to keep sheep after they are six years old.—New York Herald.

OIL FOR FARM IMPLEMENTS.—For general purposes on the farm castor oil, with a little kerosine added, is the best lubricator and preserver. For saws, mowers, buggies, and the like, this mixture furnishes more body with less gum than most other oils. The amount of kerosine, if any, to be added must be governed by the purpose for which it is designed.

The Colored Cook.

Instead of our usual variety in the household department this week, we publish the following description of the colored cook from the Texas Siftings. Though the style is humorous, the picture is true to life, as all Southern housewives will agree:

"An' dis heah ar' wat dey calls a spring chicken dese days.'

There is quite a variety of colored cooks infesting the kitchens of the southern end of the United States of North America at the present day. They vary in color from the somber shades of a burned stump in a dark alley, at mid-night, to the mellow tints of a ripe pumpkin tinged with the rays of the rising sun. They vary in other respects. The young one is more impudent and less respectful than the old one. When she comes in search of a "place," she is apt to say that "cullud wash-lady" told her that the "white woman what lived here wanted to hire a cook;" but they all resemble each other in one particular—their ignorance of cookory is 20° above proof, and their unconsciousness of their ignorance may safely be said to register at least 146° Fahrenheit in the shade.

We have not space to describe all the varieties of the colored cook, but will tell what we know of the commonest type, the culinary artist, who is fat, black and forty years of age or thereabout. She is proud of having "b'longed to de ole judge 'fo' de wah," and she is fond of comparing the present with the past. Her comparisons are not complementary to the present, for her surroundings are, to her, as the gloomy ruins of social and material things standing out against a brilliant and golden tinted back-ground "ob de gorgeousness ob de good ole days."

With the loyalty of her race, she is faithful to her old master and mistress to the extent of calling on them for the loan of a half dollar whenever she is financially embarrassed.

She seldom stays at any one place more than three months at a time. When hired, she promises to come on Thursday, the day the old cook intends leaving, but she does not come until the following Monday evening, when she arrives accompanied by a small trunk with wall paper pasted over the outside of it, and a large bundle of "her things" tied up in a patch-work bed-spread. During the first few days she acts so that her mistress absorbs the idea that the new cook is a treasure. But her satisfaction in, and admiration of, her treasure receives successive and severe shocks as the idiosyncrasies of the cook's character begin to develope. She can cook a chicken, but all the colored people can do that. It is a talent that is hereditary. Beyond that her capacity is limited. She breathes on the plates, and polishes them on the table. She developes religious proclivities which necessitates her attendance at church three times on Sunday; at prayer meeting on Wednesday, and choir practice on Saturday night. She is also a member of the "Benevolent Order of the Sisters of the Mysterious Ten Wise Virgins," the weekly meetings of which require her attention on Tuesday nights. Thus her mistress has only three evenings in the week on which she feels at liberty to entertain her friends at her own house.

The favorite dissipation of the colored cook, besides religious observances, consist of sitting down on the kitchen door step to rest, and going to sleep to rest, and going to sleep there while the biscuits burn to a cinder, and the coffee boils over and mixes with the cabbage and other fruits in the adjacent skillet. She has days on which she suffers with "a misery" in her head, probably from too much religious observance on the previous evening, and on these days she takes a gloomy view of life, breaks dishes, forgets to put Royal baking powder in the batter cakes, and manufacturers coffee of the kind that leaves successive circles of an alluvial deposit on the inside of the cup.

When she comes to hire she tells her employer that she is not married. After awhile, when the latter notices the frequent appearance of a "cullud gemman" about the kitchen and the cook's boudoir, and brings her to task for having concealed the fact that she was married, she replies: "Fo' de Lawd 'm, we isn't married: we jes took up wid one anoddor."

Honesty is her strong point; she can be trusted with a dollar to take to market in the morning, and she will invest fifty cents of it in provisions and cheerfully turn over fifteen cents of change to her employer on her return. The appetite of the colored cook is something that the columns of this paper are too limited in extent to describe.

Hints for Milkers.

Milk only twice a day unless the cow sheds her milk. Let the milking be at regular times, and at intervals of about twelve hours. Milk thoroughly, as any milk left in the udder is likly to thicken, and do injury to the cow, as well as lessen the quantity. Again, remember that the milk grows richer until the last. Read the following from the pen of Dr. Anderson, of Bath, England: "We filled several large teacups of the same size, commencing with milk at the beginning of the milking, and others at regular intervals, till the last, which was filled with the strippings or stroakings. Those were severally weighed, so as to ascertain that the quantity of it was the same, and after repeating this experiment a number of trials with different cows, the results were stated as follows: The quantity of cream from the first-drawn cup was in every case much inferior and smaller than that from the last cup drawn, and those between giving less or more as they were nearer to the beginning or end. In the case of some cows the variation of cream from the first cup to the last was in the proportion of sixteen to one; and in no case was it less than eight to one. The difference in quality was much greater than in quantity. In the first cup the cream was thin, and in the last cup the cream was thicker and richer in color, more so than of any. The difference in the quality of the milk that remained after the cream was separated was still greater than either respect to the quantity and quality of the cream. The milk of the first cup was thin and bluish, as if a large proportion were water, while that of the last cup was a thick consistency and of a yellow color, more like that of cream than milk, both in appearance and taste."

It has been well said that a little moss fed to a cow while milking often has a good effect, and she meanwhile yields her milk more freely. As nearly as possible, observe twelve hours between milking—a rule of more importance than at first might seem to a careless milker. The beating of a cow with a milking stool, or kicking with your feet should never be allowed.

Educational.

AMERICAN COLLEGES.—The Sun says that more money is devoted to the higher education by the United States than by any other country in the world except Great Britian. But although the aggregate sum applied to this end is large it is scattered among so many institutions that the need of further endowment is one of the most urgent.

The whole annual income distributed among the 358 colleges of the United States fell in 1878 a trifle short of $2,550,000. The English universities of Oxford and Cambridge alone had, according to the returns published in 1871, revenues amounting to $3,770,000. These resources, moreover, were exclusive of the bonifices in the gift of the several colleges, and which, under the reformed system, are as truly encouragements to learning as the university prizes. The gross annual value of these benefices must amount to nearly $2,000,000, for about one half of that sum is represented by the livings in the gifts of Oxford alone. We see, therefore, that all the American colleges combined can not vie with the two great English seminaries in the scope of their pecuniary means, nor is it likely that any single American institution will succeed in placing itself on an equal footing with them in this respect within a century. Indeed it is probable that Trinity College, Dublin, although precise figures relating to the funds at its disposal are not just now accessible, is richer than the five best endowed universities in this country.

Harvard has of productive fund $3,615,000 the annual income being $231,000. Columbia College has $1,763,000, and an annual income of $315,000. Next comes the Johns-Hopkins University in Baltimore, with $3,000,000 and a revenue of $180,000. The Lehigh has $1,000,000, though its income is but $70,000 Cornell University, $1,263,000 and 100,000 of yearly revenue. College of New Jersey, at Princeton, has $850,600 and an income of $75,000. The University of California has $750,000 in productive funds and $105,000 income. Yale has but $587,000, but her annual income, which is largely recruited from tuition fees, $136,000.

Of the large sums contributed by individual benefactors to collegiate establishments during the last twenty years at the head stands John Hopkins, who gave $3,000,000; John C. Green; the gifts of Ezra Cornell and H. W. Sage to Cornell University aggregate more than a million. Lafayette College has received from Ario Pardee more than half a million since 1864, and the Western Reserve College was endowed with $500,000 by Amassa Stone. Mrs. Valeria G. Stone, the wife of a Boston merchant, has bestowed more than $600,000 on different American Colleges; George Peabody gave to Yale and Harvard $150,000 each; to Washington College, Virginia, $10,000; to Kenyon, Ohio $25,000, and to various scientific institutes about a million and a half. Joseph E. Sheffield gave to the scientific school of Yale nearly $400,000, and Amherst College received $150,000 from Samuel Williston, Nathaniel Thayer and Nathan Mathews have each given more than a quarter of a million to Harvard University; and the gift of the younger Agassiz to the museum at Cambridge, which his father founded, already exceed $300,000.

—Two years ago the faculty of the Divinity School at New Haven established a course of study extending over a fourth year. It was then an experiment. It has proved, however, to be successful. The two graduate classes which have received instruction under this arrangement have made gratifying progress. Other theological schools are now adopting the same plan. At Yale the resident professors conducted students in advanced studies of their several departments, and similar courses will be pursued this year, as the special studies of the students may require.

—The women voted on school matters to some purpose recently at West Denver, Colorado. A Catholic or fusion ticket was put into the field to oust the regular board. The ladies came to the rescue—"one old lady of seventy walking nearly a mile to deposit her maiden vote"—and the old management was continued by a good majority. At the last election in Cheyenne, Wyo., out of 1,431 votes polled, 510 were cast by women. But one swallow does not make a Summer.

—The Louisiana University is to be entirely reorganized, the Board having become convinced that the decrease in the number of students is due to some inherent cause of mismanagement. All the chairs of the college have been declared vacant. Elections to fill these positions will be made at a meeting of the Board at Baton Rouge, August 4.

—At the last session of the Virginia General Assembly $50,000, arising from the sale of the State interest in Atlantic, Mississippi and Ohio railroad bonds, were appropriated to educational purposes.

—The study of American classics, or model selections from favorite American authors, both in prose and poetry, was introduced as a half time study during the last term in the Milwaukee high school, and was pursued with enthusiasm and success.

—The Arkansas State Senate has passed a bill appropriating $10,000 for a branch normal college at Pine Bluff, Ark., which school will be used for the education of teachers.

—The University at Cambridge, England, by an immense majority of its Senate—398 to 32—has opened its regular examination to women students, granting them the same honors and degrees as to young men.

—Miss Gladstone, daughter of the English Premier, will probably be elected Principal of the flourishing Ladies' College at Cambridge.

—It is claimed that the Cincinnati schools have greatly deteriorated in the past few years. Of the 87,618 children in the city 41,330 do not attend any school.

—The University of Berlin has now more than 3,000 students—the largest number ever yet reached by the German university.

—There are two colleges in the United States possessing departments of political science: Columbia College and the University of Michigan.

—The people of Yankton, Dakota, propose to erect on a knoll near that city a Congregational College to cost $100,000.

—The white students of Howard University, Medical Department, are displeased because the faculty have appointed a colored man valedictorian.

—Michigan University has 1317 students, the largest number of any American college. Columbia pays its professors the largest salaries.

Times of Chastisement.

are disposed to say that their affliction is all lost time, and it aggravates the chastisement, severe enough, to feel that they members of the ground. When ever how lightly we valued our opportunities, we wish for them yet wishing does not bring them we long, but long in vain, once permitted to give a cup of water to one for whom Christ

it is something to be humbled ss, and to discover which we have not valued as it Yet inaction need not be less. The bud that in a fellow the winter frost is mellowing for ring sowing. It is very possible useless amid a great deal of busy activity, and to be seeking ess of men, not of God. We can useless while we are doing and God's will, whatever it may to be; and we can always do If we are bringing forth the fruits Spirit we are not useless; and always do that. If we are ing in the knowledge of God's all wisdom and spiritual underng, we are not useless; and we ways do that. While we pray not be useless; and we can alldo that. God will always find us a work to do, a niche to fill, a place to serve, nay, even a soul to save, when it is his will, not ours, that we desire to do; and if it should please him that we should sit still for the rest of our lives, doing nothing but waiting on him, and waiting for him, why should we complain? "Here is the patience of the saints." Rev. xiv, 12.

So, when sorrow comes to you, or to those you love, do not shrink from it as from some cruel torturer, but welcome in it an angel to bring you near to God. Do not fear, do not fear. "This light affliction, which is but for a moment, worketh for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory." (2 Cor. v, 17.) Our God is enough for every one of us, and when we pass behind the cloud, it is that we may see his face and our joy be full. We must not indeed say, envy those in sorrow. That would be aiming far too high for human nature. But we may say, Bless God for his gracious purpose toward them; and let your prayer for them rather be, that they may be able to receive and retain all he offers them, than that they may be too soon delivered from their pain. It is natural to pity them, yet if we could look into the invisible world, we should see that they who are pitied by angels; and whom therefore we ought to pity, and not those whom Christ is taking apart into the wilderness to rest awhile, but those who are left alone to be filled with their own devices, and whom an unbroken prosperity is hardening against God.—A. W. Thorold, D. D., from The Presence of Christ.

How to Ruin a Church.

Evil-minded people certainly need no instruction as to the way of doing evil, but it may serve as a warning to the children of truth to point out the fruits of evil, and put them in their true light.

By a faithful carrying out of the following rules many persons have succeeded admirably well in impeding and destroying the work of God in the church.

1. By staying away from the divine service whenever it is possible. By doing so it will discourage the preacher and set an example which you may have good hopes of being able to induce others to follow.

2. Never attend the devotional meetings. It is very easy to find some excuse for the neglect of your duty in this respect. The state of your health may not allow it, your business occupies all your time, and then these are so cold and dead, too, that you can derive no blessing from attending them.

3. Go often to other churches, and never fail to slander the members of your own church and to report how the church affairs are managed in a better way in other churches. Besides, be filled with zeal for every service, save those that you ought to attend in your own congregation.

4. Complain constantly of coldness and unfriendliness on the part of your fellow members. Take particular care to express your grievances at the deadness of the church. By doing so, you put on the appearance of being exceedingly pious, while you at the same time discourage others. That the case is different from what you make it appear, makes no difference; you will, nevertheless, find many willing to believe you.

5. When you are going home from church be sure to find some fault with the sermon. Tear it to pieces and express disapprobation of it at the dinner-table. It is certain that thereby you will imbue the other members of the family with indifference, and keep them away from the church.

6. Don't show any cordiality towards strangers who attend the services. If they sit by your side look at them sharply and reproachfully, giving them to understand that they are in your way. Even a few looks of that kind will be sufficient to drive them away from you and from the church.

7. Try to get in some quarrel with the pastor or the church members. This, too, will be of good effect in bringing about offense.

It is marvelous how easy it is to live up to these rules. Neither piety nor intelligence is required. But mind—if you do it, you do the work of the devil.—Ex.

The Cure for Gossip.

BY J. O. HOLLAND.

What is the cure for gossip? Simply culture. There is a great deal of gossip that has no malignity in it. Good-natured people talk about their neighbors for use, and only for use, they have nothing else to talk about. As we write, there comes to us the picture of a family of young ladies. We have seen them at home, we have met them in galleries of art, we have caught glimpses of them going from a bookstore, or a library, with a fresh volume in their hands. When we meet them, they are full of what they have seen and read. They are brimming with questions. One topic of conversation is dropped only to give place to another in which they are interested. We have left them, after a delightful hour, stimulated and refreshed; and during the whole hour not a neighbor's garment was soiled by so much as a touch. They had something to talk about. They knew something, and wanted to know more. They could listen as well as they could talk. To speak freely of a neighbor's doings and belongings would have seemed an impertinence to them, and, of course, an impropriety. They had no temptation to gossip, because the doings of their neighbors formed a subject of very much less interest than those which grew out of their knowledge and their culture.

And this tells the whole story. The confirmed gossip is always either malicious or ignorant. The one variety needs a change of heart and the other a change of pasture. Gossip is always a personal confession either of malice or imbecility, and the young should not only shun it, but by the most thorough culture, relieve themselves from all temptation to indulge in it. It is a low frivolous, and too often a dirty business. There are country neighborhoods in which it rages like a pest. Churches are split in pieces by it. Neighbors are made enemies by it for life. In many persons it degenerates into a chronic disease, which is practically incurable. Let the young cure it while they may.

The annual summary of British contributions to missionary societies has just been completed. It shows an increase in the total sum contributed. The separate details for each of the 74 societies form a small pamphlet, but the summary of the whole is as follows: Church of England foreign missions, £465,816; joint societies of Churchmen and Nonconformists, £161,674; English and Welsh Nonconformist societies, £394 313; Scotch and Irish Presbyterian societies, £170,075; Roman Catholic societies, £10,772; total British contributions for 1880, £1,108,050.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT. Trade Mark. Registered.

The Gentle Way is Best. In dyspepsia, liver complaint, and constipation, the diseased organs are preternaturally sensitive and tender. Do not use them roughly. An alterative like TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT, that tones, corrects and purifies the system without unduly exciting or irritating either the stomach, the liver, or the bowels is the true specific in such cases. Reason teaches this, and experience confirms it.

"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873.
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons and several improvements have been added. It obliterates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work within the same time, while economizing steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton, on this account, of a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint, added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every two bales ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

SELF-FEEDERS and CONDENSERS with latest improvements also made by the Daniel Pratt Gin Company to work with these Gins. Send for descriptive circulars. JOS. B. WOLFE & CO., New Orleans, La.

Is a compound of the virtues of sarsaparilla, stillingia, mandrake, yellow dock, with the iodide of potash and iron, all powerful blood-making, blood-cleansing, and life-sustaining elements. It is the purest, safest, and in every way the most effectual alterative medicine known or available to the public. The sciences of medicine and chemistry have never produced so valuable a remedy, nor one so potent to cure all diseases resulting from impure blood. It cures Scrofula, and all scrofulous diseases, Erysipelas, Rose, or St. Anthony's Fire, Pimples and Facegrubs, Pustules, Blotches, Boils, Tumors, Tetter, Humors, Salt Rheum, Scald-head, Ringworm, Ulcers, Sores, Rheumatism, Mercurial Disease, Neuralgia, Female Weaknesses and Irregularities, Jaundice, Affections of the Liver, Dyspepsia, Emaciation, and General Debility.

By its searching and cleansing qualities it purges out the foul corruptions which contaminate the blood, and cause derangement and decay. It stimulates and enlivens the vital functions. It promotes energy and strength. It restores and preserves health. It infuses new life and vigor throughout the whole system. No sufferer from any disease which arises from impurity of the blood need despair, who will give AYER'S SARSAPARILLA a fair trial. Remember, the earlier the trial, the speedier the cure.

Its recipe has been furnished to physicians everywhere; and they, recognizing its superior qualities, administer it in their practice.

For nearly forty years AYER'S SARSAPARILLA has been widely used; and it now possesses the confidence of millions of people who have experienced benefits from its marvellous curative virtues.

THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes in good condition, as when first you use them. They have been carefully examined and approved by American and European oculists, who say the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, if used in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light in the eye, completely doing away with that tiresome sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they remain their polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the result is that the optic nerves always cool, doing away with any feverish sensation to the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or irksome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

BROOKHAVEN, Miss., June 16.—A brilliant audience assembled in the college chapel to-night to hear the address of Rev. Galloway, which was chaste and eloquent. The music was classical and exceedingly well executed.—Special to Times-Democrat.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

PORTLAND, June 13.—The Republican State Convention to-day nominated Col. Frederick Reble, on the first ballot, for Governor, and Reed, Dingley, Houlelle and Milliken as candidates for Congress.

PROVIDENCE, R. I., June 13.—The General Assembly to-day re-elected Senator Anthony to succeed himself for a fifth term.

NEW YORK, June 13.—A car-load of new Texas wheat, the first shipped North, consigned to Samuel Jacoby, was sold at the Produce Exchange yesterday at $1 50 per bushel.

LITTLE ROCK, June 14.—R. S. Hayes, vice president of the Iron Mountain railroad, has filed in the office of the Secretary of State a map exhibiting the route of what will be known as the White River Branch of the Iron Mountain railroad. The new railroad will begin at Newport, on White river, and run through the counties of Independence, Izard, Stone, Baxter, Marion and Boone, to Eureka Springs, a distance of 170 miles. It will open up a country rich in agricultural and mineral resources. Work on the proposed line will be commenced at an early day.

KEOKUK, Ia., June 15.—The four Brookfield, Mo., bank robbers pleaded guilty and were each sentenced to twenty-five years' imprisonment. The Sheriff started with them for Jefferson City this afternoon.

PETERSBURG, Va., June 16.—Rev. Robert F. Jackson, rector of Christ Episcopal Church of Richmond, died here this afternoon of Bright's disease of the kidneys. He was formerly rector of St. Paul's Episcopal Church at Macon, Ga. He was a minister of rare ability and widely known. He was a graduate of the University of Virginia and a native of Petersburg.

REDFORD, Ind., June 16.—The regular north bound passenger train on the Louisville, New Albany and Chicago railroad met with a serious accident yesterday when nearing White river bridge. The rear car jumped the track, rolled down a steep embankment, pulling the other coach, engine, tender, mail and baggage car with it. They were thirty-five or forty passengers on the train; all are more or less injured.

ALBION, N. Y., June 16.—The New York express train, which passed this station at 7:55 A. M., was thrown from the track and upset between Holly and Brockport, and Engineer Michael Burns, of Rochester, was instantly killed. The fireman, it is thought, is fatally injured. All the coaches, with exception of the sleepers, left the track, but no one else was killed or severely injured.

VICKSBURG, June 16.—At one o'clock this morning a fire was discovered in the rear of Wimberly's barber shop on Washington street. The flames spread to several other frame buildings, and all were destroyed with their contents. Several other buildings were materially damaged. The total loss was about $8,000, which was fully covered by insurance.

WASHINGTON, June 17.—The friends of the Mississippi river are well satisfied with their work to-day. The river and harbor bill is through the House with the full amount asked for the Mississippi in it, and there is no doubt that it will go through the Senate.

PETERSBURG, Va., June 17.—A subscription, headed by the Tobacco Exchange, has been started here for the relief of the Patrick county sufferers. The indications are that liberal contributions will be made.

PITTSBURG, June 17.—The labor parade took place to-day. The immense column, which moved at 2:30, containing, it is estimated, fully 25,000 men, comprised five divisions. The procession was an hour and a half passing a given point, eight abreast being the general order.

CHICAGO, June 18.—Latest reports in regard to the cyclone in Iowa indicate that forty persons were killed and a great many wounded, and much property destroyed.

ST. LOUIS, June 17.—A special from Kansas City, says: The most severe and destructive wind and rain storm that has visited this city in years occurred between one and two o'clock yesterday morning. The velocity of the wind was estimated at sixty miles an hour. The rain-fall was heavy, and the lightning terrific. Not a single square in town escaped the fury of the storm. The streets in every quarter were strewed with signs, awnings, limbs of trees and debris of all descriptions. Scarcely an exposed building in the city remained whole, chimneys being blown down, roofs taken off and in many cases houses ruined.

LEAVENWORTH, June 18.—A terrible wind storm prevailed between twelve and one o'clock yesterday morning. The loss in the city and country is about $500,000. Wheat is not seriously injured, but fruit is half stripped from the trees. An unknown man was blown into the river and drowned.

PENSACOLA, Fla., June 19.—A Norwegian vessel, the Zebra, hailing from the tropics, which has been lying at Quarantine Station here for the past ten days, was ordered to Ship Island by the Board of Health Saturday, has one or two suspicious cases aboard.

BILOXI, Miss., June 19.—A Sabbath stillness pervaded the streets yesterday, astonishing and exciting the curiosity of the oldest inhabitants. It resulted from an agreement of the merchants to close their establishments hereafter on Sundays.

TROY, N. Y., June 19.—A terrific storm passed over this city this afternoon, demolishing a partly finished factory building in which one hundred masons and carpenters were at work. No one was injured. The same storm is reported to have done considerable damage in Vermont.

DES MOINES, Iowa, June 19.—Up to last night forty-one deaths had occurred at Grinnell and twenty-three at outside points; seventeen of the latter at Malcolm and five in the country northwest of Grinnell. No deaths are reported to-day, but the doctors say that six or seven more of the wounded at Grinnell will die. Some physicians put the final death roll at Grinnell alone at more than 50, while others fear it will yet reach as high as seventy-five. Of the wounded in that city there are now over one hundred and twenty known cases, about eighty of them being of a rather serious nature. In the country there are also several serious cases of injury. The best posted persons at Grinnell yesterday estimated that the death roll of the calamity would probably reach one hundred. There were six deaths yesterday and last night, among the rest that of Conductor Diegnan, of the Rock Island road. The number of dwelling-houses destroyed by the tornado in the city of Grinnell is now estimated at one hundred and forty-three. It is estimated this entailed a loss of half a million of dollars now, which is nearly a total loss, as hardly any of them are insured against tornadoes; or anything but fire. Mr. J. B. Grinnell states that fifty of the people in losing their homes, lose all they have in this world. Outside of Grinnell, at Malcolm and in the country, there is also an immense loss, probably an aggregate of all will not foot up less than $750,000. Some business men of Grinnell think that the actual loss will be larger.

STARKVILLE, Miss., June 19.—This county was blessed this morning with a fine rain, which gives all vegetation a growing appearance, and the people are in good spirits at the flattering prospects we have for a good crop. Crops are generally good.

FOREIGN.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 13.—The Empress was safely delivered of a daughter at eight o'clock this morning. The child will be named Olga. Public buildings are decked with flags in honor of the event.

LONDON, June 14.—The correspondent of the Daily News at Alexandria states that not only women and children are leaving the country, but men with large material interests in Egypt are hegging passages and leaving their property behind. Many large capitalists are arranging to leave Egypt permanently, not in a panic, but after calmly calculating the cost of such steps.

ALEXANDRIA, June 14.—The bodies of the engineer of the English ironclad Superb, and of two seamen of the Helicon, who were killed in the riot on Sunday, have been buried at sea, as it was deemed imprudent to risk the danger that might have arisen from a funeral on shore. As the barge containing the bodies passed the United States steamer Galena the marines fired a salute and all on board uncovered their heads.

BERLIN, June 15.—In the Reichstag yesterday Bismarck, replying to criticism as to the largeness of the military budget said that the millions of bayonets maintained by Germany's neighbors pointed to the centre of Europe as to a magnet. Germany might have coalitions against her as in former times. He had thus far been able to frustrate such coalitions, but only because the strength of Germany was known. In view, he said, of a slightly developed feeling of our countrymen, the French do not abandon the idea of getting back Alsace and Lorraine.

PARIS, June 15.—The budget committee of the Chamber of Deputies, owing to remonstrances by M. De Freycinet, has rescinded its action rejecting the grant for the maintenance of the French embassy at the Vatican.

LONDON, June 17.—The Central News states that the government, with the approval of France and Turkey, has determined to protect the Suez canal with British troops.

The Standard's correspondent at Alexandria telegraphs that up to last evening the total number of corpses found of Europeans killed in Sunday's riot was 340. An eye witness states that Europeans who took refuge in the police station were massacred by the gendarmes. The correspondent declares that the rising was organized by the Prefect of Police. A dispatch from Alexandria to Reuter's telegram company says that thousands of Europeans are arriving from the interior.

The police made a raid on a stable in Clerkenwell, London, and seized 100,000 rounds of ammunition packed in boxes ready for removal to Ireland. Four hundred rifles, with bayonets, and twenty-five boxes of revolvers were also captured.

LEMBERG, Austria, June 17.—The Jewish committe here have informed the London committe that they will cease to act if the latter committee persist in forwarding to America only able-bodied emigrants.

ALEXANDRIA, June 17.—Ragheb Pasha has consented to undertake the formation of a ministry.

HAVANA, June 17.—Forty-three deaths occurred here from yellow fever during the week ending yesterday.

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an imported piano, because their mothers and grandmothers used to have one of the same make. What was considered good a hundred years ago, would be called a tin pan now; what suited our ancestors would not suit us. Music more than all other arts, is progressive, and the difference between the spinet used by Mozart and even Beethoven, played it, in comparison with the concert piano, say the Chickering of to-day, is as great as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While European makers adhere to their old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. American pianos alone have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The American pianos have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The American pianos durability by their iron plates and bars, volume of tone by overstringing, light touch by improved unisone of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board. If a European piano has a valuable improvement American makers adopt it. There is no patent or copy-right on them. Take, for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago: this fact is very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which no other piano possess. Their pin block is of iron, the bodies are bushed with maple, and the rims are inserted with maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as other pianos. Therefore it is not advisable for people to buy French pianos of which the governments about $100.00 in duties, if a better toned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for less. I have no prejudice against foreign manufacture, and sold myself large numbers of imported pianos, but that was at a time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since I commenced I have always striven to keep good, reliable and first-class pianos, and sell them as low as possible. By this policy, and fair dealing, I have built up my business, in dealing with pride to the thousands I have supplied with music.

Respectfully,

The King Press is worked by hand or one man only is necessary to work the press. With the Double Gear press the labor of two men will reduce a 500 pound bale equal to any horse power steam power screw press and in the same time, with very little labor to the operator. The capacity of this Press is 50% greater than that of any other Single Box Press manufactured by any power. The King Press occupies but little space compared to others, and is made strong and durable; requires no foundation to set up and operate it. It is portable in itself. Needs no props, bolts or planks to secure it around it; stands independent of everything. Under cover or out. Every Press guaranteed perfect and capable of doing the work claimed for it.

The cut shows the simplicity of the Press and the combination of the two principles—the pulley and the lever. Full directions for setting up will accompany each press; no mistakes can be made.

BARE TREES.

BY MARIA S. PARKINGHAM.

Poverty-stricken and gaunt they stand,
Dotted about o'er the liged, frozen land,
Stripped of their freshly they moan and sigh
To the pitiless breeze as it rushes by.
Leafless and shaken, of soul bereft,
They are like a life with no pleasure left.

Bear! I never, though stripped bare,
Are the trees that are planted everywhere
Wherever love's beauty belongs to them,
To their gnarled trunk and feathery stem,
And ever bravely standing in the silent wood,
Is some path-lit life that is nobly good.

They seem to be so, full, these stricken trees,
Of the keen-lined experiences and troubles;
To know that the weeks as they pass will bring
The bursting buds of genial spring;
So they wait from time of life and song,
Like a patient heart that through hope is strong.

Well would it be if our human life,
Sere and dry from the cold of worldly strife,
Shaken by every passing breeze,
Could be calm and tongueless be-cause it sees,
Seeing through all the sum of its light,
Yet rejoicing in hope through the winter's night.

God whose lessons are everywhere,
Let us see thy wond'rful branches bare,
May we learn to be hopeful when storms are nigh,
And be still and strong 'gainst whatever sky,
Knowing that even in the winds sigh during
The glorious leaves of love are quivering.

"Sweet Memories Past."

BY REV. H. J. HARRIS.

There is much poetry in life; much more of reality; no doubt. In comparison, however, the distinction is made between poetry and prose, when there is as much sentiment in the one as in the other. Metre, rhythm, euphony, are characteristics of poetry and song. A connoisseur of art may judge of any production in either department by these, and pronounce unfavorably—not regarding the sentiment. I can not consent to the idea that poety is all the fiction, mere imagination. Though often sublime, it is not always ethereal. Take for example this stanza from the Irish melodies:

"Let gay be my heart as the moments roll on!
Let me laugh like a schoolboy at folly and fun!
Like vases in which flowers have once been inclined—
You may break, you may ruin the vase if you will,
But the scent of the roses will hang round it still."

I quote this because it is apropos. Not that I intend a dissertation on the subject of poetry; but to illustrate how in verse, as well as in prose, a real sentiment may be expressed.

And now, Mr. Editor, I will say a few things I wish to say upon the topic indicated at the head of this article.

Of all the vases adorning the center-table of the heart, memory contains far the sweetest flowers. True, some are exotic, others indigenous, and they are all of different hues. Some have to be bruised to make them exhale their sweet odors; but the combination has eliminated all that was offensive. The vase is almost in fragments, but "the scent of the roses hang round it still." Often I gather the pieces and blend them together, and inhale once more their sweet perfumes. All of life is in the past with me; what little time is left is but a round, perhaps, of the same experiences, or a summing up of these. Translucent light (not always transparent) gilds the future. This cheers and revives. But retrospection of threescore years shows me what life has been, and what it might have been; perhaps, if I had rightly understood the "logic of events," and heeded the lessons of experience.

Whatever has been done or suffered for Christ's sake will live forever. Whatever favor received and employed for His sake will have its reflexaction upon him who bestowed it. Whatever persecution I may have endured will not only have its corresponding measure of reward hereafter; but, if it has been for righteousness' sake, the reward will be in excess.

Seeing your name at the head of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE, as editor, reminds me of the days of twenty-seven years ago when I saw you first, then a small boy. I was then, and often afterward, the welcomed guest at your father's house. It was at Kosciusko, in Attala county, Miss., I first saw you. Thank God that he has called you to so great a dignity in the church. But with the recollection of those days come up the names of some good men and true, with whom I feel to-day it was an honor to be associated: Adams, Tipton, Sebrock, Murff, Fullilove, and others. I was presiding elder there in 1855-6. Washington Ford, a great and good man, was on the circuit. The fourth Quarterly Conference for the year 1856 was held at Kosciusko. There were about thirty members present—the largest attendance of official members of the church that I have ever seen at a Quarterly Conference. I witnessed then and there what I have never seen before nor since: A general outpouring of the Spirit of God upon the entire body of a Quarterly Conference. Every one present was made happy, and rejoiced in the precious love of God. Some shouted, some were filled with laughter, tears of joy flowed freely, and some lay prostrate on the floor filled with the fullness of God. I can not recall the names of all who were there. But I trust their names are all written in the Book of Life. Some, perhaps most of them, are dead—nay, gone to life eternal. Henry Sebrock, a local preacher and a strong man, who was there, afterward moved to Texas and located in Bell county. I know not whether he is living or dead. Bro. Sweat, a local preacher of that circuit, died during or since the war, I believe. Two of his sons are now my near neighbors in Texas, good citizens. Bros. Wm. Adams and Wm. Tipton, who were landmarks in their day, have gone to rest. Bro. Ford, the then circuit preacher, has gone to his reward.

The first Annual Conference ever held at Kosciusko was held at the close of the year 1856. Bishop Pierce presided. It was "with a squeeze" that we found houses for the preachers. But the good people of the then little village opened their hearts and homes freely, and the Conference was kindly and comfortably entertained. Methodism has been upon the "upgrade" there ever since.

Again, Bro. Galloway, allow me to congratulate you and the church upon your present position, and God's blessing be with you.

LOUISIA, TEXAS, June 16, 1882.

Rev. C. Chamberlin.

MR. EDITOR: A note from yourself brought me the sad intelligence of the death of Rev. Corydon Chamberlin, of the Pacific Conference. I can not refrain from paying some tribute to the memory of a friend honored and true, and a Christian minister whose labors have been so largely blessed.

My acquaintance with him began when we were both students in Centenary College and in the same class. In the intimacies of student life I had opportunity to know him well. In his studies he stood among the foremost, going through all college tasks with the greatest ease. While he was second to none in other things, he excelled in mathematical studies and in metaphysics, comprehending and expressing clearly their most recondite problems. Always while at college his demeanor was such that he was esteemed by the professors and beloved by his fellow-pupils. When Corydon Chamberlin went from the college halls on graduating day he was a noble young man, well fitted for success in life. At that time his purpose was to follow the profession of law, and his friends were confident that in it he would attain the highest honors. But now, when the time had come to make a positive choice, he considered more solemnly than ever before the meaning of life, and the result was that he gave himself to the ministry of the gospel of Christ. He felt that the highest thing in the world is not to obtain money and fame, but to do good and to win souls to the Saviour.

I think that from that period the consecration of no one was more complete than his. It was a marvel to see the transformation that had occurred. He, who was so ambitious before, was now more than willing to labor unknown for Christ's sake. He spent a year in preparation for the ministry at the Theological Seminary at Evanston, Ills. While there an incident occurred which will illustrate his spirit. A large and crowded lake steamer was wrecked in a storm and many persons were lost, but some were drifted toward the shore. In the morning a crowd from the shore witnessed the spectacle, but were unable to afford assistance, having no boats. Chamberlin and three other of the theological students swam out again and again into the waves, which were still running high, and succeeded in rescuing more than a score of persons. It was very heroic on their part, and the papers applauded it much; Harper's Weekly giving sketches and portraits of the four brave young men.

With the gathering of the war he returned home to Mississippi and began his labors among us. From the first he had large success in the ministry, for his piety was deep and ardent, and his natural gifts were of a rare character. He seemed to have but one desire: to persuade men to be saved. Association with him was stimulating and exalting, shaming any half-way consecration on the part of a minister. But this was by the force of silent, unconscious influence, for in all things he had a singular modesty. His sermons were full of thought, and the most cultivated congregations listened to them with delight. Wherever he labored there was an increase in the spirituality of the church. A marked feature of his pulpit ministrations were the abundant illustrations which he used. Nature in all its ranges was to him full of suggestions and analogies and pictures of great truths, every flower and leaf and bird and star pointed to the spiritual and heavenly. Ministers especially were pleased to listen to him.

As a preacher he was self poised, facile in expression, logical and earnest. He knew books and more; for "His daily teachers were woods and rills,

The silence that is in the starry skies,
The sleep that is among the lonely hills."

Eight years ago he went to California, hoping that its mountain air would give him back his health, which had become impaired. His course there was the same as here, useful in the churches, honored and beloved among his brethren. But it was not to be that he should labor for Christ as he desired, for he was the victim of ill-health ever afterward, and so he patiently suffered, illustrating the grace of God. And now while still young his work is finished. I count it one of the greatest blessings of life to have had such a friend, and to have known intimately one of such real genius, so true and manly a minister of Christ.

Kentucky Correspondence.

Changes have come since my last letter, important changes to some, sensible changes to us all. I do not have reference to those changes which are operated by the immutable laws of Nature affecting all material things, but rather to those providential changes which affect the readers of the ADVOCATE. The former editor had won our hearts, and we would be less than sincere to say that no shade of sadness touched us when we read his valedictory. Our prayers follow him. To you, Mr. Editor, we extend the warm grasp of a brother's hand. I did not know, when introduced to you at Nashville, that I was forming the acquaintance of one who was so soon to take the helm of the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE. May you have fair weather and a happy voyage, and when your time for promotion comes remember that even a Kentuckian might be induced to travel via New Orleans.

Bishop Hargrove preached the commencement sermon at Logan Female College the first Sunday in June—theme, "The Model Woman;" report, a model sermon. The college had but one graduate this year for the reason that Dr. Stark has an eye to the quality rather than to the quantity of his graduates. He said: With a little forcing we might have had a very large class, but the girls were not really ready, and we chose to keep them back another year. When a girl receives a diploma from Logan Female College it means that she has been faithfully instructed in the college curriculum, and that she has made satisfactory proficiency in all her studies, and, in a word, that she will be a creditable representative of the institution.

The District Conference for this district was an enjoyable occasion. It was held near Hopkinsville, Christian county—a basket meeting. The attendance was large, the preaching very edifying, the reports fully up to those of any previous year. Methodism is keeping pace with the population in Southern Kentucky. We are a flourishing folk. This was our first delegated District Conference. Heretofore the members of the Quarterly Conferences were all recognized as members. There were objections to this plan. It was claimed: 1. That what is everybody's business is nobody's business; therefore remote charges are unrepresented. 2. That the local interest attaching to the Conference drew out a full representation in the charge where it happened to be held, and thereby committed the interests of the whole district into the hands of that charge. 3. That the lay delegates were usually chosen not for fitness, but on account of personal popularity at the seat of the Conference. The plan adopted was, that each circuit, station and mission should be entitled to two delegates to be elected by the Quarterly Conferences. Our experience is not satisfactory. Three out of the four delegates elected to our ensuing Annual Conference are from the same locality—Christian county. The body was too small in comparison with former bodies. The Conference was lacking in popular interest: it is no longer a people's Conference. We would not advise any Annual Conference to unpopularize its District Conferences.

Once more the hum of the sickle is heard in the land. My eye never swept broader areas of golden grain. The wheat is of the best quality. And truly we need good harvests to lift us out of our embarrassments, to say nothing of meeting the great expectations of the church. We have so multiplied our general or connectional collections, with those ordered by our Conference, that we have broken down public collections. Well, I have no objections to getting all the money we can for our Lord, to whom it belongs, provided the methods are both lawful and judicious. There are some farmers in my knowledge who pay but little attention to a judicious rotation of crops, whose lands are becoming poorer every year, but the tillage is just as vigorous as ever. Ruin is before them. May not Annual Conferences learn a lesson from such?

Free thinking and free speech, great constitutional grants, are liable to great abuse. There are many cranks in the land. We have them in Kentucky. They are found in our pulpits, on our platforms and on the hustings. I do not think they ought to be hung; but our safety demands that they be suppressed. Would it not be well for our wonderfully-productive church to inaugurate a system of Conference asylums for the reception of our theological cranks. What an inviting field!

Our new connectional secretary, Rev. David Morton, is taking steps to open up his work. He means business in calling the board together. He is capable, honest, high souled, energetic. He is the right man in the right place. His Conference will underwrite for him to a man in this important work.

Rev. H. C. Morrison, a man who enjoys much of the love of his brethren, is now suffering from an attack of deafness. It is hoped that it will be only temporary.

Bro. Cottrell, your correspondent, is passing through the deep waters of affliction. He has just buried his son Johnny, a bright boy of sixteen summers. May the God of compassion comfort him! Sharp indeed is the sting of death; but thanks be to God, who giveth us the victory through our Lord Jesus Christ! Blessed be the God and Father who hath begotten us again unto a living hope.

I was greatly saddened of the intelligence of the death of Alma, daughter of our brother Rev. J. A. Ivy. She spent the summer in Kentucky about ten years ago—part of the time at our house. A lady who met her then said to her aunt: "She is the most remarkable child I have ever known. She talked about New Orleans and recent public events just like a woman." The remark saddened me, for the lady was a fine observer. It was suggestive of an early harvest. When I saw her again at New Orleans, three years ago, my fears were unspeakably dispelled, for she seemed a healthy, buoyant girl. The bow of hope bent high above her pathway. I was the guest of her father during my stay, and gratefully record the fact that much of my pleasure was derived from her assiduous attention. Broken in health, far from home and wife and children, I was often depressed in spirit; but she found many ways to beguile my thoughts. She taught me the use of the mallet and ball; she took me to places of interest about the city, to visit some of her friends; she gathered fresh flowers for me, and, in company with her father, we visited the beautiful cemetery where her dust is urned. Little did we think, sweet child, that the gate of death was so near thee! How fond she was of her church! How faithful in the Sunday-school! How firm, how tender, how loving! Her young life was a benediction to many. The pure, the beautiful, and the good belong more to heaven than to earth. It is not strange then, that in the very fitness of things, that her feet were taken out of earth's dusty ways to tread celestial heights. We follow with strained eyes; but the brightness of the glory hides her from our vision. Our Father! blessed be his name!

Texas Notes.

Galveston and Texas are becoming the least bit jealous of New Orleans, because of her happy fortune in being able to claim the citizenship of two Bishops; but, fortunately, our polity is so happily flexible, and the episcopacy so perfectly free from the diocesan idea, that every section of the church has an equal claim upon our Bishops, both as individuals and as a whole; and Texas Methodism is loyal enough to consult the pleasure and comfort of our Bishop rather than our own preferences and wishes.

The creation by the General Conference of a Church Extension Society has been hailed with gladness all along the border, and it is safe to say nothing could have given such an impetus to the mission work of all our frontier territory. During the coming year at least one hundred new churches should be erected in the more destitute districts of our Western and Mission Conferences in Texas, and the local societies must look largely to this auxiliary of the church for material assistance. It is also urgently needful, though it were unreasonable to hope for it soon, that the churches in our Texas cities should receive through this or some other channel assistance in erecting houses of worship in keeping with the dignity and mission of Methodism. In a few of the cities we have creditable buildings—not more so in all the East; but in others our people worship in gloomy and dilapidated barns, and the strength and spirituality of the church are crumbling away with the walls. True, these cities are wealthy; but everything is in the formative state. The people have not been educated into liberality, and, for the most part, the princely wealth of the land is out of the reach of Methodism. But for all this the march is onward, onward; and one has only to pass over this great State, and take a cursory view of the work being done by Methodism, to realize that its enginery and influence for good are more powerful than all the other forces of the land combined.

The Mexican Calde Company have just finished laying their submarine telegraph line to this city, and within a few days Center street will be in telegraphic communication with the halls of the Montezumas. This marks an epoch in Mexican national progress, and is but one of the precursors of the gathering forces of enlightenment that are to shake and destroy the fabric of a superstition grounded on the ignorance of centuries. With the clank of the railway spike and the whistle of the locomotive the power of Romanism seems to retreat to darker caverts, and the whole land is becoming Americanized and Protestantized so rapidly that the change may be marked with every setting sun.

The corner stone of the temporary new capitol at Austin was laid with appropriate ceremonies on the nineteenth instant. It is to be used during the erection of the grand new State building, which will, perhaps, occupy several years. I have already given your readers the plan of this proposed handsome structure, which will, perhaps, as it should, be the finest State capitol in the Union.

The Democratic State Convention will assemble in Saengerfest Pavilion, in this city, on the twenty-sixth of August. Some doubt as to the result, but some fears as to the possibility of party success are entertained. Harmony of views, unity of action, and a proper regard for the popular demands touching prohibition and other great moral questions are, however, the watchwords for the hour and the guaranties of success.

H. M. DUNCAN.

How to Succeed As An Inventor.

The Christian Union has been publishing a series of articles on "How to Succeed," in the several vocations and departments of life. These have been written by distinguished specialists, who have been marked successes themselves. The one, "How to Succeed As An Inventor," by Thomas A. Edison, is so practical, and applies so happily to all departments of activity, we take pleasure in reproducing the following liberal extracts:

To succeed as an inventor, a young man must have a natural taste for mechanical pursuits; though not necessarily so much of a taste as to amount to a genius. It has been my experience that men who have been successful in that line preferred, in their early boyhood, to work in a little shop, always planning and contriving on some mechanical device, and to do this to such an extent as to keep them away from their playfellows much of the time.

The inventor must have a good constitution; for, if he is successful, he will often have to work long hours at a stretch without rest. I work with my assistants during the night, commencing at seven o'clock at night and working till eight or nine the next morning. I do not find this wearing on my health; in fact, do not believe that any thing is wearing that you like.

There must be continuity of work. When you set out to do a certain thing never let anything disturb you from doing that. The power of putting the thought on one particular thing, and keeping it there for hours at a time, comes from practice, and it takes a long while to get in the habit. I remember, a long while ago, I could only think ten minutes on a given subject before something else would come to my mind. But, after long practice, I can keep my mind for hours on one topic without being distracted with thoughts of other matters.

When I was at Menlo Park, I was once working with my assistants a long time trying to connect a piece of carbon to a wire; every time it would break. Then we would spend several hours in making another and that would break. After working a day and two nights in this way, we finally accomplished our purpose. One of my assistants wearily got up and said, "Well, I think Job got too much reputation on a small capital!"

The fact is, the inventor must have a tremendous amount of patience. There are probably one hundred disappointments to one success, and the things that are valuable seem to be very hard to do. They, too, he must have the quality of imagination largely developed, or he will get into a rut, and that is one thing above all others he must not do. In addition to these qualities, the inventor should have an analytical mind.

A man to be an inventor need not be a great mathematician. I have had college bred assistants who were "way up," as the saying is, in arithmetic and algebra, but who sometimes made the most outrageous mistakes in their calculations. With a thorough acquaintance with the ordinary branches of arithmetic a man can make calculations near enough for all practical purposes. Faraday, the greatest of all experimentalists, has nothing about mathematics in his books. Such knowledge is necessary in pure science, but not in applied science.

The student will learn a great deal by the way. To illustrate: In my carbon lamps I found I had to use bamboo. I set to work and read everything I could find in the works on botany in regard to bamboo and the family of gigantic grasses; experimented with the microscope. Now, I am no botanist; but I know enough about the science to answer my purpose. And I never read anything about the steam engine until a year ago. The rule should be never to read anything you are not interested in.

But the student will find that experience is the best teacher. The reason why I get along with comparative ease now is because I know from experience the enormous number of things that will not work. For instance, I start on a new invention to-morrow. From the great number of experiments I have made, and the vast amount of information I have stored up, I am saved a great deal of time and trouble in not having to travel over barren ground.

The reason why so many so-called "inventors" fail is because they have not the power of analysis, and they are not practical. For instance, a man will devise a machine for a certain object. He makes an enormously-complicated affair and gets out his patent. After he has obtained his patent he finds there is no demand for such a thing; that is enough to kill him. And, if there is a demand for it, his want of practicability has made the machine so complicated that it can not be made a commercial success. The only test he can apply to himself when he is working, in order to see that he is on the right track, is common sense. Therefore, it would be well for him if he was not born with a silver spoon in his mouth. It will be a help instead of a hindrance, if he has had to knock around the world and earn his own living, for he will have a better knowledge of what people need, and will know that the world does not pay for anything unless it absolutely wants it.

Another reason for failure is that inventors work well enough while everything goes smoothly, but give up when they get "stuck." That is just the time when one should not be discouraged; at such a time the inventor should bring all his powers of patience and perseverance to bear on the matter in hand.

Take the steam engine for instance. Probably a million men have worked at it. That would not scare me a bit, because that which is known, to what is possible to be known, stands, we will say, as one to ten millions. The best method of doing almost anything you can mention in mechanics has not yet been found out. We have not got the most perfect sewing machine. Fifty years hence the sewing machine we have now will be laughed at. The mind of man is so infinite that the field is unlimited. But the only proper way is to take up one branch: make yourself a specialist.

Of course there is pecuniary reward for the successful inventor. If, by some slight mechanical invention, you could save one-eighth of one per cent. in weaving a yard of cloth, or make the value of a spindle one-tenth of one per cent. more, the amount saved all over the world would be enormous. They had an ore in England that contained so much phosphorus that they could not work it. Two men conceived the idea of lining the furnace with fire-brick to absorb the phosphorus. And that slight change opens up an enormous tract of country containing this ore. They say that the man who conceived the idea of putting brass tips on children's shoes netted half a million dollars from his invention. That, you see, was an invention that combined the two successful qualities: it was simple and it was wanted by the public. Men very often admire the man who invents a complicated machine, but they will not purchase his machine; they buy the one that does the same work in a simpler way.

From Our Mission Room.

It is feared our Mission Board, at Nashville, is going to get heavily in debt.—Dr. J. E. Edwards, in Southern Christian Advocate.

This is stating the case very mildly, doctor. The Mission Board is known to be in debt, because the assessments on the churches in our connection for the current year have not been paid and sent into our treasury. We called for the money last week. Now, if Dr. Edwards and every other preacher in charge will take his collection and send it to Dr. D. C. Kelley, our treasurer, every dollar of our debt will be paid with great ease, and you will never hear of it again. We are in debt simply because the collections are not taken and sent in. Brethren, let us hear from you in rapid succession.

ARE YOU READY.

BY MRS. C. CRARY SADLER.

Written, by request, for the Branch Society at Moss Point, Miss., of the Woman's Foreign Missionary Society.

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Are your lamps now burning bright?
Are you ready for the Bridegroom
If he should call to-night?

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Oh! the door may soon be shut,
When, though you may say "Lord open,"
You may hear "I know you not."

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Have you each a willing heart?
Ready with your time and money,
Or will you keep back part?

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Do you hear the pleons cry?
"Come over now and help us,"
Come help us ere we die.

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Either "to be spent or spend,"
Hear you not the wail from China?
"Oh! to us the gospel send."

Are you ready, sisters, ready,
With the leaves that nations heal?
Then remember heathen women
In that sunny land, Brazil.

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Is there any here to go
To join the band of laborers
In priest-ridden Mexico?

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Calls the Master as of yore,
And he that calleth speaketh
"As man never spake before."

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Burns the fire within your soul
Sees your sight of that great headlight,
That shall shine "from pole to pole"

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Signs of promise can you tell?
Will the shadows of the blood,
Where the heathen women dwell?

Are you ready, sisters, ready?
Then "arise up," and take your stand,
And wave the gospel banner,
Till its sheen from land to land.

Yes, sisters, wave this signal,
Show the foe you are awake;
For by this sign we conquer,
And the world for Jesus take.

MORAL SIGNIFICANCE OF OUR CELESTIAL VISITORS.

The thoughtful man, with intellectual conception and spiritual power to reach after and grasp, in a certain sense, the wonderful significance of high and noble things, finds something more in the coming of these radiant visitors than the mere gratification of an idle curiosity.

He rises above the foolish superstitions of the past, the idiocyneracies of the royal, who regarded them as omiuons of good or evil, who, in their vicious pride, claimed that they were symbolic of their own reign, or the fear of the ignorant who shrank from the fiery wrath, that seemed about to be visited upon them, and the insignificance of the Pope who threatened their annihilation with his windy "bulls," that rose hardly up to the petty dignity of Don Quixote's famous tilt against windmills.

It is said this last is a new comer—a stranger in our midst—from unknown regions. Where has it been these restless, countless years? Science has watched the coming and going of many of them, names them, and thinks she has accomplished wonders; indeed, she has; and yet almost daily God so manifests his power and omnipotence as to startle and throw her out of her admirable poise. Science has done much, and will do much when rightly directed.

She calls the fire of the black thunder cloud "electricity." With it she belts the earth, through it she holds communion with all mankind, drives machinery with it, banishes darkness into the caverns of Erebus, lectures learnedly about it; but what is it? She has never answered this; it is forever a miracle so far as reason and the processes of analyzing and describing it are concerned.

I repeat it—forever a miracle—apparently transcending many of the miracles of the Bible. Science admits it, and yet she sits in the poverty of her arrogated wisdom, many of her followers even doubting the miracles of the Bible. Believing that these great and glorious things we see and hear are but the creatures of blind chance, and these longing, aspiring, hungry, immortal souls, always reaching out and up, are nothing but the refined possibilities of a fully-developed monkey! Oh! the utter littleness of man when he does stoop to the depths of his possible littleness.

I like science when it is dominated by a divine ideal, when it but unfolds the true and beautiful in nature, when it corroborates the divine teachings of the Bible, but much of it is an injury to our young, misleading them, and sinking them below the sphere they were designed to fill.

Lieut. Maury was a scientist we delight to honor. He says that he made it a rule, among his physical researches and thought, which occupied his life, "never to forget who is the author of the great volume which nature spreads out before us, and always to remember that the same Being is also the author of the book which revelation holds up to us. They are widely different, these two works, but when they treat upon the same point their records are equally true, and it is impossible that they should contradict each other. If the two can not be reconciled the fault is ours!"

Science has done much, and yet it is not a step beyond the divine revelations of the Bible. And, were we to trace closely the comparison between the two, we would find that science is only following the well-blazed course of prophecy and revelation.

When we devoutly ask of the laws which govern the winds, Job says of them: "He maketh the weight of the winds." And of the laws which govern the sea, Solomon says: "All the rivers run into the sea, yet the sea is not full; unto the places from whence the rivers came thither they return again."

So we are taught, in terms the most impressive, that when the "morning stars sang together" the "waves lifted up their voices" and the "winds joined the Divine anthem;" and, as discovery advances, we find the same marks of order in the "fall of the sparrow," the graceful inclination of trees, the beauty of the lillies that "toil not, neither do they spin," in the sea, in the air, in the harmony of our own souls, in everything that is in tune with the "music of the spheres."

The same order is in the heavenly hosts, in their movements; the laws of all things are nothing but the perfect harmony of the Divine will, and every movement of creative energy is but its systematic influence. Respecting the new comet, there are two theories.

Sir John Herschell, after sounding the heavens, says there was a great seemingly barren place in the north, and that it was there that comets delighted to roam, and hide themselves in emptiness. It is a plausible theory, and yet but the endorsement of revelation. Job told Bildad the Shuhite that these empty places were stretched out in the north, for he says: "He stretcheth out the north over the empty place, and hangs the earth upon nothing."

These truths are pertinent, and the analogy might be followed profitably by our men of science. What admirable evidences are these to those whose love of Divine agencies and power dominate their intellectual and scientific researches!

I do not think, however, that these matchless suns of light, flying like flaming steeds through the heavens, are madly sweeping through these limitless fields of emptiness for naught.

There is deep, boundless significance in their presence, as they unquestionably discover to the thoughtful, investigating mind the vastness of infinitude, and suggest the limitless fields beyond, full of suns and lights as our ever-present firmament is full of stars. And, what is better, they prove that all are controlled and swayed and kept in harmonious relationship and order by the one great over-ruling Power, who holds the reins of the Universe in his hands.

These great, luminous torches, flashing through the heavens, throwing off as they fly sparkles of light and beauty, attracting the wondering eyes of the world, and arousing and stimulating its deepest and most profound thought and reverence, have something in them of a sublime and holy mission.

It is God omnipotent—omnipresent—discovering himself to man continually, giving us brief, dim and ndaty glimpses of the wonderful glories beyond, showing us the wondrous greatness of his power and wealth of his possessions, that shall be unfolded to us when, with spiritual conception, our eyes shall sweep the plains of immortality and feast upon the marvelous splendors of heaven.

I do not wonder that Sir Isaac Newton, as he sat by the sea, overflowing with the learning and wisdom of this world, should, as he contemplated with heightened admiration and grasped the grandeur and miracle of creative power, realize that he was just in the A B C of spiritual comprehension.

And yet what would I give for the grasp and spiritual conception of such minds as Newton, Faraday, Maury and others as they contemplated these astounding mysteries.

There is a lesson in every star that jewels the heavens—a revelation in living light of the "power behind the throne"—a moral stimulus in every blade of grass that grows; spiritual inspiration in the subtle perfume of the flowers, that are emblems of love scattered along our pathway; there are helps and sustenance in the richness and beauty of colors, in the harmony of sounds and the symmetry of every beautiful thing. These are a few of the many blessings about us, irradiating our lives; and yet God, in his infinite love and mercy, occasionally reveals to us a higher beauty; the hidden treasures he reserves for us in the great beyond; how he bathes us with the burning radiance of the grand heavenly bodies, lifting us up among the stars. How he quickens our love and veneration; how he strengthens our reverence, and makes our faith in him and all he does so solid and permanent that the "gates of hell shall not prevail against it!".

We are lost in wonder when we contemplate the immensity of space through which these comets move. They prove to us there are distances beyond the reach of science, and that there are systems and suns that transcend all our knowledge and conception of the magnificent worlds in sight. But they prove further the unmistakable existence of God, and the wondrous miracle of his goodness, mercy and love to man.

CROMWELL.

FOREST, Mississippi.

From the Talahatchie.

DEAR ADVOCATE: Your pleasant face and welcome visits continue to us in this land of itinerant hardships. You have never failed, from your first issue to the present, when you could possibly leave the press and start upon your errand through all these years of varied itinerant experiences. And now I have a mind to tell you something of my late experience. I have traveled perhaps every character of circuit, and some missions, by every mode of transportation known to an interior country; commencing with horseback riding, the regular Methodist orthodox mode. I have traveled in buggy, in carriage, in wagon, on the cars, on steamboats, and have walked from appointment to appointment, but not until recently have I traveled my circuit in a dug-out, "paddling my own canoe." One of my churches is within two hundred yards of where I live. On the first Sunday after the water covered these lands the whole congregation paddled up in boats and landed on the church steps. This seemed rather novel, but there was no better mode of reaching the place. My next appointment was back in the interior, some twelve miles from home. I had rumors of distress among the people there, and felt it my duty, as pastor and preacher, to visit them. My limited experience in dug-out navigation made me look upon this trip, with so few visible landmarks to guide me, with doubt. On Friday morning I entered my boat and pushed out into the stream. For about five miles my course was down the river. Vegetation was showing the presence of springs; buds were unfolding their leaves, and the willows were beginning to look green. My position upon the waters elevated me to a level with the surrounding country. These things, together with the novel manner I was traveling, thrilled me with sensations similar to those I experienced long years ago, when on my way to my first circuit. Forty-five minutes brought me opposite the place where I must leave the river. I am evidently eighteen inches or two feet above the water beyond into which I wish to pass. The rush of water is evidently great; its noise is in my ears. I call to mind all the skill and dug-out theories of which I had ever heard or read—"straighten your boat with the current, use your paddle enough to move your boat faster than the waters, keep your eyes before you, and guide your boat." I now feel the force of the current taking my little craft. I plunge the first breaker, and rush onward, leaping and plunging "like a thing of life." I strike out into calm and safe waters sooner, perhaps, than the reader has perused the account. Certainly I had a use for all my skill and theory. A number of boats had been wrecked just along the track over which I had passed, manned by skilled and experienced boatmen. In traveling round on my circuit I am in the habit of studying my sermons as I ride, but I did no sermonizing while shooting those rapids. I paddle on into the woods, sometimes along the road over which I had traveled on foot, on horseback, and on the mail hack, sometimes losing sight of all known landmarks. Occasionally a startled deer went plunging through the water, or bounding off on a narrow strip of unsubmerged land. A wild turkey sat perched in a tree some thirty or forty feet above me, and peered carnestly down as if to scrutinize this strange mode of circuit traveling. When deepest in the woods a slight glimpse of something falling from high up in a tree, and the noise of its striking the water attracted my attention. It was a bear. I knew it was their habit to drop to the ground from such elevated position when approached by a human being. I stopped my paddling to get sight of him, but my boat was drifting into vines and underbush, so I had to pay attention to interests nearer at hand, and leave his bearship to himself. I took dinner with a friend, rested awhile, and resumed my voyage. Near sundown I came out on the lake I had often seen so calm and placid, its surface unruffled, except by some gentle breeze; now it has an angry, rushing, boiling, roaring flood rushing over its bosom. Up this current for a mile and a half, I made my way to the house I had been steering for during the day. A young brother gave me a hearty welcome. The head of the house had just gone crazy under the strain brought upon his mind by the overflow of his lands and the destruction of his property. They felt they needed the pastor, his counsels and his prayers. As one of the family expressed it, the preacher never came in a better time. The labors of that night, I think, were a real good to that family, and a blessing to my own soul. Sunday morning broke dark and gloomy, with showers of rain and heavy mist. Would a congregation turn out on such a day? About ten o'clock the question was answered by the appearance of a fleet of half a dozen dug-outs a-sweeping down the lake. The congregation was small, but I was glad to meet the people for public worship. I made several visits to families, paddling into the yards and to the very door of some. My trip home was not an up-hill, but was an up-stream business. Climbing the rapids now was widely different from descending. Effort after effort I made to stem the torrent. Again and again I was beaten back. The gaining a few inches and losing several feet was a kind of backsliding. I had tried to preach and live against. I stepped from my boat, laid my hand upon the bow, acting as tug. I lead up into calmer waters, when I again boarded it, and pushed out into the main river, and, after two hours' up-stream work, landed at my home, to receive an unusually warm greeting from wife and daughter.

The distance to my next appointment by the meandering water route would be perhaps eighteen or twenty miles, the entire way against the current. After long hours of hard work I reached my destination, tired from a mode of travel not common to an itinerant preacher. Sunday morning dawned beautifully, with all the blush of early spring. The congregation was really encouraging, not one of whom came except by water, some a distance of four or five miles. Closing up my labors for this visitation, I felt anxious in regard to my trip home. The river had fallen several inches. I was not sufficiently acquainted with the woods to attempt the overflow on side of the river without eminent peril of being lost. My friends advised me to take the main river. This route was sixty miles home, but it was safe. I was sure, in the end, to drift home if I kept afloat. Then it was so easy to drift with the current, as many another sinner has found to his ruin. I pushed out into the river just at the outset the scenery and its associations conspired to make my meditations most entertaining, every one was cheerful over the rapid decline of the waters. The voice and song of the distant plowman, as he cheerily "drove his team afield," the forest was out in full spring dress. The river sweeping along grandly in its fullness, murmuring in its flow through the undergrowth and lower branches of the trees along its banks, shimmering as it rippled in the rays of the morning sun. The feathered tribes, in their varied plumage, and variedly modulated notes, singing for their own if not my entertainment. But after a time a change came over myself and all my surroundings, the sun rose high in the heavens, the day was hot; I came to feel fatigued from paddling, and too warm for comfort; the birds ceased their merry songs, and what sounds reached me bore a sort of cadence which added to my solitude. The farms, though almost continuous, seldom opened out upon the shore. On both sides of the river the banks were low, and the waters spread out for a great distance on either hand. For many miles the stream crept sluggishly along. No squealing pigs, nor bleating flocks, nor lowing herds gave life to the distance. The pigs and sheep, in the main, had been silenced forever, or until their places could be supplied by immigration. Occasionally, upon some elevated spot of open land, a few miserable looking cattle could be seen gropped around a smoke kindled to protect them from the gnats, their awful pest. The remnants of large flocks present a doleful appearance, looking much as if they were holding a lodge of sorrow in memory of thousands of their kind that perished in the flood. I reached home in about nine hours after starting, making the sixty miles in five hours less time than I had calculated upon.

I do not think I have attempted more nor accomplished as much as some of my co-laborers have for the cause of Christ in this water-scourged country. I have observed this much: that persons, claiming to be friends of the church, and professing religion, duly attending to their secular business, crossing the waters in their boats to do so, could not attend the worship of God at the same distance under the same inconveniences. I can not know how often I was met with the question: "Did you come all the way here in your dug-out just to preach?" In every instance my answer was: "Certainly I did. I see men traveling over this same route attending to their worldly business. I think my business is of more importance than any other man's. I am willing to travel further, under greater difficulties, to preach the gospel to this people." To this answer some seemed thoughtful, others perplexed and blank. When I have seen men giving attention to their worldly affairs with greater industry and zeal than I was exercising in the cause of my Master I have felt rebuked, and that I must seek the grace to sustain me in greater ardor and devotion to the gospel, and I am always happier in its attainment.

Reply from a Young Preacher.

MR. EDITOR: Not long since my attention was arrested by an article from Dr. T. S. West, the object of which was to sound a note of warning for young preachers. If I understand it correctly, it is but the reiteration of Dr. A. Clarke's advice: "Converse sparingly with women, and especially with young women." Now this advice, I take it, means beware of young women lest they fall in love with you, or you with them. No very great misfortune, surely, if both are of one mind on the subject. Of course, neither doctor would object to that; therefore, I suppose they mean, be guarded in your conduct, lest you fascinate some fair maid and be not able to reciprocate.

Now, as Protestants, we expect every preacher to marry, and, of course, a wife whom his judgment pronounces the queen of womankind.

Let us suppose A. to be a young man contemplating marriage. As he expects to marry a woman, he goes into their society, converses with them. Among those he meets there is one who, he thinks, is up to his ideal. To prove if first impressions be correct, he must pay her that attention the world calls courting. If he finds that she is not all his fancy painted her and stops there, methinks he is innocent of any intention of deception, though the world generally, in its uncharitableness, affirms the contrary.

If I understand the animus of the doctors' advice, expressed by Dr. Clarke, and implied by Dr. West, obedience to it would make every young preacher (or any other man) appear cold, distant, haughty. Furthermore, it would make him appear to ape a superiority, and virtually to say: "I know my attractions of mind and person are very great. You might stand the one, but if I exert the brilliant powers of the other, your hearts would own me as lord of their affections; therefore I will be silent."

Dr. West asks, after having related a bit of experience, this unconscious winning the love of another, Was I guiltless? Yes, doctor; innocent as a new-born lamb; but that young lady was very foolish, or very long-headed, and thought she would be first in the field in case your then engagement came to nothing.

"Hear the conclusion of the whole matter:" "A good wife is from the Lord." But you have to find her, my young friend, and in order to do this you must associate with young ladies, talk with them, etc. Do not imagine you are so handsome and pleasing that they all will be captivated, and wear a "dislocated cortral organ" if you do not propose. If you are so silly, I predict that you will be awakened, and the word that will arouse you is "No!"

The Sabbath Question.

MR. EDITOR: In the ADVOCATE of the fifteenth instant I find an article headed "The Sabbath," signed "W." I am glad to see an article on that subject, as I think the importance of that holy institution demands a greater amount of attention than is usually given it—both from the pulpit and the press. I have long been anxious to know how the Christian world came to substitute the first day of the week for the Sabbath instead of the seventh, inasmuch as the commandment claims that we shall rest the seventh day; and, as one jot or tittle of the law can not fail, I profess my inability to solve the difficulty. "W." writes that under the Christian dispensation the Sabbath is commemorative of the resurrection of Christ on the first day of the week. "W." further states that the example of Christ, the apostles, and the usage of the early church, under their ministry, is deemed among Christians as sufficient for the change of the Sabbath. I no not, but there are thousands of good and wise men who fully subscribe to "W's" statement. Let us examine the matter a little. Did not Christ recognize the original Sabbath, and claim to be Lord of the Jewish Sabbath? Did not his disciples rest on the Sabbath while Christ was in the tomb—the day before his resurrection? Did not the apostles observe the original Sabbath by preaching and teaching in the synagogues to both Jew and Gentile Christian for forty years? After his resurrection I can not see in the example of Christ, or his apostles, anything to favor a change in the fourth commandment. Will "W," or some one else, fully explain this difficulty, so as to remove my conscientious scruples on this to me very important subject?

To Him That Overcometh.

Men often ask with wonder, and sometimes with complaint, "Why does God ever suffer his grace to be frustrated, or his plans for man's salvation to be thwarted? Why does he not draw them resistlessly and hold them by compulsion?" Omnipotence may do marvelous things in the surroundings of a man, but the choice of a man's own spirit determines what he shall become. Gracious influences do not make a gracious state; religious impressions do not make a religious man. God may give a man the opportunity and the needed help, but the victory comes to him who wins it. The winning of it is the glory of it. All the powers of heaven and earth can not give a man that, unless he take it. The taking of it is the essential thing. God could relieve a man of the contest; but that would not be winning the battle. The skill of labor is not acquired by avoiding the labor. The results of travel are not gained by avoiding the journey. God might spare a man the discipline, but that would not give him the virtue. He could spare him the cross, but that would not give him the crown. Missing the trial is a different thing from enduring the trial. You may keep the metal from the fire, but you can not also give it the purity of refined silver. Escaping obligation is a different thing from fulfilling it.

"God may give a man a gentle disposition. But a gentle disposition is not a virtue; it is only an advantage. The self-control of Christian meekness is a very different thing from that placidity of temper which has never been disturbed. The calmness of the ocean steamer, which has faced and conquered the storm, is very different from the quiet of the abandoned ship which drifts before the gale, and is quiet only because it does not resist. Every victory acquires its meaning from the struggle. We need to go with Jesus to Gethsemane before we can understand the full meaning of Calvary. We need to see him as he prayed, "being in an agony, and sweating, as it were, great drops of blood," before we can know how keenly he must have felt the injustice of those who tried him, the insults and jeers of those who held him, and the cruelty of those who crucified him. Then we may know how much that victory meant by which he "overcame the world." The sublime patience of the cross can be understood only from the agony of the garden.

So every victory is measured by what it cost to win it. If there was no struggle, there would be no strength. The severity of the contest gives significance to the victory. It is only a long, hard contest for us against selfishness and sin, and indolence and doubt. There are many hours of depression, when "the clouds return after the rain." But so it has been with every one who has pressed toward my prize. No one ever sought a desired haven but he has faced the storms sometimes. But the promise is that "he that overcometh shall inherit all things"—all that there is in the promises of God; all that there is in the kingdom of the Lord Jesus Christ.

The Gospel Invitation.

My Christian brethren, one word to you. We are continually meeting men around us, and often have intimate dealing with them, who are not Christians. You meet them in society; you meet them in the community life of the university and the exchange, and in the bustling corners of business where men meet in common on the broad basis of their accepted merits, and where allowances for individual peculiarities are never made, and are elements utterly unknown. How are we to treat them? What is our Christian profession for? Is it in fencing us in from the world, at the same time to fence out the world from us? Are we to clothe ourselves in the outer coverings of religion, and talk at our brethren from the stock of goodly words in our experience, as David chose the pebbles from his shepherd's bag, and hurled them at Goliath? No, my brethren; not so. We must be true and manly men; we must take men as we find them in the world; we must not sink our manhood in what we may be disposed to think are the requirements of a Christian profession, or else we can not obey the apostle's injunction, and quit us like men. We must throw way all cant, not the foundation basis—the root of the matter of which this is only the superficial covering, for somehow it is hard for a true and honest man to respect a whining fellow-man, no matter how near canonization he may be at the church's calendar of sainthood.

The first step, then, is a thorough respect for one's character as a true Christian in God's sight, not in man's. The second step is to abandon those technical terms which we never use about the real things of every-day life. Why can you not talk to your neighbor about being a Christian in an open, manly way, and not feel yourself compelled to slide up to the subject by degrees, and with the help of obsolete and long, buried expressions? They were, to cant, no doubt, to cover the needs of the soul; whereas, in reality, they too often hind. They were invented to help forward the awakened soul; whereas, they deceive men with the mere talk about the externalism of the church as an institution, and disgust men with spiritual things. Never let us be ashamed of Jesus and his cross, and his atoning work; we glory in all these! Only if the gospel needs translating and explaining, let us translate it into the honest language of to-day. Do not wrap it up and dwarf it into the phraseology of the past. Let us tell the old story of the cross, as Jesus would tell it if he were here on earth in this nineteenth century to-day; just as he told it to meet the common wants of a sin-stricken world when he was here eighteen hundred years ago.—Rev. Wm. Wilberforce Newton.

AGAINST COVETOUSNESS.—No divided or impure heart whatever can clearly and steadily see the light of God. But we do not need to be told what a darkening influence is exercised over Christian men by the love of money in particular. We are, unhappily, too familiar with its ravages in the modern church, with disciples, genuine enough, zealous sometimes to a fault, and loud in their profession of Christianity, who nevertheless betray, by the stationariness of their moral character, or by their unconscious perseverance in faulty habits which every one notices but themselves, or by overlooking very obvious duties lying in their path, that they can not be walking open-eyed in the light of God. Christians who, throughout the greater part of life, remain unchastened, ungentle, unmellowed, hardly distinguishable from the utter worldling by reason of their petty, grasping, saving ways, are frequent enough everywhere. Were the cause of that religion to be faithfully inquired after, or could it be plainly told, how often would it prove to be just this—that the real desire of their heart is not bent with single-minded longing upon the attainment of God's approval or of his celestial rewards, but has become diverted to an excessive degree on temporal objects, chained down to earth, and made earthly by the over-eager pursuit of success, or by an over-warm delight in such perishable gains as they have been able to win for themselves in the scramble of business. With such Christians a reverse process has been going on from that which happened to the converts of Ephesus. The eye of those hearts at Ephesus were enlightened, so that they saw the riches of God's own inheritance—the celestial wealth destined for children of God in the everlasting kingdom of their Father. But we suffer the dazzle of corruptible gold to fall across our vision, and draw after it the worship of the heart; then our eyes, which were full of heaven's own light, grow dim again, the celestial glory fades away, the shining crown suspended over Christian heads has leave to hang there unseen, and we toil on to rake together in the dark what is but dust after all, though it be the dust of gold.—J. Oswald Sykes, M. A., D. D.

SEEING IN A FOG.—A friend of ours last March, sailing down the coast, came on deck one morning to find the air pervaded by a fog so thick as to shut off the vision for even a few yards from the steamer. He had been aware during the night of a peculiar vigilance and activity on board, and ascertained that the fog had lasted since the previous evening. On inquiring of the captain concerning their whereabouts, he was told that they had passed Cape Hatteras in the night. "How did you know that? Could you see the light?" "Oh, no, not in a fog like this." "Well, you certainly could take no observations without a star in sight." "No; but we have other ways of seeing where we are than those you have mentioned." "How?" "By the lead. Our soundings told us when we were off the cape, and when we passed it." The spiritual have other means of seeing than what we call our sight. They see by the lead. That lead is faith. All distinctively Christian seamanship consists in the use of this "vision and faculty divine." There are nights when the heavens seem walled above our heads, and no light shines from the shore—when through the moaning and midnight seas we have the stormy and perilous crises of our life. But we go on, sounding the very depths that encompass and imperil us, and find in the rocks and shoals themselves our chart and our security. For "we walk by faith, not by sight."—Christian Intelligencer.

PILGRIMS PRAYER.

BY REV. S. H. READE.

Here before thy altar bending,
We, thy children, now attend;
On thy grace so free depending,
Low the contrite knee we bend.
Pray we each for that rich blessing
Which thy word has surely said
Thou will grant to those confessing
They would heavenly God.

Come we to the bleeding fountain
Flowing rich with Jesus' blood;
Here we to the holy mountain
Down which flows the crimson flood.
Seek we now a burden-bearer
Who will all our steps attend;
Can we find another fairer
Than our Christ, the sinner's friend.

Jesus, hear our sincere pleading,
Hear us in our direst need;
Listen to our interceding,
And our troubled souls now feed;
Feed us on the heavenly manna
Which descendeth from above,
O'ercast not thy blood-stained banner
Still for evermore be love.

When we, to thy likeness waking,
Shall be fully satisfied;
When, we see, through glory breaking,
Jesus, once the Crucified,
With the angel bands surrounded,
Coming through the yielding air,
Then we'll sing thy love unbounded,
O, thou Fairest of the fair.

BY BISHOP ROBERT PAINE, METHODIST EPISCOPAL CHURCH, SOUTH.

In a "Memorial of Rev. John Horsey," recently published in the Christian Advocate, Nashville, I have already given most of the prominent incidents of this year's labors, and sketched the characters of some with whom I was here thrown into contact and need not repeat, except as a summary.

The formation of the first missionary society among the Methodists to operate among the Indians, occurred in Tuscaloosa, in the spring or early summer of 1820. I am now aware that Dr. Bangs had brought this subject to notice in New York about that period, and that at the General Conference held that year it had been determined to organize such a society—and that a constitution had been adopted and officers appointed—of all which we were profoundly ignorant when the members of our church, together with the citizens of the community generally, united in the little vicinity of the Methodist meeting-house in Tuscaloosa and formed a "Missionary Association" to Christianize and civilize the two large tribes of Indians Chickasaws and Choctaws—our immediate neighbors. The lapse of over sixty years has not effaced the remembrance of my feelings, when after all the preliminaries had been finished the writer was urged by the unanimous vote of the society to visit the Choctaws, to obtain the consent of the chiefs and people to admit missionaries, and, if successful, to select a site for a school, nominate a superintendent, and report as soon as possible. All which was done, as heretofore related, while prosecuting this enterprise. After consulting the United States official representative in the Choctaw Nation, and being assured of a cordial welcome, and when seeking a location for a school, I was taken ill of a malarial fever and was detained so long and so enfeebled that I was obliged to give over the further effort to explore the country. I had, however, the pleasure of reporting to our association that the way was open, and that the vicinity of the "Six Towns" was by common consent recommended as the best location for the school. I was also authorized to nominate Nicholas T. Snred as willing to take charge of it if the society and the Conference would go promptly into it.

Why this attempt to send the blessed gospel with its train of civil, social, and religious influences was not carried forward at once I know not. Early in the fall I left the country to attend the Tennessee Conference. Hearn, Regan, and Snead fell into the Mississippi Conference and by the act of the General Conference that whole section of country was attached to the Mississippi Conference.

A few years later, through the labors of the Conference missionaries—the valleys especially—an extraordinary revival occurred in that tribe. Hersey and the Presbyterian Mission had prepared the way, while Folsom, Le Flore and other Choctaw chiefs, were instrumental in a glorious work of moral and religious benefit to the whole nation.

It is not surprising that Ethnology—the science which treats of the different races of men, should be an interesting subject to an intelligent people, for while obscurity rests like a cloud over the origin and primeval history of nearly all nations, it is natural to desire to know as much as possible of our ancestry. What labor and expense have been devoted to this subject in unraveling the mysteries of African, Egyptian, Grecian, and Roman antiquities! The more cultured a people become the more interest they take in their early history. A thoroughly barbarous people are utterly indifferent to such topics. May not such thoughts suggest sufficient apology for some remarks upon the history of the great tribes contiguous to my circuit?

The Chickasaws and Choctaws were evidently of the same stock—their similarity in language, personal appearance customs, and traditions, clearly demonstrating this fact. They, like most of the red race in the United States, claim to have migrated from the Northwest; and while other tribes who hold themselves to be of Northwestern origin, affirm that their ancestors continued to travel eastward to the Atlantic slope, these tribes believe their fathers, after crossing the Mississippi river, turned southwest and settled where authentic history found them several centuries ago. The Cherokees and Muscogees, or Creeks, have substantially the same tradition. Naturalists say they belong to the great "Appalachian" family of Indians. The Appalachian—"the long or endless mountain"—was the name given by De Soto and early Spanish authorities to the great range of mountains, including its plateaus and parallel ridges, which, leaving Canada, passed through Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, and on southerly, diverging from the Atlantic coast line, and subsiding in Georgia and Alabama, and abounding (throughout generally its whole extent) in coal, iron and other minerals. The southwestern extremity of this range reaches into North Mississippi, separating the tributaries of the Mississippi from those that fall into the Bay of Mobile. The English called it the Allegheny range, but De Soto and the Spanish discoverers the Appalachian. Other names have been given in certain parts of it, as "Blue Ridge," "Cumberland," etc., but Appalachian was probably its earliest name for the whole range. Geology indicates that the larger part of it was of earlier date than the Andes or Alps. Over a great part of this territory, especially the Southern, the mysterious old Natchez race, the Cherokees, Creeks and their associate tribes, were found when the whole race invaded that region, and hence the country gave the name to its inhabitants. How the tribes change their locations is illustrated by the Delawares, Shawnees, and others, one residing on the Atlantic slope, but now in Kansas and the Northwest; and to what extent the tribes have mixed is indicated by the facts that Tecumseh's mother was a Creek, while he and his brother—the prophet—were Shawnees and were found on the borders of Canada, in the war in 1812. The Cherokees and Chickasaws were less migratory in disposition than usual with the other tribes; for while it is said they descended from two brothers, and have always lived close together, they have retained separate tribal and political distinctions to a remarkable degree. Even the fierce savage wars which on several occasions have burst forth between them have ceased as suddenly as they began. About equal in population, in intellectual culture, and industrial improvements, they have respected each other's rights as good neighbors and true friends, and when it has been otherwise, the fault has been in the whites. Having visited them while living here, and repeatedly in their new homes west of the Mississippi, I gladly testify that this applies to them now.

The first authentic account we have of these two great tribes is their invasion by Ferdinand De Soto. This very remarkable man had distinguished himself as a Spanish cavalier under Pizarro, in the conquest of Peru, about the time of Luther's appearance in obedience to the command of Charles V. before the "Diet of Worms." Having returned to Spain loaded with the spoils of that infamous war, he asked and obtained the royal consent to organize an army and a fleet to return to America as commander-in-chief, and invade and attach to the kingdom of Spain the far famed Florida. Having married the beautiful Babadilla, daughter of a royal favorite, and collected a large force of the most gallant spirits in Spain, he set sail, with the knights and some of their wives, to rendezvous at the Island of Cuba. There he left the ladies and proceeded in full force to Tampa Bay where he landed, May 30, 1539. This was the largest and most formidable army that had ever invaded the continent. From the time he buried his transports, and thus cut off all means of returning to Spain, his conduct admits of no explanation, but that he was seeking to find Ponce de Leon's imaginary Fountain of Health, or the fabulous Eldorado gold and diamond mines. Hence he spent some time in exploring Florida, thence into Georgia—thence, turning southwest, he struck the Alabama river, and had a terrible battle with the Indian fort situated on the river and under the noted Chief Tuscaloosa. The Spaniards call it Matrvilla; it is described as being on the north bank of the Alabama river and about twenty-five miles above its junction with the Tombigbee. Passing up the latter, he is said to have crossed the Black Warrior near where Erie now stands; after a fierce battle of two days with the Choctaws. Continuing his course, Pickett and others say, De Soto crossed the Bigbee—or Little Tombigbee, near Waverly, in Lowndes county, Mississippi—not far below the mouth of the Buttahatchee; and took the buffalo trail up the prairie region. The Tibbie, being the line between the Choctaws and Chickasaws, enters the Bigbee just below where he crossed it, his way henceforth was among the latter tribe, and not far from the present Mobile and Ohio Railroad. This level and beautiful prairie, running north for forty miles, along a well-beaten buffalo trail, was the best possible way for his artillery and stock, and upon reaching the neighborhood of the Chickasaw "Council House," not far from the Pontotoc ridge, he went into winter quarters.

The place of encampment was fortified, near the largest village in the Nation and in the most populous part—abounding in maize and other valuable products. The Spaniards were not likely to forego the use of those advantages, and the Indians feared to resist it.

MISSIONARY.

—The missionaries of the American Board appointed to the Central African Mission have encountered unexpected difficulties in their journey to Bihe. Letters from them, dated Bailunda, August 23d, and printed in the Missionary Herald for January state that the King of Bailunda has compelled them, for the present, to give over their attempt to reach Bihe, and abide at Bailunda. The party left Bailunda and arrived at Biheli, in company with the King's ambassador, who had been charged with entrance to them. Biheli is on the border of the dominions of the kings of Bailunda and Bihe. The ambassador carried a present to the chiefs of Biheli, and brought back a story to the effect that a messenger from the King of Bihe had left word that the white men must not come into his country. If they did, they would be plundered and murdered. The missionaries said they would take the risk; but the ambassador refused to allow them to proceed and the carriers were afraid to disobey the ambassador. So the party was compelled to return to Bailunda. They had an interview with the King, who told them he would not permit them to go to Bihe at present. They must stop near him, or he would hire carriers and send all their goods back to the coast. Subsequently they learned from a Portuguese trader from Bihe that the King of Bihe was expecting them, but the King of Bailunda refused to listen to this information. The missionaries will remain at Bailunda for the present and are providing temporary quarters for themselves. They hope to be able to push on to Bihe when reinforcements arrive.—New York Independent.

THE MISSIONARY STATUS.—Bishop Bastle says: "At the beginning of the present century there were not, if the data we have are reliable, more than 50,000 converted heathen under the care of evangelical missions, while to-day there are not less than 1,950,000. The year 1878 alone shows an addition of some 80,000 souls. Let us take individual islands and 'coast lands,' and mark the strength of the Christian population. In the West Indies and Madagascar there are about 310,000; in India and Farther India, some 5,000; in West Africa, 45,000; in South Africa, 180,000; Indian Islands 90,000; China, 70,000; South Sea Islands, more than 300,000. To-day there are about 70 missionary societies in active operation, employing of Europeans and Americans alone, 2,000 ordained ministers, besides hundreds of native preachers, and over 23,000 native helpers. Those various societies, in addition to the number of missionaries sustained, have founded and are sustaining nearly 12,000 mission schools, in which there are more than 800,000 pupils, hundreds of whom are under theological training for the ministry. May we not rejoice that on many an island and along many a seacoast, the morning of redemption is dawning, and on some the sun of righteousness has actually risen?"

—The Blantyre (East Africa) Mission of the Church of Scotland is going on steadily under its new management. The scandal growing out of the horrible punishments inflicted by former missionaries on the natives is a thing of the past, and now men and better methods are redeeming the name of the mission. The meetings at the mission are well attended and orderly quiet reigns in the community. Outside the mission the Makalobs, who seem to be losing the excellent character given them by Dr. Livingstone, are making serious disturbances. The chiefs war among themselves and commit terrible cruelties. One of them has killed two of his wives by crushing their heads between boxes. The presence of the missionaries in the neighborhood has, however, a restraining influence. There has been a change in the method of dealing with natives gathering at the station. Formerly Blantyre meant to them "You go there naked and you come away clothed;" but it means now something more than "calico" and "protection." Eight villages have been formed around the station. The roll of the school includes 130 scholars. The advanced scholars read English and write, but are weak in arithmetic.

—Bishop Penick of the African Mission of the Protestant Episcopal Church writes that the schools have been visited with a scourge in the shape of an insect called the "chigre." It requires much of the time of those connected with the mission to extract these troublesome insects from the flesh of the little sufferers. The "chigre" buries itself in the flesh, forming a white, bough sac, which it fills with eggs. In from twenty-four to thirty-six hours these eggs hatch, and the process of hatching and burrowing goes on rapidly, the parasite going deeper and deeper, until mortification sets in and death ensues. The Bishop has distributed large quantities of rice in the districts suffering from a famine, and has in many cases been aware of the dishonesty and ingratitude of the heathen, though he believes that the general effect of the exhibition of Christian liberality in the timely gift will be very salutary.

—India contains 1,766,695 square miles. It is as large as twenty-eight States like Illinois; or one hundred and ninety-seven States like Massachusetts. The census has just been taken, but the results are not yet made known; we can safely say, however, that the population of India is about 250,000,000. Of this vast number about 185,000,000 are of the Brahmin faith, about 10,000,000 are Mohammedans, and about 3,000,000 are Buddhists. Of the remainder 750,000 are nominal Christians, and the remainder are of the various religions of the hill and aboriginal tribes.

—The South American Protestant missions conducted by both American and European societies, are found in the Guianas, in Brazil, and the Argentine Republic, in Columbia, Peru, Chili, and to a small extent in southern Patagonia and Terra del Fuego, as well as in the Falkland Islands.

Our Young People.

OLD-EYES' SPEECH.

I was made to be eaten,
And not to be drank;
To be threshed in a barn;
Not soaked in a tank.
I come as a blessing
When put through the mill;
And slight and a curse
When run through a still.
Make me up into loaves
And your children are fed,
But if into drink,
I will starve them instead.
To bread I'm a servant
The eater shall rule:
To drink I am master;
The drinker a fool.
Then remember the warning
My strength I'll employ,
If eaten to strengthen,
If drunk, to destroy.

Sammie's Dinner.

MR. EDITOR: Some weeks ago little Sammie Smith, aged seven years, received at Sunday-school a lesson paper, with the picture of an idol, and worshipers bowed down before it. Sammie's mind seemed to be much exercised thereby, so he asked his mother what it all meant. His mother explained; then Sammie filled with trouble asked if they could hear of God and Christ, would they believe? Whereupon his mother explained God's plan of sending missionaries to tell them of Jesus and his love, that the heathen might believe and be saved. Well then, said Sammie, as I have a dime I will hire Rev. Brown to go and preach to them, and tell them of Jesus. So he came to the writer and said: "Bro. Brown, I want to hire you to go and preach to the heathen, and tell them of Jesus, as they are going to be lost without a knowledge of him." Of course I could not comply, but began to tell him of Sister Sanford, and her mission of love to the heathen. He determined to send her his dime. So I encouraged the effort by asking him to try and raise other dimes among his schoolmates, with a promise to assist him. I am glad to say that success has attended the effort, and now we would be glad for the encouragement of little Sammie and his missionary friends, that you would publish this with the names of donors and amounts as follows:

Sammie Smith, twenty cents; Willie Smith, twenty cents; Arthur Darby, ten cents; Luther Middleton, ten cents; William Kinner, twenty-five cents; Charley Robertson, ten cents; Ernest Robertson, ten cents; Grace Brown, ten cents; Dolla Brown, ten cents; Ada Ethridge, twenty-five cents; Irene Powell, twenty cents; Leola Stamper, ten cents; Nellie Smith, ten cents; Julia Smith, ten cents. Total, $2.

H. F. BROWN,

PLEASANT HILL, La., June 6, 1882.

Cornwallis's Buckles.

I am not quite sure of dates, but it was late in the fall, I think, of 1777, that a foraging party from the British camp in Philadelphia made a descent upon the farm of Major Rudolph, south of that city, at Darby. Having supplied themselves well with provender, they were about to begin their return march, when one of the soldiers happened to espy a valuable cow, which at that moment unfortunately made her appearance in the lane leading to the barnyard; and poor Sukey was confiscated for the use of the company.

Now, this unfortunate cow happened to be the pride of the farm, and was claimed as the exclusive property of Miss Annie Rudolph, the daughter of the house—aged twelve years. Of course no other animal on the estate was so important as this particular cow, and her confiscation by the soldiers could not be tolerated for a moment. So, Miss Anne made an impetuous dash for her recovery, but finding the man deaf to her entreaties and the sergeant proof against the storms of her indignation, the high-spirited child rushed over to the stables, saddled her pony, and was soon galloping off toward the city, determined to appeal to the commander-in-chief of the British army, if nothing less would save the life of her favorite.

Meanwhile, poor Sukey trudged along, her reluctant steps quickened now and then by a gentle prick with the point of a bayonet in her well-rounded side.

To reach the city before the foraging party, was the one thought of the child, as her pony went bounding along the old Chester road at a pace that soon brought her within the British lines. She was halted at the first outpost by the guard, and the occasion of her hot haste was demanded. The child replied: "I must see the general immediately!" "But the general cannot be disturbed for every trifle. Tell me your business, and if important, it will be reported to him."

"It is of great importance, and I cannot stop to talk to you. Please let go my pony, and tell me where to find the general!"

"But, my little girl, I cannot let you pass until you tell me whence you come, and what your business is within these lines."

"I come from Darby, and my business is to see the general immediately! No one else can tell him what I have to say!"

The excitement of the child, together with her persistence, had its influence upon the officer. General Washington was in the neighborhood, with his ragged regiments, patiently watching his opportunity to strike another blow for the liberty of the colonies. The officer well knew that valuable information of the movements of the rebels frequently reached the British commander through families residing in the country, and still, in secret, friendly to the Crown. Here might be such a case, and this consideration determined the soldier to send the child forward to head-quarters. So, summoning an orderly, he directed him to escort the girl to the general.

It was late in the afternoon by this time, and Cornwallis was at dinner with a number of British officers, when "A little girl from the country with a message for the general," was announced.

"Let her come in at once," said the general; and a few moments later Miss Anne Rudolph entered the great tent.

For a moment the girl hesitated, overcome, perhaps, by the unexpected brilliancy of the scene. Then the spirit of her "Redwolf" ancestors asserted itself, and to her, Cornwallis in full dinner costume, surrounded by his brilliant companions, represented only the power that could save her favorite from the butcher's knife.

"Well, my little girl," I am General Cornwallis," said that gentleman, kindly. "What have you to say to me?"

"I want my cow!"

Profound silence reigned for a moment, then came a simultaneous burst of uproarious laughter from all the gentlemen around the table. The girl's fiery temper was kindled, but she held her ground, and her set features and flashing eyes convinced the general that the child before him was one of no ordinary spirit.

A few words of encouragement pleasantly spoken, quickly restored the equability of the girl. Then, with ready tact, the general soon drew from her a concise narration of her grievance.

"Why did not your father attend to this for you?"

"My father is not at home, now."

"And have you no brothers for such an errand, instead of coming yourself into a British camp?" "Both of my brothers are away. But, General Cornwallis," cried she, impatiently, "while you keep me here talking they will kill my cow!"

"So your brothers also are away from home. Now, tell me, child, where can they be found?"

"My oldest brother, Captain John Rudolph, is with General Gates."

"And your other brother, where is he?"

"Captain Michael Rudolph is with Harry Lee." The girl's eyes fairly blazed as she spoke the name of gallant "Light-horse Harry Lee." Then she exclaimed: "But, General, my cow!"

"Ah, had one brother with Gates and one with Lee. Now," said the general, severely, "where is your father?"

"He was with General Washington," frankly answered the little maiden; "but he is a prisoner now."

"So, so. Father and brothers all in the Continental army! I think, then, you must be a little rebel."

"Yes, sir, if you please I am a little rebel. But I want my cow!"

"Well! you are a brave, straightforward little girl, and you shall have your cow and something more, too." Then, stooping forward, he detached from his garters a pair of brilliant knee-buckles, which he laid in the child's hands. "Take these," he said, "and keep them as a souvenir of this interview, and believe that Lord Cornwallis can appreciate courage and truth, even in a little rebel." Then, calling an orderly, he instructed him to go with the child through the camp in search of the cow, and, when he should find the animal, to detail a man to drive her home again. So Miss Annie returned in triumph with her prize! And those sparkling knee-buckles are still treasured by her descendants as a memento of Cornwallis and the Revolution. St. Nicholas.

A Sharp-Eyed Boy.

A poor lad living near Philadelphia was invited a couple of years ago by a wealthy friend in town to dine with him. Among the dishes now to him on the table, he noticed that one which he particularly relished was set down on the menu as "Ecllet à la champignons." A sharp scrutiny showed him that the "champignons" were only mushrooms, such as he had gathered on the sheep walks. These, however, as his friend explained to him, were of finer quality, and had been cultivated and canned in France. They sold at retail, his friend explained to him, readily at sixty cents a can. Strolling through the market the next day, the boy saw one or two quart baskets of native mushrooms marked at that price. "Is there much demand for these things?" he asked. "We do not think much of them in the country." "They are considered a rare delicacy," said the man, "but only epicures can afford to buy them."

The lad passed on with a new thought in his brain. Why could he not grow mushrooms? He was poor, to be sure, and had little time to spare from his regular work, and had no land. Here was a crop which he had been told could be raised in a cellar, one for which there was always a demand which could easily be increased, and no supply. He went home, and during the next few weeks read every book he could find on mushrooms, laid out beds in a back cellar, manufactured his spawn with a few old mushrooms and the manure heap, and last fall filled the market with his boxes of tiny silvery buttons, blushing delicate pink. They were of precisely the same quality as the French canned champignons, only they were dewy fresh, and sold at twenty cents. Epicures eagerly filled their baskets, and others who never had tasted them, in the prevailing high prices of all kinds of food, tried the now cheap vegetable, and came again and again. The crop fairly took the market, and the boy has already laid up a snug sum toward going to college.—Museum.

TEMPERANCE.—CREDIT.—Young man, if you contemplate a business career, you cannot look after your habits too carefully. Your aim in life is to be successful; with bad habits it is impossible to be successful or respected. Matters that seem of small importance to you may become in future the turning point in your career, either up or down, as they have many a man before you. In illustration of this we take the following anecdote from one of the New York dailies:

Horace B. Claflin, one of the most prominent and wealthy dry goods merchants of New York, was alone in his office one afternoon when a pale, care-worn young man timidly knocked and entered. "Mr. Claflin," said he, "I have been unable to meet certain payments because parties failed to do by me as they agreed to do, and I would like to borrow $10,000. I came to you because you have been a friend to my father, to my mother, and might be a friend to me." "Come in," said Claflin, "come in and take a glass of wine."

"No, I don't drink."

"Have a cigar, then?"

"No, I never smoke."

"Well," said the merchant, "I would like to accommodate you, but I don't think I can."

"Very well," said the young man, as he was about to leave the room. "I thought perhaps you might—good day, sir."

"Hold on," said Mr. Claflin, "you don't drink?"

"No."

"Nor smoke, nor gamble, nor anything of the kind?"

"No, sir."

"Well," said Mr. Claflin, with tears in his eyes, "you shall have it, and three times the amount if you wish it. Your father let me have $5,000 once, and asked me the same question. No thanks—I owed it to you for your father's sake."

"The gulf-stream of history" is what Joseph Cook aptly terms the results of Bible religion.

Before another issue of the ADVOCATE Charles J. Guiteau will have suffered the penalty of death for his atrocious crime. There is little probability of executive interference. To us his conduct is inexplicable on any other theory than insanity, but the national sentiment demands his life on the gallows.

Let all who can get ready to attend the approaching Seashore Camp Meeting which begins July 12 next. It is easy of access, and the rates of travel low. See another column of this paper. There is no more delightful place to spend a few days than at a genuine, old-fashioned Methodist camp meeting.

J. E. Smith, of Covington, La., in a letter to the St. Tammany Farmer, giving an account of his visit to Centenary College during the late commencement, suggests that "a thousand Methodists contribute $10 each for the repair of the college building, and I would willingly head the list with that amount. What say you, friends of Southern education?" This is a timely suggestion, and commends itself to every Methodist in Mississippi and Louisiana. Who will respond?

Gen. Buford, the old Kentucky turfman, has turned preacher, and is trying to reconcile horse racing with Christian living. We are afraid of the conversion that still loves the race-course. It has been suggested that the losses of the turf occasioned the old gentleman's repentance. The general quotes "the Bishop of Canterbury" to sustain his position, to which the Southern Churchman replies: "No! no! general; the Archbishop or Bishop of Canterbury never has and never does attend the Derby or other race-courses."

Some of Walter Whitman's writings have been suppressed as indecent and vicious. His publisher urged him to make certain erasures, but to no purpose. Other passages might be surrendered, but his vulgarities never. Of course there has been a storm raised, with the usual cry of "puritanism." Should any one be tempted to purchase the suppressed volume, we commend the following from the Christian Intelligencer: "Walter Whitman is the greatest literary humbug of the age. If the stuff which he has written were boiled down, the residuum of poetry would not pay for the process."

Our correspondent from Keatchie, La., last week made three good points. He is surely fired with the right spirit, and doubts not the recompense of reward. From many private letters also we are assured that the faith and spirit of revival is in the pulpit. Our brother said he was working, praying and looking for three things: 1. A general revival in every house and at every appointment; 2. Trebling the subscriptions to the ADVOCATE; 3. Making the missionary collections equal the preacher's receipts. May his heart's glowing desires be abundantly realized! Such a grand achievement is enough to awaken the sleeping energies of every pulpit and pew in the church. His aim is not beyond the Lord's promise. If any appreciable number of pastorates could accomplish so large a result, the songs of jubilee would wake the echoes from shore to shore.

We have noticed two $100 challenges made by Baptist papers for proof that any mode other than immersion is baptism. One is by the Examiner, to the editor of the New York Christian Advocate, the other by the Western Recorder, to the editor of the Louisville Christian Observer. Why they offer $100, no more and no less, we are not advised. But we must submit that such propositions are beneath the dignity of manly, theological discussion. Is the $100 any inducement for a Christian scholar to discuss the subject? It strikes us as either a mild sort of bribery now very common in the commercial world, or a blatant banter that belongs to the ring of the pugilist. Calm, careful, prayerful, exhaustive investigation of the subject is right and proper, but $100 challenges are pitiable and puerile. We do wish our good Baptist confreres could be as well satisfied on that subject as Paul was. He rejoiced in the fact that his mission was to preach rather than baptize. They rather reverse the order.

The Southern Outlook.

The census of 1880 is a revelation of hope to the South. Our industrial progress and material development for the past decade has far surpassed the fondest expectations of most sanguine patriots. If these gratifying facts will have the effect of stimulating Southern energy, and restoring commercial confidence, our future is full of promise and greatness. Ever since the war it has been our habit, if not mournful pleasure, to brood over our poverty. Thus the elasticity of other years has given place to depression and despair. The ear of Southern progress has been arrested, and the proud capabilities of our section allowed to sleep in an inglorious inactivity. But hope is beaming upon us. In the face of all discouragements, surrounded by the scarred and charred remains of former greatness, we are moving onward and upward. Manufactories of different kinds are springing up over the Southern States. Last year alone more miles of railroad were constructed in the South than in the Middle and New England States. Vegetable farming is becoming a great industry. Silk culture is increasingly productive. Horticulture is a large source of revenue at a season when money is most needed. All these proclaim the fact that "there is life in the old land yet."

To help forward this brightening outlook and yet more hopeful prophecies, we will indicate some duties that now imperatively claim Southern attention.

It is of foremost importance that we cultivate a hopeful, cheerful spirit. The South is richer than we have had heart to hope or think. Invidious comparisons have been made so long between the North and South that we have greatly magnified Northern wealth and sadly minified Southern capabilities. This spirit has become morbid, and is a reproach to our enterprise, intelligence and boundless possibilities. Around our firesides, to our children and with our friends, we must talk more hopefully. A man in good health has been made sick, and actually killed, by being constantly told that he "looked so dreadfully." On the other hand, invalids have been cheered and restored to health by hopeful, happy friends. That spirit we must cultivate. We have less reason for gloom and despair than any people on earth. We never read the history of France without blushing for our want of stern, masterful heroism. Since the dawning of the present century how many revolutions have swept over her like dreadful simoons of the desert! The sound of one conflict scarcely died away before the gathering clouds of another was seen darkening her skies. Trampling armies swept over her fields, and left behind a track of blood and desolation. And yet they scarcely thwarted their plans for a season or dwarfed a single energy. Soon their desolate fields were made to smile with waving grain, new and more spacious granaries were erected on the ruins of the old, and the bland smile of the farmer seemed to defy the clouds and thunder of war. The Franco-Prussian war debt was paid with marvellous promptness by a defeated people, and is to-day the greatest feat of national financiering known to history. Why then should we repine? The census indicates not only what has been done, but what we may achieve.

Again, our thinking and education must be more practical. We have lost much in this regard. No section of our country has been more productive of great men than the South, but history shows that they were lacking in practical statesmanship. Their great resources of mind were directed to the discussion of the theory of government, the nature of the federal compact, and all issues that affected the nation, rather than those local questions of development and enterprise which have so wonderfully enriched the North and East. While the Southern mind was engaged with these great questions, the keen-eyed Yankee was busy in developing home, industrial and economical, resources, opening rivers, digging canals, building dykes, erecting manufactories, and promoting every measure that could be turned into money. The result is our theories have vanished, and with them have flown our prestige and power. We need in the South more of that utilitarian spirit which so eminently characterizes the New Englander, and which has made the barren rocks of Massachusetts become fountains of flowing plenty. With a more genial sun, more productive soil, as beautiful rivers, less expensive winters than the North, the South should have outstripped her in the race, and to-day have been the robed and sceptered queen of this great Western world. We are not jealous of their prosperity, but acknowledge our own failure to improve grand opportunities. We must forget old theories, and adjust ourselves to new duties. The multiplication and improvement of local industries must be our study and care.

We should also encourage and cultivate a spirit of confidence. We know there has been too little confidence in manly integrity. Suspicion has stereotyped its forbidding form on the chivalrous brow of our manhood, and thus has stayed the march of commercial prosperity. Commerce is founded on confidence; when that is lacking the other can not prosper. Capital in multiplied thousands is idly waiting for investment. Now we believe it will be unlocked, and our country take an upward movement. Here, in the city of New Orleans, two and a half million dollars are being invested in building. If we would only consider it calmly, there is no section that promises richer rewards to capital and labor. Thousands who wandered off after the war, seeking a better country, would gladly return if able.

We further venture to say that there should be less aspiration after political leadership. Every citizen should, in one sense, be a politician, but not dream and scheme for place and power. Our restoration and greatness are not to be achieved by legislation, State or National. The eloquence of our statesmen, the patronage of the general government and the favor of the world, all will not give us glory and success. We must win our way, not by politics, but by honest labor and rigid economy. This, and this alone, is the vision of Minerva that will make every opposing Achilles tremble. The South can not expect, for many years to come, to claim leadership in national politics, nor is it desirable. Other things must command our time and invigorate our energies. If our home affairs are properly conserved, it is matter of small moment to us who pilots the national ship or how fierce the storms that assail her. Interested in all that develops the material interests of our country, as well as its moral and spiritual good, as a religious journalist we feel it not inappropriate to utter these earnest words. May Heaven's blessings rest upon our hopeful outlook, and with returning material prosperity multiply his spiritual followers, and make our Zion rejoice with an exceeding great joy.

The Old Kingswood School.

Just now, as college commencement exercises are being held, and the subject of education is uppermost, a bit of Methodist history may have special interest. Methodism was born in a university, and has ever been the patron of learning. Though, on account of the unexampled growth of the revival and the imperative exigencies of the hour, many uneducated ministers were called to the pulpit, yet early in the movement Mr. Wesley recognized the necessity, and planned accordingly for a Methodist college. This led to the founding of the old Kingswood school, which was opened on the twenty-seventh of June, 1748—Methodism's first institution of learning, and the only one for a half century. That is one of the sacred and memorable places in our ecclesiastical history. Many of the ablest and most heroic coadjutors and successors of the Wesleys claimed Kingswood as their alma mater. Adam Clark, the great linguist and commentator, was educated there. Dr. Joseph Benson at one time was its head-master, and John Wesley, to the day of his death, its ever zealous benefactor. Some facts connected with this mother of Methodist colleges, which suggest comparisons with modern methods and institutions, will be both amusing and instructive.

The location of a college is important. A mistake in this may work irreparable injury to the enterprise. With us accessibility is a chief consideration. A great highway of travel or railroad center is preferred. Not so Mr. Wesley. He selected Kingswood because "it was private, remote from all high roads." What would have been an insuperable objection to many in our time was the circumstance that determined its location. But is there not wisdom in our great founder's selection? or rather do we not go to the other extreme? Mr. Wesley's idea of a church school was a Christian household. To secure the highest religious training with all possible mental culture, he preferred a location remote from outside temptations and distractions. Unless this could be accomplished, a church school was in no way superior to any other. With this view he selected Kingswood. He strenuously insisted that all the children should "be brought up in the fear of God; and at the utmost distance, as from vice in general, so in particular, from idleness and effeminacy." Only pious masters and servants would be employed. Though Wesley had much trouble in keeping up a healthy religious spirit in the school, his earnest purpose is worthy of all emulation. Church schools, in which religion is not a prominent and dominant sentiment, positively and prayerfully taught, are a misnomer and a mistake. Godly parents patronize denominational institutions to secure their children a Christian education. If that is not faithfully attempted, the school disappoints its patrons and fails of its high purpose.

The curriculum of Kingswood was extensive, and compares not unfavorably with our much-lauded advanced modern schools. It embraced at once a primary, academic and collegiate course—"reading, writing, arithmetic, English, French, Latin, Greek, Hebrew, history, geography, chronology, rhetoric, logic, ethics, geometry, algebra, physics and music."

None but boarders were admitted, and these "between the years of six and twelve." And no child would be received "unless his parents agree that he shall observe all the rules of the house; and that they will not take him from school, no, not a day, till they take him for good and all."

The rules of the school were carefully drawn up by Mr. Wesley, and, as he said, found "agreeable Scripture and reason." Even so great a mind has strange weaknesses. Some of these rules are amusing, but were enforced with seriousness and vigor. No wonder they failed. Their strict observance was impossible and unreasonable. But Mr. Wesley was never a parent or an ordinary child. 1. They had to rise, the year round, at four o'clock, and spend the time till five in private, reading, singing, meditating and praying. 2. No play days were permitted, and no time allowed on any day for play. 3. Children must never be out of sight of a master. 4. Every child, if in health, was required to fast every Friday till three o'clock in the afternoon. 5. At five in the morning they attended public religious service, and again every night at seven. 6. At six they breakfasted; at seven school began; at eleven they walked or worked; at twelve they dined, and then worked in the garden or sang till one; from one to five they were in school; from five to six was their hour for private prayer; from six to seven they again walked or worked; supper at seven, and to bed at eight. These surely were rigid regulations, and he enforced them with firmness and exactness. His theory against playing was: "He that plays when he is a child will play when he is a man." He peremptorily dismissed a master because he not only would not restrain the boys from play, but played with them.

After three years these rules had well-nigh destroyed the school. There were remaining only two masters, two servants and eleven children. But he writes: "I believe all in the house are at length of one mind, and trust God will bless us in the latter more than in the beginning." Again, some time after, he says: "I will kill or cure. I will have one or the other; a Christian school or none at all." And thus he was worried for many years. But at length the school, well patronized, officered and equipped, was conducted to his eminent satisfaction, and caused him great joy. From that time forth his journals contain no word of complaint against honored, historic old Kingswood.

Enforcing religious rules is not imparting religious knowledge and impressing upon the heart religious truth. That was Kingswood's mistake. The rigid rules enforced upon children from six years upward rather disgusted than attracted them to religion. But, bating all this, Kingswood is among the places of most sacred memories in our Methodism. Her colleges have now multiplied to thousands. Improving on her methods, may all emulate her purpose and spirit.

Educational Value of the Christian Scriptures.

Intellectual advancement should be unfettered by sectarianism, but the profound reverence I entertain for the Holy Scriptures leads me to express here the hope, that the educational development intended by this gift, should never antagonize, but be in harmony with the great fundamental principles of Christian truth contained in them.

This language is an extract from the letter of Mr. Paul Tulane to the Hon. Randall Gibson and others, conveying to them his large property in New Orleans, to be used for the benefit of the education of young white persons. In the beautiful letter by which the magnificent gift was conveyed, in trust to the gentlemen named, the above sentence shines like a star. How much the generous donor expresses in those few lines! What a wealth of thought and hope is in them! How beautifully is a most important truth put forth! In this age, when almost everybody smatters of an education that ignores the Scriptures, and of a so-called science that turns up its nose at holy things, it is refreshing to find a man who, in his gift of money for educational purposes, protests, beforehand, against the use of his gift for an "educational development" which antagonizes "the great fundamental principles of Christian truth." There is an education which openly and persistently antagonizes those principles, which not only ignores Christian truth, but which treats it with the profoundest contempt. There is a process of education obtaining in many quarters which teaches the young that intellectual independence is won only by departing from the Scriptures. It says plainly that to attain the highest mental culture the mind must be freed from the shackles of a religious training. It speaks with no uncertain sound when it says to the young, your minds must be unfettered by Scripture truth before you can soar away and bathe in the blue sky of true culture. Culture—mental culture—alone is the proper education, and that only on those lines of study and thought which antagonize "the fundamental principles of Christian truth," and lead directly away from God. It is inspiring to find a man of large wealth rising up and protesting against this educational folly, and proving the sincerity of his protest by donating more than a million of dollars for "educational development that shall be in harmony with the great fundamental principles of Christian truth contained in the Scriptures." That million of dollars, conveyed in trust to be used in that way, represents the value of the Christian Scriptures, in Mr. Tulane's mind, as an indispensable factor in the education of the young. How different this looks, and how different will be the outcome, to the gift of the celebrated Stephen Girard!

This is the professed age of culture—mental culture. Scholars of every grade of attainment are giving their time and energies, and men of all classes of wealth are donating money to promote mental culture. Educational appliances are being multiplied with marvelous rapidity, and school facilities are increasing on every side, and in this rush and whirl some very important matters may be forgotten, some indispensable things may be left behind, without which the character, forming under these influences, will be lacking in that which alone can bring it to a symmetrical completeness. The mind is not the whole of a man that needs to be educated. This mental culture is good and beautiful, and productive of grand results, when it is sought and used as a means to bring us to something higher, to elevate us to higher ranges of thought, and to broader fields of usefulness, but, when it is sought and used only for its own sake, it is a most defective sort of education. So thought Mr. Tulane, and hence he said: "The profound reverence I entertain for the holy Scriptures leads me to express the hope that the educational development, intended by this gift, should never antagonize, but be in harmony with the great fundamental principles of Christian truth contained in them." The scientists, with all their parade of wonderful discoveries, have not yet proved, to the satisfaction of everybody, that the mind is simply a bundle of "nervous modifications become hereditary." A great many people still hold on to the old truth, that man is a moral as well as an intellectual being, and that a complete education can not be attained if either of these is neglected. The true theory of culture is the Christian theory—mental cultivation accessory to moral development and moral culture subsidiary to mental development. To reach the right standard of character both of these become potent factors, and the neglect of either issues in deformity. Notwithstanding the jeers of enemies, and the timidity of friends, we must say that Christian education is the only education worthy of the effort of a human being. Notwithstanding the contempt with which some would-be wise people treat the Scriptures, we must say that the Bible is the best text-book for the school and the college and the university that the world has ever had. If any man will take the trouble to study carefully the results which follow early training, he will find that those who have been trained under the influences of "the fundamental principles of Christian truth" have made the best and broadest men. Humanity needs good men and broad men—men who can and who will reach down to others, and help them up to higher planes—men educated to sympathize with human want, and to rejoice in all true success, and to weep in sight of human woe! Humanity needs all from the character which has been formed under the training processes of Christian truth, and modeled after the pattern described in the Christian Scriptures. And yet how often parents, who pretend to be Christians, send their children to those institutions where the word of God is not only ignored, but where the teaching tears the conscience from its seat, and throttles its very life out of it, and where morality is treated with pitiful scorn, and where God is blotted from existence! The words of Mr. Tulane come as a timely rebuke to all such parents. He would have the young people, who are educated by the money he worked to earn and which he gives so generously, "developed in harmony with the great fundamental principles of Christian truth." This generous giver realizes the fact that our young people need Christian education, and his great heart moves him to give a million of dollars toward supplying that need. This money is to be used only in the city of New Orleans. There are other places just as needy. There is a certain place in Louisiana where true men have been at work for years trying, with their limited means, to supply Christian education to our young men. Their progress and success are hampered for the want of money. There are men in Louisiana who have more money than they know what to do with. The only legitimate use of money is to do good with it. See Eph. iv, 28. My rich brother, you who are reading these lines, the place that needs your help, where your money given will do the most good, and whence it will bring richest returns to you, is Centenary College.

Spiritual Camp Meetings.

Within the next few months camp meetings many will be held over our Southwest. These ought to be occasions of spiritual power—of large ingatherings and blessings to believers. The very idea of a camp meeting is spiritually sublime. Christians, leaving their homes, occupying temporary structures in the forests or by the seaside, all to worship God and labor for the conversion of souls. The place is hallowed by singular associations. Spiritual exercise is the one business of the occasion. This is the ideal meeting. As a matter of fact, it is often too much a social reunion. Other things are allowed to dissipate and distract religious meditation. On this point, and as helpful to brethren in conducting these meetings, we extract the following from an excellent article in Zion's Herald, by Rev. Dr. A. Lowrey:

What we want at all our camp meetings proper is a direct grapple, from beginning to end, with sin and sinners. The theme should be, from morning till night, in the stand and in the tent, in the boarding halls and dormitories, in singing and in conversation, salvation, free, full and present. Nor should there be any effort to limit spiritual interest and teaching to a certain class of meetings. It is not only a few enthusiastic persons already saved that we desire to collect together, but the multitude of unsaved sinners, or backslidden or half-saved Christians. We should not be ambitious to minister to a mere coterie of pre-eminent professors, but plunge into the seething sea of wicked men, thread the "highways and hedges," compelling them to come in by the compulsions of love. The church as such needs sanctifying, not in representative characters and heads of departments, but in detail.

Spirituality must go through the church like fire in heated iron until the whole mass is in a glow. This world will be saved through a sanctified church as a whole; not by a blazing evangelist here and there, however apostolic and miraculously endowed, nor by detached combinations, however saintly and useful, but by a red-hot church and burning ministry. Extraordinary evangelists and sacred characters are raised up, it would seem, at intervals, as samples to show what the general church should be. Therefore let all our camp fires this summer be fed with spiritual truth, pure and simple.

We should look for immediate fruit at our camp meetings. The idea that men are called into the ministry and general service of God as a horse is put on a tread-mill, to perform routine duty without any thought about results, is preposterous and unscriptural. When Paul was called to preach it was for a purpose "to turn them from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, that they might receive forgiveness of sins and inheritance among all them that are sanctified." We should look for convictions, conversions, sanctifications and baptisms of power at the first service.

A church is in a state of power when it is in a state of reasonable expectancy. Brethren, when we return from the camp, let it be said of us, they "come bringing their sheaves with them."

Sabbath Observance.

We commend most earnestly the following, from the Chicago Standard, to our readers. A Sabbath or no Sabbath is now the question before American Christianity. If surrendered, we are shorn of our strength for generations. With the large influx of people who have no sympathy with our peculiar institutions, we are called upon to exercise double diligence and unwonted zeal that the church suffers no loss. We have known young men, occupied as clerks in the stores of gentlemen who regarded not the Lord's day, to be prived of all church privileges, n to their spiritual ruin. They ve forsaken the church in consee of such deadly associations: it is a matter of extreme difficulty, every one acquainted with the dition of European countries well ows, to keep spiritual religion ve where there is no Sabbath. ere may be pompous masses in thedrals, there may be a certain rial church-going in the morning the day, whose afternoon and ning are given up to pleasure, re may be some lingering reions restrain through the reacting science of a past age; but spirit religion survives only in the few cere assemblies where the Lord's thful "remnant" nurses the red fire, often in sorrowful doubt ether it may not soon go wholly is quite the thing in this country t now to ridicule every sign of uprbusness as regards Sabbath servance. The word "puritan" never more a word of derision n it is now. Honored in history, ognized by every truly generous nd, as representative of both prinles and traits of character to ich the world is deeply indebted what it now most values, it is l used; as in the days of the debched and worthless Stuart kings, the favorite cant-term of vulgar use. When the puritans consed the Sabbath, as they did, they ew what they were about. If they nt too far in their zeal, it was still eat of which neither they nor ir descendants have any cause to ashamed. The puritan Sabbath fle its mark in this land; and at there is of good still left among is very greatly due to the fact that dwart principles of righteousness bodied in stalwart institutions ntinue to hold sway, however it y be a declining one, even over godless generations which repute both.

t seems almost like a hopeless ng for Christians to breast the Sabbath tendency now so strong. ey can not, of themselves, make hange laws; they can not control roads, nor close Sunday theaters, in their own strength stem the of European godlessness which aks upon the Eastern sea-coast rolls to the Western. But they personally be true to their own nciples, and in so doing can preve the institution itself from total ck. Nor is the Christian element this country without power. uld it once thoroughly assert itf. It would be found that Chrisity is still something more than ame. The time may come when h Christian self-assertion will be e a necessity and a duty. Meme, and in anticipation of that day, church of Jesus Christ should p its own garments spotless, its hand strong, and its own heart rtworth College Commencement.

We had the pleasure of attending, participating in the commencet exercises of this famed and exlent institution. The commencesermon was to have been ached by Rev. C. W. Carter D. but on account of bereavement in family he could not be present. pastor at Brookhaven, Rev. J. McLaurin, preached at 11 A. M., technically a commencement non but from reports, in all re ts timely and equal to the occasion. pure gospel sermon is only apopriate at such time. We remem. when at college to have heard a mmencement sermon which for rade of learning and display of tainment was a model, but in genne gospel instruction and unction as as barren and dry as Gideon's ece. The congregation was utterexhausted with the dryness of reek roots, and the hardness of sci tific terms. Colleges need the gosl not sermonic smatterings of sci ce. In the evening the Christian sociation was addressed by Rev. A. S. Adams of Kosciusko. It s full of wholesome instruction, iginally and beautifully presented. e have no more scholarly man mong us than this poet, preacher and erator of the North Mississippi nference. Having been for so long the work of education he understood well how to edify his audience d succeeded.

On Monday the essays of the large aduating class were read. Some of ese were above the usual style and aracter of such compositions. There as less profusion of rhetoric and ore of fact than we remember to ave heard on former occasions. In the evening the anniversary of the Alumni Association was held with n address by this editor. The large udel was packed, and a score or ore of lamps were burning in a mperature already above ninety, so he speaker favored his audience with ore perspiration than eloquence. The association was not largely atended by members from a distance.

On Tuesday the honor pupils of the senior class read their essays and the annual address was delivered by Governor Robert Lowry. The Governor spoke on the Disabilities of Woman, and as evidence of his success on the occasion, the audience by a rising vote requested its publication. We are delighted that Mississippi's Governor is so interested in the great cause of Christian education as to find time amid the duties of his office to lend the influence of his presence, counsels and learning to our college commencements. His visit to Whitworth will not soon be forgotten.

The college has had a prosperous term with over two hundred pupils in attendance. Dr. Johnson has the honor of presiding over the largest female college in the South. His success has been a blessing to the state, and the pride of his friends. He has been ably assisted by a fine corps of teachers. Without invidious distinction, but on the score of old friendship dating back some ten years or more, we would make special mention of Prof. R. S. Ricketts. He has been connected with Whitworth College for many years and is an ornament to his profession. Dr. Johnson has been wise in retaining for so long his valuable services. Mrs. L. A. Kidd, has charge of the boarding department. She is a lady of rare culture and refinement.

Whitworth has had a remarkable history. We hope its prosperity may increase with years and the demands of the age. To the warm friends of Dr. Johnson's family we are indebted for distinguished hospitality.

—A young Georgia Methodist has given $100 for the new library in Seney Hall, Emory College.

—The Natchez, Jackson and Columbus R. R., it is said will be completed to Jackson in sixty days.

—The Italian citizens of Vicksburg, Miss., propose to erect a monument, to the memory of Gen. Garibaldi.

—The Mississippi State Sunday-School Convention will be held at Water Valley, July 5, 6 and 7. A large attendance is expected.

—Mrs. Young J. Allen, the wife of Dr. Allen, the Superintendent of our China Mission, has arrived at Oxford, Ga., where she will live the next two years for the education of her children.

—Rev. D. W. Carter of the Holston Conference, will probably go as a missionary to Mexico next fall. The Holston Methodist speaks of him in terms of high praise as a gifted and consecrated young man.

—Miss Willie Streater has been elected music teacher in the East Mississippi College, at Meridian. We congratulate Prof. Adkisson and the trustees on securing her services. We have known her from childhood and have no doubt of her eminent fitness for the position.

—The Rev. Charles Kendall, President of the Primitive Methodist Connection, England, died in Hull on May 5, aged 61. He was a brother of the Rev. Amos Kendall of the North Mississippi Conference Methodist Episcopal Church, South. He leaves three other brothers who are also ministers.

—The great Methodist Hospital in Brooklyn is to be located on Prospect Heights. The nine buildings are estimated to cost $100,000, and this, with the price of the land, will bring the total amount to about $500,000. This, it will be remembered is the princely gift of Mr. George I. Seney.

—The Rev. R. G. Porter—"Gilderoy"—has become associate editor of the Mississippi Methodist. He is well known as a newspaper writer and as the author of Gilderoy's Stories For Boys. His name will add strength to the paper, and his writings will please and instruct. Bro. Porter has been an occasional correspondent of this ADVOCATE for years, and we hope still to hear from him.

—Bishop McTyeire has appointed Miss Anna Muse, of Atlanta, a missionary to China to labor under the auspices of the Woman's Missionary Board. Miss Muse is highly recommended, is finely educated, and has true missionary spirit. She will join the Misses Rankin, in the noble work among the heathen women of the Celestial Empire. May the Lord speed her journey and bless her labors.

—Joseph Cook, the Boston "Monday Lecturer," was in Japan last month lecturing to large audiences. At Tuskilo, it is said, fully two thousand students of the University, and Engineering College were present. He made some happy hits, among others the following: "America, if deprived of its Sabbath, its Sunday-schools, and its Christian pulpit, could not last a single generation. And I am sure you can not."

—Thanks to our friend, the Rev. Beverly Carradine, of Vicksburg, for a handsome list of subscribers to the ADVOCATE. This editor has many warm friends in that Hill city to whom a pastorate of four years attached him most tenderly. During the dark days of 1878, when pestilence walked those streets and he lay prostrate, with the shadow of death gathering over him, he can never forget their ceaseless vigils and angel ministries. He is glad to perpetuate that pastorate through the columns of the ADVOCATE.

—We extend our sympathies to Rev. R. S. Woodward, presiding elder of the Vicksburg district, and his excellent wife, in the death of their infant son Clarence. Sorrow again has visited their home, but however often he comes the face of death is never familiar. In other sore bereavements they have tested the comforts of God's grace. May his blessing abide with them in this new trial. How rapidly the company of our loved ones is increasing on the other shore. We shall be no strangers there, but will find greetings at the beautiful gate.

—The last has been a year of gratifying prosperity to Wesleyan Methodism in England. They have been suffering for several years a decrease in numbers; but this year, blessings abundant have attended their labors. Their methods of gathering and reporting statistics are much more accurate and rigid than ours. The net gain of full members reported, do not indicate the conversions and accessions during the year. They win more than 56,000 while the net increase is only 12,661. The grace of liberality is largely developed. Their Thanksgiving Fund lately raised was over a million and a half of dollars. We rejoice with our mother in her rejoicings.

—We call attention to the notice in another column from Rev. Geo. G. Smith. He has ready for the press, "The Life Letters of Bishop Andrew," prepared at the request of the family. Bro. Smith is too well known as a writer to leave any doubt as to the character of his work in this volume. We look for a most readable and valuable book. Bishop Andrew was connected with that period of Methodist history that witnessed the division of the church, and our separate organization. His was a saintly life and his biography will do good. Rev. J. W. Rush one of our valued corresponding editors has examined the manuscript and given it hearty endorsement.

—Mrs. Eliza Yundell Singleton, wife of Hon. O. M. Singleton, died at Canton, Miss., on the night of the fifteenth. Her sufferings had been long and great, and death was a relief. She was a lady of unusual culture, had a character of admirable poise and a Christian experience positive and active. We have known her from the days of our boyhood and can bear grateful testimony to the faith and zeal of her life in all good works. For some years past during her husband's congressional career, she has not lived much at Canton. But when at home was ever ready to co-operate in church enterprises and was rarely absent from public worship. Truly a noble spirit has gone to her rest.

Revival at Wesson.

The Rev. W. W. Hopper writes as follows of a gracious revival at Wesson, Miss. Such news from the field cheers the faith of brethren at other points. The notes of victory from our position tires the courage and quickens the step all along the line. The church needs revival power in all our Southwest. May this be followed by yet greater displays of divine power.

Our revival meeting in Wesson, Miss., closed on the night of June 15, lasting twenty-two days. The powers of darkness strongly opposed the work from the start, yet Jesus was conqueror all along. Blessed be his holy name, he got the victory in every service. All the members of the church who took part in the meeting were graciously blessed. The pastor had no ministerial aid. Twenty-five brethren and sisters received the blessing of perfect love; one hundred precious souls professed saving faith in Jesus; and thirty-five united with the church. Class meeting, weekly prayer meetings and ladies prayer meetings are in successful operation. To Jesus be all the praise.

Church Extension.

Here is a good church extension item. Like results and far greater will follow our efforts in that wonderful field. We are looking for a speedy advance in all our frontier work, so soon as the Church Extension Board can organize and begin operations. Nothing has been projected by our church that promises such large and quick returns. Bishop Elliot of Western Texas writing to the Churchman says:

"We need more men to preach and more money to pay them. The preaching builds the churches. From abroad comes $100 or $500, and a missionary stands up and says: See! Christians abroad are willing to do this for you, what will you do for yourselves?" Such a proposition has always, without one failure in this field, resulted in a church, costing from $1,500 to $4,000. This year, under the stimulus of such missionary work and promised help, five churches have been built in the jurisdiction.

Books and Periodicals.

THE QUARTERLY REVIEW.—The new editor, Rev. Dr. J. W. Hinton, makes an appeal to the church in behalf of the Quarterly Review from which we extract the following. We wish the present management abundant success in this important work. Such a periodical, of high standard and great scholarship, ought to be liberally sustained:

In resuming control of the Quarterly Review, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, I desire to make a brief statement and appeal to the public. The late editor, Dr. T. O. Summers, had prepared nearly matter enough for the July number, and that issue is now going through the press at Nashville. The death of Dr. Summers will cause some, but not much delay in its appearance. It will probably be issued by the fifteenth of July. This statement is made that all concerned may understand the status. All doubt may be dismissed as to the continuance of the Review; and I earnestly appeal to delinquent subscribers to make prompt payment by remitting to Dr. J. B. McFerrin or L. D. Palmer, Nashville Tenn. A very considerable arrearage is found in the books; much of it long since due which must be had to carry forward the work in hand. Remit by letter or post office order, and don't delay. New subscribers are wanted, and must be had to give the Review prosperity. Terms, $3 per annum; a moderate price for a first class Quarterly of nearly 800 pages of original reading matter during the year. The mechanical execution of the Review shall be in the highest style of typography—none can excel it in this respect. As to its future literary character, I can only say, while much is demanded, it will be up to the wants of the church and country. Pledges in this matter may not be safely made—words are but leaves, deeds are fruits. I do not propose to say what I can do, but will do what every reasonable man will admit as all that is possible with the facilities at hand. Our people are not largely a reading people, and few of our educated men are professional writers of distinction. The truth should always be told; we must develop writing talent, and we must create a generation of reading and thinking men and women. An organ like this is essential to both these ends. Without a review our standards will be low, and our capable men remain in obscurity. Old men do not know their infirmities—they can not retrieve the time lost nor repair the damages from faulty habits. Very little reliance can be placed for literary aid on men who have passed their meridian without familiarity with the pen. The church is not poor, but rich in brilliant young men, who have learning and even genius, which can lead to distinction and high achievement. I appeal to this class with confident hope. Standing midway between the old and young, in full sympathy with both classes, while belonging to neither, I may be allowed to indicate what must be our reliance for literary progress.

—The Homiletic Magazine for June is on our table. This is the best of its kind. It is divided into four sections: Homiletical, Theological, Expository and Miscellaneous. There are sermons, sketches of sermons, biographies, expositions of particular texts and reviews. We recommend this monthly to all our preachers. It can be had of A. D. F. Randolph & Co., 900 Broadway, N. Y., for twenty-five cents a number.

—We acknowledge the reception of "Grace and Glory," a collection of sacred songs for Sabbath-schools, revivals, etc., by D. E. Dortch and edited by Dr. Cunningham. The book is published at the Southern Methodist Publishing House. Dr. Cunningham says; "We believe the book to be above the average of its kind, and recommend it to our people." That is cautious but good endorsement. It can be had at the Publishing House at the usual price of such publications.

—We have another music book, "Pearly Portals," for the Sabbath-school, by D. S. Hakes, published by Geo. D. Russell, 126 Tremont Street, Boston; Pacific Press Co., Oakland, Cal. The publisher claims in this book a higher standard of excellence, in music and in text, than belongs to such publications. The collections of songs are so numerous that those interested can only buy specimen copies, examine and recommend. The poetry, seems to be good; as to the music our knowledge is so limited, we can not speak.

—The Southern Musical Journal, Savannah, Ga., comes to us this month in attractive dress. It has a good picture of Longfellow, a discriminative tribute to his genius, and a poem to his memory. This is a good periodical and should be patronized by the lovers of music and art.

—Musical Herald, published by Musical Herald Co., Boston, for June has come to hand. This number is equal to any former issue. The literary articles are of superior character. Under the leadership of such periodicals as the Herald our people are developing a taste for music quite gratifying. The lecture on "church choirs and the relation of the clergy thereto" by Gen. H. K. Oliver, discusses a much discussed subject, with interest and eloquence. The departments of "Musical Mention" and "Review of New Music" are full and valuable.

—The Southern Pulpit for June, Jackson and Lafferty, Richmond, Va., is on our table. We have read only a few of the sermons, but they are worth the full price of the Pulpit for a year. Our excellent friend, the Rev. H. M. DuBose of Galveston, has a good sermon on "The Fear of God a Power—Principle." Subscription only $1 50 per annum.

—Little's Living Age, June 17, 1882, is a rich number. The following is the table of contents, Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, Charles Lamb and his friend, Aunt Mona, The Last King of Tahiti, Cecily, "Poor White Trash," The Peruvian Library, In Memoriam, Dr. John Brown and the Convent of Monte Oliveto.

—We return thanks for a copy of the thirty-seventh catalogue of the Memphis Conference Female Institute, Jackson, Tenn. Our old friend Rev. Dr. A. W. James is still the President and has been for many years.

—A catalogue of Augusta Female Seminary, Staunton, Va., has been sent us. Accept thanks. These are beautiful buildings in the frontispiece.

We shall do our best to exclude fraudulent advertisements of every description from the ADVOCATE, and trust our friends, in ordering goods from the leading merchants of New Orleans and elsewhere, as represented in our columns, will mention having seen the advertisement in the ADVOCATE. We will also take pleasure in attending personally to any commissions for our friends in the country with which we may be favored, while endorsing our advertisers as being worthy of their patronage.

A Western editor once apologized to his readers somewhat after this fashion: "We intended to have issued and a marriage to publish this week, but a violent storm prevented the wedding and the doctor being taken sick himself, the patient recovered, and we are accordingly cheated out of both."

CHAMPS, COLIC, CHOLERA MORBUS, SOUR STOMACH, Diarrhœa and Dysentery, are speedily cured by Dr. Jayne's Carminative Balsam. It removes all soreness of the Bowels, quiets the Stomach, and restores its natural action. As a family remedy for Disorders of the Bowels, so often prevalent among children and adults in the Summer months, it is especially recommended, being prompt in its operation, perfectly safe, and easily administered.

"Well, John," said a minister to one of his hearers, "I hope you hold family worship regularly?" "Ay, sir," answered John, "in the time o' year o't." "In the time o' year o't! What do you mean?" "Ye ken, sir, we canna see in winter." "But John, you should buy candles." "Ay, sir," replied John, "but in that case, I'm afraid the cost might overhang the profit."

CONSUMPTION CURED.—Since 1870 Dr. Sheraz has each year sent from this office the means of relief and cure to thousands afflicted with disease. The correspondence necessitated by this work becoming too heavy for him, I came to his aid. He now feels constrained to relinquish it entirely, and has placed in my hands the formula of that simple vegetable remedy discovered by an East India missionary, and found so effective for the speedy and permanent cure of Consumption, Bronchitis, Catarrh, Asthma, and all Throat and Lung Diseases; also all Nervous Complaints. Its remarkable curative powers have been proven in many thousand cases, and actuated by the desire to relieve suffering humanity, I gladly assume the duty of making it known to others. Address me, with stamp, naming this paper and I will mail you, free of charge, the recipe of this wonderful remedy, with full directions for its preparation and use, printed in German, French or English. A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.—Mr. P. Werlein, 135 Canal street, New Orleans, is now prepared to offer the greatest bargains in the best pianos manufactured. Owing to the overflow he is over stocked with fine pianos, and also has a large stock of second-hand pianos on hand, which were rented out last winter, that he can sell you at your own price, so to speak, and on such terms as will suit your convenience. The piano-forte, as illustrated in the new Chickering, may now be said to be perfect. These pianos have been known for the past sixty years; but they were never so good as now, and never had a larger sale. The Chickering piano of to-day will wear an indefinite number of years, as they have always done, but the purity of tone and perfection of action is what now constitutes the Chickering piano the perfect piano of the world. The Mathushek pianos have patented features which gives them great popularity; they are also considered indestructible. Mason and Hamlin's organs—the organs of greatest reputation, are to be had at this popular house. Whoever needs anything in the music line will consult their interests by writing to P. Werlein, or calling in person. Any representation of goods at this house can be relied upon implicitly. Send there also for song music and musical instruments of every kind, either retail or wholesale.

An unpaid board bill will strike terror to the heart of the best poet living.

The best and safest way to increase the appetite, assist digestion, cause the food to assimilate properly, and the absorbents to take up nourishment, induce full and regular evacuation, produce easy expectoration, and stop decay of the lungs, heart, liver, urinary and digestive organs is by using Brown's Iron Bitters. It has given satisfaction in more than a million instances.

FORTY YEAR'S EXPERIENCE OF AN OLD NURSE.—Mrs. Winslow's Soothing Syrup is the prescription of one of the best female physicians and nurses in the United States, and has been used for forty years with never failing success by millions of mothers for their children. It relieves the child from pain, cures dysentery and diarrhœa, griping in the bowels, and wind-colic. By giving health to the child it rests the mother. Price twenty-five cents a bottle.

NEW ADVERTISEMENTS.

A BOY WANDERER.

Willie Reuth, a boy about seventeen years of age, black hair and eyes, left his home in Mobile on Tuesday, June 20. It is probable he is trying to get to Texas. He bought a ticket to New Orleans, and had with him enough money to pay his way as far as Vermillionville, La. His mother is in great distress on account of his leaving home, and will be grateful for any information concerning his whereabouts. Any such information sent to me will greatly relieve a mother in trouble. Texas papers will do a kindness to a distressed family by inserting this notice.

Notice to the Friends of Bishop Andrew.

At the request of the family I have prepared "The Life and Letters of Bishop Andrew" for the press. There was placed enough material in my hands to make a most delightful book. If this has not been done, the fault is mine.

Authors are proverbially sanguine but they are somewhat by experience. They find the public are not anxious by any means to read as they were to write, and when authors publish they are often losers. If the public wish this memoir, I will publish it. Let those who desire to have it send me a postal. It will be neatly printed, well bound and illustrated, about 500 pages, and delivered at $1 50. No money called for till the book is issued. I should be glad to get all the expenses during this month so as to put the book to press timely.

STANDARD of SILVER.

As a rule the quality of Government Coin has been the standard on which Silversmiths have based their quality. The standard of United States Coin is 900 fine silver to 100 copper or other alloy. The standard of Great Britain is 925/1000 pure silver to 75 fine alloy.

Our leading Silversmiths, the GORHAM COMPANY, adopted the English standard many years ago, and so careful has been the surveillance over the quality of their ware, that not a SINGLE piece has been known to leave their Factory under the standard. So well is this now understood that their trade mark is as well known to all purchasers of STERLING Solid Silver in this country, as is the Hall Mark of England, as a sure guarantee for pure metal.

THE FARMER.

BY ROBERT NICOLL.

When the trees are wreathed with blossoms
And the raptured, feathered throng
Greet the sweet spring's welcomed coming
With their adulating song
In his fields apace, the farmer
Strikes the furrows wide and deep
From his hand the golden kernels
Spring forth with generous sweep.

When the sultry sun of summer
Shimmers down on all the land,
Through the days it toils unceasing
With its soft and plastic hand
Toils with busy make the harvest
Bringing fleecy clouds of rain
And the fertile vapor raising
In the dew returns again.

With the sunshine he has labored
Till the autumn comes amain
And he reaps the ripened harvest
Bending on the golden plain:
Autumn with her lap o'erflowing
With the gifts of all the year,
And her song is sweet and tender
In her promise of good cheer.

When the winter rules the country,
Wraps the fields in icy sleep,
In the barns the stock is feeding—
Horse and kine and fleecy sheep—
Sing within his happy palace
What cares he how wild it blows
He enjoys the years completeness:
Summer's sun and whirling snows.

He may rest, for he has answered
To the world's incessant prayer
Give us bread, oh, Lord, and daily—
By his toil and watchful care.
And the glad ships spread their pinions
With the harvest, east and west,
Where the hungry nations waiting
Break the bread and all have blest.

—Young Folk's Rural.

VEGETABLE FARMING.—This is a growing industry in the Southwest. Alabama, Mississippi and Louisiana have thus developed vast resources within the past few years and added largely to their wealth and productive capital. The past season marked a considerable advance in shipping early vegetables to the great markets of the North. Mobile is coming to the front as a vegetable market, and New Orleans shows a yearly advance. The railroad lines have made special arrangements for safe and speedy shipments North. Money from this industry comes to the South when it is most needed and in a few years will do much toward entirely changing our old cotton-bottom methods. We commend the following from the Savannah News to our farmer readers:

Our truck farmers have been able to meet their obligations with great promptness, and the close of the season will see them free of debt and with a considerable surplus on hand. The increase in the business is shown in the very heavy shipments. One of our leading lumber firms, who have made a speciality of furnishing crates for packing peas, cucumbers, etc., inform us that they have furnished this season over double the number of crates they did last year, and that the experience of other firms in the business is about the same, and that instead of waiting for payment three or five months, as has usually been the case, they have been paid so promptly that their business has almost been for cash. We hear of one farmer on the Louisville road who raised this year from eighty to ninety bushels of potatoes to the acre, and at three bushels to the barrel and $6 50 per barrel, which has been the average price obtained, the amount realized has been $195 to the acre, a very handsome and profitable yield. In the Washington market on Saturday Savannah and Charleston new potatoes brought $8 per barrel, and late advices from New York quote them at $6 50 to $7. All other products have brought equally good prices, and there has been very little loss, and all the reports state that the shipments arrive in good condition. The truck farms on the Vale Royal plantation, Louisville road, Springfield plantation and on the line of the Suburban railroads, as well as on Wilmington Island, have all yielded fine crops. Several of the planters, we learn, have realized fifty per cent. increase in crops on the same acreage planted last year.

A RESTORATIVE SYSTEM OF FARMING.—My first counsel would be, practice a restorative instead of an exhaustive system of agriculture. A system that involves abandonment of lands and removal to new scenes is unworthy of the age and a reproach to modern civilization.

No man is worthy to be a farmer who does not annually leave his land in better tilth and strength than he found it. The intellect must share more largely with muscle the toil of agriculture; machinery directed by skilled labor, and propelled by brute force, and also by the mighty power of steam, must take the place of expensive and inefficient human strength. This change involves the necessity for better culture, liberal use of manure, rotation in crops and a larger working capital in proportion to permanent investment. You are already spending millions annually on the old lands of the Atlantic States for commercial fertilizers. While I would commend a judicious expenditure in this direction, I would make this a basis of a practical rotation with course of grasses and other restorative agencies of scientific agriculture.

The business of agriculture should be an industry and not a speculation. The insane pursuit of specialties has long been a curse to American agriculture. A whole community runs wild upon hops, when selling at fifty cents per pound, and in two years they are scarcely worth the price of picking, and extravagance begotten of high expectations, is forthwith followed by bankruptcy. Wheat brings $2 00 per bushel, and whole States become wheat fields, while every other interest languishes until the bread crop becomes so abundant as to be fed to swine in preference to shipment for human food. The sheep with wool at $1 00 per pound, holds high place in popular esteem, but is kicked from the pasture by every Randolph of the farm at the first indication of a heavy decline in the value of its fleece.

In your section cotton, a great boon to your agriculture, as a constituent in your aggregate of production, may become an unmitigated evil if left to usurp the place of all other crops. The crop of last year produced $1,000,000,000; more than fifty per cent. larger than ten years ago. Three millions of bales may command a profit of $40 per bale, while five millions may not bring a dollar above their cost. But present profit is not the main consideration. The increase in value and enlargement of the productive capacity of the soil, by a judicious rotation, including the restorative influences of green-cropping and cattle-feeding, is an increase of capital, a source of larger annual income, and an addition to the inheritance of one's children.—Address of H. Capron.

IMPORTANCE OF GOOD ROADS.—The public roads of the United States have cost several hundred million dollars. Many millions are annually expended in keeping them in repair. It is safe to say that not one-half of this outlay is applied in an intelligent and systematic manner. Millions are literally wasted every year. The country has been aroused to what are regarded the impositions and oppressions of monopolies. Those who are loudest in this complaint are constantly and quietly permitting enormous losses by the mismanagement of roads and by road taxes. One of the best things which farmers and country residents could do, would be to hold occasional public meetings in each town or road district, discuss the matter, find out how much they lose by bad roads, and how they could be improved to the best advantage. If they could thus be induced to inquire and think, a great improvement would not fail to be the result—all of which might be done without a change of the laws.

Good roads are a financial, moral and religious blessing. Nearness to market and mechanics' shops is a great and constant advantage; and a hard, smooth road, four miles long, is practically shorter than one of two miles, made of mud, ruts and stones. To the farmer whose business requires him to go to the neighboring village, three miles distant, twice a week, it makes quite a difference whether he drives those six miles with ease and rapidity, over a fine track, or plunges and jolts, with an occasional broken wagon, over continued obstructions. Good roads enable the country resident to take his family to lectures and places for worship, and favor the dissemination of useful knowledge in many different ways, thus becoming important agents in promoting education in the community. They are, in short, one of the surest indications of a civilized people.—Country Gentleman.

POULTRY—FOOD AND FEEDING.—There is some little art, if so we may so style it, in feeding young chicks to make a healthful and vigorous growth while young. Fully nine-tenths of the mortality amongst poultry, from sickness or disease, occurs while the chicks are still in the "downy" state, and the majority of this loss occurs from improper food, and careless or ignorant feeding. Corn meal, which is far too generally used, is unfit for young chicks, being too heating for their tender and immature digestive organs. Corn meal has killed more young chicks than rats. The best food we have ever found for young birds is stale bread, either crumbled up and fed dry, scalded and fed when cool, or else merely moistened in fresh milk. Where milk is abundant, it should always be used, and if the young birds get plenty of milk, in some form, they will grow so rapidly as to astonish those who have never given milk liberally to their poultry. We know of one breeder, a large dairyman in Chester county, Pennsylvania, who feeds the principal part of his refuse milk to his poultry, old and young, and his birds are not only singularly free from disease, but large, and finely developed in body and feathering. This breeder gives milk the credit of it all, but it may be due in part to excellent care.—D. Z. Evans, Jr., in American Agriculturist.

CATTLE IN PENNSYLVANIA.—From the Pennsylvania State Agricultural Report it would seem that the value of cows, swine, etc., is less than ten years ago. That was the time of high prices, but where are all the improved breeds in this valuation? There are 70,000 more horses than in 1870, and the valuation is fifteen millions less. There are 62,850 more cows, value twelve millions less. There are 173,000 fewer swine, and the total value of the herd is $1,612,333 less than it was ten years ago. Sheep alone have increased in numbers; some two hundred thousand more, and their value is only slightly less than it was ten years ago. It would seem that we are not growing so much as yet as a grazing State as we are a corn and hay State. Enough has been said, however, to show that Pennsylvania's riches are by no means confined to her workshops, factories and mines, her chimneys and spindles and shafts alone.

ABOUT WATERING PLANTS.—Unless one has an abundant supply of water, so that its use, when once begun, can be continued, it is better, as a general thing, to not water at all. In the drouth which we so generally have this month, a mere sprinkling of the leaves is worse than not watering at all. Still, we all may have in the vegetable as well as in the flower garden certain plants that we would like to favor. In such cases, instead of watering the plant, the water should be applied to the soil; draw the earth away from the plants, forming a sort of basin around them; then pour on water gradually, and let it soak in around the roots. Afterwards return the removed dry earth to its place, and this will act as a mulch to keep the roots moist.—American Agriculturist.

FISH CULTURE PROFITABLE.—Fish culture might be engaged in by farmers who have water facilities for the purpose. Where one has a pond of an acre or two in extent hereon, by fish culture, produce more pounds of fresh fish for sale each year than it would be possible to produce of beef from twice the same extent of land. The fish need feeding where there is a large number of them. One thousand fish weighing two pounds each can readily be grown in an acre of water, in two or three years, and it would require twice that extent of land, and twice as much food as the fish would require, to produce an equal weight of beef, mutton or pork.

TIME TO SET RASPBERRIES.—The canes which are to grow and bear fruit the second year, come from buds that start below ground, and commence their growth very early in spring. When the shoots first start they are exceedingly tender, and are liable to be broken in handling and in transportation. For this reason it is desirable to plant them in autumn. But it is better to plant the coming spring than to wait for next fall, and the earlier in the season it can be done, the better. The only use of the piece of old cane given by nurserymen with the root is as a handle in planting. The useful growth comes from the underground shoots.

Household.

FISH-BALLS.—One pint of fish chopped as finely as possible, six large or eight medium-sized potatoes, boiled and mashed fine while hot. Add to them one tablespoonful of butter, half a cup of milk and half a teaspoonful of white pepper and one well-beaten egg. Fish varies so much in saltness that after it has been added to the potato it is best to taste the mixture and judge if more is required. When thoroughly mixed make into small flat balls, and after flouring them well fry a bright brown in sweet dripping. A still more delicate ball is made by dipping them first in beaten egg, then in crumbs, and frying like croquettes, but when eggs are high the first method will answer. Fat, if cooled and strained after using into a small jar, can be used many times, and a thing is never perfectly free from fat unless it is immersed in it when at actual boiling point. A perfectly fried croquette, rissole, fish-ball or potato should be so dry and free from grease as not to soil the napkin it may be served on.—Our Continent.

CHICKEN SALAD.—Pick a pound of meat quite free from bone, and thoroughly cleanse a good head of celery; chop both very fine or better still, pass through a mincing machine; put this in a large basin. Beat the yolk of an egg until it is thick, mix with it a teaspoonful of made mustard, a pinch of salt, and a quarter of a teaspoonful of white pepper. Beat well into the mixture half a teacupful of thick cream, and add the juice of a small lemon, drop by drop, beating the mixture with a fork all the time. Stir this dressing well among the minced chicken and celery. Mould with a spoon in any shape you like, and serve on a dish with beet-root cut into fanciful shapes. Some prefer a teaspoonful of tarragon vinegar instead of lemon juice, and salad oil can be used instead of the cream; but the cream makes it much whiter and daintier in appearance, and gives a better flavor.

A correspondent of the Hearth and Home thus directs the making of tea: You are correct in recommending an earthen tea-pot. A good direction for making tea is: Use three-quarters of an ounce for from six to eight persons; pour in boiling water when ready to sit down; give it a stir with a spoon, and in five minutes your first cup is ready; then refill the tea-pot with boiling water and your second cup will be as good as the first. Use water fresh boiled; when it has been boiling too long, or if the tea is wet fifteen to thirty minutes before you are ready to use it, the finest aroma is gone. A great deal is in the making of tea. The most healthful and the cheapest teas are the black teas, Oolong and Breakfast teas.

Here is my mother's recipe for making tea: The kettle must have fresh water; just as soon as it boils the quantity required is poured into the tea-pot, and the tea shaken in on top; the pot is placed not on the hottest part of the stove, and allowed to draw ten minutes, never boil. If the tea-pot be tin, and the stove very hot, five minutes will suffice.—Farm Journal.

A CHEAP TEA CAKE.—An inexpensive tea cake is made of one cup of sour milk, one cup of sugar, half a cup of butter, one egg, one cup of raisins (stoned and chopped), one teaspoonful of soda dissolved in a little hot water, one teaspoonful of spices, and two cups and a half of flour. This should be eaten while fresh, but if it is not, after two or three days, beat the white of an egg to a froth and add sugar enough to make a frosting for the top of the cake. This will ensure its being eaten if there are children in the family.

HOW TO DRY CORN.—Gather the corn when in the proper state of maturity for canning, and scald it in boiling water a sufficient time to set the milk therein; then cut it from the cob and dry as you would apples or other fruit. It should be dried in an oven or drying house, to protect it from insects. It might be dried in the sun by covering it with mosquito netting. After it is dried it can be kept in muslin bags, as dried fruit is kept in drying. Care must be taken that it does not sour by getting wet, else it will be useless.

RICE CAKES.—Cook the rice thoroughly in a farina kettle, and while still quite warm, mould it into round cakes flattened; this to be done the previous day or evening. In the morning dip them into beaten egg, and fry in hot lard or drippings, until of a delicate brown. They are very palatable to eat with meats, or with sugar and cream if thus preferred. The coating of egg keeps them firm, prevents too much fat penetrating, and adds to their good taste and nutritiousness.

RICE CAKES.—Boil rice until it is soft, and while warm make it into cakes or flat balls. Dip the balls into a beaten egg, and then roll them in Indian meal till thoroughly coated. This done, fry them in lard, which is better than butter for this purpose. Serve them with sauce, or with butter, or with cream and sugar.

COLD SLAW.—Take two-thirds of a cup of vinegar, one egg, two tablespoonfuls of sugar, one tablespoonful of salt, half teaspoon of mixed mustard, and butter size of an egg; stir until it boils. When cold, pour over the shaved cabbage.

GHERK PICKLES.—Put a quarter of a pound of salt, two tablespoons of cayenne pepper, one ounce of ginger, one ounce of white pepper, two ounces of shallots, into two quarts of best cider vinegar; boil it a short time, cool, and then pour over any freshly gathered vegetables or fruits which you desire to pickle. Cover closely. Set in a cool, dark place.

SOUTHERN CORN BREAD.—To one pint of corn meal partly scalded, take half a pint of sour milk; one teaspoonful soda, two eggs, dessertspoonful melted lard and a little salt; if the batter is too stiff, add a little more milk; have the oven hot; bake in a shallow pan.

ASPARAGUS AND EGGS.—Take cold boiled asparagus and cut the tender parts into inch lengths, and place in a buttered baking dish, seasoning with a little salt and pepper. Break three or four fresh eggs over them without beating them. Scatter a few bits of butter over the eggs, and bake in a quick oven until the eggs are cooked enough.

ICE CREAM.—One quart of cream, half pound of sugar, flavoring. If the vanilla bean is used, take one half one, boil in half pint of milk, and add cream and sugar; freeze. If strawberries are used for flavoring take one quart and crush, adding the sugar to them before mixing with the cream; freeze.

ABOUT USING SPECTACLES.—It is worthy to note that reading strains the eye more than writing. Twilight should be avoided for any kind of eye work. The pale cobalt blue that is the best that can be employed when protection for the eye from intense glare is sought, as in the case of traveling upon snow fields in the bright sunshine. The green grass that is so often adapted for this purpose is not by any means so worthy of confidence. Reading in railway traveling is objectionable in the highest degree for a very obvious reason. The oscillation of the carriage continually alters the distance of the page from the eye, and so calls for unceasing strain in the effort to keep the organ in due accomodation for the ever varying distance of the dancing image. The exact fitting of the frame work of spectacles to the face and eyes is of more importance than is generally conceived. If the centers of the lenses of the spectacles do not accurately coincide with the centers of the pupils of the eyes, the images in the separate eyes are a little displaced from the positions which they ought to hold, and a somewhat painful and injurious effort has to be made by the eye to bring those images back into due correspondence for accurate vision. An incipient squint is apt to be in this way produced. People should center their spectacles for themselves. This may be easily done by standing before a looking glass with the spectacles in their place. If the fit is a good one, the center of the pupil should then appear in the center of the rim. Fully formed spectacles are always to be preferred to folding frames, because they permit of more satisfactory adjustment in this particular, and because they are more easily kept in the right position with regard to the eyes. The only advantage which the pebble enjoys over glass for the construction of spectacles is the immunity which it possesses against scratching and fracture on account of its greater hardness.—American Inventor.

MORAL EFFECT OF TEA, COFFEE, ETC.—Dr. Beck, of Leipsic, a famous German physician, writes as follows on the moral effect of different articles of food and drink: "The nervousness and peevishness of our times are chiefly attributable to tea and coffee; the digestive organs of confirmed coffee-drinkers are in a state of chronic derangement, which re-acts on the brain, producing fretful and crying moods. Fine ladies addicted to strong coffee have a characteristic temper, which I might describe as a mania for acting the persecuted saint. The snappish, petulant humor of the Chinese can certainly be ascribed to their immoderate fondness for tea. Beer is brutalizing, wine impassions, whisky infuriates, but eventually unmans. The alcoholic drinks, combined with a flesh and fat diet, totally subjugate the moral man, unless their influence be counteracted by violent exercise; but with sedentary habits they produce those unhappy flesh sponges, which may be studied in metropolitan bachelor halls, but better yet in wealthy convents. The soul that may still linger in a fat Austrian abbot is functional to his body only as salt is to pork—in preventing imminent putrefaction.

HOW TO DRINK MILK.—A writer in the Popular Science Monthly tells how milk should be taken: Not in copious draughts like beer or any other fluids which differ from it chemically; if we consider the use of milk in infancy, the physiological ingestion, that is, of food provided for it, each small mouthful is secured by effort and slowly presented to the gastric mucous surface for the primal digestive stages. It is thus regularly and gradually reduced to curd and the stomach is not oppressed with a lump of half-coagulated milk. The same principle should be regarded in case of the adult. Milk should be slowly taken in mouthfuls, at short intervals, and thus it is rightly dealt with by the gastric juice. If milk be taken after other food, it is almost sure to burden the stomach and cause discomfort and prolonged indigestion, and this for the obvious reason that there is insufficient digestive agency to dispose of it, and the better the quality of milk the more severe the discomfort will be under these conditions.

NEW FIRE PROOF BUILDING MATERIAL.—The audacity of American invention, says Chambers' Journal, is proverbial; it disdains belief in the impossible. We now learn that fire-proof houses can be built of cotton and straw. In preparing these materials raw cotton of inferior quality, the scattered refuse of plantations and sweepings of factories are mixed and converted into a paste, which becomes as hard as stone, and is then called architectural cotton. It may be made in large slabs, whereby the building of a house would be rapid in comparison with the practice of laying brick after brick, and at about one-third the cost. For the other part wheat straw is treated in a way already known, and converted into pasteboard. The sheets thus prepared are soaked in a solution which hardens the fibres, and are then compressed under enormous power into beams and boards of any required size; and the effect of the soaking is said to render them difficult of combustion.

—The Princeton telescope of twenty-three inches aperture is nearly completed. The object glass was finished and approved a year ago, and the work upon the mounting, clock-work and accessories has been going on steadily in Cambridge and Princeton. Though a little smaller than the Washington telescope, and considerably smaller than the enormous instruments now constructing for Poulkowa and Nice, it will be one of the great telescopes of the world, and admirably powerful for the work it is designed for stellar spectroscopy.

—During the year ending February 14, the Herald cabled to Europe 16 warnings of coming storms, 87 per cent. of which proved correct, 24 per cent. were partly verified, and 9 per cent. were failures. In the five years since its weather service department was established it has sent 287 warnings to Europe. Of these 209 were entirely correct, 58 partially so, and 22 were unnecessary.

—The path of destruction of American tornadoes has averaged 1085 feet in width, according to Sergeant Finley. The storm cloud moves at the rate of twelve to sixty miles an hour, while the wind within the vortex sometimes reaches the tremendous velocity of 500 miles an hour—300 miles being the average.

—Mr. E. Da Canti reports that it has been found in the Azores that the entrance of smoke into the conservatories causes a rapid development of the buds in the case of roses, annuas, etc., and that this fact is now made use of in hastening the blooming.

—Dr. Scudder asserts that there is no intellect in the world superior to that of the Brahmins.

Ayer's Hair Vigor,

FOR RESTORING GRAY HAIR TO ITS NATURAL VITALITY AND COLOR.

It is a most agreeable dressing, which is at once harmless and effectual, for preserving the hair. It restores, with the gloss and freshness of youth, faded or gray, light, and red hair, to a rich brown, or deep black, as may be desired. By its use thin hair is thickened, and baldness often though not always arrested. It checks falling of the hair immediately, and causes a new growth in all cases where the glands are not decayed; while to brushy, weak, or otherwise diseased hair, it imparts vitality and strength, and renders it pliable.

The Vigor cleanses the scalp, cures and prevents the formation of dandruff, and, by its cooling, stimulating, and healing properties, it heals most if not all of the humors and diseases peculiar to the scalp. Keeping it cool, clear, and healthy, by which conditions diseases of the head and hair are impossible.

Dressing for Ladies' Hair.

Ayer's Hair Vigor is incomparable. It is colorless, contains neither oil nor dye, and will not soil white cambric. It imparts a delightful and lasting perfume, and is an elegant article for the toilet. It is commended and unsurpassed in its excellence.

BANKS—Died in Jackson, Miss., April 16, 1882, of heart disease, Mrs. JENNIE BANKS, nee DeFrance, aged forty-three years.

Mrs. Banks was born in Warren county, Miss., was married to Dr. Robert Bruce Banks, of Jackson, Miss., in 1860, who preceded her two years to the home above, and doubtless awaited her coming near the pearly portals, for, being devoted and united in life, with the same Christian hopes and desires, their unity could but continue in the better land. Dear Cousin Jennie had been long a sufferer, was never strong-ly constituted, and grew gradually weaker until the end came.

She was a woman of fine intellect and thorough culture; but, above all, she was a Christian, and devoted not a pitiful remnant of days to God, but consecrated herself in her youth to his service, and ever remained one of his faithful and elect children. We know that to-day she is rejoicing around the great white throne with those of her loved ones who had gone on before. We know this; for as her mortal frame grew weaker her strong arms of faith reached out into the shadow land, and caught hold, as it were, upon the very gates of heaven. How beautiful thus to live and thus to die! Such a death may well be considered among the Christian's treasures. "To live is Christ; and to die is gain."

The deceased was to the writer as a dear elder sister, and I loved her as such. Many times has she corrected the waywardness of my youth, and assisted in teaching me to experience the holiness of God. We are thankful that she has lived, and that through her example of patience and goodness we have been made better. To her two little orphaned girls we can only say: We taught you how to live, and has given you the rich legacy of how to die; follow her precepts, and your end will be like hers. And now to her dear sister, who still survives her, we can only say: Yet a little while. Just a little more of toil and strife, and the angels shall come: "Well done, thou good and faithful servant." "It is enough; come up higher and enjoy the rest prepared for you;" and swell the blood-washed throng marching through the gates to the New Jerusalem, and claim the treasures laid up in that city whose builder and maker is God.

RESOLUTIONS—In memoriam—by Williamsburg Station Sunday-school:—Mrs. AMELIA L. BLOUNT, the wife of Thomas C. Blount, died in Williamsburg May 28, 1882, aged thirty-two years. She professed faith in Christ in early life, connected herself with the Mount Zion Baptist Church, and has ever lived a consistent, devoted Christian. She became a member and teacher of our school fourteen months before she died. Her labors there, we trust, were greatly blessed. She was regular and prompt in her attendance as long as her health would permit. And when she could no longer attend she sent to be excused in the following words: "Beg to be excused from attending Sunday-school for awhile on account of my health. Get some one to hear my class until I get able, which I hope will be soon. My soul's delight is in Sunday-school."

Resolved, That it has pleased our great Father and Ruler to separate the ties that bind us together, and to call to himself our beloved sister to a perfect life of existence.

Resolved, That we, the survivors of this school, in the bitterness of our sorrow for the separation of the ties that bind us together, do sadly realize the force of the loss in her departure from among us, and, with humble submission, will bow our heads to him who doeth all things well, and say, Thy will be done.

Resolved, That a copy of these resolutions be preserved with the records of our schools, and a copy be sent to the bereaved family, and one to the CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE.

Adopted May 28, 1882.

J. M. STRALEY, Sec.

BRISTER—Died in Bogue Chitto, Miss., on the sixteen of May, 1882, little CLIDE, infant child of H. E. and E. E. BRISTER, aged five months and thirteen days.

The deceased was an interesting and lovely little babe, admired and loved by many, as the anxious and paternal care manifested by many watchful friends throughout his illness would clearly prove. Many sleepless nights were spent by weeping parents and kind-hearted friends around his little bed, and nothing was spared that could be done to stay the afflicting hand of Providence. That unfeeling power that seemed so long to waver on the verge of an eternal separation, crept in turn hopes and disappointments, finally quivered away, as the dawning rays of a western sun, into that night that waited the gentle spirit of little Clyde into the bright realities of eternal day.

Weeping parents, mourn not for your departed idol. He is gone forever from this earth; but he is at home in heaven with Parent; where pains and tortures will never more be felt. Dry your tears, and let the remembrance that your heavenly Father does all things for the best be your consolation. He who afflicts will heal your sorrows, though your loved one in death is sleeping.

H. P. L.

FAUST—Whereas, It has pleased almighty God, in his infinite wisdom and power, to remove by death from amongst our dear and much-beloved pastor, Rev. J. E. Faust; therefore, be it

Resolved, That we, the members of the Methodist Episcopal Church Sunday-school, humbly bow with reverence to his holy will, and, while we feel that we are a smitten and bereaved people, we thank God that we have been blessed in having so faithful a guide, so devoted a pastor, and so loving a friend.

Resolved, That we, as members of the Sunday-school, will pray more earnestly for God's holy spirit to enable us to follow his teachings and example.

Resolved, That we tender our heartfelt sympathies to his bereaved family, and commend them to the blessings of our heavenly Father.

Resolved, That copies of these resolutions be sent to our town papers, and to the Alabama Christian Advocate, and to the NEW ORLEANS CHRISTIAN ADVOCATE for publication, and that they be placed on our Sunday-school record.

EASON.—SISTER ELIZA AGNES EASON died in Caldwell parish, La., May 21, 1882. Her maiden name was Hope. She was born near Louisville, Ky., May 8, 1825. Her parents moved to Macon county, Ga., while she was a girl, and there, at the age of nineteen, she married James A. Eason, and moved with him to Louisiana where he died about 1859. She was converted at the age of sixteen, and joined the Methodist Church, of which she remained a faithful member till her death. The writer never knew her; but her friends say: "She was a truly devoted Christian." Her daughter says: "She was more religious the last year of her life than before." Though unconscious for some time before she died, yet her life was such as to assure us that she was ready to cease from labor and enter into rest.

VAN HORN—THADDEUS ROBERT, infant son of William L. Van Horn, M. D., and Fannie M. Bridger, was born in Columbia, Caldwell parish, La., September 19, 1881, and died June 7, 1882. He was a bright, beautiful child, the pride and joy of his parents, and the pet of those who knew him. Having filled up his mission of gladness for a short time, the Saviour took the little one to a better, brighter world above.

J. D. HARPER.

DEATH'S MASTER.—A Christian woman was lately dying of internal cancer. She was attended by a Roman Catholic nurse, who was very much astonished at the calm patience and peace of the poor sufferer. A friend of mine called to see her one day. The door was opened by the nurse.

"How is Mrs. Blank to-day?" inquired my friend.

"She is very ill, sir," was the reply. The nurse then gave the following details: "Last night she was seized with violent pain and I thought she was dying. I said to her:

"'You are dying; shall I send for a clergyman to prepare you for death?'

"'O, no,' she said, 'I want no minister, for I am ready to die at any moment.'

"'But,' I said, 'are you not afraid to die?'

"'No, indeed, not a bit,' she replied.

"'Tell me why you are not afraid to die, when you have not been prepared by your clergyman, nor received the rites of your church,' I said.

"'Because,' she replied joyously, 'I belong to death's Master. I am a poor sinner saved by grace.'"

A CHEERFUL FACE.—There is no greater every day virtue than cheerfulness. This quality in man among men is like sunshine to the day or gentle renewing moisture to the parched herbs. The light of a cheerful face diffuses itself and communicates the happy spirit that inspires it. The sternest temper must sweeten in the atmosphere of continuous good humor. As well might fog and cloud and vapor hope to cling to the sun-illumined landscape as the "blues" and moroseness to combat jovial speech and exhilarating laughter. Be cheerful always. There is no path but will be easier traveled, no load but will be lighter, no shadow on heart or brain but will lift sooner in presence of a determined cheerfulness. It may at times seem difficult for the happiest tempered to keep the countenance of peace and content, but the difficulty will vanish when we truly consider that sullen gloom and passionate despair do nothing but multiply thorns and thicken sorrows. Ill comes to us providentially as good—and is as good, if we rightly apply its lessons. Why not, then, cheerfully accept the ill, and thus blunt its apparent sting?

HOW EACH MAN BEGINS.—Cornelius Vanderbilt began life with an old pirogue running between Staten Island and New York City, carrying garden stuff to market. With two or three thousand dollars from that source he entered upon steadily increasing enterprises, until he amassed the enormous sum of $40,000,000.

A. T. Stewart first bought a few laces at auction, opened his way to success in a dingy little shop in Broadway, near the site of his wholesale establishment. Years of rapid, honest, shrewd management and wisdom in things both great and small have made him the commanding merchant of the nineteenth century.

Daniel Drew, in his early life, was a cattle driver at the munificent sum of 75 cents a day, and he has now driven himself into an estate valued at from $25,000,000 to $30,000,000.

George Law was 15 years of age, was a common day laborer on the docks, and at present counts his fortune at something like $10,000,000.

Robert J. and Alexander Stuart, the sugar refiners, in their boyhood sold molasses candy, which their widowed mother had made, at a cent a stick, and to-day they are worth probably $5,000,000 to $6,000,000.

Marshall O. Roberts is the possessor of $1,000,000 to $5,000,000, and yet until he was twenty-five, he did not have $100 he could call his own.

H. B. Claflin, the eminent dry goods merchant, worth, it is estimated, $10,000,000 to $15,000,000, commenced the world with nothing but energy, determination, and honesty.

COMETS.—A great local increase of solar action is predicted when huge meteoric masses fall upon the sun. Now, if it chanced that some large comet, arriving from outer space, should fall directly upon the sun, it is most probable that as Newton once suggested the effect would be a great though temporary, increase of the sun's light and heat. Some comets have come near enough to remind us of the possibility of such a catastrophe. Newton's comet, first passed at a distance of less than a third of the sun's diameter from his surface, and the comet of 1811 came even nearer. A very slight change in the direction of either comet, when still at a great distance from the sun, would have led to the catastrophe Newton feared. It may be that the catastrophe would do little harm, or would only affect the comet itself. But for my own part I can not but think that the inhabitants of this world have far more to fear from the fall of a comet upon the sun than from the once dreaded collision of a comet with our earth. It is no unreasonable inference that the great conflagration which caused the star in the northern crown to blaze out so remarkably was produced by the downfall of a comet or flight of meteoric masses upon that orb. In this case it is quite within the bounds of possibility that our sun may one day experience a similar fate. For aught that is certainly known, the more daily continuance of the sun's light and heat may be due to causes which need only to be excited to unusual activity to hasten the prophecy of St. Peter fulfilled. The day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night; in which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise; and the element shall melt with fervent heat; and the works that are therein shall be burned up.—Expanse of the Heavens.

TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT

The Gentle Way is Best.—In dyspepsia, liver complaint, and constipation, the diseased organs are preternaturally sensitive and tender. Do not use them roughly. An alterative like TARRANT'S SELTZER APERIENT, that tones, corrects and purifies the system without unduly exciting or irritating either the stomach, the liver, or the bowels is the true specific in such cases. Reason teaches this, and experience confirms it.

DANIEL PRATT IMPROVED
"Revolving Head Cotton Gin,"
PATENTED JULY 15, 1873.
—AND—
Eclipse Hulling Cotton Gin,
WITH REVOLVING HEAD.
PRICES REDUCED.

THE REVOLVING HEAD GIN has been in use for the past nine seasons, and several improvements have been added. It obviates all friction at the ends of the cotton box, prevents the roll from breaking, and gives a larger yield of lint from the same quantity of seed cotton than any other Gin in use. The Revolving Head lightens the draft and causes the Gin to run faster with less driving power, thus doing a great deal more work within the same time, while consuming steam or animal power, than any other Gin. The seed being ginned very close, the length of the staple is increased, producing cotton on this account of a greater market value. This improved value, given by length of staple, with extra production of lint, added to increased amount of work done, more than covers the cost of the Gin in every bale ginned. Testimonials sent by mail on application.

SELF-FEEDERS and CONDENSERS with latest improvements also made by the Daniel Pratt Gin Company to work with these Gins. Send for descriptive circulars.

THE BEST COTTON GINS.

We are making the ECLIPSE EAGLE COTTON GINS, which proved such a complete success the past season, and which took the first prize at the Atlanta Exposition for ginning bully cotton, which had been gathered with the bolls. We also continue to manufacture our celebrated STANDARD EAGLE GINS, which have for the past twenty-six years been known as the leading Cotton Gins, receiving the indorsement of the largest and best planters. We also make a gin having rows of ten inch diameter. Our FEEDERS and CONDENSERS are the best invented, and the Feeder was awarded the first prize at Atlanta. Edward Atkinson, Col. Burrows the President of Williamette Cotton Company, and other Northern manufacturers of cotton goods, indorse the Eagle Gins as producing the best sample of cotton. Planters in purchasing the Eagle Cotton Gins do so with the certainty of getting the best gin ever made. Circulars sent on application, giving prices and terms. THESE GLASSES ARE CHEMICALLY TREATED IN THE PROCESS OF MANUFACTURE, AND possess the property of keeping your eyes brilliant continually, as they have been carefully examined and analyzed by American and European scientists, that the MEDICATED GLASSES have no equal, and can, in some cases, restore the sight, because in time, but in no case can the eye become impaired by their use, for the following reasons:

1. The chemicals soften the light to the eye, completely shading away the glare, that is one sensation that is usually experienced in using glasses after one or two hours' use.
2. The chemicals make the glasses hard; they retain a polish. Hence you will always see through them as bright and clear as at first.
3. The chemicals keep the glasses cold, and the results is that the eyes always look shining, thus taking away with it any feverish sensation in the eye.
4. With these glasses you can read, write or sew all night, the light having no effect on the eye, with no distressing or tiresome sensation, which necessarily improves the eye.

BEWARE OF COUNTERFEITS. NONE GENUINE UNLESS STAMPED.

BE KIND TO THE SICK.

The only medicine tonic specially adapted to enfeebled invalids and infants is Brown's Iron Bitters. It will not injure the most delicate, but gives new life and new strength to both mind and body. All leading physicians are now recommending it in preference to all other tonics.

Rev. Phillips Brooks, of Boston, accepts from his parish a leave of absence of one year to be spent in Europe, but declines to have his salary continued during his absence.

NEWS OF THE WEEK.

DOMESTIC.

CHICAGO, June 21.—The condition of the strikers who struck against wages ranging from $1 50 to $2 per day is becoming pitiable. Their boasted reserve fund does not hold out, and many of them are actually suffering. They only grow more stubborn, however, preferring to depend on the town for support to yielding their point.

Hon. J. B. Grinnell, of Iowa, is here to solicit aid for the cyclone sufferers in Iowa. He visited a number of citizens, and received great encouragement. J. V. Farwell announced that his check for $1000 was ready for the committee.

FALL RIVER, Mass., June 21.—Owing to the large and constantly increasing stock of print cloths there is a talk of shutting down the mills for a brief period and thus relieve the market.

NEW YORK, June 21.—The striking type founders of Conner & Co. went to work to-day at all advance of wages, but not at the rates asked.

WASHINGTON, June 22.—The government does not appear to have made much progress toward convicting the accused parties in the star route cases. Fraud has been shown, but a conspiracy has not been provon. As conspiracy is the very essence of the crime charged, it must be proven before there can be a conviction.

DES MOINES, June 22.—The following estimate is made of the damage done by the cyclone in the various counties of this State: Boone, $20,000; Story, $30,000; Jasper, $50,000; Powerkiek, $10,000; Keoknk, $100,000, Henry, $1,200,000; Pocahontas, $10,000. The Chicago and Rock Island Railway Company lose in merchandise and property $41,000, and the Iowa Central Railway Company $10,000. The total loss is estimated at from $2,500,000 to $3,000,000.

CHICAGO, June 22.—It is announced that Prof. Swing has retired from the editorial control of the Alliance (religious paper) and will be succeeded by George C. Milton, whose antagonistic views recently caused his retirement from the pastorate of Unity Unitarian Church.

NEW YORK, June 23.—The striking railroad laborers to-day visited the Erie freight houses in Jersey City and frightened the Italian laborers away. The latter were taken back to Castle Garden. The strikers notified them through interpreters that if they returned to work they would be thrown overboard.

FRANKFORT, Ky., June 23.—Among those who professed conversion at the meeting held by the "Mountain Evangelist," Rev. George O. Barnes, at the Opera House last night, was Gov. Luke Blackburn. It is understood Gov. Blackburn will unite with the Protestant Episcopal Church, in Louisville, next Sunday.

BILOXI, Miss., June 24.—It is now believed that there is not, and has not been, any yellow fever on the Norwegian vessel sent from Pensacola to the Ship Island quarantine.

AUGUSTA, Ga., June 24.—At a mass meeting of Democrats of Richmond county, to-day, resolutions were adopted indorsing Alex. H. Stephens for Governor, and James C. C. Black for Congress from the Eighth District.

WASHINGTON, June 24.—The result of the special meeting of the Cabinet last evening, in considering the case of Guiteau, was made known officially this morning by the statement from the Attorney General that the plea for a respite had been refused.

DUBUQUE, June 25.—Reports of the cyclone at Emmettsburg, Ia., telegraphed from Fort Dodge yesterday afternoon, prove to be greatly exaggerated. There was a severe storm and four or five buildings were blown down, but no one was killed.

SOUIX CITY, Ia., June 25.—Further reports show that the cyclone hurricane which wrecked Primghar, struck Hospers, fifty miles northeast of Sioux City at six A. M. and destroyed the Presbyterian Church, school-house, carpenter shop and twenty-five residences and barns. It lasted only fifteen minutes. Henry Gaule, a farmer, was fatally injured. The course appeared to be from west to east, in a path about five miles wide for fifteen miles.

FOREIGN.

LONDON, June 21.—Mr. Gladstone receiving a deputation of Scotch farmers to-day spoke strongly in favor of compensation for improvements made by tenants, and the abolition of entail, though he despaired of legislation on the subject this year.

Police precautions for the safety of Mr. Gladstone, which was recently allowed to lapse, have again been resumed.

PARIS, June 21.—The Senate has commenced the discussion of the bill for the readmission to France of American pork. The clauses of the bill will be discussed on Thursday.

The bill for the sale of the Crown jewels and diamonds has passed the Chamber of Deputies by a vote of 315 to 90, with an amendment of the committee that the proceeds shall be applied to the fund for disabled artisans.

HAVANA, June 22.—Yesterday the police arrested Cannon Leon Bernard, a Belgian, who defranded various Belgian religious societies to the amount of 3,000,000 francs. Bernard was about to embark for St. Thomas. The capture was due to the activity of the Belgian Consul.

LONDON, June 22.—The Times correspondent at Alexandria say: It is generally believed that if the Khedive goes to Cairo he will not return from there alive. The fleet here consists of seven English ships, seven French, two Greek, one Italian, one Austrian, one German, one American, one Russian and one Turkish.

The torpedo depot ship Hecla sailed from Portsmouth to-day for Egypt. She has on board a vast store of explosives, several torpedo boats and a detachment of marines.

PARIS, June 22.—In the Chamber of Deputies, to-day, M. DeFreycinet, Prime Minister, said that France and England have given their ambassadors instructions fixing as a basis of conference, re-establishment of the rights of the Sultan, maintenance of the rights of the Khedive, preservation of the liberties of the Egyptians, and observance of the international engagements of Egypt.

The Senate, despite a favorable speech by M. Tirard, Minister of Commerce, has rejected the bill on the importation of foreign pork, on the ground that it did not offer sufficient guarantee against trichinosis.

ALEXANDRIA, June 22.—Dervisch Pasha has received a telegram from the Sultan, instructing him to use his efforts to induce Arabi Pasha to proceed to Constantinople before the first sitting of the conference and stating that the Sultan is satisfied with the attitude of Arabi Pasha. It is believed that Arabi will decline to go to Constantinople. The Sultan has also telegraphed to the Khedive, expressing satisfaction at his course and promising to use every means to strengthen his authority.

The exodus of Europeans is diminishing. Much sensation has been caused by an official violently denouncing Europeans at a reception given by the Khedive.

DUBLIN, June 22.—The iron-clad Belle Isle has been suddenly ordered to proceed from Kingstown to Egypt. She will reinforce the ships guarding the Suez canal.

MACCLESFIELD, June 22.—The silk trade here is more depressed than it has been a quarter of a century. Hundreds of weavers have emigrated to America.

LONDON, June 23.—An Alexandria correspondent telegraphs that he is informed on the best authority that if France and England interfere actively in Egyptian affairs, Arabi Pasha will blow up the Suez canal, cut the railway to Cairo, and oppose the landing of European troops in Alexandria. If beaten he will retire to the desert, where he is promised the support of 30,000 Bedouins, partisans of Prince Halem. The Egyptian Ministry are prepared to sanction the above on patriotic grounds.

ST. PETERSBURG, June 23.—The Golos says: Five important firms of Moscow have formed a syndicate for the promotion of cotton cultivation in Central Asia. They propose to engage American experts to superintend the cultivation of the plant.

LONDON, June 24.—The Chester, another tank vessel, has also been ordered to the Mediterranean. The Admiralty now deem it desirable to guard the Suez canal by a number of small, swift gunboats, instead of by two guard ships, as originally intended.

Special police are guarding the premises of the London Times owing to the receipt of a threatening letter purporting to come from the Fenian association.

ARMAGH, Ireland, June 24.—Several hundred men marched through the city to-day in military order, singing rebel songs and excerning the Queen. They were afterward drilled.

HAVANA, June 24.—There were forty-four deaths here from yellow fever during the week ending yesterday.

ALEXANDRIA, June 25.—The Sultan has conferred the order of Medjidie of the first class upon Arabi Pasha. He has also presented the Khedive with a souvenir in diamonds, and conferred upon Sultan Pasha a distinction of high rank. Razheb Pasha has telegraphed Count De Lesseps, contradicting the report that the Suez canal is in danger.

ALEXANDRIA, June 26.—An uneasy feeling continues to prevail along the Suez canal. It is rumored that a number of cases containing explosives, accompanied by men in uniform, have arrived at Ismaila and have been deposited in inoccupied public buildings under the supervision of the Governor.

SMYRNA, June 26.—A strong shock of earthquake was felt here yesterday. Five iron-clads arrived here Saturday. It is presumed they will go to Crete or Egypt.

PORTSMOUTH, June 26.—Three hundred marines and three hundred men of the Marine Artillery have been ordered to embark on the troop ship Orontes, which sails for the Mediterranean Wednesday.

LONDON, June 26.—The Press Association reports that the War Office, on Monday, issued orders for 20,000 stand of arms and accoutrements to be ready in four days, with a view, it is believed, of calling out the army reserves within three days.

Mr. B. B. Bruce of Cleveland, O., writes: "I felt generally unwell. Not desiring to get into the clutches of some rapacious doctor, I stepped into a drug store and inquired if they had a remedy that would cure anything and everything. The clerk promptly handed me a bottle of Brown's Iron Bitters. I said, 'Is it good for dyspepsia?' He replied, 'There's nothing better.' 'My urine isn't just the right color, I guess my kidneys are out of order.' 'Just the thing,' said he, 'for kidney disorders; you will find it strengthens all parts of the body, and very refreshing to the mental faculties.' 'Just the thing I want,' thought I, and it suited my complaint precisely. I never before believed in 'cure-alls', and now I make Brown's Iron Bitters the only exception, for I really believe it will relieve any disease that human flesh is heir to."

A FEW WORDS ON PIANOS.

Very few people actually know what pianos to buy. Many say they prefer an instrument like their mothers and grandmothers used to have one of the same make. What was considered a hundred years ago, would be called a thumper now; what suited our ancestors would not satisfy us. Music more than all other arts, is progressive, and the difference between the splendid pianos of old even Beethoven, played in, in comparison with the concert piano, say the Chickering of to-day, is as between the mail coach of our forefathers and a Pullman palace car of to-day. While Europe adhere to fixed old forms and scales, American manufacturers improve year by year. Among them alone have improved and reached a state of perfection, that cannot be excelled. The American piano, durability by their iron plates and bars, volume of tone by over stringing, elasticity of touch by perfection of action, vibration by enlarging sounding board." If a European piano has a value the American makers adopt it. There is no patent or copy-right on them. Take, for instance, the CHICKERING pianos of today, and compare them with those made fifty or sixty years ago, the difference is very clearly illustrated. So have the MATHUSHEK pianos patented features which they possess. Their pin block is of iron, the holes are bushed with maple, and the pins are of hickory maple, which gives them the solidity of iron, and keeps them in tune four times as long as other pianos. Therefore it is not advisable for people to buy French pianos on which the government collects about $100.00 in duties, for a better toned, better looking and more durable piano can be bought for less. I have no prejudice against foreign manufacture, and sold my self large numbers of them in fact that was at a time when American manufacturers made only square pianos. Since then, I have always strived to keep good, reliable and first-class pianos, and as all those who know me will testify to this policy, and fair dealing, I have built up my business, preferring wide praise to the few I have supplied with music.

Respectfully,

PHILIP WERLEIN, 435 Canal St.

It has also, in addition to the ordinary plan of assessments, to facilitate prompt payment of policies, a reserve fund.
